XUM

TO THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCESSE ELIZABETH,

By

THE GRACE OF GOD, OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND QVEENE, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c.

VNder hope of your Highneſſe gracious and accuſtomed fauour, I haue preſumed to preſent here vnto your Majeſtie, Plutarchs liues tranſlated, as a booke fit to be protected by your Highneſſe, and meete to be ſet forth in Engliſh. For who is fitter to giue countenance to ſo many great ſtates, then ſuch an high and mighty Princeſſe? who is fitter to reuiue the dead memorie of their fame, then ſhe that beareth the liuely image of their vertues? who is fitter to authorize a worke of ſo great learning and wiſedome, then ſhe whom all do honour as the Muſe of the world? Therefore I humbly beſeech your Majeſtie, to ſuffer the ſimpleneſſe of my tranſlation, to be couered vnder the ampleneſſe of your Highneſſe protection. For, moſt gracious Soueraigne, though this booke be no booke for your Majeſties ſelfe, who are meeter to be the chiefe ſtorie, then a ſtudent therein, and can better vnderſtand it in Greeke, then any man can make it Engliſh:

yet I hope the common sort of your subiects shall not onely profit themselues hereby, but also be animated to the better seruice of your Maiestie. For among all the prophane bookes that are in reputation at this day, there is none (your Highnesse best knowes) that teacheth so much honor, loue, obedience, reuerence, zeale, and deuotion to Princes, as these liues of Plutarch do. How many examples shall your subiects reade here, of seuerall persons and whole armies, of noble and base, of yong and old, that both by sea and land, at home and abroad, haue strained their wits, not regarding their states, ventured their persons, yea cast away their liues, not onely for the honour and safety, but also for the pleasure of their Princes?

Then well may the Readers thinke, if they haue done this for heathen Kings, what should we do for Christian Princes? If they haue done this for glory, what should we do for religion? If they haue done this without hope of heauen, what should we do, that looke for immortality? And so adding the encouragement of these examples, to the forwardnesse of their owne dispositions: what seruice is there in war, what honour in peace, which they will not be ready to doe, for their worthy Queene?

And therfore that your Highnesse may giue grace to the Booke, and the Booke may do his seruice to your Maiestie: I haue translated it out of French, and do here most humbly present the same vnto your Highnesse; beseeching your Maiestie with all humility, not to reiect the good meaning, but to pardon the errours of your most humble and obedient subiect and seruant, who prayeth God long to multiply all graces and blessings vpon your Maiestie. Written the sixteenth day of Januarie, 1579.

Your Majesties most humble and obedient seruant,

THOMAS NORTH.

To the Reader.

THE profite of ſtories, and the praiſe of the Author, are ſufficiently declared by Amiot, in his Epiſtle to the Reader: ſo that I ſhall not need to make many words thereof. And indeed if you will ſupply the defects of this tranſlation, with your owne diligence and good vnderſtanding: you ſhall not need to truſt him, you may proue your ſelues, that there is no prophane ſtudie better then Plutarch. Al other learning is priuate, fitter for Vniuerſities then Cities, fuller of contemplation then experience, more commendable in ſtudents themſelues, then profitable vnto others. Whereas ſtories are fit for euery place, reach to all perſons, ſerue for all times, teach the liuing, reuiue the dead, ſo farre excelling all other bookes, as it is better to ſee learning in Noblemens liues, then to reade it in Philoſophers writings. Now for the Author, I will not denie but loue may deceiue me, for I muſt needs loue him with whom I haue taken ſo much paine: but I beleeue I might be bold to affirme, that he hath written the profitableſt ſtorie of all Authors. For all other were faine to take their matter, as the fortune of the countries whereof they wrote, fell out: But this man being excellent in wit, learning, and experience, hath choſen the ſpeciall acts of the beſt perſons, of the famouſeſt nations of the world. But I will leaue the iudgement to your ſelues. My onely purpoſe is to deſire you to excuſe the faults of my tranſlation, with your owne gentleneſſe, and with the opinion of my diligence and good intent. And ſo I wiſh you all the profit of the booke. Fare ye well. The foure and twentieth day of Ianuarie. 1579.

Amiot to the Readers.

THE reading of bookes which bring but a vaine and vnprofitable pleasure to the Reader, is iustly misliked of wise and graue men. Againe, the reading of such as do but onely bring profit, and make the Reader to be in loue therewith, and do not ease the paine of the reading by some pleasantnesse in the same: do seeme somewhat harsh to diuers delicate wits, that cannot tarie long vpon them. But such bookes as yeeld pleasure and profit, and do both delight and teach, haue all that a man can desire why they should be vniuersally liked and allowed of all sorts of men, according to the common saying of the Poet Horace:

That he which matcheth profit with delight,
Doth winne the prize in euery point aright.

Either of these yeeld his effect the better, by reason the one runneth with the other, profiting the more because of the delight, and delighting the more because of the profit. This commendation (in my opinion) is most proper to the reading of stories, to haue pleasure and profit matched together, which kind of delight and teaching, meeting in this wise arme in arme, hath more allowance then any other kind of writing or inuention of man. In respect whereof it may be reasonably auowed, that men are more beholding to such good wits, as by their graue and wise writing haue deserued the name of Historiographers then they are to any other kind of writers: because an history is an orderly register of notable things said, done, or happened in times past, to maintaine the continuall remembrance of them, and to serue for the instruction of them to come.

And like as memory is as a store-house of mens conceits and deuices, without the which the actions of the other two parts should be vnperfect, and well-neare vnprofitable: so may it also be said, that an history is the very treasury of mans life, whereby the notable doings and sayings of men, and the wonderfull aduentures and strange cases, (which the long continuance of time bringeth forth) are preserued from the death of forgetfulnesse. Hereupon it riseth that Plato the wise saith, that the name of history was giuen to the recording of matters, to stay the fleeting of our memory, which otherwise would be soone lost, and retaine litle. And we may well perceiue how greatly we be beholding vnto it, if we do no more but consider in how horrible darknesse, and in how beastly and pestilent a quagmire of ignorance we should be plunged: if the remembrance of all the things that haue bene done, and haue happened before we were borne, were vtterly drowned and forgotten. Now therefore I will ouerpasse the excellencie and worthinesse of the thing it selfe, forasmuch as it is not onely of more antiquity then any other kind of writing that euer was in the world, but also was vsed among men, before there was any vse of letters at all: because that men in those dayes deliuered in their life times the remembrance of things past to their successors, in songs, which they caused their children to learne by heart, from hand to hand, as is to be seene yet in our dayes, by the example of the barbarous people that inhabite the new-found land in the West, who without any records of writings, haue had the knowledge of things past, wel-neare eight hundred yeares afore. Likewise I leaue to discourse, that it is the surest, safest, and durablest monument that men can leaue of their doings in this world, to consecrate their names to immortality. For there is neither picture, nor image of marble, nor arch of triumph, nor pillar, nor sumptuous sepulcher, that can match the durableneese of an eloquent history, furnished with the properties which it ought to haue. Againe, I mind not to stand much vpon this, that it hath a certaine troth in it, in that it alwaies profeßeth to ſpeake truth, and for that the proper ground thereof is to treate of the greateſt and higheſt things that are done in the world: inſomuch that (to my ſeeming) the greateſt profit thereof is, as Horace ſaith, that it is commonly called the mother of troth and vprightneſſe; which commendeth it ſo greatly, as it needeth not elſewhere to ſeeke any authority, or ornament of dignity, but of her very ſelfe. For it is a certaine rule and inſtruction, which by examples paſt, teacheth vs to iudge of things preſent, and to foreſee things to come: ſo as we may know what to like of, and what to follow: what to miſlike, and what to eſchue. It is a picture, which (as it were in a table) ſetteth before our eyes the things worthie of remembrance that haue bene done in old time by mighty nations, noble Kings and Princes, wiſe Gouernours, valiant Captaines, and perſons renowmed for ſome notable quality, repreſenting vnto vs the manners of ſtrange nations, the lawes and cuſtomes of old time, the particular affaires of men, their conſultations and enterpriſes, the meanes that they haue vſed to compaſſe them withall, and their demeaning of themſelues when they were come to the higheſt, or throwne downe to the loweſt degree of ſtate. So as it is not poßible for any caſe to riſe either in peace or warre, in publike or priuate affaires, but that the perſon which ſhall haue diligently read, well conceiued, and throughly remembred hiſtories, ſhall find matter in them whereat to take delight, and counſell whereby to reſolue himſelfe to take a part, or to giue aduice vnto others, how to chooſe in doubtfull and dangerous caſes that which may be for their moſt profit, and in time to find out to what point the matter will come if it be well handled: and how to moderate himſelfe in proſperity, and how to cheare vp and beare himſelfe in aduerſity. Theſe things it doth with much greater grace, efficacie, and ſpeed, then the bookes of morall Philoſophie do: foraſmuch as examples are of more force to moue and inſtruct, then are the arguments and proofes of reaſon, or their preciſe precepts; becauſe examples be the very formes of our deedes, and accompanied with all circumſtances. Whereas reaſons and demonſtrations are generall and tend to the proofe of things, and to the beating of them into vnderſtanding: and examples tend to the ſhewing of them in practiſe and execution, becauſe they do not onely declare what is to be done, but alſo worke a deſire to do it, as well in reſpect of a certaine naturall inclination which all men haue to follow examples, as alſo for the beautie of vertue, which is of ſuch power, that whereſoeuer ſhe is ſeene, ſhe maketh her ſelfe to be loued and liked. Againe, it doth things with greater weight and grauitie, then the inuentions and deuices of the Poets: becauſe it helpeth not it ſelfe with any other thing then with the plaine truth, whereas Poetry doth commonly enrich things by commending them aboue the ſtarres and their deſeruing, becauſe the chiefe intent thereof is to delight. Moreouer, it doth things with more grace and modeſtie then the ciuill lawes and ordinances do: becauſe it is more grace for a man to teach and inſtruct, then to chaſtiſe or puniſh. And yet for all this, an hiſtory alſo hath his manner of puniſhing the wicked, by the reproch of euerlaſting infamie, wherewith it defaceth their remembrance; which is a great meane to withdraw them from vice, who otherwiſe would be leudly and wickedly diſpoſed. Likewiſe on the contrary part, the immortall praiſe and glorie wherewith it rewardeth wel-doers, is a very liuely and ſharpe ſpurre for men of noble courage and gentleman-like nature, to cauſe them to aduenture vpon all manner of noble and great things. For bookes are full of examples of men of high courage and wiſedome, who for deſire to continue the remembrance of their name by the ſure and certaine record of hiſtories, haue willingly yeelded their liues to the ſeruice of the common-weale, ſpent their goods, ſuſtained infinite paines both of body and mind in defence of the oppreſſed, in making common buildings, in ſtabliſhing of lawes and gouernements, and in the finding out of arts and ſciences neceſſary for the maintenance and ornament of mans life: for the faithfull regiſtring whereof, the thanke is due to hiſtories. And although true vertue ſeeke no reward of her commendable doings like a hireling, but contenteth her ſelfe with the conſcience of her well doing: yet notwithſtanding I am of opinion, that it is good and meet to draw men by all meanes to good doing, and good men ought not to be forbidden to hope for the honour of their vertuous deeds, ſeeing that honour doth naturally accompanie vertue, as the ſhadow doth the body. For we commonly ſee, that not to feele the ſparkes of deſire of honour, is an infallible ſigne of a baſe, vile, and clowniſh nature: and that ſuch as count it an vnneceſſary, needleſſe, or vnſeemely thing to be praiſed, are likewiſe no doers of any things worthie of praiſe, but are commonly men of faint courage, whoſe thoughts extend no further then to their liues, whereof alſo they haue no further remembrance, then is before their eyes. But if the counſell of old men be to be greatly eſteemed, becauſe they muſt needs haue ſeene much by reaſon of their long life: and if they that haue trauelled long in ſtrange countries, and haue had the managing of many affaires, and haue gotten great experience of the doings of this world, are reputed for ſage, and worthie to haue the reynes of great gouernements put into their hands: how greatly is the reading of histories to be esteemed, which is able to furnish vs with more examples in one day, then the whole course of the longest life of any man is able to do? Insomuch that they which exercise themselues in reading as they ought to do, although they be but yong, become such in respect of vnderstanding of the affaires of this world, as if they were old and gray headed, and of long experience. Yea though they neuer haue remoued out of their houses, yet are they aduertised, informed, and satisfied of all things in the world, as well as they that haue shortned their lines by innumerable trauels and infinite dangers, in running ouer the whole earth that is inhabited: whereas on the contrary part, they that are ignorant of the things that were done & come to passe before they were born, continue still as children, though they be neuer so aged, and are but as strangers in their owne natiue countries. To be short, it may be truly said, that the reading of histories is the schoole of wisdome, to fashion mens vnderstanding, by considering aduisedly the state of the world that is past, and by marking diligently by what lawes, manners, and discipline, Empires, Kingdomes and dominions, haue in old time bene stablished, and afterward maintained and increased: or contrariwise changed, diminished, and ouerthrowne. Also we reade, that whensoeuer the right sage and vertuous Emperor of Rome, Alexander Seuerus, was to consult of any matter of great importance, whether it concerned warr, or gouernment: he alwaies called such to counsell, as were reported to be well seene in histories. Notwithstanding I know there are that will stand against me in this point, and vphold, that the reading of histories can serue to small purpose, or none at all, towards the getting of skill: because skill consisteth in action, and is engendred by the very experience and practise of things, when a man doth well marke and throughly beare away the things that he hath seene with his eyes, and found true by proofe, according to the saying of the ancient Poet Afranius:

My name is Skill, my Syre Experience hight,
And Memorie bred and brought me forth to light.

Which thing was meant likewise by the Philosopher that said, that the hand is the instrument of skill. By reason whereof it commeth to passe (say they) that such as speake of matters of gouernement and state, but specially of matters of warre by the booke, speake but as booke knights, as the French prouerbe termeth them, after the manner of the Grecians, who call him a booke Pilot, which hath not the sure and certaine knowledge of the things that he speakes of: meaning thereby, that it is not for a man to trust to the vnderstanding which he hath gotten by reading, in things that consist in the deed doing, where the hand is to be set to the worke: no more then the often hearing of men talke and reason of painting, or the disputing vpon colours, without taking of the pensill in hand, can stand a man in any stead at all to make him a good painter. But on the contrary part, many haue proued wise men and good Captaines, which could neither write nor reade. Besides this, they alledge further, that in matters of warre, all things alter from yeare to yeare: by meanes whereof the sleights and policies that are to be learned out of bookes, will serue the turne no more then wines that are blowne vp. According whereunto Cambyses telleth his sonne Cyrus in Xenophon, that like as in Musicke the newest songs are commonly the best liked of for once, because they were neuer heard of afore: So in the warres, those policies that neuer were practised afore, are those that take best successe, and commonly haue the best effect, because the enemies do least doubt of them. Neuertheless I am not he that will maintaine, that a wise Gouernour of a common-weale, or a great Captaine, can be made of such a person, as hath neuer trauelled out of his studie, and from his bookes: howbeit that which Cicero writeth of Lucius Lucullus, is true, that when he departed out of Rome as Captaine generall and Lieutenant of the Romaines, to make warre against King Mithridates, he had no experience at all of the wars, and yet afterward he bestowed so great diligence in the reading of histories, and in conferring vpon euerie point with the old Captaines and men of long experience whom he caried with him, that by the time of his comming into Asia, where he was indeed to put his matters in execution, hee was found to be a verie sufficient Captaine, as appeared by his deedes: insomuch that by those wayes, cleane contrarie to the common order of warre, he discomfited two of the most puissant and greatest Princes that were at that time in the East. For his vnderstanding was so quicke, his care so vigilant, and his courage so great, that he needed no long training, nor grosse instruction by experience. And although I grant there haue bene diuerse Gouernours and Captaines, which by the onely force of nature (furthered by long continued experience) haue done goodly and great exploites: yet can it not be denied me, but that if they had matched the gifts of nature with the knowledge of learning and the reading of histories, they might haue done much greater things, and they might haue become much more perfect. For like as in euerie other cunning and skill wherein a man intendeth tendeth to excell: ſo alſo to become a perfect and ſufficient perſon to gouerne in peace and warre, there are three things of neceſſitie required, namely, nature, art, and practiſe. Nature (in the caſe we treate of) muſt furniſh vs with a good mother wit, with a body well diſpoſed to endure all manner of trauell, and with a good will to aduance our ſelues: Art muſt giue vs iudgement and knowledge, gotten by the examples and wiſe diſcourſes that we haue read and double read in good hiſtories: and Practiſe wil get vs readineſſe, aſſuredneſſe, and the eaſe how to put things in execution. For though Skill be the ruler of doing the deed, yet it is a vertue of the mind which teacheth a man the meane point betweene the two faultie extremities of too much and too little, wherein the commendation of all doings conſiſteth. And whoſoeuer he is that goeth about to attaine to it by the onely triall of experience, and had rather learne it at his owne coſt, then at another mans: he may well be of the number of thoſe that are touched by this ancient Prouerb, which ſaith, Experience is the ſchoole-miſtris of fooles: becauſe mans life is ſo ſhort, and experience is hard and dangerous; ſpecially in matters of war, wherein (according to the ſaying of Tamachus the Athenian Captaine) a man cannot fault twice, becauſe the faults are ſo great, that moſt commonly they bring with them the ouerthrow of the ſtate, or loſſe of the liues of thoſe that do them. Therefore we muſt not tarie for this wit that is woone by experience, which coſteth ſo deare, and is ſo long in coming, that a man is oft times dead in the ſeeking of it before he haue attained it, ſo as he had need of a ſecond life to employ it in, becauſe of the ouer late coming by it. But we muſt make ſpeed by our diligent and continuall reading of hiſtories both old and new, that we may enioy this happineſſe which the Poet ſpeaketh of:

Three things neceſſary for a Magiſtrate, or Captaine.

A happie wight is he that by miſhaps
Of others, doth beware of afterclaps.

By the way, as concerning thoſe that ſay that paper will beare all things: if there be any that vnworthily take vpon them the name of Hiſtoriographers, and do deface the dignity of the ſtorie for hatred or fauour, by mingling any vntruth with it: that is not the fault of the hiſtorie, but of the men that are partiall, who do abuſe that name vnworthily, to couer and cloake their owne paſſions withall, which thing ſhall neuer come to paſſe, if the writer of the ſtorie haue the properties that are neceſſarily required in a ſtorie-writer, as theſe: That he ſet aſide all affection, be voide of enuie, hatred, and flatterie: that he be a man experienced in the affaires of the world, of good vtterance and iudgement, to diſcerne what is to be ſaid, and what to be left vnſaid; and what would do more harme to haue it declared, then do good to haue it reproued or condemned: foraſmuch as his chiefe drift ought to be to ſerue the common-weale, and that he is but as a regiſter to ſet downe the iudgements and definitiue ſentences of Gods Court, whereof ſome are giuen according to the ordinarie courſe and capacity of our weake naturall reaſon, and other ſome go according to Gods infinite power and incomprehenſible wiſedome, aboue and againſt all diſcourſe of mans vnderſtanding, who being vnable to reach the bottome of his iudgements, and to finde out the firſt motions and grounds thereof, doe impute the cauſe of them to a certaine fortune, which is nought elſe but a fained deuice of mans wit, dazeled at the beholding of ſuch brightneſſe, and confounded at the gazing of ſo bottomeleſſe a deepe: howbeit, nothing commeth to paſſe nor is done without the leaue of him that is the very right and truth it ſelfe, with whom nothing is paſt or to come, who knoweth and vnderſtandeth the verie originall cauſes of all neceſſitie. The conſideration whereof teacheth men to humble themſelues vnder his mightie hand, by acknowledging that there is one firſt cauſe which ouerruleth nature, whereof it commeth, that neither hardineſſe is alwaies happie, nor wiſdome alwaies ſure of good ſucceſſe. Theſe ſo notable commodities are euery where accompanied with ſingular delight, which proceedeth chiefly of diuerſity and noueltie, wherein our nature delighteth, and is greatly deſirous of: becauſe we hauing an earneſt inclination towards our beſt proſperitie and aduancement, it goeth on ſtill, ſeeking in it euerie thing which it taketh to be goodly, or good in this world. But foraſmuch as it findeth not wherewith to content it ſelfe vnder the cope of heauen, it is ſoone wearie of the things that it had earneſtly deſired before, and ſo goeth on wandering in the vnskilfulneſſe of her likings, whereof ſhe neuer ceaſſeth to make a continuall changing vntill ſhe haue fully ſatisfied her deſires, by attaining to the laſt end, which is, to be knit to her chiefe felicitie, where is the full perfection of all goodlineſſe and goodneſſe. This liking of varietie cannot be better relieued, then by that which is the finder out and the preſeruer of time, the father of all noueltie, and meſſenger of antiquitie. For if we finde a certaine ſingular pleaſure, in hearkning to ſuch as be returned from ſome long voyage, and do report things which they haue ſeene in ſtrange countries, as the manners of people, the natures of places, and the faſhions of liues, differing from ours: and if we be ſometime ſo ra-uiſhed with delight and pleaſure at the hearing of the talke of ſome wiſe, diſcreete, and well ſpoken old man, from whoſe mouth there floweth a ſtreame of ſpeech ſweeter then honie, in rehearſing the aduentures which he hath had in his greene and youthfull yeares, the paines that he hath endured, and the perils that he hath ouer paſſed, ſo as we perceiue not how the time goeth away: how much more ought we to be raviſhed with delight and wondering, to behold the ſtate of mankind, and the true ſucceſſe of things, which antiquity hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world; as the ſetting vp of Empires, the ouerthrow of Monarchies, the riſing and falling of Kingdomes, and all things elſe worthie admiration, and the ſame liuely ſet forth in the faire, rich, and true table of Eloquence? And that ſo liuely, as in the very reading of them we ſee our minds to be ſo touched by them, not as though the things were already done and paſt, but as though they were euen then preſently in doing, and we find our ſelues caried away with gladnes and griefe through feare or hope, well neare as though we were then at the doing of them: whereas notwithſtanding we be not in any paine or danger, but onely conceiue in our minds the aduerſities that other folkes haue endured, our ſelues ſitting ſafe with our contentation and eaſe, according to thoſe verſes of the Poet Lucretius:

It is a pleaſure for to ſit at eaſe
Vpon the land, and ſafely for to ſee
How other folkes are toſſed on the ſeas,
That with the bluſtring winds turmoiled be.
Not that the ſight of others miſeries
Doth any way the honeſt heart delight:
But for becauſe it liketh well our eyes.
To ſee harmes free, that on our ſelues might light.

Alſo it is ſeene that the reading of hiſtories doth ſo hold and allure good wits, that diuers times it not onely maketh them to forget all other pleaſures, but alſo ſerueth very fitly to turne away their griefes, and ſometimes alſo to remedie their diſeaſes. As for example, we find it written of Aphonſus King of Naples, that Prince ſo greatly renowned in Chronicles for his wiſedome and goodneſſe, that being ſore ſicke in the city of Capua, when his Phiſitions had ſpent all the cunning that they had to recouer him his health, and he ſaw that nothing preuailed: he determined with himſelfe to take no more medicines, but for his recreation cauſed the ſtorie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deeds of Alexander the Great, to be read before him: at the hearing whereof he tooke ſo wonderfull pleaſure, that nature gathered ſtrength by it, and ouercame the waywardneſſe of his diſeaſe. Whereupon, hauing ſoone recouered his health, he diſcharged his Phiſitions with ſuch words as theſe: Feaſt mee no more with your Hippocrates and Galene, ſith they can no skill to helpe me to recouer my health: but well fare Quintus Curtius, that could ſo good skill to helpe me to recouer my health. Now if the reading and knowledge of hiſtories be delightfull and profitable to all other kind of folke: I ſay it is much more for great Princes and Kings, becauſe they haue to do with charges of greateſt weight and difficultie, to be beſt ſtored with gifts and knowledge for the diſcharge of their duties: ſeeing the ground of ſtories is, to treate of all manner of high matters of eſtate, as warres, battels, cities, countries, treaties of peace and alliances, and therefore it ſeemeth more fit for them, then for any other kind of degrees of men: becauſe they being bred and brought vp tenderly, and at their eaſe, by reaſon of the great regard and care that is had of their perſons (as meete is for ſo great ſtates to haue) they take not ſo great paines in their youth for the learning of things as behoueth thoſe to take which will learne the noble ancient languages, and the painefull doctrine comprehended in Philoſophie. Againe, when they come to mans ſtate, their charge calleth them to deale in great affaires, ſo as there remaineth no exerciſe of wit more conuenient for them, then the reading of hiſtories in their owne tongue, which without paine is able to teach them euen with great pleaſure and eaſe, whatſoeuer the painefull workes of the Philoſophers concerning the gouernement of common-wealths can ſhew them, to make them skilfull in the well ruling and gouerning of the people and countries that God hath put vnder their ſubiection. But the worſt is, that they euer (or for the moſt part) haue ſuch manner of perſons about them, as ſeeke nothing elſe but to pleaſe them by all the wayes they can, and there are very few that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: whereas on the contrarie part, an hiſtorie flattereth them not, but layeth open before their eyes the faults and vices of ſuch as were like them in greatneſſe of degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalerius (a man renowned aſwell for his skill in the good gouernement of a common-weale, as for his excellent knowledge otherwiſe) counſelled Ptolomie, firſt king of Ægypt after the death of Alexander the Great, that he ſhould often and diligently reade the bookes that treated of the gouernement of Kingdomes because (said he) thou shalt find many things there, which thy seruants and familiar friends dare not tell thee: Moreouer this is another thing, that such great personages cannot easily trauell out of the bounds of their dominions, to go view strange countries, as priuate persons do: because the iealousie of their estate, and the regard of their dignitie, requires that they should neuer be in place where another man might command them. And oftentimes for want of hauing seene the countries, and knowne the people and Princes that are their neighbours, they haue aduentured vpon attempts without good ground: to auoide the which, the instruction they may haue by the reading of histories, is one of the easiest and fittest remedies that can be found. And though there were none other cause then onely this last, surely it ought to induce Princes to the often and diligent reading of histories, wherein are written the heroicall deedes of wise and valiant men, specially of Kings that haue bene before them: the consideration whereof may cause them to be desirous to become like them, specially which were of stately and noble courage: because the seedes of Princely vertues that are bred with themselues, do then quicken them vp with an emulation towards those that haue bene or are equall in degree with them, as well in respect of noblenesse of bloud as of greatnesse of state, so as they be loth to giue place to any person, and much lesse can find in their hearts to be out-gone in glorie of vertuous doings. Whereof innumerable examples might be alleadged, if the thing were not so well knowne of it selfe, that it were much more against reason to doubt of it, then needfull to proue it. Therefore a man may truely conclude, that an historie is the schoole-mistris of Princes, at whose hand they may without paine, in way of pastime, and with singular pleasure learne the most part of the things that belong to their office. Now, according to the diuersitie of the matter that it treateth of, or the order and manner of writing that it vseth, it hath sundry names giuen vnto it: but yet among the rest, there are two chiefe kinds. The one, which setteth downe mens doings and aduentures at length, is called by the common name of an historie: the other which declareth their natures, sayings and manners, is properly named their liues. And although the ground of them both do close very neare in one, yet doth the one respect more the things, and the other the persons: the one is more common, and the other more priuate: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceede from within: the one the euents, the other the consultations: betweene the which there is oftentimes great odds, according to this answer of the Persian Siramnes, to such as maruelled how it came to passe, that his deuices being so politicke, had so vnhappie successe: it is (quoth he) because my deuices are wholly from mine owne inuention, but the effects of them are in the disposition of Fortune and the King. And surely among those that euer haue taken vpon them to write the liues of famous men, the chiefe prerogatiue, by the iudgement of such as are clearest sighted, is iustly giuen to the Greeke Philosopher Plutarke, borne in the citie of Chæronea in the countrey of Bœotia, a noble man, perfect in all rare knowledge, as his workes may well put men out of doubt, if they list to reade them through, who all his life long, euen to his old age, had to deale in affaires of the common-weale, as he himselfe witnesseth in diuers places, specially in the treatise which he intituled, Whether an old man ought to meddle with the gouernment of a common-weale or not: and who had the hap and honour to be schoolemaster to the Emperour Traian, as is commonly beleeued, and as is expresly pretended in a certaine Epistle set before the Latine translation of his matters of state, which (to say the truth) seemeth in my iudgement to be somewhat suspitious, because I finde it not among his workes in Greeke: besides that it speaketh as though the booke were dedicated to Traian, which thing is manifestly disproued by the beginning of the booke, and by diuers other reasons. Yet notwithstanding, because me thinkes it is sagely and gracely written, and well beseeming him, I haue set it downe here in this place: Plutarke vnto Troian sendeth greeting. I know well, that the modestie of your nature was not desirous of Soueraignetie, though you haue alwayes endeuoured to deserue it by your honourable conuersation: by reason whereof you haue bene thought so much the worthier of it, as you haue bene found the further off from all ambition. And therefore I do now reioyce in your vertue and my fortune, if it be so great as to cause you to administer that thing with iustice, which you haue obtained by desert. For otherwise, I am sure you haue put your selfe in hazard of great danger, and me in perill of slanderous tongues, because that Rome cannot away with a wicked Emperour, and the common voyce of the people is alwayes wont to cast the faults of the schollers in the teeth of their schoole-masters: as for example, Seneca is railed vpon by slanderous tongues, for the faults of his scholler Nero: the scapes of Quintilians yong schollers, are imputed to Quintilian himself: and Socrates is blamed for being too mild to his hearers. But as for you, there is hope you shall do all things well enough, so you keepe you as you

cc are. If you firſt ſet your ſelfe in order, and then diſpoſe all other things according to vertue, all things cc ſhall fall out according to your deſire. I haue ſet you downe the meanes in writing, which you muſt
cc obſerue for the well gouerning of your common-weale, and haue ſhewed vnto you of how great force cc your behauiour may be in that behalfe. If you thinke good to follow thoſe things, you haue Plutarke cc for the directer and guider of your life: if not, I proteſt vnto you by this Epiſtle, that your falling into cc danger, to the ouerthrow of the Empire, is not by the doctrine of Plutarke. This Epiſtle witneſſeth plainely, that he was the ſchoolemaſter of Traian, which thing ſeemeth to be auowed by this writing of Suidas: Plutarke being borne in the citie of Cheronea in Bœotia, was in the time of the Emperour Traian, and ſomewhat before. But Traian honoured him with the dignitie of Conſulſhip, and commanded the officers and magiſtrates that were throughout all the countrey of Illyria, that they ſhould not do any thing without his counſell and authoritie. So doth Suidas write of him. And I am of opinion, that Traian being ſo wiſe an Emperour, would neuer haue done him ſo great honor, if he had not thought himſelfe greatly beholding to him for ſome ſpeciall cauſe. But the thing that maketh me moſt to beleeue it true, is, that the ſame goodneſſe and iuſtice appeared to be naturally imprinted in moſt of Traians ſayings and doings, whereof the patterne and mould (as a man may terme it) is caſt and ſet downe in Plutarkes Morals, ſo as men may perceiue expreſly, that the one could well skill to performe rightly, that which the other had taught wiſely: For Dion writeth, that among other honours which the Senate of Rome gaue by decree vnto Traian, they gaue him the title of the good Emperour. And Eutropius reporteth, that euen vnto his time, when a new Emperour came to be receiued of the Senate, among the cries of good handſell, and the wiſhes of good lucke that were made vnto him, one was: Happier be thou then Auguſtus, and better then Traian. Howſoeuer the caſe ſtood, it is verie certaine that Plutarke dedicated the collection of his Apothegmes vnto him. But when he had liued a long time in Rome, and was come home againe to his owne houſe, he fell to writing of this excellent worke of Liues, which he calleth Parallelon, as much to ſay, as a coupling or matching together, becauſe he matcheth a Grecian with a Romaine, ſetting downe their liues each after other, and comparing them together, as he found any likeneſſe of nature, conditions, or aduentures betwixt them, and examining what the one of them had better or worſer, greater or leſſer then the other: which things he doth with ſo goodly and graue diſcourſe euery where, taken out of the deepeſt and moſt hidden ſecrets of morall and naturall Philoſophie, with ſo ſage precepts and fruitfull inſtructions, with ſo effectuall commendation of vertue, and deteſtation of vice, with ſo many goodly allegations of other Authors, with ſo many fit compariſons, and with ſo many high inuentions: that the booke may better be called by the name of the Treaſurie of all rare and perfect learning, then by any other name. Alſo it is ſaid, that Theodorus Gaza, a Grecian of ſingular learning, & a Worthy of the ancient Grece, being asked on a time by his familiar friends (which ſaw him ſo earneſtly giuē to his ſtudy that he forgot all other things) what Author he had leuereſt chooſe, if he were at that point that he muſt needs chooſe ſome one to hold him to alone, did anſwer, that he would chooſe Plutarke: becauſe that if they were all put togēther, there was no one both ſo profitable, and ſo pleaſant to reade, as he. Soſſius Senecio to whom he dedicateth his worke, was a Senator of Rome, as witneſſeth Dion, who writeth that the three perſons whom Traian moſt loued and honored, were Soſſius, Parma, and Celſus, inſomuch that he cauſed images of them to be ſet vp. True it is that he wrote the liues of many other men, which the ſpitefulneſſe of the time hath bereft vs of, among which he himſelfe maketh mention of the liues of Scipio Africanus, and Metellus Numidicus. And I haue read a litle Epiſtle of a ſonne of his, whoſe name is not expreſſed, copied out of an old copie in the Librarie of S. Marke in Venice, wherein he writeth to a friend of his, a regiſter of all the bookes that his father made: and there among the couples of liues, he ſetteth downe the liues of Scipio and Epaminondas, and laſtly the liues of Auguſtus Cæſar, of Tiberius, of Caligula, of Claudius, of Nero, of Galba, of Vitellius, and of Otho. But hauing vſed all the diligence that I could in ſearching the chiefe Libraries of Venice & Rome, I could neuer find them out. Onely I drew out certaine diuerſities of readings, and many corrections, by conferring the old written copies with the printed bookes: which haue ſtood me in great ſtead to the vnderſtanding of many hard places: and there are a great number of them which I haue reſtored by coniecture, by the iudgement and helpe of ſuch men of this age, as are of greateſt knowledge in humane learning. Yet for all this, there remaine ſome places vnamended, howbeit verie few, becauſe ſome lines were wanting in the originall copies, whereof (to my ſeeming) it was better for me to witneſſe the want by marking it with ſome ſtarre, then to gueſſe at it with all aduenture, or to adde any thing to it. Now finally, if I haue ouerſhot my ſelfe in any thing, as it is verie eaſie to do in ſo hard and long a worke,

a worke, ſpecially to a man of ſo ſmall ability as I am: I beſeech the Readers to vouchſafe for my diſcharge, to admit the excuſe which the Poet Horace giueth me, where he ſaith:

A man may well be ouerſeene
In workes that long and tedious beene.

Specially ſith that of ſo many good men, and men of skill, as haue heretofore ſet hand to the tranſlating of it, there was neuer yet any one found, that went through with it in any language, at leaſtwiſe that I haue ſeene or heard of: and that ſuch as haue enterpriſed to tranſlate it, ſpecially into Latine, haue euidently witneſſed the hardneſſe thereof, as they may eaſily perceiue which liſt to conferre their tranſlations with mine. Neuertheleſſe if it ſo fortune that men find not the ſpeech of this tranſlation ſo flowing, as they haue found ſome other of mine, that are abroad in mens hands: I beſeech the Readers to conſider, that the office of a fit Tranſlator, conſiſteth not onely in the faithfull expreſſing of his Authors meaning, but alſo in a certaine reſembling and ſhadowing out of the forme of his ſtile, and the maner of his ſpeaking: vnleſſe they will commit the errour of ſome painters, who hauing taken vpon them to draw a man liuely, do paint him long where he ſhould be ſhort, and groſſe where he ſhould be ſlender, and yet ſet out the reſemblance of his countenance naturally. For how harſh or rude ſoeuer my ſpeech be, yet am I ſure that my tranſlation will be much eaſier to my countrimen, then the Greeke copie is, euen to ſuch as are beſt practiſed in the Greeke tongue, by reaſon of Plutarchs peculiar maner of inditing, which is rather ſharpe, learned, and ſhort, then plaine, poliſhed, and eaſie. At the hardeſt, although I haue not compaſſed my matters ſo happily as ye would haue wiſhed and deſired: yet do I hope that your Lordſhips in reading it will hold the parties good will excuſed, which hath taken ſuch paines in doing of it to profit you. And if my labour be ſo happie as to content you, God be praiſed for it, which hath giuen me the grace to finiſh it.

THE

THE LIVES OF THE NOBLE GREEKES AND ROMAINES, THE MOST OF THEM COMPARED TOGETHER

by that graue learned Philoſopher and Hiſtoriographer

Theſeus.

LIKE as the hiſtoriographers which do ſet forth the deſcription of the earth in figure (my friend Soſius Senecio) are wont to place in the lowermoſt part of their mappes, the farre diſtant regions vnknowne vnto them, and to marke in the margent ſuch like notes and reaſons as theſe: Beyond theſe countries are nothing but deepe drie ſands without water, full of fowle ill fauoured venemous beaſts, or much mudde vnnauigable, or SCYTHIA forſaken for cold, or elſe the ſea froſen with Ice. Euen ſo in this my hiſtorie, I could ſpeake of ſtrange things, and more ancient, and further off from mens memorie. But herein I haue compared the liues of ſome noble men, the one with the other, hauing followed all thoſe times, whereof the monuments remaine yet ſo whole, that men may ſpeake of very great likelihood, or rather write a very troth. What hath bene written before, is but of ſtrange faynings, and full of monſtrous fables, imagined and deuiſed by Poets, which are altogether vncertaine, and moſt vntrue. Howbeit hauing heretofore ſet forth the liues of Lycurgus (which eſtabliſhed the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS) and of king Numa Pompilius, me thought I might with reaſon alſo aſcend vnto the time of Romulus, ſithens I was come ſo neare vnto his time. Wherefore hauing long debated with my ſelfe what Æſchilus the Poet ſaid:

Soſius Senecio a Senator of Rome.

What champion may with ſuch a man compare?
Or who (thinke I) ſhall be againſt him ſet?
Who is ſo bold? or who is he that dare
Defend his force, in ſuch encounter met?

In the end I reſolued to compare him which did ſet vp the noble and famous citie of ATHENS, vnto him which founded the glorious and inuincible city of ROME. Wherein I would haue wiſhed, that the fables of her antiquitie had bene ſet out ſo in our writings, that we might yet haue graced them with ſome apparance of hiſtoricall narration. But if by chance in ſome places they range a little too boldly out of the bounds or limites of true apparance, and haue no maner of conformity with any credibleneſſe of matter: the readers in curteſie muſt needs hold me excuſed, accepting in good part that which may be written, and reported, of things ſo extremely old and ancient. Now ſurely me thinkes, that Theſeus in many things was much like vnto Romulus. For being both begotten by ſtealth and out of lawfull matrimony, they were both bruited to be borne of the ſeed of gods.

Theſeus & Romulus very like.

Both valiant were, as all the world doth know.

Both were very wiſe, and ſtrong beſides of body. The one of them built ROME, and the other the citie of ATHENS, two of the moſt noble cities of the world. The one and the other were rauiſhers of women: and neither the one nor the other could auoid the miſchief of quarell and contention with their friends, and to defile themſelues with the bloud of their neareſt kinſmen. Moreouer, they ſay that both the one and the other in the end, did get the hate and ill will of their citizens. At the leaſt if we beleeue thoſe things which are left written, and carry greateſt ſhew of troth, Theſeus of his fathers ſide, was deſcēded of the right linage of Erichtheus the great, and of the firſt inhabitants which occupied the countrey of ATTICA, the which ſince were called AVTOCTHONES, as much to ſay, as born of themſelues. For there is no memory, or other mention made, that they came out of any other countrey then that. And of his mothers ſide he came of Pelops, who was in his time the mightieſt king of all the countrey of PELOPONNESVS, not ſo much for his goods and riches, as for the number of children which he had. For his daughters which were many in number, he beſtowed them on the greateſt Lords of all the countrey: his ſonnes alſo, which likewiſe were many, he diſperſed into euery city and free towne, finding meanes to make them gouernours and heads of the ſame. Pitheus grandfather to Theſeus on the mother ſide, was one that founded the litle city of TROEZEN, and was reputed to be one of the beſt learned and wiſeſt men of his time. But the knowledge and wiſdome, which only caried eſtimation at that time, conſiſted altogether in graue ſentences & morall ſayings; as thoſe are, which wan the Poet Heſiodus ſuch fame for his booke intituled, The works & dayes: in the which is read euen at this preſent, this goodly ſentence, which they father vpon Pitheus:

The linage of Theſeus.

Pelops king of Peloponneſus.

Pitheus, the grandfather of Theſeus.

The wiſedome of Pitheus.

Thou ſhalt performe thy promiſe and thy pay
To hired men, and that without delay.

And this doth Ariſtotle the Philoſopher himſelfe teſtifie: and the Poet Euripides alſo, calling Hippolitus the ſcholler of the holy Pitheus, doth ſufficiently declare of what eſtimation he was: But Ægeus deſiring (as they ſay) to know how he might haue children, went into the city of DELPHES to the Oracle of Apollo: where, by a Nunne of the temple, this notable prophecie was giuen him for an anſwer; the which did forbid him to touch or know any woman, vntill he was returned againe to ATHENS. And becauſe the words of this propheſie were ſomewhat darke and hard, he returned by the city of TROEZEN, to tell it vnto Pitheus. The words of the prophecy were theſe:

Ægeus the father of Theſeus.

O thou which art a gemme of perfect grace,
Plucke not the tappe out of thy truſty tunne,
Before thou do returne vnto thy place
In Athens towne, from whence thy race doth runne.

Pitheus vnderſtanding the meaning, perſwaded him, or rather cunningly by ſome deuice deceiued him, in ſuch ſort, that he made him to lie with his daughter called Æthra. Ægeus, after he had accompanied with her, knowing that ſhe was Pitheus daughter with whom he had lien, and doubting that he had gotten her with child, left her a ſword and a paire of ſhoes, the which he hid vnder a great hollow ſtone, the hollowneſſe whereof ſerued iuſt to receiue thoſe things which he layed vnder it; and made no liuing creature priuie to it but her alone, ſtraightly charging charging her, that if she happened to haue a sonne, when he were come to mans estate, and of strength to remoue the stone, and to take those things from vnder it which he left there: that she should then send him vnto him by those tokens, as secretly as she could, that no body else might know of it. For he did greatly feare the childrē of one called Pallas, the which lay in wait and spiall by all the meanes they could to kill him, onely of despite because he had no children, they being fifty brethren, and all begotten of one father. This done, he departed from her. And Æthra within few moneths after was deliuered of a goodly sonne, the which from that time was called Theseus: and as some say, so called, because of the tokens of knowledge his father had layed vnder the stone. Yet some others write, that it was afterwards at Athens when his father knew him, and auoued him for his sonne. But in the meane time, during his infancie and childhood, he was brought vp in the house of his grandfather Pitheus, vnder the gouernement and teaching of one called Connidas, his schoolemaister: in honour of whom the Athenians to this day do sacrifice a weather, the day before the great feast of Theseus, hauing more reason to honour the memorie of this gouernour, then of a Silanion and of a Parrhasius, to whom they do honour also, because they painted and cast moulds of the images of Theseus. Now there was a custome at that time in Greece, that the young men after their infancie and growth to mans state, went into the citie of Delphes, to offer part of their haires in the temple of Apollo. Theseus also went thither as other did: and some say that the place where the ceremony of this offering was made, hath euer since kept the old name (and yet continueth) Theseia. Howbeit he did not shaue his head but before onely, as Homer saith, like the fashion of the Abantes in old time: and this manner of shauing of haires, was called for his sake, Theseida. And as concerning the Abantes, in troth they were the very first that shaued themselues after this fashion: neuertheless they learned it not of the Arabians, as it was thought of some, neither did they it after the imitation of the Missians; but because they were warlike and valiant men, which did ioyne neere vnto their enemie in battell, and aboue all men of the world were skilfullest in fight hand to hand, and would keepe their ground: as the Poet Archilochus witnesseth in these verses:

The Abantes.

They vse no slings in foughten fields to haue,
Nor bended bowes: but swords and trenchant blades.
For when fierce Mars beginneth for to raue
In bloudy field, then euery man inuades
His fiercest foe, and fighteth hand to hand:
Then do they deeds, right cruell to recompt,
For in this wise, the braue and warlike band
Do shew their force, which come from Negrepont.

The cause why they were thus shauen before, was, for that their enemies should not haue the vantage to take them by the haires of the head while they were fighting. And for this selfesame consideration, Alexander the great commanded his captaines to cause all the Macedonians to shaue their beards: because it is the easiest hold (and readiest for the hand) a man can haue of his enemy in fighting, to hold him fast by the same. But to returne to Theseus. Æthrā his mother had euer vnto that time kept it secret from him, who was his true father. And Pitheus also had giuen it out abroad, that he was begotten of Neptune, because the Troezenians haue this god in great veneration, and do worship him as patron and protector of their city, making offerings to him of their first fruits: and they haue for the marke and stampe of their mony, the three picked mace, which is the signe of Neptune, called his Trident. But after he was come to the prime and lustines of his youth, and that with the strength of his body he shewed a great courage, ioyned with a naturall wisdome, and staiednes of wit: then his mother brought him to the place where this great hollow stone lay, and telling him truly the order of his birth, and by whom he was begotten, made him to take his fathers tokens of knowledge, which he had hidden there, and gaue him counsell to go by sea to Athens vnto him. Theseus easily lift vp the stone, and tooke his fathers tokens from vnder it: Howbeit he answered plainly, that he would not go by sea, notwithstanding that it was a great deale the safer way, and that his mother and grandfather both had instantly intreated him, because the way by land from Troezen to Athens was very dangerous, all the wayes being beset by robbers and murderers. For the world at that time brought forth men, which for strongnesse in their armes, for swiftnesse of feete, and for a generall ſtrength of the whole body, did far paſſe the common force of others, and were neuer weary for any labour or trauell they tooke in hand. But for all this, they neuer employed theſe gifts of nature to any honeſt or profitable thing, but rather delighted villanouſly to hurt and wrong others: as if all the fruite and profite of their extraordinary ſtrength had conſiſted in cruelty and violence onely, and to be able to keepe others vnder and in ſubiection, and to force, deſtroy, and ſpoyle all that came to their hands. Thinking that the more part of thoſe which thinke it a ſhame to do ill, and commend iuſtice, equity, and humanity, do it of faint cowardly hearts, becauſe they dare not wrong others, for feare they ſhould receiue wrong themſelues: and therefore, that they which by might could haue vantage ouer others, had nothing to do with ſuch quiet qualities. Now Hercules, trauelling abroad in the world, draue away many of thoſe wicked theeuiſh murderers, and ſome of them he ſlue and put to death; other as he paſſed through thoſe places where they kept, did hide themſelues for feare of him, and gaue place: inſomuch as Hercules perceiuing they were well tamed and brought low, made no further reckoning to purſue them any more. But after that by fortune he had ſlaine Iphitus with his owne hands, and that he was paſſed ouer the ſeas into the countrey of LYDIA, where he ſerued Queene Omphale a long time, condemning himſelfe vnto that voluntary paine for the murther he had committed, all the Realme of LYDIA during his abode there, remained in great peace and ſecuritie from ſuch kind of people. Howbeit in GREECE, and all thereabouts, theſe old miſchiefes began againe to renew, growing hotter and violenter then before: becauſe there was no man that puniſhed them, nor that durſt take vpon him to deſtroy them. By which occaſion, the way to go from PELOPONNESVS to ATHENS by land was very perillous. And therefore Pitheus declaring vnto Theſeus, what maner of theeues they were that lay in the way, and the outrages and villanies they did to all trauellers and wayfaring men, ſought the rather to perſwade him thereby to take his voyage along the ſeas. Howbeit in mine opinion, the fame and glory of Hercules noble deedes, had long before ſecretly ſet his heart on fire, ſo that he made reckoning of none other but of him, and louingly hearkened vnto thoſe which would ſeeme to deſcribe him what maner of man he was, but chiefly vnto thoſe which had ſeene him, and bene in his company, when he had ſaid or done any thing worthy of memory. For then he did manifeſtly open himſelfe, and he felt the like paſſion in his heart, which Themiſtocles long time afterwards endured, when he ſaid: that the victorie and triumph of Miltiades would not let him ſleepe. For euen ſo, the wonderfull admiration which Theſeus had of Hercules courage made him in the night that he neuer dreamed but of his noble acts and doings, and in the day time, pricked forwards with emulation and enuie of his glory, he determined with himſelfe one day to do the like, and the rather, becauſe they were neere kinſmen, being coſins remoued by the mothers ſide. For Æthra was the daughter of Pitheus, and Alcmena (the mother of Hercules) was the daughter of Lyſidices, the which was halfe ſiſter to Pitheus, both children of Pelops and of his wife Hippodamia. So he thought he ſhould be vtterly ſhamed and diſgraced, that Hercules trauelling through the world in that ſort, did ſeek out thoſe wicked theeues to rid both ſea and land of them: and that he, farre otherwiſe, ſhould flye occaſion that might be offered him, to fight with them that he ſhould meete on his way. Moreouer, he was of opinion, he ſhould greatly ſhame and diſhonour him, whom fame and common bruit of people reported to be his father: if in ſhunning occaſion to fight, he ſhould conuey himſelfe by ſea, and ſhould carry to his true father alſo a paire of ſhooes, (to make him knowne of him) and a ſword not yet bathed in bloud. Where he ſhould rather ſeeke cauſe, by manifeſt tokens of his worthy deeds, to make knowne to the world of what noble bloud he came, and from whence he was deſcended. With this determination, Theſeus holdeth on his purpoſed iourney with intent to hurt no man, yet to defend himſelfe, and to be reuenged of thoſe which would take vpon them to aſſault him. The firſt therefore whom he ſlue within the teritories of the citie of EPIDAVRVM, was a robber called Periphetes. This robber vſed for his ordinarie weapon to carrie a clubbe, and for that cauſe he was commonly ſurnamed Corynetes, that is to ſay, a clubbe carrier. So he firſt ſtrake at Theſeus to make him ſtand: but Theſeus fought ſo luſtily with him, that he killed him. Whereof he was ſo glad, and chiefly for that he had won his clubbe, that euer after he caried it himſelfe about with him, as Hercules did the Lyons skinne. And like as this ſpoile of the Lyon did witneſſe the greatneſſe of the beaſt which Hercules had ſlaine, euen ſo Theſeus went all about, ſhewing that this club which he had gotten out of anothers hands, was in his owne hands inuincible. And ſo going on further, in the ſtreights of PELOPONNESVS he killed another, called Sinnis, ſurnamed Pityocamtes, that is to ſay, a wreather or bower of pine-apple trees: whom he put to death in that ſelfe cruell manner that Sinnis had ſlaine many other trauellers before. Not that he had experience thereof, by any former practiſe or exerciſe: but onely to ſhew, that cleane ſtrength could do more then either Arte or exerciſe. This Sinnis had a goodly faire daughter called Perigouna, which fled away when ſhe ſaw her father ſlaine: whom he followed and ſought all about. But ſhe had hidden her ſelfe in a groue full of certaine kinds of wild pricking ruſhes called Stœbe, and wild Sperage, which ſhe ſimply like a child intreated to hide her, as if they had heard, and had ſenſe to vnderſtand her: promiſing them with an oath, that if they ſaued her from being found, ſhe would neuer cut them downe, nor burne them. But Theſeus finding her, called her, and ſware by his faith he would vſe her gently, and do her no hurt, nor diſpleaſure at all. Vpon which promiſe ſhe came out of the buſh, and lay with him, by whom ſhe was conceiued of a goodly boy, which was called Menalippus. Afterwards Theſeus married her vnto one Deioneus, the ſonne of Euritus the Oechalian. Of this Menalippus the ſonne of Theſeus, came Ioxus: the which with Ornytus brought men into the countrey of CARIA, where he built the Citie of IOXIDES. And hereof cometh that old ancient ceremonie, obſerued yet vnto this day by thoſe of IOXIDES, neuer to burne the briers of wild Sperage, nor the Stœbe, but they haue them in ſome honour and reuerence. Touching the wild ſauage Sowe of Crommyon, otherwiſe named Phæa, that is to ſay, ouergrowne with age: ſhe was not a beaſt to be made light account of, but was very fierce, and terrible to kill. Theſeus notwithſtanding taried for her, and killed her in his iourney, to the end it ſhould not appeare to the world, that all the valiant deeds he did, were done by compulſion and of neceſſitie: adding thereto his opinion alſo, that a valiant man ſhould not onely fight with men, to defend himſelfe from the wicked: but that he ſhould be the firſt, to aſſault and ſlay wild hurtfull beaſts. Neuertheleſſe others haue written that this Phæa was a woman robber, a murderer, and naught of her body, which ſpoiled thoſe that paſſed by the place called CROMMYONIA, where ſhe dwelt: and that ſhe was ſurnamed a Sow, for her beaſtly brutiſh behauiour and wicked life, for the which in the end ſhe was alſo ſlaine by Theſeus. After her he killed Sciron, entring into the territories of MEGARA, becauſe he robbed all trauellers by the way, as the common report goeth: or as others ſay, for that of a cruell, wicked, and ſauage pleaſure, he put foorth his feete to thoſe that paſſed by the ſea ſide, and compelled them to waſh them. And then when they thought to ſtoupe to do it, he ſtil ſpurned them with his feet, till he thruſt them headlong into the ſea: ſo Theſeus threw him headlong downe the rockes. Howbeit the writers of MEGARA impugning this common report, and deſirous (as Simonides ſaith) to ouerthrow it that had continued by preſcription of time, did maintaine that this Sciron was neuer any robber, nor wicked perſon, but rather a purſuer and puniſher of the wicked, and a friend & kinſman of the moſt honeſt and iuſteſt men of GREECE. For there is no man but will confeſſe, that Æacus was the moſt vertuous man among the GRECIANS in his time, and that Cychreus the SALAMINIAN is honored and reuerenced as a God at ATHENS: and there is no man alſo but knoweth that Peleus and Telamon were men of a ſingular vertue. Now it is certaine, that this Sciron was ſonne in law to Cychreus father in law of Æacus, & grandfather to Peleus and Telamon, the which two were the children of Endeida, the daughter of the ſaid Sciron, and of his wife Charicio. Alſo it is not very likely, that ſo many good men would haue had affinity with ſo naughty and wicked a man: in taking of him, and giuing him that which men loue beſt of all things in the world. And therefore the Hiſtoriographers ſay, that it was not the firſt time, when Theſeus went vnto ATHENS, that he killed Sciron: but that it was many dayes after, when he tooke the citie of ELEVSIN, which the MEGARIANS held at that time, where he deceiued the Gouernour of the citie, called Diocles, and there he ſlue Sciron. And theſe be the obiectiõs the MEGARIANS alledged touching this matter. He ſlue alſo Cercyon the ARCADIAN, in the city of ELEVSIN, wraſtling with him. And going a little further, he ſlue Damaſtes, otherwiſe ſurnamed Procruſtes, in the citie of HERMIONIA: and that by ſtretching of him out, to make him euen with the length and meaſure of his beds, as he was wont to do vnto ſtrangers that paſſed by. Theſeus did that in imitation of Hercules, who puniſhed tyrants with the ſelfe ſame paine and torment which they had made others ſuffer. For euen ſo did Hercules ſacrifice Buſiris. So he ſtifled Antheus in wraſtling. So he put Cycrus to death, fighting with him man to man. So he brake Termerus head, from whom this prouerbe of Termerus euill came, which continueth yet vnto this day: for this Termerus did vse to put them to death in this sort whom he met: to iolle his head against theirs. Thus proceeded Theseus after this selfe manner, punishing the wicked in like sort, iustly compelling them to abide the same paine and torments, which they before had vniustly made others abide. And so he held on his iourny vntill he came to the riuer of CEPHISVS, where certaine persons of the house of the Phytalides were the first which went to meet him, to honour him, and at his request they purified him according to the ceremonies vsed at that time: and afterwards hauing made a sacrifice of propitiation vnto their gods, they made him great cheare in their houses: and this was the first notable entertainement he found in all his iourney. It is supposed he arriued in the city of ATHENS, the eight day of the moneth of Iune, which then they called Cronius. He found the common-wealth turmoiled with seditions, factions, and diuisions, and particularly the house of Ægeus in very ill termes also, because that Medea (being banished out of the Citie of CORINTH) was come to dwell in ATHENS, and remained with Ægeus, whom she had promised of by vertue of certaine medicines to make him to get children. But when she heard tell that Theseus was come, before that the good king Ægeus (who was now become old, suspicious, and afraid of sedition, by reason of the great factions within the City at that time) knew what he was, she perswaded him to poyson him at a feast which they wold make him as a stranger that passed by. Theseus failed not to go to this prepared feast whereunto he was bidden, but yet thought it not good to disclose himselfe. And the rather to giue Ægeus occasion and meane to know him, when they brought the meate to the boord, he drew out his sword as though he would haue cut withal, & sheweth it vnto him. Ægeus seeing it, knew it straight, & forthwith ouerthrew the cup with poison which was prepared for him: and after he had enquired of him and asked things, he embraced him as his sonne. Afterwards in the common assembly of the inhabitants of the city, he declared, how he auowed him for his sonne. Then all the people receiued him with exceeding ioy, for the renowne of his valiantnes and manhood. And some say, that when Ægeus ouerthrew the cup, the poison which was in it, fell in that place, where there is at this present a certaine compasse inclosed all about within the temple which is called Delphinium. For euen there in that place, in old time, stood the house of Ægeus: in witnesse whereof, they call yet at this present time the image of Mercury (which is on the side of the temple looking towards the rising of the Sunne) the Mercury gate of Ægeus. But the PALLANTIDES, which before stood alwayes in hope to recouer the Realme of ATHENS, at the least after Ægeus death, because he had no children: when they saw that Theseus was known, and openly declared for his son and heire, and successor to the Realme, they were not able any longer to beare it, seeing that not onely Ægeus (who was but the adopted son of Pandion, and nothing at all of the bloud royall of the Ericthеides) had vsurped the kingdome ouer them, but that Theseus also should enioy it after his death. Whereupon they determined to make warre with them both, and deuiding themselues into two parts, the one came openly in armes with their father, marching directly towards the city: the other lay close in ambush in the village GARGETTVS, meaning to giue charge vpon thē in two places at one instant. Now they brought with them an Herald borne in the towne of AGNVS, called Leos, who bewrayed vnto Theseus the secret & deuice of all their enterprise. Theseus vpon this intelligence went forth, and set on those that lay in ambush, and put them all to the sword. The other which were in Pallas company vnderstanding therof, did break and disperse themselues incontinently, and this is the cause (as some say) why those of PALLENA do neuer make affinitie nor marriage with those of AGNVS at this day: and that in their towne when any proclamation is made, they neuer speake these words which are cried euery where els throughout the whole country of ATTICA, Acouete Leos, (which is as much to say, as Harken ô people) they do so extremely hate this word Leos, for that it was the Heralds name that wrought them that treason. This done, Theseus who would not liue idly at home and do nothing, but desirous therewithall to gratifie the people, went his way to fight with the bull of Marathon, the which did great mischiefes to the inhabitants of the country of TETRAPOLIS. And hauing taken him aliue, brought him through the citie of ATHENS, to be seene of all the inhabitants. Afterwards he did sacrifice him vnto Apollo Delphias. Now concerning Hecale, who was reported to haue lodged him, and to haue giuen him good entertainement, it is not altogether vntrue. For in the old time, those townes and villages thereabouts did assemble together, and made a common sacrifice which they called Hecalesion, in honour of Iupiter Hecalion, where they honoured this old woman, calling her by a diminutiue tiue name, Hecalena: becauſe that when ſhe receiued Theſeus into her houſe, being then but very yong, ſhe made much of him, and called him by many pretie made names, as old folks are wont to call yong children. And forasmuch as ſhe had made a vow to Iupiter to make him a ſolemne ſacrifice, if Theſeus remained ſafe from the enterpriſe he went about, and that ſhe died before his returne: in recompence of the good cheare ſhe made him, ſhe had that honour done vnto her by Theſeus commandement, as Philochorus hath written of it. Shortly after this exploit, there came certaine of king Minos ambaſſadours out of CRETA, to aske a tribute, being now the third time that it was demanded; which the ATHENIANS payed for this cauſe. Androgeus, the eldeſt ſonne of king Minos, was ſlaine by treaſon within the country of ATTICA: for which cauſe Minos purſuing the reuenge of his death, made very hote and ſharpe warres vpon the ATHENIANS, and did them great hurt. But beſides all this, the gods did ſharply puniſh and ſcourge all the countrey, as well with barrenneſſe and famine, as alſo with plague and other miſchiefes, euen to the drying vp of their riuers. The ATHENIANS perceiuing theſe ſore troubles and plagues, ran to the oracle of Apollo, who anſwered them that they ſhould appeaſe Minos, & when they had made their peace with him, that then the wrath of the gods would ceaſſe againſt them, and their troubles ſhould haue an end. Whereupon the ATHENIANS ſent immediatly vnto him, and intreated him for peace: which he granted them, with condition that they ſhould be bound to ſend him yearly into CRETA, ſeuen yong boyes, and as many yong gyrles. Now thus farre all the Hiſtoriographers do very well agree, but in the reſt not. And they which ſeeme furtheſt off from the troth, do declare, that when theſe yong boyes were deliuered in CRETA, they cauſed them to be deuoured by the Minotaure within the Labyrinth: or elſe that they were ſhut within this Labyrinth, wandring vp and downe, and could find no place to get out, vntill ſuch time as they died, euen famiſhed for hunger. And this Minotaure, as Euripides the Poet ſaith, was

A corps combin'd, which monſtrous might be deem'd:
A Boy, a Bull, both man and beaſt it ſeem'd.

But Philochorus writeth, that the CRETANS do not confeſſe that, but ſay that this Labyrinth was a gaile or priſon, in the which they had no other hurt, ſauing that they which were kept there vnder locke and key, could not flie nor ſtart away: and that Minos had in memorie of his ſonne Androgeus, inſtituted games and playes of priſe, where he gaue vnto them that wan the victorie, thoſe yong children of ATHENS, the which in the meane time notwithſtanding were carefully kept and looked vnto in the priſon of the Labyrinth: and that at the firſt games that were kept, one of the Kings Captaines called Taurus, who was in beſt credite with his maiſter, wan the priſe. This Taurus was a churliſh and naughty natured man of condition, and very hard and cruell to theſe children of ATHENS. And to verifie the ſame, the Philoſopher Ariſtotle himſelfe, ſpeaking of the commonwealth of the BOTTIEIANS, declareth very well, that he neuer thought that Minos did at any time cauſe the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but ſaith, that they poorely toyled in CRETA, euen to crooked age, earning their liuing by true & painfull ſeruice. For it is written, that the CRETANS (to ſatisfie an old vow of theirs, which they had made of ancient time) ſent ſometime the firſt borne of their children vnto Apollo in the citie of DELPHES: and that amongſt them alſo they mingled thoſe which were deſcended of the ancient priſoners of ATHENS, and they went with them. But becauſe they could not liue there, they directed their iourney firſt into ITALIE, where for a time they remained in the realme of PVGLIA, and afterwards from thence went into the confines of THRACIA, where they had this name of BOTTIEIANS. In memorie whereof the daughters of the BOTTIEIANS in a ſolemne ſacrifice they make, do vſe to ſing the foot of this ſong: Let vs to ATHENS go. But thereby we may ſee how perillous a thing it is, to fall in diſpleaſure and enmity with a city which can ſpeak wel, & where learning & eloquence do floriſh. For euer ſince that time Minos was alwaies blaſed and diſgraced throughout all the Theaters of ATHENS. The teſtimonie of Heſiodus, who calleth him the moſt worthy King, doth nothing at all helpe him, nor the praiſe of Homer, who nameth him Iupiters familiar friend: becauſe the tragicall Poets got the vpper hand in diſgracing him, notwithſtanding all theſe; & vpon their ſtages where al the Tragedies were plaid, they ſtil gaue forth many ill fauored words & foule ſpeeches of him; as againſt a man that had bin moſt cruell & vnnaturall. Yet moſt men think, that Minos was the King that eſtabliſhed the laws, & Radamãthus the Iudge and preſeruer of them, who cauſed the ſame alſo to be kept & obſerued. which had children not yet maried, to giue them to be put forth to take their chance and lot: the citizens of ATHENS began to murmur against Ægeus, alledging for their grieues, that he who onely was the cause of all this euill, was only alone exempted from this grief. And that to bring the gouernement of the Realme to fall into the hands of a stranger his bastard, he cared not though they were bereft of all their naturall children, and were vnnaturally compelled to leaue and forsake them. These iust sorrowes and complaints of the fathers whose children were taken from them, did pierce the heart of Theseus, who willing to yeeld to reason, and to run the selfe same fortune as the citizens did, willingly offered himselfe to be sent thither, without regard taking to his hap or aduenture. For which, the citizens greatly esteemed of his courage and honorable disposition, and dearely loued him for the good affection he seemed to beare vnto the communaltie. But Ægeus hauing vsed many reasons and perswasions to cause him to turne and stay from his purpose, and perceiuing in the end there was no remedie but he would go, he then drew lots for the children which should go with him. Hellanicus notwithstanding doth write, that they were not those of the citie which drew lots for the children they should send, but that Minos himselfe went thither in person, and did chuse them, as he chose Theseus the first, vpon condition agreed betweene them: that is to wit, that the ATHENIANS should furnish them with a ship, and that the children should ship and imbark with him, carying no weapons of warre: and that after the death of the Minotaure this tribute should ceasse. Now before that time, there was neuer any hope of returne, nor of safetie of their children; therefore the ATHENIANS alwayes sent a ship to conuey their children, with a blacke saile, in token of assured losse. Neuertheless Theseus putting his father in good hope of him, being of a good courage, and promising boldly that he would set vpon this Minotaure, Ægeus gaue vnto the maister of the ship a white saile, commanding him that at his returne he should put out the white saile if his sonne had escaped; if not, that then he should set vp the blacke saile, to shew him afarre off his vnlucky and vnfortunate chance. Simonides notwithstanding doth say, that this saile which Ægeus gaue to the maister, was not white, but red, died in graine, and of the colour of Scarlet: and that he gaue it him to signifie afarre off their deliuerie and safetie. This maister was called Phereclus Amarsiadas, as Simonides saith. But Philocorus writeth, that Scirus the SALAMINIAN gaue to Theseus a maister called Nausitheus, and another marriner to tackle the sailes, who was called Phæas: because the ATHENIANS at that time were not greatly practised to the sea. And this did Scirus, for that one of the children on whom the lot fell was his nephew: and thus much the chappels do testifie, which Theseus built afterwards in honour of Nausitheus, and of Phæas, in the village of Phalerus, ioyning to the temple of Scirus. And it is said moreouer, that the feast which they call Cybernesia, that is to say, the feast of Patrons of the ships, is celebrated in honour of them. Now after the lots were drawne, Theseus taking with him the children allotted for the tribute, went from the pallace to the temple called Delphinion, to offer vp to Apollo for him and for them, an offering of supplication, which they call Hiceteria: which was an oliue bough hallowed, wreathed about with white wool. After he had made his prayer, he went downe to the sea side to imbarke, the sixth day of the moneth of March: on which day at this present time they do send their young girles to the same temple of Delphinion, there to make their prayers and petitions to the gods. But some say, that the Oracle of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES had answered him, that he should take Venus for his guide, and that he should call vpon her to conduct him in his voyage: for which cause he did sacrifice a goate vnto her vpon the sea side, which was found suddenly turned into a ramme, and that therefore they surnamed this goddesse Epitragia, as one would say, the goddesse of the ramme. Furthermore, after he was arriued in CRETA, he slue there the Minotaure (as the most part of ancient Authours do write) by the meanes and helpe of Ariadne: who being fallen in fancie with him, did giue him a clue of threed, by the helpe whereof she taught him, how he might easily wind out of the turnings and crannckes of the Labyrinth. And they say, that hauing killed this Minotaure he returned backe againe the same way he went, bringing with him those other young children of ATHENS, whom with Ariadne also he carried afterwards away. Pherecides saith moreouer, that he brake the keeles or bottomes of all the ships of CRETA, because they should not so dainly set out after them. And Demon writeth, that Taurus (the Captaine of Minos) was killed in fight by Theseus, euen in the very hauen mouth, as they were readie to ship away, and hoise vp saile. Yet Philochorus reporteth, that king Minos hauing set vp the games, as he was wont to do yearely yearely in the honour and memorie of his ſonne, euery one began to enuy captaine Taurus, becauſe they euer looked that he ſhould carrie away the game and victorie, as he had done other yeares before; ouer and aboue that, his authority got him much ill will and enuie, becauſe he was proud and ſtately, and had in ſuſpition that he was great with Queene Paſiphaë. Wherefore when Theſeus required that he might encounter with Taurus, Minos eaſily granted it. And being a ſolemne cuſtome in CRETA, that the women ſhould be preſent, to ſee thoſe open ſports and fights, Ariadne being at theſe games, amongſt the reſt, fell further in loue with Theſeus, ſeeing him ſo goodly a perſon, ſo ſtrong, and inuincible in wreſtling, that he farre exceeded all that wreſtled there that day. King Minos was ſo glad that he had taken away the honour from captaine Taurus, that he ſent him home franke and free into his countrey, rendring to him all the other priſoners of ATHENS: and for his ſake clearely releaſed and forgaue the citie of ATHENS the tribute, which they ſhould haue payed him yearely. Howbeit, Clidemus ſearching out the beginning of theſe things to the vtmoſt, reciteth them very particularly, and after another ſort. For he ſayeth, about that time there was a generall reſtraint through all GREECE, reſtraining all maner of people to beare ſaile in any veſſell or bottome, wherein there were about fiue perſons, except onely Iaſon, who was choſen captaine of that great ſhippe Argus, and had commiſſion to ſaile euery where, to chaſe and driue away rouers and pirats, and to ſcoure the ſeas throughout. About this time, Dædalus being fled from CRETA to ATHENS in a little Barke, Minos contrarie to this reſtraint, would needes follow him with a fleet of diuerſe veſſels with owers, who being by force of weather driuen with the coaſt of SICILIE, fortuned to die there. Afterwards his ſon Deucalion, being maruellouſly offended with the ATHENIANS, ſent to ſummon them to deliuer Dædalus vnto him, or elſe he would put the children to death, which were deliuered to his father for hoſtages. But Theſeus excuſed himſelfe, and ſaid he could not forſake Dædalus, conſidering he was his neare kinſman, being his coſingermaine; for he was the ſonne of Merope, the daughter of Erichtheus. Howbeit by and by he cauſed many veſſels ſecretly to be made, part of them within ATTICA ſelfe in the village of Thymetades, farre from any high wayes: and part of them in the city of TROEZEN, by the ſufferance of Pitheus his grandfather, to the end his purpoſe ſhould be kept the ſecretlier. Afterwards when all his ſhippes were readie, and rigged out, he tooke ſea before the CRETANS had any knowledge of it: in ſo much as when they ſaw them afarre off, they did take them for the barkes of their friends. Theſeus landed without reſiſtance, and tooke the hauen. Then hauing Dædalus, and other baniſhed CRETANS for guides, he entred the city ſelfe of GNOSVS, where he ſlue Deucalion in a fight before the gates of the Labyrinth, with all his guard and officers about him. By this meanes the kingdome of CRETA fell by inheritance into the hands of his ſiſter Ariadne. Theſeus made league with her, and carried away the young children of ATHENS which were kept as hoſtages, and concluded peace and amitie betweene the ATHENIANS and the CRETANS: who promiſed, and ſware, they would neuer make warres againſt them. They report many other things alſo touching this matter, and ſpecially of Ariadne: but there is no troth nor certaintie in it. For ſome ſay, that Ariadne hung her ſelfe for ſorrow, when ſhe ſaw that Theſeus had caſt her off. Other write, that ſhe was tranſported by mariners into the Ile of NAXOS, where ſhe was married vnto OEnarus the prieſt of Bacchus: and they thinke that Theſeus left her, becauſe he was in loue with another, as by theſe verſes ſhould appeare:

borne in the Ile of CHIO, and ſpeaking of this citie, he ſaith thus:

OEnopion which was the ſonne of worthy Theſeus, Did cauſe men build this ſtately towne, which now triumpheth thus.

Now what things are found ſeemely in Poets fables, there is none but doth in manner ſing them. But one Paenon borne in the citie of AMATHVNTA, reciteth this cleane after another ſort, and contrary to all other: ſaying, that Theſeus by tempeſt was driuen with the Ile of CYPRVS, hauing with him Ariadne, which was great with child, and ſo ſore ſea ſicke, that ſhe was not able to abide it. In ſo much as he was forced to put her aland, and himſelfe afterwards returning aboord hoping to ſaue his ſhip againſt the ſtorm, was compelled forthwith to looſe into the ſea. The women of the country did courteouſly receiue & intreat Ariadne: & to comfort her againe (for ſhe was maruellouſly out of hart, to ſee ſhe was thus forſaken) they counterfeited letters, as if Theſeus had written them to her. And when her groning time was come, and ſhe to be layed, they did their beſt by all poſſible means to ſaue her, but ſhe died notwithſtanding in labour, and could neuer be deliuered. So ſhe was honourably buried by the Ladies of CYPRVS. Theſeus not long after returned thither againe, who took her death maruelous heauily, & left mony with the inhabitants of the country, to ſacrifice vnto her yearly: & for memory of her, he cauſed two litle images to be molten; the one of copper, & the other of ſiluer, which he dedicated vnto her. This ſacrifice is done the ſecond day of September, on which they do yet obſerue this ceremony: they do lay a yong child vpon a bed, which pitifully crieth and lamenteth, as women trauelling with child. They ſay alſo, that the AMATHVSIANS do yet cal the groue where her tombe is ſet vp, the wood of Venus Ariadne. And yet there are of the NAXIANS, that report this otherwiſe: ſaying, there were two Minoes, and two Ariadnes, whereof the one was maried to Bacchus in the Ile of NAXOS, of whom Staphylus was borne: and the other the yongeſt, was rauiſhed and caried away by Theſeus, who afterward forſooke her, & ſhe came into the Ile of NAXOS with her nurce called Corcyna, whoſe graue they do ſhew yet to this day. The ſecõd Ariadne died there alſo, but ſhe had no ſuch honour done to her after her death, as to the firſt was giuen. For they celebrate the feaſt of the firſt with all ioy & mirth: where the ſacrifices done in memory of the ſecond, be mingled with mourning and ſorow. Theſeus then departing from the Ile of CRETA, arriued in the Ile of DELOS, where he did ſacrifice in the temple of Apollo, and gaue there a litle image of Venus, the which he had gotten of Ariadne. Then with the other yong boyes that he had deliuered, he danced a kind of dance, which the DELIANS keepe to this day, as they ſay: in which there are many turnes and returnes, much after the turnings of the Labyrinth. And the DELIANS call this manner of dance, the crane, as Dicaearcus ſaith. And Theſeus danced it firſt about the altar, which is called Ceraton, that is to ſay, horne-ſtaffe: becauſe it is made and builded of hornes only, all on the left hand well and curiouſly ſet together without any other binding. It is ſaid alſo, that he made a game in this Ile of DELOS, in which at the firſt was giuen to him that ouercame, a branch of palme for reward of victorie. But when they drew neare to the coaſt of ATTICA, they were ſo ioyfull, he and his maiſter, that they forgat to ſet vp their white ſaile, by which they ſhould haue giuen knowledge of their health and ſafety vnto Aegeus. Who ſeeing the blacke ſaile afarre off, being out of all hope euer more to ſee his ſonne againe, tooke ſuch a griefe at his heart, that he threw himſelfe headlong from the toppe of a clyffe, and killed himſelfe. So ſoone as Theſeus was arriued at the port named Phalerus, he performed the ſacrifices which he had vowed to the gods at his departure: and ſent an Herald of his before vnto the city, to carry newes of his ſafe arriuall. The Herald found many of the city mourning the death of King AEgeus. Many other receiued him with great ioy, as may be ſuppoſed. They would haue crowned him alſo with a garland of flowers, for that he had brought ſo good tidings, that the children of the city were returned in ſafety. The Herald was content to take the garland, yet would he not in any wiſe put it on his head, but did wind it about his Heralds rod he bare in his hand, and ſo returned forthwith to the ſea, where Theſeus made his ſacrifices. Who perceiuing they were not yet done, did refuſe to enter into the temple, and ſtayed without for troubling of the ſacrifices. Afterwards all ceremonies finiſhed, he went in and told him the newes of his fathers death. Then he and his company mourning for ſorrow, haſted with ſpeed towards the city. And this is the cauſe, why to this day, at the feaſt called Oſcophoria (as who would ſay the feaſt of boughes) the Herald hath not his head but his rod onely crowned with floures, and why the aſſiſtants alſo after the ſacrifice done, do make ſuch cries and exclamations: Eli, leuſ, ion, iou, iou: whereof the firſt is the cry and voice they commonly vſe one to another to make haſte, or elſe it is the foote of ſome ſong of triumph: and the other is the cry and voice of men as it were in feare and trouble. After he had ended the obſequies and funerals for his father, he performed all his ſacrifices vnto Apollo, which he had vowed, the ſeuenth day of the moneth of October, on which they arriued at their returne into the city of ATHENS. Euen ſo the cuſtome which they vſe at this day to ſeeth all manner of pulſe, cometh of this: that thoſe which then returned with Theſeus, did ſeeth in a great braſſe pot all the remaine of their prouiſion, and therewith made good cheare together. Euen in ſuch ſort as this came vp the cuſtome to carry a branch of oliue, wreathed about with wooll, which they call Ireſione: becauſe at that time they caried boughes of ſupplication, as we haue told ye before. About which they hang all ſorts of fruits: for then barrenneſſe did ceaſſe, as the verſes they ſang afterwards did witneſſe.

Bring him good bread, that is of ſau'ry taſte,
With pleaſant figges, and drops of dulcet mell:
Then ſowple oyle, his body for to baſte,
And pure good wine, to make him ſleepe full well.

Howbeit there are ſome which will ſay, that theſe verſes were made for the Heraclides, that is to ſay thoſe that deſcended from Hercules: which flying for their ſafetie and ſuccour vnto the ATHENIANS, were entertained and much made of by them for a time. But the moſt part hold opinion, they were made vpon the occaſion aforeſaid. The veſſell in which Theſeus went and returned, was a galliot of thirty owers, which the ATHENIANS kept vntill the time of Demetrius the Phalerian, alwayes taking away the old peeces of wood that were rotten, and euer renewing them with new in their places. So that euer ſince, in the diſputations of the Philoſophers touching things that increaſe, to wit, whether they remaine alwayes one, or be made others: this galliot was alwayes brought in for example of doubt. For ſome maintained, that it was ſtill one veſſell: others to the contrary defended it was not ſo. And they hold opinion alſo, that the feaſt of boughes which is celebrated at ATHENS at this time, was then firſt of all inſtituted by Theſeus. It is ſaid moreouer, that he did not carry all the wenches vpon whom the lots did fall, but choſe two faire young boyes, whoſe faces were ſweete and delicate as maidens be, that otherwiſe were hardie and quicke ſpirited. but he made them ſo oft bathe themſelues in hote bathes, and keepe them from the heate of the Sunne, and ſo many times to waſh, annoint, and rub themſelues with oiles, which ſerue to ſupple and ſmooth their skins, to keepe freſh and faire their colour, to make yellow and bright their haires: and withall did teach them ſo to counterfeit the ſpeech, countenance and faſhion of young maides, that they ſeemed to be like them, rather then yong boyes. For there was no maner of difference to be perceiued outwardly, and he mingled them with the girles, without the knowledge of any man. Afterwards when he was returned, he made a proceſſion, in which both he and the other yong boyes were apparelled then, as they be now which carry boughes on the day of the feaſt in their hands. They carry them in the honour of Bacchus and Ariadne, following the fable that is told of them: or rather becauſe they returned home iuſt at the time and ſeaſon, whē they gather the fruit of thoſe trees. There are women which they call Deipnophores, that is to ſay, ſupper cariers, which are aſſiſtants to the ſacrifice done that day, in repreſenting the mothers of thoſe vpon whom the lots did fall, becauſe they in like ſort brought them both meate and drinke. There they tell tales, for ſo did their mothers tattle to their children to comfort and encourage them. All theſe particularities were written by Demon the Hiſtoriographer. There was moreouer a place choſen out, to build him a temple in: and he himſelf ordained, that thoſe houſes which had payed tribute before vnto the king of CRETA, ſhould now yearely thenceforth become contributaries towards the charges of a ſolemne ſacrifice, which ſhould be done in the honour of him: and he did aſſigne the order and adminiſtratiō of the ſame, vnto the houſe of the Phytalides, in recompence of the curteſie which they ſhewed him when he ariued. Furthermore, after the death of his father Ægeus, he vndertooke a maruellous great enterpriſe. For he brought all the inhabitants of the whole prouince of ATTICA, to be within the city of ATHENS, and made them all one corporation, which were before diſperſed into diuerſe villages, and by reaſon thereof were very hard to be aſſembled together, when occaſion was offered to eſtabliſh any order concerning the common ſtate. Many times alſo they were at variance together and by the eares, making wars one vpon another. But Theſeus tooke the paines to go from village to village, and from familie to familie, to let them vnderſtand the reaſons why they ſhould conſent vnto it. So he found the poore people and priuate men ready to obey and follow his will, but the rich, and ſuch as had authoritie in euery village, all againſt it. Neuertheleſſe he wan them, promiſing that it ſhould be a commonwealth, and not ſubiect to the power of any ſole Prince, but rather a popular ſtate. In which he would onely reſerue to himſelfe the charge of the warres, and the preſeruation of the lawes: for the reſt, he was content that euery citizen in all, and for all ſhould beare a like ſway & authoritie. So there were ſome that willingly granted thereto. Other who had no liking thereof, yeelded notwithſtanding for feare of his diſpleaſure and power, which then was very great. So they thought it better to conſent with good will, vnto that he required, then to tarry his forcible cõpulſion. Then he cauſed all the places where iuſtice was miniſtred, and all their halles of aſſembly to be ouerthrowne and pulled downe. He remoued ſtraight all iudges and officers, and built a towne houſe, and a counſell hall, in the place where the ci y now ſtandeth, which the ATHENIANS call ASTY, but he called the whole corporation of them, ATHENS. Afterwards he inſtituted the great feaſt and common ſacrifice for all the country of ATTICA, which they call Panathenæa. Then he ordained another feaſt alſo vpon the ſixteenth day of the moneth of Iune, for all ſtrangers which ſhould come to dwell in ATHENS, which was called Metœcia, and is kept euen to this day. That done, he gaue ouer his regall power according to his promiſe, and began to ſet vp an eſtate or policy of a commonwealth, beginning firſt with the ſeruice of the gods. To know the good ſucceſſe of his enterpriſe, he ſent at the very beginning to the oracle of Apollo in DELPHES, to inquire of the fortune of this city: frõ whence this anſwer was brought vnto him:

Aſty the town houſe of the Athenians.

O thou which art the ſonne of AEgeus,
Begot by him, on Pitheus daughter deare:
The mighty Ioue, my father glorious,
By his decree, hath ſaid there ſhall appeare
A fatall end, of euery city here.
Which end he will, ſhall alſo come adowne,
Within the walles, of this thy ſtately towne.
Therefore ſhew thou, a valiant conſtant mind,
And let no care, nor carke thy heart diſpleaſe:
For like vnto a bladder blowne with wind
Thou ſhalt be toſt, vpon the ſurging ſeas.
Yet let no dint of dolours thee diſeaſe.
For why? thou ſhalt, not periſh nor decay,
Nor be orecome, not yet be caſt away.

It is found written alſo, that Sibylla afterwards gaue out ſuch a like oracle ouer the citie of ATHENS:

The bladder blowne may fleete vpon the ſtudde,
But cannot ſinke, nor ſticke in filthy muddе.

Moreouer, becauſe he would further yet augment his people, and enlarge his city, he enticed many to come and dwell there, by offering them the ſelfe ſame freedome and priuiledges which the natural borne citizens had. So that many iudge, that theſe words which are in vſe at this day in ATHENS, when any open proclamation is made, All people, come ye hither: be the ſelfe ſame which Theſeus then cauſed to be proclaimed, when he in that ſort did gather a people together of all nations. Yet for all that, he ſuffered not the great multitude that came thither tagge and ragge, to be without diſtinction of degrees and orders. For he firſt deuided the Noblemen from husbandmen and artificers, appointing the Noblemen as iudges and Magiſtrats to iudge vpon matters of Religion, and touching the ſeruice of the gods: and of them alſo he did chuſe rulers, to beare ciuill office in the common-weale, to determine the law, and to tell all holy and diuine things. By this meanes he made the Noblemen and the two other eſtates equall in voice. And as the Noblemen did paſſe the other in honour, euen ſo the artificers exceeded them in number, and the husbandmen them in profite. Now that Theſeus was the firſt who of all others yeelded to haue a common-weale or popular eſtate (as Ariſtotle ſaith) and did giue ouer his regall power: Homer ſelfe ſeemeth to teſtifie it, in numbring the ſhips which were in the GRÆCIANS army before the city of TROIA. For amongſt all the GRÆCIANS, he onely calleth the ATHENIANS people. Moreouer Theſeus coyned money, which he marked with the ſtampe of

of an oxe, in memory of the Bull of Marathon, or of Taurus the captaine of Minos, or elſe to prouoke his citizens to giue themſelues to labour. They ſay alſo that of this money they were ſince called Hecatombœon, and Decabœon, which ſignifieth worth an hundred oxen, and worth ten oxen. Furthermore hauing ioyned all the territorie of the city of MEGARA vnto the countrey of ATTICA, he cauſed that notable foure ſquare pillar to be ſet vp for their confines within the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS; and engraued thereupon this ſuperſcription, that declareth the ſeparation of both the countries which confine there together. The ſuperſcription is this:

Hecatombœon, Decabœon.

Where Titan doth begin, his beames for to diſplay, Euen that way ſtands Ionia, in fertile wiſe alway:
And where againe he goeth, adowne to take his reſt,
There ſtands Peloponneſus land, for there I compt it weſt.

It was he alſo which made the games called Iſthmia, after the imitation of Hercules, to the end that as the GRECIANS did celebrate the feaſt of games called Olympia, in the honour of Iupiter, by Hercules ordinance: ſo, that they ſhould alſo celebrate the games called Iſthmia, by his order and inſtitution, in the honour of Neptune. For thoſe that were done in the ſtraights in the honour of Melicerta, were done in the night, and had rather forme of ſacrifice or of a myſterie, then of games and open feaſt. Yet ſome will ſay, that theſe games of Iſthmia were inſtituted in the honour and memory of Sciron, and that Theſeus ordained them in ſatisfaction of his death: becauſe he was his coſin germaine, being the ſonne of Canethus, and of Heniocha the daughter of Pitheus. Other ſay that it was Sinnis and not Sciron, and that for him Theſeus made theſe games, and not for the memory of the other. Howſoeuer it was, he ſpecially willed the CORINTHIANS, that they ſhould giue vnto thoſe that came from ATHENS to ſee their games of Iſthmia, ſo much place to ſit downe before them (in the moſt honourable part of the feaſt place) as the ſaile of their ſhip ſhould couer, in the which they came from ATHENS: thus do Hellanicus and Andron Halicarnaſſeus write hereof. Touching the voyage he made by the ſea Maior, Philochorus and ſome other hold opinion, that he went thither with Hercules againſt the AMAZONES: and that to honour his valiantneſſe, Hercules gaue him Antiopa the AMAZONE. But the more part of the other Hiſtoriographers, namely Hellanicus, Pherecides, and Herodotus, do write, that Theſeus went thither alone, after Hercules voyage, and that he tooke this AMAZONE priſoner; which is likelieſt to be true. For we do not find that any other who went this iourney with him, had taken any AMAZONE priſoner beſides himſelfe. Bion alſo the Hiſtoriographer, this notwithſtanding ſaith, that he brought her away by deceit and ſtealth. For the AMAZONES (ſaith he) naturally louing men, did not flie at all when they ſaw them land in their countrey, but ſent them preſents, and that Theſeus enticed her to come into his ſhippe, who brought him a preſent: and ſo ſoone as ſhe was aboord, he hoyſed his ſaile, and ſo carried her away. Another Hiſtoriographer Menecrates, who wrote the hiſtorie of the city of NICEA in the countrey of BYTHINIA, ſaith: that Theſeus hauing this AMAZONE Antiopa with him, remained a certaine time vpon thoſe coaſts, and that amongſt other he had in his companie three younger brethren of ATHENS, Euneus, Thoas, and Solois. This laſt, Solois, was maruellouſly in loue with Antiopa, and neuer bewrayed it to any of his other companions, ſauing vnto one with whom he was moſt familiar, and whom he truſted beſt: ſo that he reported this matter vnto Antiopa. But ſhe vtterly reiected his ſuite, though otherwiſe ſhe handled it wiſely and curteouſly, and did not complaine to Theſeus of him. Howbeit the young man deſpairing to enioy his loue, tooke it ſo inwardly, that deſperatly he leapt into the riuer, and drowned himſelfe. Which when Theſeus vnderſtood, and the cauſe alſo that brought him to this deſperation and end, he was very ſory, and angry alſo. Whereupon he remembred a certaine Oracle of Pythia, by whom he was commanded to build a city in that place in a ſtrange countrey, where he ſhould be moſt fory, and that he ſhould leaue ſome that were about him at that time, to gouerne the ſame. For this cauſe therefore he built a city in that place, which he named PYTHOPOLIS, becauſe he built it onely by the commandement of the Nunne Pythia. He called the riuer in the which the young man was drowned, Solois, in memorie of him: and left his two brethren for his deputies and as gouernors of this new city, with another gentleman of ATHENS, called Hermus. Hereof it cometh, that at this day the PYTHOPOLITANS call a certaine place of their city, Hermus houſe. But they faile in the accent, by putting it vpon the laſt ſyllable: for in pronouncing it ſo, Hermus ſignifieth Mercury. By this meanes they do transferre the honour

The cause of the wars of the Amazones against the Athenians.

due to the memory of Hermus, vnto the god Mercury. Now heare what was the occasion of the wars of the AMAZONES, which me thinkes was not a matter of small moment, nor an enterprise of a woman. For they had not placed their camp within the very city of ATHENS, nor had not fought in the very place it selfe (called PNYCE) adioyning to the temple of the Muses, if they had not first conquered or subdued all the country therabouts: neither had they all come at the first, so valiantly to assaile the city of ATHENS. Now, whether they came by land from so farre a countrey, or that they passed ouer an arme of the sea, which is called Bosphorus Cimmericus, being frosen as Hellanicus saith it is hardly to be credited. But that they camped within the precinct of the very city it selfe, the names of the places which continue yet to this present day do witnesse it, and the graues also of the women which died there. But so it is, that both armies lay a great time one in the face of the other, ere they came to battell. Howbeit at the length Theseus hauing first made sacrifice vnto Feare the goddesse, according to the counsell of a prophecy he had receiued, he gaue them battel in the moneth of August, on the same day, in the which the ATHENIANS do euen at this present solemnise the feast, which they cal Boedromia. But Clidemus the Historiographer, desirous particularly to write all the circūstances of this encounter, saith, that the left point of their battell bent towards the place which they call AMAZONION: and that the right point marched by the side of CHRYSA, euē to the place which is called PNYCE, vpō which the ATHENIANS coming towards the temple of the Muses, did first giue their charge. And for proofe that this is true, the graues of the women which died in the first encounter, are found yet in the great streete, which goeth towards the gate Piraica, neare vnto the chappell of the litle god Chalcodus. And the ATHENIANS (saith he) were in this place repulsed by the AMAZONS. euen to the place where the images of Eumenides are, that is to say, of the furies. But on the other side also, the ATHENIANS coming towards the quarters of Palladium, Ardettus, and Lucium, draue back their right point euen to within their campe, and slue a great number of them. Afterwards, at the end of foure moneths, peace was taken betweene them by meanes of one of the women called Hyppolita. For this Historiographer calleth the AMAZONE which Theseus maried, Hyppolita, and not Antiopa. Neuertheless, some say that she was slaine (fighting on Theseus side) with a dart, by another called Molpadia. In memorie whereof, the pillar which is ioyned to the temple of the Olympian ground, was set vp in her honour. We are not to maruell, if the historie of things so ancient, be found so diuersly written. For there are also that write, that Queene Antiopa sent those secretly which were hurt then into the city of CALCIDE, where some of them recouered, and were healed: and others also died, which were buried neare to the place called AMAZONION. Howsoeuer it was, it is most certaine that this warre was ended by agreement. For a place adioyning to the temple of Theseus, doth beare record of it, being called Orcomosium: because the peace was there by solemne oath concluded. And the sacrifice also doth truly verifie it, which they haue made to the AMAZONS, before the feast of Theseus, long time out of mind. They of MEGARA also do shew a tombe of the AMAZONES in their citie, which is as they go from the market place, to the place they call Rhus: where they find an ancient tombe, cut in forme and fashion of a losenge. They say that there died other of the AMAZONES also, neare vnto the city of CHÆRONEA, which were buried all along the litle brooke passing by the same, which in the old time (in mine opinion) was called Thermodon, and is now named Haemon, as we haue other places written in the life of Demosthenes. And it seemeth also, that they did not passe through THESSALY without fighting: for there are seene yet of their tombes all about the city of SCOTVSA, hard by the rockes, which be called the dogges head. And this is that which is worthy memory (in mine opinion) touching the warres of these AMAZONES. How the Poet telleth that the AMAZONES made wars with Theseus to reuenge the iniury he did to their Queene Antiopa, refusing her, to marry with Phædra: and for the murder which he telleth that Hercules did, that me thinkes is altogether but a deuice of Poets. It is very true, that after the death of Antiopa, Theseus married Phædra, hauing had before of Antiopa a sonne called Hyppolitus, or as the Poet Pindarus writeth, Demophon. And for that the Historiographers do not in any thing speake against the tragicall Poets, in that which concerneth the ill happe that chanced to him, in the persons of this his wife, and of his sonne: we must needes take it to be so, as we finde it written in the Tragedies. And yet we finde many other reports touching the mariages of Theseus, whose beginnings had no great good honest ground, neither fell out their ends very fortunate: and yet for all that they haue made no Tragedies of them, neither neither haue they bene plaied in the Theaters. For we reade that he took away Anaxo, the TROEZENIAN, and that after he had killed Sinnis and Cercyon, he tooke their daughters perforce: and that he did also mary Phæribæa the mother of Aiax, and afterwards Perebæa, and Ioppa the daughter of Iphicles. And they blame him much also, for that he so lightly forsooke his wife Ariadne, for the loue of Ægles the daughter of Panopeus, as we haue recited before. Lastly, he tooke away Hellen: which rauishment filled all the Realme of ATTICA with wars, & finally was the very occasion that forced him to forsake his country, and brought him at length to his end, as we will tel you hereafter. Albeit in his time other Princes of GRECE had done many goodly & notable exploits in the wars, yet Herodotus is of opinion, that Theseus was neuer in any one of them: saiuing that he was at the battel of the Lapithæ against the Centauri. Others say to the contrary, that he was at the iourney of Cholchide with Iason, and that he did helpe Meleager to kil the wild Bore of Calydonia: from whence (as they say) this Prouerbe came: Not without Theseus; meaning that such a thing was not done without great helpe of another. Howbeit it is certaine that Theseus selfe did many famous acts, without aide of any man, and that for his valiantnesse this Prouerbe came in vse, which is spoken: This is another Theseus. Also he did helpe Adrastus King of the ARGIVES, to recouer the bodies of those that were slaine in the battell, before the city of THEBES. Howbeit it was not, as the Poet Euripides saith, by force of armes, after he had ouercome the THEBANS in battell: but it was by composition. And thus the greatest number of the most ancient writers do declare it. Furthermore, Philochorus writeth, that this was the first treaty that euer was made to recouer the dead bodies slaine in battell: Neuertheless we reade in the histories & gestes of Hercules, that he was the first that euer suffered his enemies to carry away their dead bodies, after they had bene put to the sword. But whosoeuer he was, at this day in the village of ELEVTHERES, they do shew the place where the people were buried, & where Princes tombes are seen about the city of ELEVSIN, which he made at the request of Adrastus. And for testimony hereof, the tragedy Æschilus made of the ELEVSINIANS, where he causeth it to be spoken euen thus to Theseus himself, doth clearely ouerthrow the petitioners in Euripides. Touching the friendship betwixt Pirithous and him, it is said it began thus. The renowne of his valiancy was maruellously blown abroad through all GRECE, & Pirithous desirous to know it by experience went euen of purpose to inuade his country, & brought away a certaine booty of oxē of his taken out of the country of MARATHON. Theseus being aduertised therof, armed straight, & went to the reseue. Perithous hearing of his coming, fled not at all, but returned back suddenly to meet him. And so soon as they came to see one another, they both wondred at each others beauty & courage, and so had they no desire to fight. But Pirithous reaching out his hand first to Theseus, said vnto him; I make your selfe iudge of the damage you haue sustained by my inuasion, and with all my heart I will make such satisfaction, as it shall please you to assesse it at. Theseus thē did not only release him of all the damages he had done, but also requested him he would become his friend, and brother in armes. Herupon they were presently sworn brethren in the field: after which oath betwixt them, Pirithous maried Deidamia, & sent to pray Theseus to come to his mariage, to visite his country, and to make merry with the Lapithæ. He had bidden also the Centauri to the feast: who being drunke, committed many lewd parts, euen to the forcing of women. Howbeit the Lapithæ chastised them so well, that they slue some of them presently in the place, and draue the rest forwards out of the countrey by the helpe of Theseus, who armed himselfe, and fought on their side. Yet Herodotus writeth the matter somwhat contrary, saying that Theseus went not at all vntill the war was well begun: and that it was the first time that he saw Hercules, and spake vnto him neare vnto the city of TRACHINA, when he was then quiet, hauing ended all his far voyages, and greatest troubles. They report that this meeting together was full of great cheere, much kindnesse, and honorable entertainement betweene them, and great curtesie was offered to each other. Neuertheless me thinkes we should giue better credite to those writers that say they met many times together, and that Hercules was accepted and receiued into the brotherhood of the mysteries of ELEVSIN, by the meanes of the countenance and fauor which Theseus shewed vnto him: and that his purification also was thereby allowed of, who was to be purged of necessitie of all his ill deeds and cruelties, before he could enter into the company of those holy mysteries. Furthermore, Theseus was fiftie yeares old when he tooke away Hellen and rauished her, which was very young, and not of age to be maried, as Hellanicus saith. By reason whereof, some seeking to hide the rauishment of her as a haynous fact, do report it was not he, but one Idas and Lynceus that caried her away, who left her in his custodie and keeping: and that Theseus would haue kept her from them, and would not haue deliuered her to her brethren Castor and Pollux, which afterwards did demand her againe of him. Others againe say, it was her owne father Tyndarus, who gaue her to keepe, for that he was affraid of Enarsphorus the sonne of Hippocoon, who would haue had her away by force. But that which cometh nearest to the troth in this case, & which indeed by many authors is testified, was in this sort. Theseus & Perithous went together to the city of LACEDÆMON, where they took away Hellen (being yet very yong) euen as she was dancing in the temple of Diana surnamed Orthia: and they fled for life. They of LACEDÆMON sent after her, but those that followed went no further then the city of TEGEA. Now when they were escaped out of the counrry of PELOPONNESVS, they agreed to draw lots together, which of them two should haue her, with condition that whose lot it were to haue her, he should take her to his wife, & should be bound also to help his companion to get him another. It was Theseus hap to light vpon her, who caried her to the city of APHIDNES, because she was yet too young to be maried. Whither he caused his mother to come to bring her vp, & gaue his friend called Aphidnus the charge of them both, recõmending her to his good care, and to keep it so secretly, that no body should know what was become of her. Because he would do the like for Perithous (according to the agreement made betwixt them) he went into EPIRVS with him to steale the daughter of Aidoneus, king of the MOLOSSIANS, who had surnamed his wife Proserpina, his daughter Proserpina, and his dogge Cerberus, with whom he made them fight which came to aske his daughter in mariage, promising to giue her to him that should ouercome his Cerberus. But the king vnderstanding that Perithous was come, not to request his daughter in mariage, but to steale her away, he tooke him prisoner with Theseus: and as for Pirithous, he caused him presently to be torne in peeces with his dogge, and shut Theseus vp in close prison. In the meane time there was one at ATHENS called Menestheus, the sonne of Peteus: which Peteus was the son of Orneus, and Orneus was the son of Erictheus. This Menestheus was the first that began to flatter the people, and did seeke to win the fauour of the communaltie, by sweet entising words: by which deuice he stirred vp the chiefest of the city against Theseus (who indeed long before began to be weary of him) by declaring vnto them how Theseus had taken from them their royalties and signiories, and had shut them vp in such sort within the walles of a city, that he might the better keep them in subiection and obedience in all things, after his will. The poore inferiour sort of people he did stirre vp also to rebellion, perswading them that it was no other then a dreame of liberty which was promised them: and how contrariwise they were clearely dispossessed and throwne out of their owne houses, of their temples, and from their naturall places where they were borne, to the end only, that in liew of many good and louing Lords which they were wont to haue before, they should now be compelled to serue one onely head, and a strange Lord. Euen as Menestheus was very hote about this practise, the war of the Tyndarides fell out at that instant, which greatly furthered his pretence. For these Tyndarides (to wit the children of Tyndarus) Castor and Pollux, came down with a great army against the city of ATHENS: and some suspect sore that Menestheus was cause of their comming thither. Howbeit at the first entrie they did no hurt at all in the countrey, but only demanded restitution of their sister. To whom the citizens made answer, that they knew not where she was left: and then the brethren began to make spoile, and offer warre indeed. Howbeit there was one called Academus, who hauing knowledge (I cannot tell by what meane) that she was secretly hidden in the city of APHIDNES, reuealed it vnto thẽ. By reason wherof the Tyndarides did alwaies honor him very much, so long as he liued, and afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS, hauing oft burnt & destroyed the whole country of ATTICA throughout, they would yet neuer touch the Academie of ATHENS for Academus sake. Yet Dicearchus saith, that in the armie of the Tyndarides there were two ARCADIANS, Echedemus and Marathus, and how of the name of one of them, it was then called the place of Echedemie, which sithence hath bene called Academia: and after the name of the other, there was a village called MARATHON, because he willingly offered himself to be sacrificed before the battell, as obeying the order and commandement of a prophecie. So they went and pitched their campe before the city of APHIDNES, and hauing wonne the battell, and taken the city by assault, they razed the place. They say that Alycus, the sonne of Sciron was slaine at this field, who was in the hoast of the Tyndarides, and that after his name, a certaine quarter of the territorie of MEGARA was called Alycus, in the which his body was

Howbeit it is not likely to be true, that Theſeus being there, the city of APHIDNES, and his mother alſo were taken. But when it was wonne, they of ATHENS began to quake for feare, and Meneſtheus counſelled them to receiue the Tyndarides into the city, and to make them good cheere, ſo they would make no wars but vpon Theſeus, which was the firſt that had done them the wrong and iniury: and that to all other elſe they ſhould ſhew fauour and good will. And ſo it fell out. For when the Tyndarides had all in their power to do as they liſted, they demanded nothing elſe but that they might be receiued into their corporation, and not to be reckoned for ſtrangers, no more then Hercules was: the which was granted the Tyndarides, and Aphidnus did adopt them for his children, as Pylius had adopted Hercules. Moreouer they did honor them as if they had bene gods, calling them Anaces. Either becauſe they ceaſſed the wars, or for that they ordered themſelues ſo well, that their whole army being lodged within the city, there was not any hurt or diſpleaſure done to any perſon: but as it became thoſe that haue the charge of any thing, they did carefully watch to preſerue the good quiet thereof. All which this Greeke word Anacos doth ſignifie, whereof perchance it comes that they call the kings Anactes. There are others alſo who hold opinion that they were called Anaces, becauſe of their ſtarres which appeared in the aire. For the ATTICAN tongue ſaith, Anacas, and Anecathen: where the common people ſay Ano, and Anothen, that is to ſay, aboue. Neuertheleſſe Æthra Theſeus mother, was caried priſoned to LACEDÆMON, and from thence to TROIA with Hellen, as ſome ſay: and as Homer himſelfe doth witneſſe in his verſes, where he ſpeaketh of the women that followed Hellen:

Kings called Anactes. Anaces why ſo called.

Æthra taken priſoner and caried to Lacedemon.

Æthra the daughter deare of Pitheus aged Sire,
And with her faire Clymene ſhe, whoſe eyes moſt men deſire.

Yet there are other who as well reiect theſe two verſes, and maintaine they are not Homers: as alſo they reproue all that is reported of Munychus: to wit, that Laocide being priuily conceiued of him by Demophon, he was brought vp ſecretly by Æthra within TROIA. But Heſter the hiſtorian in his thirteenth of his hiſtories of ATTICA, maketh a recitall far contrary to other, ſaying that ſome hold opinion, that Paris Alexander was ſlaine in battell by Achilles and Patroclus in the country of THESSALY, neare to the riuer of Sperchius, & that his brother Hector took the city of TROEZEN, from whence he brought away Æthra: in which there is no maner of appearance or likelihood. But Ædonius king of the MOLOSSIANS, feaſting Hercules one day as he paſſed through his Realme, deſcended by chance into talke of Theſeus and Perithous, how they came to ſteale away his daughter ſecretly: and after told how they were alſo puniſhed. Hercules was maruellous ſorry to vnderſtand that one of them was now dead, and the other in danger to die; and thought with himſelfe that to make his mone to Ædoneus, it would not helpe the matter: he beſought him only that he would deliuer Theſeus for his ſake. And he granted him. Thus Theſeus being deliuered of his captiuity, returned to ATHENS, where his friends were not altogether kept vnder by his enemies: & at his returne he did dedicate to Hercules all the temples, which the city had before cauſed to be built in his owne honour. And where firſt of all they were called Theſea, he did now ſurname them all Herculea, excepting foure, as Philochorus writeth. Now when he was arriued at ATHENS, he would immediatly haue commanded and ordered things as he was wont to do: but he found himſelfe troubled much with ſedition, becauſe thoſe who had hated him of a long time, had added alſo to their old cankred hate, a diſdaine and contempt to feare him any more. And the common people now were become ſo ſtubborne, that where before they would haue done all that they were commanded: and haue ſpoken nothing to the contrary: now they looked to be borne with, and flattered. Whereupon Theſeus thought at the firſt to haue vſed force, but he was forced by the faction and contention of his enemies to let all alone, and in the end, deſpairing he ſhould euer bring his matters to paſſe to his deſire, he ſecretly ſent away his children vnto the Ile of EVBOEA, to Elphenor the ſonne of Chalcodus. And himſelfe, after he had made many wiſhes & curſes againſt the ATHENIANS, in the village of GARGETTVS, in a place which for that cauſe to this day is called Arateriod, (that is to ſay, the place of curſings) he did take the ſeas, & went into the Ile of SCIROS, where he had goods, and thought alſo to haue found friends. Lycomedes reigned at that time, and was king of the Ile, vnto whom Theſeus made requeſt for ſome land, as intending to dwell there: albeit ſome ſay that he required him to giue him aide againſt the ATHENIANS. Lycomedes, were it that he doubted to entertaine ſo great a perſonage, or that he did it to gratifie Meneſtheus: caried him vp to the high rockes, faining as though he would from thence haue ſhewed him all his country round about: but when he had him there, he threw him downe headlong from the top of the rocks to the bottome, and put him thus vnfortunatly to death. Yet other write, that he fell downe of himſelfe by an vnfortunate chance, walking one day after ſupper as he was wont. There was no man at that time that did follow or purſue his death, but Meneſtheus quietly remained king of ATHENS: and the children of Theſeus, as priuate ſouldiers followed Elphinor in the warres of TROIA. But after the death of Meneſtheus, who died in the iourney to TROY, Theſeus ſonnes returned vnto ATHENS, where they recouered their ſtate. Sithence there were many occaſions which moued the ATHENIANS to reuerence and honour him as a demy God. For in the battell of Marathon, many thought they ſaw his ſhadow and image in armes, fighting againſt the barbarous people. And after the warres of the Medes (the yeare wherein Phædon was gouernour of ATHENS) the Nunne Pithia anſwered the ATHENIANS, who had ſent to the Oracle of Apollo: that they ſhould bring backe the bones of Theſeus, and putting them in ſome honourable place, they ſhould preſerue and honour them deuoutly. But it was a hard matter to find his graue: and if they had found it, yet had it bin a hard thing to haue brought his bones away, for the malice of thoſe barbarous people which inhabited that Ile: which were ſo wild and fierce, that none could trade or liue with them. Notwithſtanding Cimon hauing taken the Iland (as we haue written in his life) and ſeeking his graue: perceiuing by good hap an Eagle pecking with her beake, and ſcraping with her clawes in a place of ſome prety height: ſtraight it came into his mind (as by diuine inſpiration) to ſearch and digge the place, where was found the tombe of a great body, with the head of a ſpeare which was of braſſe, & a ſword with it. All which things were brought to ATHENS by Cimon in the admirall gally. The ATHENIANS receiued them with great ioy, with proceſſions and goodly ſacrifices, as if Theſeus himſelfe had bene aliue, and had returned into the city againe. At this day all theſe relickes lye yet in the middeſt of the city, neare to the place where the yong men do vſe all their exerciſes of body. There is free liberty of acceſſe for all ſlaues and poore men (that are afflicted and purſued by any mightier then themſelues) to pray and ſacrifice in remembrance of Theſeus: who while he liued was protector of the oppreſſed, and did curteouſly receiue their requeſts and petitions that prayed to haue aid of him. The greateſt & moſt ſolemne ſacrifice they do vnto him, is on the eight day of October, in which he returned from CRETA with the other yong children of ATHENS. Howbeit they do not leaue to honour him euery eight day of all other moneths, either becauſe he arriued from TROEZEN at ATHENS the eight day of Iune, as Diodorus the Coſmographer writeth: or for that they thought that number to be meeteſt for him, becauſe the bruite ranne he was begotten of Neptune. They do ſacrifice alſo to Neptune the eight day of euery moneth, becauſe the number of eight is the firſt cube made of euen number, and the double of the firſt ſquare: which doth repreſent a ſtedfaſtneſſe immoueable, properly attributed to the might of Neptune, whom for this cauſe we ſurname Aſphalius, and Gaiochus, which by interpretation doth ſignifie the ſafe keeper, and the ſtayer of the earth.

THE LIFE OF Romulus.

THE Hiſtoriographers do not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cauſe the great name of the city of ROME (the glory whereof is blowne abroad through all the world) was firſt giuen vnto it. For ſome thinke that the Pelaſgians, after they had ouercome the greateſt part of the world, and had inhabited and ſubdued many nations, in the end did ſtay themſelues in that place where it was new builded: and for their great ſtrength and power in armes, they gaue the name of ROME vnto the city, as ſignifying power in the Greeke tongue. Other ſay, that after the taking and deſtruction of TROIA, there were certaine TROIANS, which ſauing themſelues from the ſword, tooke ſuch veſſels as they found at aduenture in the hauen, and were by winds put to the THVSCANE ſhore, where they anckered neare vnto the riuer of Tyber. There their wiues being ſo ſore ſea ſick, that poſſibly they could not any more endure the boiſterous ſurges of the ſeas, it happened one of them among the reſt (the nobleſt and wiſeſt of the company) called Roma, to counſell the other women of her companions to ſet their ſhips a fire; which they did accordingly. Wherewith their husbands at the firſt were maruellouſly offended. But afterwards, being compelled of neceſſitie to plant themſelues neare vnto the city of PALLANTIVM, they were appeaſed when they ſaw things proſper better then they hoped for, finding the ſoile there fertile, and the people their neighbours ciuill and gentle in entertaining them. Wherefore among other honours they did to requite this Lady Roma, they called their city after her name, as from whom came the originall cauſe of the building and foundation thereof. They ſay, that from thence came this cuſtome continuing yet to this day at ROME, that the women ſaluting their kinſefolkes and husbands, do kiſſe them on the mouth: for ſo did theſe TROIAN Ladies to pleaſe their husbands, and to winne them againe, after they had loſt their fauours, and procured their diſpleaſures with burning of their ſhippes. Other ſay, that Roma was the daughter of Italus, and of Lucaria, or elſe of Telephus the ſonne of Hercules, and the wife of AEneas: other ſay, of Aſcanius, the ſonne of AEneas, who named the city after her name. Other hold opinion, that it was Romanus (the ſonne of Vliſſes and of Circe) that firſt founded ROME: other will ſay that it was Romus the ſonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent thither from TROIA. Other write that it was one Romis a tyrant of the LATINS, who draue the THVSCANS out of thoſe parts: which departing out of THESSALY, went firſt of all into LYDIA, and afterwards from LYDIA into ITALY. And furthermore, they who thinke that Romulus (as indeed it carieth beſt likelihood) was he that gaue the name to the city, do not agree about his anceſtors. For ſome of them write, that he was the ſonne of Æneas and of Dexithea the daughter of Phorbus, and that he was brought into ITALY of a litle child with his brother Remus: and that at that time the riuer of Tyber being ouerflowne, all other ſhips were caſt away, ſauing the ſhippe in which the two litle boyes were, which by great good hap came to ſtay vpon a very plaine euen ground on the banke: and becauſe the children beyond all hope were ſaued by this means, therfore the place was afterwards called ROMA. Other ſay, that Roma the daughter of the firſt Troian Lady was maried vnto Latinus the ſon of Telemachus, by whom ſhe had Romulus. Other write, that it was Æmilia the daughter of Æneas, and of Lauinia, which was gotten with child by the god Mars. Other tel a tale of Romulus birth, nothing true nor likely. For it is ſaid that there was ſometime a king of ALBA named Tarchetius, a very wicked and cruell man, in whoſe houſe through the permiſſion of the gods, appeared ſuch a like viſion: that there roſe vp in the harth of his chimney the forme and faſhion of a mans priuy member, which continued there many daies. And they ſay, that at that time there was in THYSCANE an oracle of Thetis, from whom they brought vnto this wicked king Tarchetius ſuch an anſwer; that he ſhould cauſe his daughter yet vnmaried to haue carnall company with the ſtrange thing, for ſhe ſhould beare a ſonne, that ſhould be famous for his valiancie, for ſtrength of body, and his happy ſucceſſe, wherein he ſhould exceed all men of his time. Tarchetius told this oracle vnto one of his daughters, and willed her to entertaine this ſtrange thing: but ſhe diſdaining to do it, ſent one of her wayting women to vndertake the entertainement. But Tarchetius was ſo mad at this, that he cauſed them both to be taken to put them to death: howbeit the goddeſſe Veſta appeared to him in his ſleep in the night, and charged him he ſhould not do it. Whereupon he did command them to make him a peece of cloth in the priſon, with promiſe that they ſhould be maried when they had finiſhed it. Theſe poore maids toiled at it all the liue long day, but in the night there came other (by Tarchetius commandement) that did vndo all they had done the day before. In the mean time, this waiting woman that was got with child by this ſtrange thing, was deliuered of two goodly boyes or twins: whom Tarchetius gaue vnto one Teratius, with expreſſe commandement he ſhould caſt them away. This Teratius caried them vnto the banke of the riuer: thither came a ſhe Wolfe and gaue them ſucke, and certaine birds that brought little crums and put them in their mouthes, vntill a ſwine-heard perceiuing them, and wondring at the ſight, did boldly go to the children, and tooke them away with him. Theſe infants being thus preſerued, after they were come to mans ſtate, did ſet vpon Tarchetius and ſlue him. One Promathion an Italian writer, deliuereth this ſtory thus. But the report that carieth beſt credite of all, and is allowed of by many writers, cometh from Diocles Peparethian, (whom Fabius Pictor followeth in many things) who was the firſt that put forth this ſtory among the GRECIANS, and ſpecially the chiefeſt points of it. Though this matter be ſomewhat diuerſly taken, yet in effect the ſtory is thus. The right line and bloud of the kings of ALBA deſcended from AEneas, by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne: and the kingdome fell in the end betweene two brethren, Numitor and Amulius. They agreed by lot to make diuiſion betweene them, whereof the one to haue the Kingdome, and the other all the gold, ſiluer, ready money, goods and iewels brought from TROIA. Numitor by his lot choſe the Realme for his portion: Amulius hauing all the gold and treaſure in his hands, did find himſelfe thereby the ſtronger, and ſo did eaſily take his Realme from him. And fearing leſt his brothers daughter might haue children which one day might thruſt him out againe, he made her a Nunne of the goddeſſe Veſta, there to paſſe her dayes in virginity, and neuer to be maried: (ſome call her Rhea, other Syluia, and other Ilia) neuertheleſſe not long after ſhe was found with child, againſt the rule and profeſſion of the Veſtall Nunnes. So nothing had ſaued her from preſent death, but the petition of Antho the daughter of king Amulius, who intreated her father for her life: yet notwithſtanding ſhe was ſtraightly locked vp, that no body could ſee her, nor ſpeake with her, leſt ſhe ſhould be brought to bed without Amulius knowledge. In the end ſhe was deliuered of two faire boyes and maruellous great twins: which made Amulius more affraid then before. So he commanded one of his men to take the two children, and to throw them away, and deſtroy them. Some ſay that this ſeruants name was Fauſtulus: other thinke it was he that brought them vp. But whoſoeuer he was, he that had the charge to throw them away put them in a trough, and went towards the riuer with intention to throw them in. Howbeit he found it riſen ſo high, and

and running so swiftly, that he durst not come neare the waters side, and so they being in the trough, he laid them on the banke. In the meane time the riuer swelling still, and ouerflowing the banke, in such sort that it came vnder the trough, did gently lift vp the trough, and caried it vnto a great plaine, called at this present Germanum, and in the old time Germanum (as I take it) because the ROMAINES called the brothers of father and mother, Germani. Now there was neare vnto this place a wild fig-tree which they called Ruminalis, of the name of Romulus, as the most part thought: or else because the beasts feeding there, were wont to come vnder the same in the extreme heate of the day, and there did ruminate, that is, chew their cudde in the shadow: or perhaps because that the two children did sucke the teate of the Wolfe, which the ancient LATINS call RVMA, and they at this day do yet call the goddesse on whom they cry out to giue their children sucke, RVMILIA. And in their sacrifices to her they vse no wine, but offer vp milke and water mingled with hony. To these two children lying there in this sort, they write, there came a she Wolfe, and gaue them suck, and a Hitwaw also which did helpe to nourish and keepe them. These two beasts are thought to be consecrated to the god Mars, and the LATINS do singularly honour and reuerence the Hitwaw. This did much helpe to giue credite to the words of the mother, who affirmed she was conceiued of those two children, by the god Mars. Howbeit some thinke she was deceiued in her opinion: for Amulius that had her maidenhead, went to her all armed, and perforce did rauish her. Other hold opinion that the name of the nurse which gaue the two children sucke with her breasts, gaue occasion to common report to erre much in this tale, by reason of the double signification thereof. For the LATINS do call with one selfe name she Wolfes Lupas; and women that giue their bodies to all comers: as this nurse the wife of Faustulus (that brought these children home to her house) did vse to do. By her right name she was called Acca Laurentia, vnto whom the ROMAINES do sacrifice yet vnto this day: & the Priest of Mars doth offer vnto her, in the moneth of Aprill, the shedding of wine & milk accustomed at burials, and the feast it selfe is called Laurentia. It is true that they honor also another Laurentia for like occasion. The clerk or sextē of Hercules temple, not knowing one day how to driue away the time, as it should seeme: of a certaine liuelinesse and boldnesse, did desire the god Hercules to play at dice with him, with condition that if he did winne, Hercules should be bound to send him some good fortune: and if it were his lucke to lose, then he promised Hercules he would prouide him a very good supper, & would besides bring him a faire gentlewoman to lye withall. The conditions of the play thus rehearsed, the sexten first cast the dice for Hercules, and afterwards for himselfe. It fell out that Hercules wan, and the sexten meaning good faith, and thinking it very meet to performe the bargaine that himselfe had made, prepared a good supper, and hired this Laurentia the curtisan, which was very faire, but as yet of no great fame, to come to it. Thus hauing feasted within the temple, and prepared a bed ready there, after supper he locked her into the temple, as if Hercules should haue come indeed, and lyen with her. And it is said for troth, that Hercules came thither, and commanded her in the morning she should go into the market place, and salute the first man she met, & keep him euer for her friend. Which thing she performed, and the first man she met was called Tarrutius, a man of great yeares, and one that had gathered together maruellous wealth and riches. He had no children at all, neither was he euer maried. He fell acquainted with this Laurentia, and loued her so dearely, that shortly after chancing to die, he made her heire of all he had: whereof she disposed afterwards by her last will and testament, the best and greatest part vnto the people of ROME. Moreouer it is reported also, that she now being growne to be famous & of great honor (as thought to be the lemman of a god) did vanish away suddenly in the self same place where the first Laurentia was buried. The place at this day is called Velabrum: because the riuer being ouerflowne, they were oftentimes compelled to passe by bote to go to the market place, and they called this maner of ferrying ouer, Velatura. Other say, that those tumblers and common players, which shewed sundry games and pastimes to win the fauour of the people, were wont to couer that passage ouer with canuas clothes & veiles, by which they go from the market place to the lists or shew place where they run their horses, beginning their race euen at that place: and they call a veile in their tongue, Velum. This is the cause why the second Laurentia is honoured at ROME. Faustulus chiefe neat-heard to Amulius, tooke vp the two children, and no body knew it, as some say; or as others report (and likest to be true) with the priuity and knowledge of Numitor Amulius brother, who secretly furnished them with mony that brought vp the two yong children. is ſaid alſo they were both conueied vnto the city of the GABIANS, where they were brought vp at ſchoole, and taught all other honeſt things, which they vſe to teach the ſons and children of good and Noble men. Further they ſay, they were named Remus and Romulus becauſe they were found ſucking on the teats of a Wolfe. Now the beautie of their bodies did preſently ſhew, beholding onely but their ſtature and maner of their countenances, of what nature and linage they were: and as they grew in yeares, their manly courage increaſed maruellouſly, ſo as they became ſtout and hardy men, in ſo much as they were neuer troubled or aſtonied at any danger that was offered them. Howbeit it appeared plainly that Romulus had more wit and vnderſtanding thē his brother Remus. For in all things wherin they were to deale with their neighbours, either concerning hunting, or the bounds and limits of their paſtures, it was eaſily diſcerned in him, that he was borne to command, and not to obey. For this cauſe they were both exceedingly beloued of their companions, & of thoſe which were their inferiors. As for the kings heardmē, they paſſed not much for them, ſaying that they were euen like themſelues, and ſo ſeemed not to care a pinne for their anger or diſpleaſure, but wholly gaue themſelues to all gentlemanly exerciſes and trades, thinking to liue idly and at eaſe without trauell, was neither comely nor conuenient: but to exerciſe and harden their bodies with hunting, running, purſuing murderers and theeues, and to helpe thoſe which were oppreſſed with wrong and violence, ſhould be credit and commendation to them. By reaſon whereof, in very ſhort time they grew to great fame and renowne. And it fell out by chance there aroſe ſome ſtrife and variance betweene the heardmen of Amulius, and the heardmen of Numitor: in ſo much as thoſe that were Numitors, caried away by force ſome cattell of the others. The other ſide would not beare that, but purſued faſt after, and beating them well-fauoredly, they made them take their legs, and brought back againe the greateſt part of the cattell they had caried away with them. Whereat Numitor ſtormed maruellouſly, but yet his men ſeemed to make but litle account of it, and purpoſing reuenge, they gathered about them a good company of vacabounds (that had neither home nor reſting place) and certaine fugitiue bondmen which they entiſed ill-fauouredly, incouraging them to ſteale away from their maiſters. Thus one day whileſt Romulus was buſie about ſome ſacrifice (being a deuout man and religious, and well giuen to ſerue the gods, and to learne to diuine and tell beforehand what things ſhould happen and come to paſſe) it happened the heardmen of Numitor to meete Remus very ſlenderly accompanied: ſo they fell vpon him ſuddenly: blowes were dealt roundly on both ſides, and men were hurt on either part. Howbeit Numitors men in the end proued the ſtronger part, & tooke Remus by force, & caried him ſtraight before Numitor, alledging many complaints and matters againſt him. Numitor durſt not puniſh him of his own authority, becauſe he feared his brother Amulius, who was ſomewhat terrible: but went vnto him, and earneſtly beſought him to do him iuſtice, and not to ſuffer him being his owne brother, to receiue ſuch iniurie of his men. There was not a man in the city of ALBA, but did greatly miſlike the iniury done to Numitor: and ſpake it openly, that he was no perſon to be offered ſuch a wrong. In ſo much as Amulius moued herewith, did deliuer Remus into his hands, to puniſh him as he thought good. Whereupon Numitor caried him home with him. But when he had him in his houſe, he began to conſider better of him, with admiratiō how goodly a yong man he was, how in height and ſtrength of body he paſſed all the reſt of his people, and perceiuing in his face an aſſured conſtancy, and bold ſtedfaſt courage that yeelded not, nor was abaſhed for any danger he ſaw towards him: and hearing alſo the reports of his acts and manhood to be anſwerable to that he ſaw: (being chiefly moued in mine opinion, by ſome ſecret inſpiration of the gods, which ordaine the depth of great matters) began partly by coniecture, and partly by chance to take a conceit of him. So he asked him what he was, and who was his father and mother: ſpeaking to him in a more gentle wiſe, and with a friendlier countenance then before, to make him the bolder to anſwer, & be of better hope. Remus boldly anſwered him; Truly I will not hide the troth from thee, for thou ſeemeſt to be more worthy to be King then thy brother Amulius. For thou enquireſt, and heareſt firſt before thou condemneſt: and he condemneth before he examine or heare the parties. Vntill now we thought we had bene the children of two of the Kings ſeruants, to wit of Fauſtulus and of Laurentia: I ſay we, becauſe my brother and I are two twins. But ſeeing we are now falſely accuſed vnto thee, and by malicious ſurmiſed tales are wrongfully brought in danger of our liues: we intend to diſcouer our ſelues, and to declare ſtrange things vnto thee, whereof the preſent perill we now ſtand in, ſhal plainly proue proue the troth. Men ſay that we haue bene begotten miraculouſly, foſtered and giuen ſucke more ſtrangely, and in our tender yeares were fed by birds and wild beaſts, to whom we were caſt out as a prey. For a Wolfe gaue vs ſucke with her teats, and an Hitwaw (they ſay) brought vs litle crummes, and put them in our mouthes, as we lay vpon the banke by the riuer, where we were put in a trough that at this day remaineth whole, bound about with plates of copper, vpon the which are ſome letters engrauen half worne out, which peraduenture will one day ſerue for ſome tokens of knowledge (vnprofitable for our parents) when it ſhall be too late, and after we are dead and gone. Numitor then comparing theſe words, with the age the young man ſeemed to be of, and conſidering well his face, did not reiect the hope of his imagination that ſmiled on him, but handled the matter ſo, that he found meanes to ſpeake ſecretly with his daughter, notwithſtanding at that time ſhe was kept very ſtraightly. Fauſtulus in the meane time hearing that Remus was priſoner, and that the King had deliuered him already into the hands of his brother Numitor to do iuſtice, went to pray Romulus to helpe him, and told him then whoſe children they were: for before he had neuer opened it to them but in darke ſpeeches, and glauncing wiſe, and ſo much as ſufficed to put them in ſome hope. So Fauſtulus taking the trough with him at that time, went vnto Numitor in great haſte, as maruellouſly affraid for the preſent danger he thought Remus in. The kings ſouldiers which warded at the gates of the city, began to gather ſome ſuſpition of Fauſtulus maner of coming: and he made himſelfe to be the more ſuſpected, being queſtioned with about the cauſe of his repaire thither, that he faltred in his words, beſides they eſpied his trough which he caried vnder his cloke. Now amongſt the warders, there was by chance one that was the man to whom the children were committed to be caſt away, and was preſent when they were left on the banke of the riuer to the mercy of fortune. This man knew the trough by and by, as well by the faſhion, as by the letters grauen vpon it: who miſtruſted ſtraight that which was true indeed. So he did not neglect the thing, but went forthwith to the King to tell him the matter, & led Fauſtulus with him to haue him confeſſe the troth. Fauſtulus being in this perplexity, could not keepe all cloſe vpon examination, but did vtter out ſomewhat of the matter, and he told not all. For he plainely iuſtified the children were aliue: yet he ſaid they were farre from the city of Alba, where they kept beaſts in the fields. And as for the trough, he was going to carry it to Ilia, becauſe ſhe had diuerſe times praied him to let her ſee & feele it: to the end ſhe might be more aſſured of her hope, who promiſed her that one day ſhe ſhould ſee her children againe. So it chanced vnto Amulius at that time, as it commonly doth vnto thoſe that are troubled, and do any thing in feare or anger, as a man amazed thereat, to ſend one preſently (who in all other things was a very honeſt man, but a great friend of his brother Numitors) to aske him if he had heard any thing that his daughters children were aliue. This perſon being come to Numitors houſe, found him ready to embrace Remus, who fell to be witneſſe thereof, and of the good hap diſcouered vnto Numitor: whereupon he perſwaded him how to ſet vpon his brother, & to diſpatch the matter with ſpeed. So from that time forwards, he tooke their part. On the other ſide alſo the matter gaue them no leiſure to deferre their enterpriſe, although they had bene willing: for the whole caſe was ſomewhat blowne abroad. So Romulus then got ſtraight a power, and drew very neare the city, and many of the citizens of Alba went out to ioyne with him, who either feared or hated Amulius. Now Romulus power which he brought (ouer and beſides thoſe citizens) was a good number of fighting men, and they were diuided by hundreds, and euery hundred had his captaine who marched before his band, carrying litle bundels of graſſe or of boughes tied to the end of their poles. The Latines call theſe bundels Manipulos, whereof it commeth that yet at this day in an army of the Romaines, the ſouldiers which are all vnder one enſigne, are called Manipulares. So Remus ſtirring vp thoſe that were within the city, and Romulus bringing in men from without, the tyrant Amulius fell in ſuch feare and agony, that without prouiding any thing for his ſafety, they came vpon him ſuddenly in his pallace, and ſlue him. Thus you heare how neare Fabius Pictor and Diocles Peparethian do agree in reciting the ſtory, who was the firſt in mine opinion that wrote the foundation of the city of Rome: howbeit there are that think they are all but fables and tales deuiſed of pleaſure. But me thinks for all that, they are not altogether to be reiected or diſcredited, if we will conſider fortunes ſtrange effects vpon times, and of the greatnes alſo of the Romaine empire: which had neuer atchieued to her preſent poſſeſſed power and authority, if the gods had not from the beginning bene workers of the ſame, and if there had not alſo bene ſome ſtrange cauſe, and wonderfull foundation. Amulius being now slaine as before, and after that all things were appeased and reduced to good order againe, Remus and Romulus would not dwell in the citie of ALBA, being no Lords thereof, nor also would be Lords of it, so long as their grandfather by the mothers side was aliue. Wherefore after they had restored him to his estate, and had done the honour and duty they ought vnto their mother, they purposed to go and build a citie in those places where they had bene first brought vp, for this was the honestest colour they could pretend for their departing from ALBA. Peraduenture they were enforced so to do whether they would or not, for the great number of banished men, and fugitiue slaues which were gathered together by them for their strength, who had bene vtterly lost and cast away, if they had bene once discharged by them. Therefore it was of necessitie that they should dwell by themselues, separated in some place, to keepe this number together and in some order. For it is true that the inhabitants of the city of ALBA would not suffer such banished persons and runagates to be mingled amongst them, nor would receiue them into their city to be free among them. All which appeareth sufficiently: first, because they tooke away women by force: and so not of insolency, but of necessity, when they found no man that would bestow any of them. It is manifest also they did greatly honour and make much of the women they had taken away before. Furthermore, when their citie began a litle to be setled, they made a temple of refuge for all fugitiues and afflicted persons, which they called the temple of the god Asilaus: where there was sanctuarie and safety for all sorts of people that repaired thither, and could get into the temple: for whom it was alledged, they could not deliuer any bondman to his maister, nor debter to his creditor, nor the murtherer to the Iustice, that was fled thither for succour, because the oracle of Apollo the Delphian had expresly enioyned them to grant sanctuarie to all those that would come thither for it. So by this meanes in short space their city flourished, and was replenished, where at the first foundation of it, they say there was not aboue one thousand houses, as more at large hereafter shall be declared. When they came now to the building of their citie, Romulus and Remus the two brethren fell suddenly at a strife together about the place where the city should be builded. For Romulus built ROME, which is called foure square, and would needs it should remain in the place which he had chosen. Remus his brother chose another place very strong of situation, vpon mount Auentine, which was called after his name Remonium, and now is called Rignarium. Notwithstanding, in the end they agreed betweene themselues this controuersie should be decided by the flying of birds, which do giue a happy diuination of things to come. So being set in diuerse places by themselues to make obseruation, some say that there appeared vnto Remus six, and to Romulus twelue vultures. Others say that Remus truly saw sixe, and Romulus feined from the beginning that he saw twise as many: but when Remus came to him, then there appeared twelue indeed vnto Romulus; and this is the cause why the ROMANES at this day in their diuinations and southsayings of the flying of birds, do maruellously obserue the flying of the vultures. It is true which the Historiographer Herodotus Ponticus writeth; that Hercules reioyced much when there appeared a vultur to him, being ready to begin any enterprise. For it is the fowle of the world that doth least hurt, and neuer marreth nor destroyeth any thing that man doth sow, plant, or set: considering hat she feedeth on carion only, and doth neuer hurt nor kill any liuing thing. Also she doth not prey vpon dead fowle, for the likenesse that is betweene them: where the eagles, the dukes, and the sakers, do murther, kill, and eate those which are of their owne kind. And yet as Æschylus saith,

Needs must that fowle accounted be most vile,
Most rauening, and full of filthy mind,
Which doth himselfe continually defile,
By preying still vpon his proper kind.

Moreouer, other birds are alwayes (as a man would say) before our eyes, and do daily shew themselues vnto vs: where the vultur is a very rare bird, and hardly to be seene, and men do not easily find their ayries. Which hath giuen some occasion to hold a false opinion, that the vulturs are passagers, and come into these parts out of strange countries. The prognosticators also thinke, that such things which are not ordinary, and but seldome seene, be not naturall, but miraculously sent by the gods to prognosticate something. When Remus knew how his brother had mocked him, he was very angrie with him. And when Romulus had cast a ditch, as it were for the wall about his citie, Remus did not onely scorne it, but hindred also his worke, and in

in the end for a mockery leapt ouer his wall. To conclude, he did ſo much, that at the laſt he was ſlaine there by Romulus owne hands, as ſome ſay: or as other hold opinion, by one of his men, which was called Celer. In this fight they ſlue Fauſtulus, and Pliſtinus alſo his brother, who had holpen him to bring vp Romulus. Howſoeuer the matter fell out, this Celer abſented himſelf from ROME, and went into the country of THVSCANE. And they ſay, that men which are quick and ready vpon a ſodaine, took their names euer after of him, & were called Celeres. As amongſt other, Quintus Metellus after the death of his father, hauing in very few daies made the people of ROME to ſee a combat of fencers (called Gladiatores) fighting at the ſharpe, they ſurnamed him Celer, for that the ROMANES maruelled how he could prepare his things in ſo ſhort a time. Furthermore, Romulus hauing now buried his brother, & his other two bringers vp (called foſter fathers) in the place they cal Remonia, began then to build & lay the foundation of his city, ſending for men out of THVSCANE, who did name and teach him particularly all the ceremonies he had to obſerue there, according to their lawes & ordinances, as a great holy myſtery. And firſt of all they made a round ditch in the place called at this day Comitium, into which they did caſt their chiefeſt and beſt things, which men vſe lawfully for good, and naturally as moſt neceſſary. After that they did throw alſo into it, a litle of the earth, from whence euery man came, and mingled theſe all together. This ditch in their ceremonies is called the World, in Latine Mundus, euen the ſelfe ſame name the Latines call the Vniuerſall. About this ditch they did trace the compaſſe of the city they would build, euen as one would draw a circle about a center. This done, the founder of the city taketh a plough, to which he faſtned a culter or plough ſhare of braſſe, & ſo yoaked in the plough an oxe and a cow, he himſelfe holding the plough did make round about the compaſſe of the city a deep furrow. Thoſe which followed him, had the charge to throw the turues of earth inward into the city, which the plough ſhare raiſed vp, and not to leaue any of them turned outward. The furrow thus caſt vp was the whole compaſſe of their wal, which they call in Latin Pomærium, by ſhortning of the ſyllables, for poſt murum: to wit, after wall. But in the place where they determined to make a gate, they did take off the plough ſhare, and draw the plough, with leauing a certaine ſpace vnbroken vp: whereupon the ROMAINES thinke all the compaſſe of their wals holy and ſacred, except their gates. For if their gates had bene hallowed and ſanctified, they would haue had a conſcience through thē to haue brought in, or caried out of the city, any things neceſſary for the life of man, that had not bene pure and clean. Now they beleeue certainly, that this ceremony of the foundatiō of their city was made the one & twenty of Aprill: becauſe the ROMANES do yet keep that day holyday, & call it the feaſt of the natiuity of their country. On which day they did not in old time ſacrifice any thing that had life, as eſteeming that day (which was the natiuity of their city) to be moſt meet to be kept cleane and pure frō being polluted or defiled with any bloud. Notwithſtanding before ROME was builded they had another feaſt called the ſhepheards or heardmens holy day, which they did celebrate vpon the ſame day, and called it Palilia. Now at this day the beginnings of the moneths with the ROMAINS is cleane contrary to the GRECIANS: yet for all this, they hold opinion for certainty, that the day on which Romulus foūded his city, was aſſuredly that which the GRECIANS call Triacada: that is to ſay, the thirtieth day. On which there was ſeen an eclips of the Moon, which they ſuppoſe was obſerued by the Poet Antimachus (born in the city of TEOS) in the thirteenth yeare of the ſixt Olympiad. Likewiſe in the time of Marcus Varro (a learned man, and one that had read as much of ancient ſtories as any ROMAINE) there was a friend of his called Tarutius, a great Philoſopher and Mathematitian, who being giuen to the calculation of Aſtronomie for the delight of ſpeculation only, wherin he was thought moſt excellent: it did fall out that Varro gaue him this queſtion, to ſearch out what houre and day the natiuity of Romulus was; who gathered it out by certaine accidents, as they do in the reſolutions of certaine Geometricall queſtions. For they ſay, that by the ſelf ſame ſcience, one may tell before of things to come, and to happen to a man in his life, knowing certainly the houre of his natiuity: and how one may tell alſo the houre of his natiuity, when by accidents they know what hath hapned to him all his life. Tarutius did the queſtion that Varro gaue him. And hauing throughly conſidered the aduentures, deeds, and geſts of Romulus, how long he liued, and how he died: all which being gathered and conferred together, he did boldly iudge for a certainty, that he was conceiued in his mothers wombe, in the firſt yeare of the ſecond Olympiad, the three and twentieth day of the moneth which the ÆGYPTIANS call Choeac, and now is called December, about three of the clocke in the morning, in which houre there was a whole eclips of the Sun: and that he was borne into the world, the 21. of the month of Thoth, which is the moneth of September, about the rising of the Sun. And that ROME was begun by him on the ninth day of the moneth, which the ÆGYPTIANS call Pharmuthi, and answereth now to the moneth of Aprill, betweene two and three of the clocke in the morning. For they will say, that a city hath his reuolution & his time of continuance appointed, as well as the life of a man: & that they knew by the situation of the stars, the day of her beginning & foundation. These things & such other like, peraduenture wil please the Readers better, for their strangenesse and curiosity, then offend or mislike them for their falsehood. Now after that he had founded his city, he first and formost did diuide in two companies all those that were of age to cary armor. In euery one of these companies there were three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen: and they were called Legions, because they were sorted of the chosen men that were pickt out amongst all the rest for to fight. The remaine after these was called Populus, which signifieth the people. After this, he made a hundred counsellors of the best and honestest men of the city, which he called Patricians: and the whole company of them together he called Senatus, as one would say, the counsel of the ancients. So they were called Patricians, as some will say, the councell of the fathers lawfull children, which few of the first inhabitants could shew. It may be, some wil say this name was giuen thē of Patrocinium, as growing of the protection they had by the sanctuary of their city, which word they vse at this day in the self same signification: as one that followed Euander into ITALY, was called Patron, because he was pitifull, and releeued the poore and litle children, and so got himselfe a name for his pity and humanity. But me thinks it were more like the troth to say, that Romulus did call them so, because he thought the chiefest mē should haue a fatherly care of the meaner sort: considering also it was to teach the meaner sort, that they shold not feare the authority of the greater, nor enuy at the honors they had, but rather in all their causes should vse their fauour and goodwill, by taking them as their fathers. For euē at this present, strangers cal those of the Senat, lords or captaines: but the naturall ROMANS call them, Patres Conscripti, which is a name of fatherhead and dignity without enuy. It is true, that at the beginning they were only called Patres, but sithence, because they were many ioyned vnto the first, they haue bene named Patres Conscripti, as a man should say, fathers of record together: which is the honorablest name he could haue deuised to make a differēce betwixt the Senators & the people. Furthermore, he made a difference between the chiefer citizens, and the baser people, by calling the better sort Patroni, as much to say, as defenders: & the meaner sort Clientes, as you would say, followers, or mē protected. This did breed maruellous great loue & good will among them, making the one much beholding to the other. by many mutual curtesies & pleasures: for the Patrons did help the Clients to their right, defended their causes in iudgement, gaue vnto them counsell, & did take all their matters in hand. The Clients again enterchangably humbled themselues to their patrons, not only in outward honor & reuerence towards them, but otherwise did help them with mony to marry & aduance their daughters, or els to pay their debts and credit, if they were poore or decayed. There was no law nor magistrate that could compell the patron to be a witnes against his client: nor yet the client to witnes against his patron. So they increased and continued all other rights & offices of amity & friendship together, sauing afterwards they thought it a great shame & reproch for the better & richer, to take reward of the meaner & poorer. And thus of this matter we haue spoken sufficiently. Moreouer, foure moneths after the foundation of the city was laid, Fabius writeth, there was a great rauishment of women. There are some which lay it vpon Romulus, who being thē of nature warlike, & giuen to propheties and answers of the gods, foretold that his city should become very great & mighty, so as he raised it by wars, & increased it by arms: & he sought out this colour to do mischief, and to make war vpon the SABYNS. To proue this true, some say he caused certain of their maids by force to be taken away, but not past 30. in nūber, as one that rather sought cause of wars, then did it for need of mariages: which me thinks was not likely to be true, but rather I iudge the contrary. For seeing his city was incontinently repleniished with people of all sorts, wherof there were very few that had wiues, and that they were men gathered out of all countries, & the most part of them poore and needy, so as their neighbors disdained thē much, and did not look they would long dwell together: Romulus hoping by this violent taking of their maids & rauishing thē, to haue an entry into alliance with the SABINS, & to entice thē further to ioine with them in mariage, if they did gently intreat these wiues they had gotten, enterprised this this violent taking of their maids, and rauiſhing of them in ſuch ſort. Firſt, he made it to be commonly bruted abroad in euery place, that he had found the altar of a god hiddē in the ground, & he called the name of the god, Conſus: either becauſe he was god of counſell; wherupon the ROMAINS at this day in their tong call Conſilium, which we call counſell: and the chiefe Magiſtrats of their city Conſules, as we ſay counſellers. Other ſay, it was the altar of the god Neptune, ſurnamed the patron of horſes. For this altar is yet at this day within the great liſts of the city, & euer couered and hidden, but whē they vſe the running games of their horſe race. Other ſay, becauſe counſell euer muſt be kept cloſe and ſecret, they had good reaſon to keepe that altar of this god Conſus hidden in the ground. Now other write, when it was opened, Romulus made a ſacrifice of wonderfull ioy, and afterwards proclaimed it openly in diuerſe places, that at ſuch a day there ſhould be common playes at ROME, and a ſolemne feaſt kept of the god Conſus, where all that were diſpoſed to come ſhould be welcome. Great numbers of people repaired thither from all parts. He himſelfe was ſet in the chiefeſt ſeate of the ſhew place, apparelled faire in purple, & accompanied with the chiefe of the citie about him. And there hauing purpoſed this rauiſhment you haue heard of, he had giuen the ſigne before: that the ſame ſhould begin, when he ſhould riſe vp and fold a plaite of his gowne, and vnfold the ſame againe. Hereupon his men ſtood attending with their ſwords: who ſo ſoone as they perceiued the ſigne was giuen, with their ſwords drawne in hand, and with great ſhouts and cries, ran violently on the maids and daughters of the SABYNES to take them away and rauiſh them; and ſuffered the men to runaway, without doing them any hurt or violence. So ſome ſay, there were but thirty rauiſhed, after whoſe names were called the thirty linages of the people of ROME. Howbeit Valerius Antias writeth, that ther were fiue hundred & ſeuen and twenty: and Iuba, ſix hundred foureſcore and three. In the which is ſingularly to be noted for the cōmendation of Romulus, that he himſelfe did take then but only one of the maids, named Herſilia: that afterwards was the only cauſe and mediation of peace betwixt the SABYNES and the ROMAINS. Which argueth plainly, that it was not to do the SABYNES any hurt, nor to ſatisfie any diſordinate luſt, that they had ſo forcibly vndertaken this rauiſhment: but to ioyne two peoples together, with the ſtraighteſt bonds that could be between men. This Herſilia as ſome ſay, was married vnto one Hoſtilius, the nobleſt man at that time amongſt the ROMAINES: or as others write, vnto Romulus himſelfe, which had two children by her. The firſt was a daughter, and her name was Prima, becauſe ſhe was the firſt: the other was a ſon whō he named Aollius, becauſe of the multitude of people he had aſſembled together in his city, & afterwards he was ſurnamed Abillius. Thus Zenodotus the TROEZENIAN writeth, wherin notwithſtanding there be diuerſe that do contrarey him. Among thoſe which rauiſhed the daughters of the SABYNES, it is ſaid there were found certaine meane men carying away a maruellous paſſing faire one. Theſe met by chance on the way certaine of the chief of the city who would haue taken her by force from them; which they had done, but that they began to cry, they carried her vnto Talaſſius, who was a young man maruellouſly well beloued of euery body. Which when the other vnderſtood, they were exceeding glad, and they commended them: inſomuch as there were ſome which ſodainly turned backe againe, and did accompany them for Talaſſius ſake, crying out aloud, and often on his name. From whence the cuſtome came, which to this day the ROMAINS ſing at their mariages, Talaſſius, like as the GRECIANS ſing Hymeneus. For it is ſaid he was counted very happy that he met with this woman. But Sextius Sylla a CARTHAGINIAN borne, a man very wiſe, and well learned, told me once it was the cry & ſigne which Romulus gaue to his men to begin the rauiſhment: whereupon thoſe that carried them away went crying this word Talaſſius, & that from thence the cuſtome had continued, that they ſing it yet at their mariages. Neuertheleſſe the moſt part of authors, ſpecially Iuba, thinkes it is a warning to remember the new married women of their worke, which is to ſpinne, which the GRECIANS call Talaſſia, the Italian word at that time being not mingled with the Greeke. And if it be true the ROMAINES vſed this terme of Talaſſia, as we of GRECE do vſe, we might by coniecture yeeld another reaſon for it, which ſhould carry a better likelihood and proofe. For when the SABYNES after the battell had made peace with the ROMAINS, they put in an article in fauor of the women in the treaty, that they ſhould not be bound to ſerue their husbands in any other worke but in ſpinning of wooll. Euer ſince this cuſtome hath growne, that thoſe which giue their daughters in mariage, and thoſe who leade the bride, and ſuch as are preſent at the wedding, ſpeake in ſport to the new maried wife, laughing, Talaſſius: in token that they do not lead the bride for any other work or ſeruice, but to ſpin wooll. Therof this hath bene the vſe to this day, that the bride doth not of her ſelfe come ouer the threſhold of her husbands doore, but ſhe is hoiſed pretily into the houſe: becauſe the SABYNE women at that time were ſo lift vp, and caried away by force. They ſay alſo, that the maner of making the ſhed of the new wedded wiues haire, with the yron head of a Iauelin, came vp then likewiſe: this ſtory being a manifeſt token that theſe firſt mariages were made by force of armes, and as it were at the ſwords point: as we haue written more at large in the booke, wherein we render & ſhew the cauſes of the ROMAINES faſhions and cuſtomes. This rauiſhment was put in execution about the eighteenth day of the moneth called Sextilis, and now named Auguſt: on which day they yet celebrate the feaſt they call Conſalia. Now the SABYNES were good men of war, and had great numbers of people, but they dwelt in villages, and not within incloſed wals: being a thing fit for their noble courages that did feare nothing, and as thoſe who were deſcended from the LACEDÆMONIANS. Neuertheleſſe they ſeeing themſelues bound and tied to peace by pledges and hoſtages, that were very neare allied vnto them, & fearing their daughters ſhould be ill intreated, ſent ambaſſadors to Romulus, by whom they made reaſonable offers & perſwaſions, that their daughters might be deliuered vnto them againe, without any force or violence, & then afterwards, that he would cauſe thē to be asked in mariage of their parents, as both reaſon & law would require, to the end that with good wil & cōſent of al parties, both peoples might contract amity & alliance together. Wherunto Romulus made anſwer, he could not reſtore the maids which his people had taken away and maried: but moſt friendly he praied the SABYNS to be contented with their alliance. This anſwer being returned, & not liked, whilſt the princes & cōmunalty of the SABYNS were occupied in conſultatiō, & about the arming of thēſelues: Acron king of the CENINENSES (a man exceeding couragious & skilfull in wars, & one that from the beginning miſtruſted the ouer bold & ſtout enterpriſes that Romulus was likely to attempt, conſidering the late rauiſhmēt of the SABYNS daughters, and how he was already greatly dreaded of his neighbours, and ſomwhat vntollerable, if he were not chaſtiſed and brought lower) firſt began to inuade him with a puiſſant army, & to make hot & violent wars vpon him. Romulus on the other ſide prepared alſo, & went forth to meet him. Whē they were come ſo neare together that they might ſee one another, they ſēt defiāce to ech other, & praied that they two might fight man to man amidſt their armies, & neither of theirs to ſtir a foot. Both of thē accepted of it, & Romulus making his praier vnto Iupiter, did promiſe, & made a vow: that if he did giue him the victory to ouercome, he wold offer vp to him the armor of his enemy, which he did. For firſt he ſlue Acron in the field, & afterwards gaue battell to his men, & ouerthrew them alſo. Laſtly he tooke his city, where he did no hurt nor yet diſpleaſure to any, ſauing that he cōmanded them to pull down their houſes, & deſtroy thē, & to go dwell with him at ROME: where they ſhould haue the ſelf ſame rights & priuiledges which the firſt inhabitāts did enioy. There was nothing more inlarged the city of ROME thē this maner of policy, to ioyne alwaies vnto it thoſe ſhe had ouercome & vanquiſhed. Romulus now to diſcharge his vow, and in ſuch ſort that his offring might be acceptable to Iupiter, and pleaſant to his citizēs to behold: did cut down a goodly ſtraight grown yong oke, which he lighted on by good fortune, in the place where his campe did lie: the ſame he trimmed and ſet forth after the maner of victory, hanging & tying all about it in faire order, the armor & weapons of king Acron. Then he girding his gown to him, and putting vpon his long buſh of haire, a garland of lawrel, laid the yong oke vpon his right ſhoulder, & he firſt marched before towards his city, and ſung a royall ſong of victory, all his army following him in armes vnto the city in order of battell: where his citizens receiued him in all paſſing wiſe and triumph. This noble and ſtately entry euer ſince hath giuen them minds in ſuch ſort, and in ſtatelier wiſe to make their triumph. The offering of this triumph was dedicated to Iupiter ſurnamed Feretrian: becauſe the Latine word Ferire ſignifieth to hurt and kill: and the praier Romulus had made, was, he might hurt and kill his enemy. Such ſpoiles are called in Latine, Spolia opima: therefore ſaith Varro, that opes ſignifie riches. Howbeit me thinks it were more likely to ſay, that they were ſo named of this word Opus, which betokeneth a deed, becauſe he muſt needs be the chiefe of the army, that hath ſlaine with his own hands the Generall of his enemies, and that muſt offer the ſpoiles called Spolia opima, as you would ſay, his principall ſpoiles and deeds. This neuer happened yet but to three Romaine captains only: of the which Romulus was the firſt, who ſlue Acron king of the CENINENSES. Cornelius Coſſus was the ſecond, who killed Tolumnius, the General of the THVSCANS. Clodius Marcellus

Marcellus was the third, who slue Britomartus, king of the GAVLES, with his owne hands. And for the two last, Cossus and Marcellus, they made their entry into the city, carying their triumphs vpon charets triumphant: but Romulus did not so. Therefore in this point Dionysius the historiographer hath erred, writing that Romulus did enter into ROME vpon a charet triumphant. For it was Tarquinius Priscus the son of Demaratus, who first did set out triumphs in so stately and magnificent shew. Other hold opinion it was Valerius Publicola, who was the first that euer entred vpon triumphant charret. Concerning Romulus, his statues are yet to be seene in ROME, carying his triumph a foote. After this ouerthrow and taking of the CENINENSES, the inhabitants of the cities of FIDENA, CRVSTVMERIVM, and ANTEMNA, rose altogether against the ROMAINS whiles the other SABYNES also were a preparing themselues. So they fought a battell, in which they took the ouerthrow: & left their cities to the spoile of Romulus, their lands to be giuē where he thought good, and themselues to be caried to ROME. Romulus then did giue their lands among his citizens, except those lands which did belong to the fathers of the maidens that they had taken away & rauished. For he was contented that the fathers of them should keep still their lands. By and by the other SABINES stomaking therat, did chuse them a Generall called Tatius, and so went with a puissant army toward the city of ROME, whereunto to approch at that time it was very hard, the castle or keepe of their city being seated where at this day the Capitoll standeth, within which there was a great garrison, wherof Tarpeius was captaine, & not his daughter Tarphia, as some will say, who set out Romulus as a foole. But Tarpeia the captaines daughter, for the desire she had to haue all the gold bracelets which they did weare about their arms, sold the fort to the SABYNS, & asked for reward of her treason, all they did weare on their left armes. Tatius promised them vnto her: and she opened them a gate in the night, by the which she did let all the SABYNS into the castle. Antigonus thē was not alone, who said, he loued those which did betray, & hated thē that had betrayed: nor yet Cæsar Augustus, who told Rymitalces the THRACIAN that he loued treason, but he hated traytors. And it is a common affection which we beare to wicked persons, whilest we stand in need of them: not vnlike for all the world to those that haue need of the gall and poyson of venimous beasts. For when they find it, they are glad, & take it to serue their turne: but after their turne is serued, & they haue that they sought, they hate the cruelty of such beasts. So plaied Tatius at that time. For when he was gotten into the castle, he commanded the SABYNS (for performance of his promise he had made to Tarpeia) they should not sticke to giue her all they ware on their left armes, & to do as he did: who taking from his own arme first, the bracelets which he ware, did cast it to her, & his target after: and so did al the rest in like sort, insomuch as being borne down to the ground by the weight of bracelets and targets, she died as pressed to death vnder her burden. Neuertheless Tarpeius self was atteinted, & condemned also of treason, by Romulus order, as Iuba saith; it is set forth by Sulpitius Galba. They that write now otherwise of Tarpeia, say ing she was the daughter of Tatius, Generall of the SABYNS, & was forced by Romulus to lie with him, & how she was punished in this sort by her own father after her said treason committed: those I say, amongst whom Antigonus is one, are not to be credited. And the Poet Simylus also doth dote most, who saith Tarpeia sold the Capitoll not to the SABYNES, but to the king of GAVLES, with whom she was in loue: as in these verses doth appeare.

Tarpeia pressed to death.

Tarpeia, that mayde of foolish minde,
Which neere vnto the Capitoll did dwell,
(In feruent flames of beastly loue beblind, Wherewith the king of Gaules did make her swell) Caus'd stately Rome surprised for to be
By enemies, as euery man may see.
And so through hope of his fidelity
Betrayd her Syre, with all his family.

And a little after, in speaking of the maner of her death, he saith also:

Yet lo: the Gaules, those worthy men of might,
Threw her not downe into the waues of Po,
But from their armes, wherewith they wont to fight,
They cast their shields vpon her body so,
That she suppresst with such an heauy waight, (Ath wofull maid) to death was smoothered straight.

This maiden therefore being buried in the ſame place; the whole hill was cal led afterwards Tarpeius after her name, which continued vntill Tarquinius the King did dedicate all the place to Iupiter: for then they caried her bones into ſome other place, and ſo it loſt her name. Vnleſſe it be that rocke of the Capitoll, which at this preſent time they call Rupes Tarpeia, from the toppe whereof they were wont in old time to throw downe headlong all wicked offenders. When the SABYNS now had gotten this hold, Romulus being exceeding wrath, ſent them a defiance, and bad them battell if they durſt. Tatius ſtraight refuſed not, conſidering if by miſchance they were diſtreſſed, they had a ſure refuge to retire vnto. The place betweene ỹ two armies where the fight ſhould be, was all round about enuironed with litle hils. So as it was plaine, the fight could not be but ſharpe and dangerous, for the diſcommodiouſnes of the place, where was neither ground for any to fly, nor yet any ſpace for any long chaſe, it was of ſo ſmal a compas. Now it fortuned by chance, the riuer of Tyber had ouerflowne the banks a few daies before, and there remained in it a deeper mud then men would haue iudged, becauſe the ground was ſo plaine, and was euen where the great market place of ROME ſtandeth at this day. They could diſcern nothing therof by the eye, becauſe the vpper part of it was cruſted, whereby it was the more ready for them to venter vpon, and the worſe to get out, for that it did ſinke vnderneath. So the SABYNS had gone vpon it, had not Curtius danger bene, which by good fortune ſtayed them. He was one of the nobleſt and valianteſt men of the SABYNES, who being mounted vpon a courſer, went on a good way before the army. This courſer entring vpon the cruſted mud, and ſinking withall, began to plunge and ſtruggle in the mire: whereat Curtius proued a while with the ſpuare to ſtirre him, and get him out, but in the end ſeeing it would not be, he left his backe, and ſaued himſelfe. The ſame very place to this day is called after his name, Lacus Curtius. The SABYNS thē ſcaping thus this danger, began the battell. The fight did grow very cruell, and endured ſo great a while, the victory leaning no more to the one ſide thē to the other. There died in a ſmall ſpace a great number of men, amongſt whom Hoſtilius was one, who as they ſay, was the husband of Herſilia, and grandfather to Hoſtilius that was king of ROMAINS after Numa Pompilius. Afterward there were (as we may think) many other encounters and battels betweene them. howbeit they make mention of the laſt aboue all the reſt, wherin Romulus had ſo ſore a blow on his head with a ſtone, that he was almoſt felled to the ground, in ſo much as he was driuen to retire a litle out of the battel. Vpon which occaſion the ROMAINES gaue backe alſo, and drew towards mount Palatine, being driuen out of the plaine by force. Romulus began now to recouer of the blow he had receiued, and ſo returned to giue a new onſet, and cried out all he might to his ſouldiers to tary, and ſhew their face again to their enemie. But for all his loud crying, they left not flying ſtill for life, and there was not one that durſt returne againe. Wherupon Romulus lifting up his hands ſtraight to heauen, did moſt feruently pray vnto Iupiter, that it would pleaſe him to ſtay the flying of his people, and not ſuffer the ROMAINS glory thus to fall to their vtter deſtruction, but to repaire it by his fauour againe. He had no ſooner ended his prayer, but diuers of his men that fled, began to be aſhamed to flie before their King, and a ſudden boldneſſe came vpon them, and their feare therwithall vaniſhed away. The place they firſt ſtaied in was where as now is the temple of Iupiter Stator, which is as much to ſay, as Iupiter the ſtayer. Afterwards gathering themſelues together again, they repulſed the SABINS euen to the place they cal now Regia, and vnto the temple of the goddeſſe Veſta: where both the battels being prepared to giue a new charge, there did fall out before them a ſtrange and incredible thing to ſee, which ſtayed them they fought not. For of the SABYNE women whom the ROMAINES had rauiſhed, ſome ran of the one ſide, other of the other ſide of the battels, with lamentations, cries, and ſhouts, ſtepping betweene their weapons, and among the ſlaine bodies on the ground, in ſuch ſort that they ſeemed out of their wits, and caried as it were with ſome ſpirits. In this manner they went to find out their fathers and their husbands, ſome carying their ſucking babes in their armes, other hauing their haire looſe about their eyes, and all of them calling, now vpon the SABYNES, now vpon the ROMAINES, with the gentleſt names that could be deuiſed: which did melt the hearts of both parties in ſuch ſort, that they gaue backe a litle, and made them place betweene both the battels. Then were the cries and lamentations of euery one plainely heard. There was not a man there but it pitied him, as well to ſee them in that pitifull caſe, as to heare the lamentable words they ſpake: adding to their moſt humble petitions and requeſts that could be any way imagined, paſſing wiſe perſwaſions and reaſons to induce them to a peace. For what offence (ſay they) or what what displeasure haue we done to you, that we should deserue such an heape of euils, as we haue already suffered, and yet you make vs beare? we were as you know violently (and against all law) rauished by those, whose now we remaine. But our fathers, our brethren, our mothers & friends haue left vs with them so long, that proces of time, and the straighteſt bonds of the world, haue tied vs now so fast to them, whom mortally before we hated, that we are constrained now to be slighted thus, to see them fight, yea and to lament and dye with them, who before vniustly tooke vs from you. For then you came not to our rescue when we were virgins vntouched, nor to recouer vs from them when they wickedly assaulted vs, poore soules: but now ye came to take the wiues from their husbands, and the mothers from their litle children. So as the helpe ye thinke to giue vs now doth grieue vs more, then the forsaking of vs was sorrowfull to vs then. Such is the loue they haue borne vnto vs, and such is the kindnesse we beare againe to them. Now, if ye did fight for any other cause then for vs, yet were it reason ye should let fall your armes for our sakes (by whom you are made grandfathers and fathers in law, cosins and brothers in law) euen from those against whom you now bend your force. But if all this war began for vs, we heartily beseech you then that you will receiue vs with your sons in law, and your sons by them, and that you wil restore vnto vs our fathers, our brethren, our kinsfolks & friends without spoiling vs of our husbands, of our children, and of our ioyes, and thereby make vs wofull captiues and prisoners in our minds. These requests and perswasions by Hersilia, and other the SABYNE women being heard, both the armies stayed, and held euery body his hand, and straight the two Generals imparled together. During which parle they brought their husbands and their children, to their fathers and their brethren. They brought meat and drinke for them that would eate. They dressed vp the wounds of them that were hurt. They caried them home with them to their houses. They shewed them how they were mistresses there with their husbands. They made them see how greatly they were accounted of and esteemed; yea how with a wedlocke loue and reputation they were honored. So in the end peace was concluded betweene thē, wherin it was articled, that the SABYNE women which would remaine with their husbands should tarry still, and be exempted from all work or seruice (as aboue recited) saue onely spinning of wooll. And that the SABINES and ROMAINS should dwell together in the city, which should be called ROME, after Romulus name: and the inhabitants should be called Quirites, after the name of the city of Tatius king of the SABYNES, and that they should reigne and gouerne together by a common consent. The place where this peace was concluded, is called yet to this day Comitium: because that Coire, in the Latin tong signifieth to assemble. So the city being augmented, by the one halfe, they did chuse of the SABYNES another hundred new PATRICIANS, vnto the first hundred of the ROMAINS that were chosen before. Then were the Legions made of 6000, footmen, & 600. horsmen. After they diuided their inhabitants into 3. tribes, wherof those that came of Romulus, were called Ramnenses after his name: those that came of Tatius were called Tatienses after his name: and those that were of the third stocke, were called Lucrenses, as from the Latin word Lucus, called with vs a groue in English, because thither great nūber of people of al sorts did gather, which afterwards were made citizēs of ROME. The very word of Tribus (which signifieth bands, wards, or hundreds) doth witnes this beginning of ROME from wards or hundreds. For hereupon the ROMAINS call those at this day, their Tribune, which are the chiefe heads of the people. But euery one of these principall wards had afterwards ten other particular wards vnder them, which some think were called after the names of the thirty SABYN women that were rauished: but that seemeth false, because many of them carry the names of the places they came from. Howbeit at that time many things were stablished & ordained in honor of the women: as to giue them place, the vpper hand in meeting them: the vpper hand in streets: to speake no foule or dishonest word before them, no man to vnray himself, or shew naked before them: that they should not be called before criminal Iudges sitting vpō homicides & murderers: that their childrē should weare about their necks a kind of iewel, called Bulla, fashioned in maner like these water bubbles that rise vpon the water when it beginneth to raine: & that their gownes should be garded with purple. Now the two kings did not straight confer together so soone as any occasion of businesse was offered them, but either of them did first counsell alone with his hundred Senators, and afterwards they did all assemble together. Tatius dwelt in the place where now is the temple of Iuno Moneta: Romulus in the place called at this present, The staires of the faire bank, then, the descent of mount Palatine, as they go to the show place or great lists, where they say was sometime the holy Cornell tree, whereof they make so great account. Romulus one day desirous to proue his strength, threw (as it is sayd) a dart from mount Auentine toward mount Palatine; the staffe whereof was of a Cornell tree: and the Iron of it entred so deepe into the ground being a lustie fat soyle, that no man could pull it out, although many proued it, and did the best they could. The ground being very good and fit to bring forth trees, did so nourish the end of this staffe, that it tooke root, and began to spread branches: so that in time it became a faire great Cornell tree, which the successours of Romulus did inclose with a wall, and did keepe and worship it as a very holy thing. If by chance any went to see it, and found it looked not fresh and greene, but like a tree withered and dried away for lack of moisture: he went away straight as one affraid, crying to all he met (and they with him went crying still) in euery place, Water, water, as it had bene to haue quenched a fire. Then ran they thither out of all quarters with vessels of water, to water and moist the tree. In the time of Caius Cæsar, who caused the staires about it to be repaired, they say the labourers raising the place, and digging about this Cornell tree, did by negligence hurt the rootes of the same in such sort, as afterwards it dried vp altogether. Now the SABYNES receiued the moneths after the manner of the ROMAINES, whereof we haue written sufficiently in the life of Numa. Romulus againe vsed the SABYNES shields: and both he and his people changed the fashion of their armour and weapons they vsed. For the ROMAINES before did cary litle shields, after the fashion of the ARGIVES. As for either of their holy dayes and sacrifices, they kept them both altogether, and did not take away any of them, which either the one or the other people obserued before, but they added thereunto some other new. As that which they call Matronalia, which was instituted in honour of the women, because by their meanes peace was concluded. And that also of Carmentalia, in the honour of Carmenta, whom some suppose to be the goddesse of fate or destiny, because she hath rule and power ouer the natiuities of men; by reason whereof the mothers call vpon her often, and reuerence her very much. Other say, she was the wife of Euander the ARCADIAN, who being a propheteesse inspired by the god Phœbus, gaue the Oracles in verse; whereupon she was surnamed Carmenta, because that Carmina in Latine signifie verses: for it is of certainty that her proper name was Nicostrata. Howbeit there are some which giue another maner of deriuation and interpretation of this word Carmenta, which is the likelier to be true: as if they would say, Carens mente: which signifieth wanting wit, for the very fury that taketh them when they are inspired with the propheticall spirit. For in Latine Carere betokeneth to lacke: and Mens, signifieth wit. As for the feast of Palilia, we haue told of it before: but the feast of Lupercalia, considering the time of celebrating therof, it seemeth it is ordained for a purification. For it is celebrated on the vnfortunate dayes of the moneth of Februarie, which are called the purging daies. The daies in the old time on which they did celebrate the same, were called Februata. But the proper name of the feast, is as much to say, as the feast of Wolues. Wherefore it seemeth to be a feast of great antiquity, and instituted by the ARCADIANS which came in with Euander: albeit the name of Wolues is as common to the females, as the males, and so it might perhaps be called, by reason of the Wolfe that brought vp Romulus. For we see those which run vp and downe the city that day, and they call Lupercs, do begin their course in the very place where they say Romulus was cast out. Howbeit, many things are done, wherof the originall cause were hard now to be coniectured. For goats about a certaine time of the yeare, are killed; then they bring two yong boyes, Noble mens sons, whose foreheads they touch with the knife bebloudied with the bloud of the goates that are sacrificed. By and by they dry their foreheads with woll dipped in milk. Then the yong boies must laugh immediatly after they haue dried their forheads. That done, they cut the goats skins, and make thongs of thē, which they take in their hands, & run with thē all about the city stark naked (sauing they haue a cloth before their secrets) & so they strikē with these thongs all they meet in their way. The yong wiues neuer shun them at all, but are well cōtented to be striken with them, be leeuing it helpeth them to be with child, and also to be easily deliuered. There is another thing yet in this feast, that these LVPERCIANS which run about the city, do also sacrifice a dogge. Concerning this feast, the Poet named Butas doth write somwhat in his elegies, where shewing the occasion of the fond customes and ceremonies of the ROMAINS, he doth say, that Romulus after that he had slaine Amulius, did runne straight with great ioy to the very place where the Wolfe gaue him and his brother sucke, in memorie of which running, he saith this feast of Lupercalia was celebrated: and that the Noble mens younger sonnes do runne through the citie, striking ſtriking & laying on thē that they meet in their way with their goat thongs, in token that Remus & Romulus ran from ALBA vnto that place, with their drawn ſwords in their hands. And that the touching of their forehead with a bloudy knife, is in remembrāce of the danger they ſtood in at that time to haue bene ſlaine. Laſt of all, the drying of their forheads with wool, dipped in milk, is in memory of the milk they ſucked of the Wolues. But Caius Acilius writeth that Remus & Romulus before ROME was built, did happen to loſe their beaſts on a day, and after they had made certain praiers vnto Faunus for the finding of thē, they ran here & there ſtark naked as they wēt a ſeeking of thē, for feare they ſhold haue bin troubled with ouermuch heat & ſweating. And this is the cauſe he ſaith, why the LVPERCIANS do at this day run about naked. And if it be true, they make this ſacrifice for a purging, a man might ſay they might offer vp a dog for that purpoſe, as the GRECIANS in their ſacrifices of purgation, do vſe to carry out all their dogs. And in many places they do obſerue this ceremony, to driue out the dogs, which they call Periſcylaciſmes. Otherwiſe, if it be of a thankfulnes to the Wolf that gaue Romulus ſuck, & ſaued him frō periſhing, that the ROMAINS do ſolemnize this feaſt: it is not impertinent they ſhould ſacrifice a dog, becauſe he is an enemy to the Wolues. Vnleſſe a man would ſay, it was to puniſh this beaſt which troubleth and letteth the LVPERCIANS when they run. Some ſay alſo it was Romulus, who firſt inſtituted it a religion to keep holy fire, & that firſt ordained holy virgins, which are called Veſtales: other do aſcribe it to Numa Pompilius. Notwithſtanding it is moſt certain otherwiſe, that Romulus was a very deuout man, & greatly skilful in telling of things to come by the flying of birds for which cauſe he did ordinarily cary the augurs crooked ſtaffe, called in latin Lituus. It is a rod crooked at ỹ end, wherwith the augurs or ſoothſaiers whē they ſit down to behold the flying of birds, do point out & mark the quarters of the heauen. They carefully kept it within the pallace: howbeit it was loſt in the time of wars with the GAVLES, when the city of ROME was taken. Afterwards when theſe barbarous people were chaſed & driuē out, it was found again (as it is ſaid) all whole, within a great hill or heape of aſhes, hauing no maner of hurt, where all things elſe about it had bin conſumed & marred with the fire. He is ſaid to haue made certain lawes, among which there is one that ſeemeth ſomwhat hard, which is: that the man is ſuffered to put away his wife, & in ſome caſe to giue her nothing: & like liberty is not giuen to the wife to put away her husband. As if ſhe may be proued to haue conſented to the poiſoning of her children, or to haue counterfeited her husbāds keys, or to haue cōmitted adultery. But if he put her away for any other cauſe, then the one half of the goods is adiudged to the wife, & the other moity to the goddes Ceres: & he that putteth away his wife after this ſort, is cōmanded further to ſacrifice to the goddes of the earth. This alſo was notable in Romulus, who hauing ordained no pain nor puniſhmēt for parricides (that is, for thoſe that kil their parents) called yet al murther parricide, to ſhew how deteſtable that murder was; and as for parricide, he thought it vnpoſſible. And it ſeemed a great while, he had reaſō to think ſo, that ſuch wickednes wold neuer happē in the world. For in 600. years together it was not known that any man in ROME cōmitted ſuch an offence, and the firſt parricide with them was Lucius Oſtius, after the wars of Hannibal. But enough touching this matter. Furthermore in the firſt yeare of the raigne of Tatius, ſome of his kinſmen & friends met by chance on the way certain ambaſſadors, coming from the city of LAVRENTVM vnto ROME, whō they ſet vpon, & meant to haue robbed thē. The ambaſſadors reſiſting thē, & not willing to deliuer their mony, they made no more ado, but ſlue them. This hainous deed being thus cōmitted, Romulus was of opiniō they ſhold be executed openly in the high way for example. But Tatius deferred it ſtil from day to day, & did alwaies excuſe the matter vnto him, which was the only cauſe they fel out one with the other. For in all things elſe, they caried themſelues as honeſtly as might be the one to the other, ruling and gouerning together, with a cōmon conſent & good accord. But the parents and kinſfolkes of thoſe who were murdered, when they ſaw they could haue no iuſtice becauſe of Tatius, watched him one day as he ſacrificed with Romulus, in the city of Lauiniū, & ſtabbed him in, without offering Romulus any violence, but rather praiſed him for a good & righteous prince. Romulus cauſed the body of Tatius to be ſtraight taken vp, & buried him very honorably in mount Auentine, about the place now called Armiluſtriū. Further he neuer ſhewed any countenance to reuenge his death. There are ſome Hiſtoriographers that write, that thoſe of the city of Laurentū being affraid at this murder, did deliuer forthwith to Romulus the murderers of the ambaſſadours. He notwithſtanding did let them go againe, ſaying: one murther was requited by another. This gaue ſome occaſion of ſpeech to thinke, he was glad he was rid of his cõpanion: yet the Sabynes neither ſtirred nor rebelled for all this, but ſome of thẽ were afraid of him for ẏ great loue they bare him, other for his power he was of, & other for the honor they gaue him as a god, continuing ſtill in duty and obedience towards him. Diuers ſtrangers alſo had Romulus valiancy in great honor: as amongſt other, thoſe who then were called the ancient Latins, which ſent ambaſſadors to him to make league & amity with him. He deuiſed to take the city of FIDENA which was neare to ROME. Some ſay he tooke it vpon a ſudden, hauing ſent before certaine horſmen to break downe the hookes and hinges with force, which the gates hang by: & himſelf came after with the reſt of his army, & ſtole vpon them, before the city miſtruſted any thing. Other write that the FIDENATES firſt inuaded his country, and foraged vnto the very ſuburbes of ROME, where they did great harme: & how Romulus laid an ambuſh in their way as they returned home, & ſlue a great number of them. When he took their city, he did not raze it, but made a colony of it (as a place to ſend the ouer-increaſe of ROME vnto) whither he ſent afterwards two thouſand fiue hundred ROMAINS to inhabit there: and it was on the 13. day of Aprill, which the ROMAINES call the Ides of the ſame moneth. Not long after there roſe ſuch a great plague in ROME, that men died ſuddenly, & were not ſicke: the earth brought forth no fruit: brute beaſts deliuered no increaſe of their kind: there rained alſo drops of bloud in ROME, as they ſay. In ſo much as beſides the euils men felt in this extremity, they fel in a maruellous feare of the wrath of the gods. Afterwards perceiuing the like hapned to the inhabitants of LAVRENTVM, then euery man iudged it was the very vengeance and heauy hand of the gods: who plagued and puniſhed theſe two cities for the murder committed vpon Tatius, and the ambaſſadors that were killed. Wherupon the murderers of both ſides were apprehended & executed: & theſe plagues by & by ceaſed both in the one and the other city. Romulus beſides, did purifie the cities with certain ſacrifices that he deuiſed, which they keep ſtill at this day, at the gate called Ferentia. But before the plague ceaſſed, the CAMERIANS came to aſſault the ROMAINS, and had ouercome all the country, ſuppoſing they ſhould not be able to withſtand thẽ, becauſe they had bene ſo ſore troubled with the plague. Yet notwithſtanding, Romulus ſet vpon them with his army, & wan the field of them, in which conflict there were ſlaine about fixe thouſand men. After the battell done, he tooke their city, and conueied to ROME the one halfe of the inhabitants that remained. After this he ſent twiſe as many ROMAINS as there were naturall CAMERIANS left at CAMERINE, to dwell there among thẽ. This was done the 1. day of Auguſt: ſo great was the multitude of the inhabitants of ROME that had increaſed in 16. years from the firſt foundatiõ of the city. Among other ſpoiles he got there, he caried away a charret of braſſe with foure horſes, which he cauſed to be ſet vp in the temple of Vulcan, and his owne ſtatue vpon it, and victorie crowning him with a garland triumphant. His power being growne thus great, his weake neighbors did ſubmit themſelues vnto him, being contented to liue in peace by him. His ſtronger neighbors were afraid of him, and enuied much his greatnes, and did take it no good policie to ſuffer him thus to riſe in the face of the world, and thought it meet ſpeedily to daunt his glorie, and clippe his wings. The firſt of the THVSCANES that bent their power againſt him, were the VEIANS, who had a great countrey, and dwelled in a ſtrong and mightie city. To picke a quarrell to him, they ſent to haue deliuered to them the city of FIDENA, which they ſaid belonged vnto them. This was thought not onely vnreaſonable, but a thing worthy laughing at, conſidering that all the while the FIDENATES were in war and danger, the THVSCANES neuer came to their aide, but had ſuffered them to be ſlaine, and then came to demand their lands and tenements, when other had poſſeſſion of them. Therefore Romulus hauing giuen them an anſwer full of mockerie and deriſion, they deuided their power into two armies, and ſent the one againſt them of FIDENA, and with the other they marched towards ROME. That which went againſt the city of FIDENA, preuailed, and killed there two thouſand ROMAINES: the other was ouerthrowne and diſcomfited by Romulus, in which there died eight thouſand VEIANS. Afterwards they met againe ſomwhat neare the city of the FIDENATES, where they fought a battell; and all did confeſſe, the chiefeſt exploite was done by Romulus owne hands that day, who ſhewed all the skill and valiantnes that was to be looked for in a worthy captaine. It ſeemed that day, he farre exceeded the common ſort of men, in ſtrength of body and feats of armes. Neuertheleſſe that which ſome ſay, is hardly to be credited: and to be plaine, is out of all compaſſe of beliefe and poſſibilitie. For they write, there were 14. thouſand men ſlaine at that battell, and that more then halfe of them were ſlaine by Romulus owne hands: and

and the rather, for that euery man iudgeth it a vaine bragge and oſtentation which the MESSENIANS report of Ariſtomenes, who offered in ſacrifice to the gods three hundred beaſts of victory, as for ſo many LACEDÆMONIANS himſelfe had ſlaine in the battell. Their army being thus broken, Romulus ſuffered them to flie who by ſwiftnes could ſaue themſelues, and marched with all his power in good array towards their city. The citizens thē conſidering their late great loſſe and ouerthrow, would not hazard the danger of withſtanding him, but went out all together, & made their humble petition and ſuit for peace. All was granted them for a hundred yeares, ſaue they ſhould forgo their territory called Septemagium, that was the ſeuenth part of their country: and yeeld to the ROMAINS all their ſalt houſes by the riuers ſide, and deliuer fiftie of their chiefeſt citizens for their pledges. Romulus made his entry & triumph into ROME for them, the day of the Ides of October, which is the fifteenth day of the ſame moneth, leading in his triumph many priſoners takē in thoſe wars: & among other, the Generall of the VEIANS, a very ancient man, who fondly behaued himſelfe in his charge, and ſhewed by his doings, that his experience was farre ſhort for his yeares in the warres. And from thence it cometh, when they offer to the gods to giue thanks for this victory, that euen at this day, they bring to the Capitol through the market place, an old man apparelled in a purple robe, and with a iewell called Bulla about his neck, which the gentlemens yong children weare about their necks: and a herald goeth hard by him, crying, Who buyeth who, the SARDIANIANS? becauſe they hold opinion the THVSCANS are come of the SARDIANIANS, and the very city of VEIES ſtandeth in the country of THVSCANE. This was the laſt war that Romulus had offered him: after which he could not beware of that which is wont to happen almoſt to all thoſe, who by ſudden proſperiry & fortunes ſpeciall fauour, are raiſed to high and great eſtate. For truſting to proſperity and good ſucceſſe of his acts, he began to grow more ſtrange and ſtately, and to carrie a ſowrer countenance then he was wont to do before: leauing to be after his old maner, a courteous & gracious prince: and gaue himſelfe in faſhions to be ſomewhat like a tyrant, both for his apparell, and ſtately port and maieſty that he caried. For he ware euer a coate of purple in graine, and vpon that, a long robe of purple colour: and gaue audience, ſitting in a wide chaire of eſtate, hauing euer about him yong men called Celeres, as we would ſay, flights, for their ſwiftnes and ſpeed in executing of his commandements. Other there were that went before him, who caried as it were tipſtaues in their hands, to make the people giue roome, and had leather thongs about their middle to bind faſt ſtreight, all the prince ſhould command. Now in old time the LATINS ſaid, Ligare was to bind: but at this preſent they ſay Alligare, from whence it cometh that the vſhers and ſergeants are called Lictores. Howbeit me thinkes it were more likely to ſay, they had put to a c, and that before they were called Litores, without a c. For they be the very ſame which the GRECIANS call Liturgos, and be in Engliſh, miniſters or officers: and at this day, Leitos, or Leos in the GREEK tong ſignifieth the people. Romulus now after his grandfather Numitor was dead at the city of ALBA, and that the Realme by inheritance fell to him: to win the fauor of the people there, turned the Kingdome to a Common weale, and euery yeare did chuſe a new magiſtrate, to miniſter iuſtice to the SABYNES. This preſident taught the noble men of ROME to ſeeke and deſire to haue a free eſtate, where no ſubiect ſhould be at the commandement of a King alone, and where euery man ſhould command and obey as ſhould be his courſe. Thoſe which were called Patricians in ROME, did meddle with nothing but had only an honorable name & robe, & were called to counſell rather for a faſhion, then to haue their aduice or counſell. For when they were aſſembled together, they did only heare the Kings pleaſure & commandement, but they might not ſpeak one word, and ſo departed: hauing no other preheminence ouer the cōmon wealth, ſauing they were the firſt that did know what was don. Al other things therby did grieue thē leſſe. But when of his own meere authority, & as it were of himſelf, he would as pleaſed him, beſtow the conquered lands of his enemies to his ſoldiers, & reſtore again to the VEIANS their hoſtages as he did: therein plainely appeared, how great iniury he did to the Senate. Whereupon the Senators were ſuſpected afterward that they killed him, when within few daies after it was ſaid, he vaniſhed away ſo ſtrangely, that no man euer knew what became of him. This was on the ſeuēth day of the moneth now called Iuly, which then was named Quintilis, leauing no maner of certainty els of his death that is knowne, ſaue only of the day & the time when he vaniſhed, as we haue ſaid before. For on that day the ROMAINS do at this preſent many things, in remēbrance of the misfortune which happened to them then. It is no maruell, the certaintie of his death

Romulus vaniſhed away: no man knew how.

The 17. day of July an vnfortunate day to the Romaines. The death of Scipio Africanus.

was not knowne: seeing Scipio Africanus was found after supper dead in his house, and no man could tell, nor yet did know how he died. For some say, that he fainted and died sodainly, being of weake complexion. Other say, he poisoned himselfe: other think his enemies did get secretly in the night into his house, and smothered him in his bed. Yet they found his body layed on the ground, that euery body might at leisure consider, if they could find or coniecture the manner of his death. Howbeit Romulus vanished away sodainly, there was neither seene peece of his garments, nor yet was there foũd any part of his body. Therfore some haue thought that the whole Senators fell vpon him together in the temple of Vulcan, and how after they had cut him in peeces, euery one caried away a peece of him, folded close in the skirt of his robe. Other think also, this vanishing away was not in the temple of Vulcan, nor in the presence of the Senators onely: but they say that Romulus was at that time without the city, neare the place called The goates marsh, where he made an oration to the people; and that sodainly the weather changed, and ouercast so terribly, as it is not to be told nor credited. For first, the Sun was darkened as if it had bene very night: this darknes was not in a calme or still, but there fell horrible thunders, boisterous winds, and flashing lightnings on euery side, which made the people run away, and scatter here and there, but the Senatours kept still close together. Afterwards when the lightning was past and gone, the day cleared vp, and the element waxed faire as before: then the people gathered together againe, and sought for the King, asking what was become of him. But the noble men would not suffer them to enquire any further after him, but counselled them to honour and reuerence him as one taken vp into heauen: and that thenceforth in stead of a good King, he would be vnto them a merciful and gracious god. The meaner sort of people (for the most part of them) took it well, and were very glad to heare therof, and went their way worshipping Romulus in their hearts, with good hope they should prosper by him. Howbeit some seeking out the troth more eagerly, did cumber sore and troubled the PATRICIANS, accusing them, that they abused the cõmon people with vaine & fond perswasions, whilst thẽselues in the meane time had murdered the king with their own hands. While things were thus in hurly burly, some say there was one Iulius Proculus, the noblest of all the PATRICIANS, esteemed for a maruellous honest man, and knowne to haue bene very familiar with Romulus, and came with him from the city of ALBA: that stepped forth before all the people, and affirmed (by the greatest and holiest othes a man might sweare) that he had met Romulus on the way, far greater and fairer, then he had seene him euer before, and armed all in white armor, shining bright like fire: whereat being affraid in that sort to see him, he asked him yet: O King, why hast thou thus left and forsaken vs, that are so falsly accused and charged to our vtter discredite and shame, by thy vanishing? To whom Romulus gaue this answer: Proculus, it hath pleased the gods from whom I came, that I should remaine among men so long as I did: and now hauing built a city, which in glory and greatnesse of empire shall be the chiefest of the world, that I should returne againe to dwell with them, as before, in heauen. Therfore be of good comfort, and tell the ROMAINES, that they exercising prowesse and temperancie, shall be the mightiest and greatest people of the world. As for me, tell them I will henceforth be their god, protector, and patron, and they shall call me Quirinus. These words seemed credible to the ROMANS, as wel for the honesty of the man that spake vnto them, as for the solemne othes he made before them all. Yet I wote not how, some celestiall motion, or diuine inspiration helped it much: for no man said a word against it. And so all suspition and accusation laid aside, euery man began to call vpon Quirinus, to pray vnto him, and to worship him. Truly this tale is much like the tales that the GRECIANS tell of Aristeas the Proconnesian, & of Cleomedes the Astypalæian. For they say, that Aristeas died in a fullers work-house, and his friends coming to carrie away his body, it fell out they could not tell what became of it: and at that instant there were some which came out of the fields, and affirmed they met and spake with him, and how he kept his way towards the city of CROTONA. It is said also that Cleomedes was more thẽ a man naturally strong & great, & therewithall mad, & furious hasty. For after many desperat parts he had plaid, he came at the last on a day into a schoolehouse full of litle children, the roofe whereof was borne with one pillar, which he did hit with so terrible a blow of his fist, that he brake it in the midst, so as the whole roofe fell & dashed the poore children in peeces. The people ran straight after him to take him: but he threw himselfe forthwith into a chest, and pulled the lid vpon him. He held it so fast down, that many striuing together all they could to open it, they were not able once to stir it. Wherupon they brake the chest all all in peeces,but they found the man neither quick nor dead. Whereat they were maruellously amazed,and sent to Apollo Pythias, where the propheteſſe answered them in this verſe:

Cleomedes the laſt of demy gods.

The report goeth also that Alcmenes corſe did vaniſh away,as they caried it to buriall, and how in stead therof they found a stone laid in the beere. To conclude,men tell many other such wonders, that are farre from any appearance of troth:only becauſe they would make men to be as gods,and equall with them in power. It is true,that as to reproue and deny diuine power, it were a lewd and wicked part: euen so to compare earth and heauen together, it were a meere folly. Therefore we muſt let ſuch fables go,being moſt certaine that,as Pindarus ſaith,it is true:

Alcmenes body vaniſhed out of the beere.

Each liuing corps muſt yeeld at laſt to death,
And euery life muſt leeſe his vitall breath:
The ſoule of man,that onely liues on hie,
And is an image of eternitie.

The ſoule eternall.

For from heauen it came,and thither againe it doth returne,not with the body,but then ſooneſt, when the ſoule is furtheſt off and ſeparated from the body, and that ſhe is kept holy, and is no more defiled with the fleſh. It is that the Philoſopher Heraclitus meant, when he ſaid: The dry light, is the beſt ſoule which flieth out of the body,as lightning doth out of the cloud: but that which is ioyned with the body being full of corporall paſſions,is a groſſe vapor,dark and maſſie, and cannot flame,ariſe or ſhoot out like lightning. We muſt not beleeue therefore,that the bodies of noble and vertuous men,do go vp together with their ſoules into heauen,againſt the order of nature. But this we are certainly to beleeue, that by the vertues of their ſoules (according to diuine nature and iuſtice) they do of men become ſaints,and of ſaints halfe gods,and of halfe gods, entire and perfect gods: after that they are perfectly (as it were by ſacrifice of purgation) made cleane and pure, being deliuered from all paine and mortality,and not by any ciuill ordinance, but in troth and reaſon, they receiue a moſt happy and glorious end. Now touching Romulus ſurname,which afterwards was called Quirinus,ſome ſay,that it ſignifieth as much as warlike:other thinke it was ſo called becauſe the ROMAINES themſelues were called Quirites. Other write,that men in old time did call the point of a ſpeare,or the dart it ſelfe,Quiris: by reaſon whereof the image of Iuno ſurnamed Quiritides, was ſet vp with an iron ſpeare, and the ſpeare which was conſecrated in the Kings pallace,was called Mars. Furthermore it is an vſe amongſt men,to honor them with a ſpeare or dart,which haue ſhewed themſelues valiant in the wars:and that for this cauſe Romulus was ſurnamed Quirinus,as who would ſay,god of the ſpeares & wars. There was ſince built a temple vnto him,in the hill called Quirinus,and ſo named of him. The day whereon he vaniſhed, is called the flying of the people, or otherwiſe the Nones of the goates. For on that day they go out of the city to do ſacrifice in the place called the Fenne,or the goats marſh: and the ROMAINES call a goate,Capra. As they go thus together, they call with lowd ſhowtes and cryes vpon diuerſe ROMAINES names, as Marcus, Cneus,and Gaius,in token of the flying that was then: and they called one another back againe, as they ran away in great feare and diſorder. Howbeit other ſay,that it is not done to ſhew the running away,but to ſhew their ſpeed and diligence,and refer it to the ſtory. Now after the GAVLES that had taken ROME were expulſed by Camillus,ỹ city was ſo weakned,that they could ſcant recouer their force & ſtrẽgth againe:wherefore many of the LATINES ioyning together,went with a great mighty army,vnder the conduct of Liuius Poſthumius,to war againſt the ROMAINS. This Poſthumius brought his camp as neare the city of ROME as he could,and ſent to the ROMAINS by a trumpet to let them vnderſtand,how the LATINS were deſirous by new mariages to reſtore their old ancient amity and kindred that was neere hand decayed between them:and therfore if the ROMAINES would ſend them a conuenient number of their daughters and yong widowes to mary with them,they would haue peace,as they had before time with the SABYNES,vpon the like occaſion. The ROMAINS hereat were ſore troubled,thinking that to deliuer their women in ſuch ſort,was no better then to yeeld and ſubmit themſelues to their enemies. But as they were thus perplexed,a waiting maid called Philotis (or as other call her,Tutola) gaue thẽ counſell to do neither the one nor the other,but to vſe a policy with them,by means whereof they ſhould ſcape the danger of the wars,and ſhould alſo not be tied nor bound to any pledge. The deuice was,they ſhould ſend to the LATINES her ſelfe,and a certaine number of their faireſt bond-maids,trimmed vp like gentlewomen,and the beſt citizens daughters,and that in the night ſhe would lift them vp a burning torch in the aire, at which signe they should come armed, and set vpon their enemies as they lay asleepe. This was brought to passe: and the LATINS thought verily they had bene the ROMAINS daughters. Philotis failed not in the night to lift vp her signe, and to shew them a burning torch in the top of a wild fig-tree: and did hang certaine couerlets and clothes behind it, that the enemies might not see the light, and the ROMAINES contrariwise might discerne it the better. Thereupon so soone as the ROMAINES saw it, they ran with all speed, calling one another by their names, and issued out of the gates of the city with great hast: and so tooke their enemies vpon a sudden, and slue them. In memory of which victory, they do yet solemnize the feast called the Nones of the goats, because of the wild fig-tree called in Latine Caprificus. And they do feast the women without the city, vnder shadowes made of the boughes of fig-trees. The waiting maids, they run vp and down, and play here and there together. Afterwards they seeme to fight, and throw stones one at another, as then they did when they holpe the ROMAINS in their fight. But few writers do auow this tale, because it is on the day time that they call so each other by their names, and that they go to the place which they call the goats marsh, as vnto a sacrifice. It seemeth this agreeth better with the first history when they call one another by their names in the night, going against the LATINES: vnlesse peraduenture these two things after many years happened vpon one day. Furthermore, they say Romulus was taken out of the world, when he was foure and fiftie yeares of age, and had reigned eight and thirty yeares by accompt.

THE COMPARISON OF Theseus with Romulus.

THus haue we declared all things of Theseus & Romulus worthy memory. But to compare the one with the other: it appeareth first, that Theseus of his own voluntary wil, without compulsion of any (when he might with safety haue reigned in the city of TROEZEN, and succeeded his grandfather in no small kingdome) did desire of himselfe, and rather sought meanes to aspire to great things: and that Romulus on the other side, to deliuer himself from bondage and seruitude that lay sore vpon him, and to escape the threatned punishment which still did hang ouer his head, was certainely compelled (as Plato saith) to shew himselfe hardy for feare: who seeing how extremely he was like to be handled, was of very force constrained to seek aduantage, and hazard the enterprise of attaining high and great things. Moreouer the chiefest act that euer he did, was, when he slue one onely tyrant of the city of ALBA called Amulius: where Theseus in his iourny only, as he trauelled, gaue his mind to great enterprises, and slue Sciron, Scinnis, Procrustes, & Corynetes. And by ridding them out of the world, he deliuered GREECE of all those cruell tyrants, before any of those knew him whom he had deliuered from them. Furthermore, he might haue gone to ATHENS by sea, & neuer needed to haue trauelled, or put himselfe in danger with these robbers, considering he neuer receiued hurt by any of them: whereas

Romulus

Romulus could not be in safety whileſt Amulius liued. Hereupon it may be alledged, that Theſeus vnprouoked by any priuat wrong or hurt receiued, did ſet vpon theſe deteſtable thieues and robbers: Remus and Romulus contrariwiſe, ſo long as the tyrant did them no harme, did ſuffer him to oppreſſe and wrong all other. And if they alledge, theſe were noble deeds, and worthy memory: that Romulus was hurt fighting againſt the SABYNES, and that he ſlue king Acron with his owne hands, and that he had ouercome and ſubdued many of his enemies: thē for Theſeus on the other ſide may be obiected, the battel of the CENTAVRI, the wars of the AMAZONS, the tribute due to the king of CRETA: & how he ventured to go himſelf thither with the yong boies & wenches of ATHENS, as willingly offering himſelf to be deuoured by a cruell beaſt, or els to be ſlain, & ſacrificed vpō the tomb of Androgeus, or to become bondſlaue & tied in captiuity to the vile ſeruice of cruel men & enemies, if by his courage & manhood he could not deliuer himſelf. This was ſuch an act of magnanimity, iuſtice & glory, & briefly of ſo great vertue, that it is vnpoſſible truly to be ſet out. Surely me thinks the Philoſophers did not ill define loue, when they ſaid ſhe was a ſeruitour of the gods, to ſaue yong folkes, whom they thought meet to be preſerued. For, the loue of Ariadne was in mine opinion the work of ſome god, and a meane purpoſely prepared for Theſeus ſafety. Therfore the woman is not to be reproched nor blamed for the loue ſhe bare Theſeus but rather it is much to be wondred at, that euery man & woman in like wiſe did not loue him. And if of her ſelf ſhe fell in loue with him, I ſay (and not without cauſe) ſhe afterwards deſerued to be beloued of a god, as one that of her own nature loued valiantnes and honor, & entertained men of ſingular value. But both Theſeus & Romulus being naturally giuen to rule & reigne, neither the one nor the other kept the true forme of a king, but both of them did degenerate alike: the one changing himſelf into a popular man, the other to a very tyrant. So that by ſundry humors, they both fell into one miſchiefe and error. For a prince aboue all things muſt keep his eſtate: which is no leſſe preſerued by doing nothing vncōly, then by doing all things honorably. But he that is more ſeuere or remiſſe then he ſhould be, remaineth now no more a king or a prince, but becommeth a people-pleaſer, or a cruell tyrant: & ſo cauſeth his ſubiects to deſpiſe or hate him. Yet me thinkes the one is an error of too much pitty and baſeneſſe: and the other of too much pride and cruelty. But if we may not charge fortune with all miſchances happening vnto men, but that we ought to conſider in them the diuerſities of maners & paſſions, ſeeing anger is vnreaſonable, and wrath raſh and paſſionate: then can we not cleare the one, nor excuſe the other of extreme rage and paſſion, in the fact committed by the one againſt his brother, and by the other againſt his naturall ſon. Howbeit the occaſion and beginning of anger doth much excuſe Theſeus, who moued with the greateſt cauſe that might be, was put into ſuch choler and paſſion. But if Romulus variance with his brother had proceeded of any matter of counſell, or cauſe of the common-weals: there is none ſo ſimple to think, that his wiſdome would ſo ſuddenly haue ſet vpon him. Where as Theſeus in contrary maner killed his ſon, prouoked by thoſe paſſions that few men can auoid: to wit, loue, iealouſie, and falſe report of his wife. Moreouer Romulus anger went to the effect, wherof the iſſue fell out very lamentable: Theſeus anger ſtretched no further thē to rough words and old folks curſes in their heat. For it ſeemeth, curſed fortune, and nought els, was the cauſe of his ſons only miſhap, as foreſpoken and wiſhed for ſomwhat by his father. Theſe be the ſpeciall things may be alledged for Theſeus. But for Romulus this was a notable thing in him. Firſt his beginning being very low and mean, and his brother and he taken for bondmen, & the children of hogheards, before they were themſelues all free, they ſet at liberty in maner all the Latins, winning at one inſtant many titles of glory and honour: as deſtroyers of their enemies, defenders of their parents, Kings of nations, founders of new cities, and no ouerthrowers of the old: whereas Theſeus of many habitations and houſes made only one, and did ouerthrow and plucke downe diuers ſtates, bearing the names of ancient kings, princes, & half gods of ATTICA. All theſe alſo did Romulus afterward, & compelled his enemies whom he had ouercome, to deſtroy their own houſes, and to come and dwell with their conquerors. And in the begining, he neuer changed nor increaſed any city that was built before, but built himſelf a new city out of the ground, getting all together, land, coūtry, kingdōe, kindred & mariages, without loſing or killing any man: and to the contrary, rather he did good to many poore vacabonds, who had neither countrey, land, nor houſes, and deſired nothing elſe but to make a people amongſt them, and to become citizens of ſome city. Alſo Romulus bent not himſelf to follow theeues and robbers, but ſubdued by force of armes many mighty and puiſſant people: he tooke cities, and triumphed ouer kings and Princes which he had vanquished in battell. And touching the murder of Remus, it is not certainely knowne of whose hands he died. The most part of Authors do charge other with the death of him. But it is certaine that Romulus deliuered his mother from apparent death, & restored his grandfather to the royall throne of Æneas, who before was deposed and brought from a king to seruile obedience, without any regard of honour or dignity: to whom he did many moe great pleasures and seruices. Besides he neuer offended him willingly, no not so much as ignorantly. Contrary I thinke Theseus, who failing by negligence to put out his white saile at his returne, cannot be cleared of parricide, how eloquent an oration soeuer could be made for his excuse: yea though it were before the most fauourable iudges that could be. Wherfore an ATHENIAN very well perceiuing that it was an hard thing to excuse and defend so foule a fault, doth faine that the good old man Ægeus hauing newes brought him that his sonnes ship was at hand, did run in so great hast to his castle, to see his son arriue afar off, that as he ran, his foot hit against something, and ouerthrew him: as though he had none of his people about him, or that neuer a man seeing him run so hastily to the sea side, did make haste to attend and waite vpon him. Furthermore, Theseus faults touching women and rauishments, of the twaine, had the lesse shadow and colour of honesty. Because Theseus did attempt it very often: for he stole away Ariadne, Antiope, and Anaxo the TROEZENIAN. Againe, being stepped in yeares, and at later age, and past marriage, he stole away Helen in her minority, being nothing neere to consent to mary. Then his taking of the daughters of the TROEZENIANS, of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and the AMAZONS (neither contracted to him, nor comparable to the birth and linage of his owne countrey which were at ATHENS, and descendad of the noble race and progeny of Erichtheus, and of Cecrops) did giue men occasion to suspect that his womannishnesse was rather to satisfie lust, then of any great loue. Romulus now in a contrary maner, when his people had taken 800. or thereabouts, of the SABYNE women to rauish them, kept but onely one for himselfe that was called Hersilia, as they say, and deliuered the rest to his best and most honest citizens. Afterwards by the honor, loue, and good entertainment that he caused them to haue and receiue of their husbands, he changed this violent force of rauishment, into a most perfect bond and league of amity: which did so knit and ioyne in one these two nations, that it was the beginning of the great mutuall loue which grew afterwards betwixt those two peoples, & consequently of the ioining of their powers together. Furthermore, time hath giuen a good testimony of the loue, reuerence, constancy, kindnesse, and all matrimoniall offices that he established by that means, betwixt man and wife. For in two hundred and thirty yeares afterwards, there was neuer man that durst forsake or put away his wife, nor the wife her husband. And as among the GRECIANS, the best learned men, and most curious obseruers of antiquities, do know his name that was the first murderer of his father and mother: euen so all the ROMAINS knew what he was, which first durst put away his wife. It was one called Spurius Carnulius, because his wife was barren & had no children. The effects also do agree with the testimony of the time. For the realme was common vnto the kings of both nations, and through the alliance of these mariages that began first of rauishments, both nations liued peaceably, and in equality, vnder one ciuill policy, and well gouerned commonweale. The ATHENIANS contrariwise, by Theseus mariages, did get neither loue nor kindred of any one person, but rather they procured wars, enmities, and the slaughter of their citizens, with the losse in the end of the city of APHIDNES: and yet very hardly, and by the mercy of their enemies (whom they honored as gods) they escaped for him, the danger which the TROIANS suffered afterwards, for the selfe act done by Alexander Paris. So it fel out at the last, that his mother was not onely in danger, but euen feelingly suffered like misery and captiuity, which Hecuba did afterwards, when she was forsaken of her son: vnlesse peraduenture those things that they write of the imprisonment and captiuity of Æthra, be found false and but fables, as for the fame and memory of Theseus were behoufull, that both it and many other things also, were of no more troth nor likelihood. That which they write of Romulus diuinements, maketh great difference between him and Theseus. For Romulus in his birth was preserued by the maruellous fauor of the gods: Theseus to the contrary was begotten against the gods will, as appeared plainly by the answer of the Oracle to Ægeus, that he should not meddle with any woman in a strange and foraine countrey.

THE LIFE OF Lycurgus.

A Man cannot ſpeake any thing at all of Lycurgus, who made the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but he ſhall find great contrariety of him amongſt the hiſtoriographers. For, of his parentage and trauell out of his country, of his death and making of lawes, of his forme of gouernment and order of executing the ſame, they haue written diuerſly. And yet aboue all things, concerning him, they agree worſt about the time he liued in. For ſome of them (and Ariſtotle is of that number) will needes haue him to haue bene in the time of Iphytus, and that he did helpe him to ſtabliſh the ordinance that all warres ſhould ceaſſe during the feaſt of the games Olympicall: for a teſtimony wherof, they alledge the copper coyt which was vſed to be throwne in thoſe games, and had found grauen vpon it, the name of Lycurgus. Other compting the dayes and time of the ſucceſſion of the kings of LACEDÆMON (as Eratoſthenes & Apollodorus) ſay, he was many yeares before the firſt Olympiade. Timæus alſo thinketh ther were two of this name, and in diuerſe times: howbeit the one hauing more eſtimation then the other, men gaue this Lycurgus the glory of both their doings. Some ſay the eldeſt of the twaine was not long after Homer: and ſome write they ſaw him. Xenophon ſheweth vs plainely he was of great antiquitie: ſaying he was in the time of the Heraclides, who were neareſt of bloud by deſcent to Hercules. For it is likely Xenophon meant not thoſe Heraclides, which deſcended from Hercules ſelfe: for the laſt kings of SPARTA were of Hercules progeny, as well as the firſt. Therefore he meaneth thoſe Heraclides, which doubtleſſe were the firſt and neareſt before Hercules time. Neuertheleſſe though the hiſtoriographers haue written diuerſly of him, yet we will not leaue to collect that which we find written of him in ancient hiſtories, and is leaſt to be denied, and by beſt teſtimonies moſt to be proued. And firſt of all, the Poet Simonides ſayth, his father was called Prytanis and not Eunomus: and the moſt part do write the pedigree otherwiſe, as well of Lycurgus ſelfe, as of Eunomus. For they ſay, that Patrocles the ſonne of Ariſtodemus begate Sous, and Sous begate Eurytion, and Eurytion begate Prytanis, and Prytanis begate Eunomus, and Eunomus begate Polydectes of his firſt wife, and Lycurgus of the ſecond wife, called Dianaſſa: yet Euthychidas another writer, maketh Lycurgus the ſixt of deſcent in the right line from Polydectes, and the eleuenth after Hercules. But of all his auncеſters, the nobleſt was Sous, in whoſe time the citie of SPARTA ſubdued the ILOTES, made them ſlaues, and did enlarge and increaſe their dominion, with the lands and poſſeſſions they had got by conqueſt of the ARCADIANS. And it is ſaid, that Sous himſelfe being on a time ſtraightly beſieged by the CLITORIANS; in a hard

dry ground, where no water could be found, offered them thereupon to reſtore all their lands againe that he had gotten from them, if he and all his company did drinke of a fountaine that was there not far off. The CLITORIANS did grant vnto it, and peace alſo was ſworne between them. Then he called all his ſouldiers before him, and told them if there were any one amongſt them that would refraine from drinking, he would reſigne his kingdome to him: howbeit there was not one in all his company that could (or would) forbeare to drinke, they were ſo ſore athirſt. So they all dranke heartily except himſelfe, who being the laſt that came downe, did no more but a litle moyſt his mouth without, and ſo refreſhed himſelfe, the enemies ſelues ſtanding by, and drank not a drop. By reaſon wherof, he refuſed afterwards to reſtore their lands he had promiſed, alledging they had not all drunk. But that notwithſtanding, he was greatly eſteemed for his acts, and yet his houſe was not named after his owne name: but after his ſonnes name Eurytion, they of his houſe were called Eurytionides. The reaſon was, becauſe his ſonne Eurytion to pleaſe the people, did firſt let fall and giue ouer the ſole and abſolute power of a king. Wherupon there followed afterwards maruellous diſorder and diſſolution, which continued a great time in the city of SPARTA. For the people finding themſelues at liberty, became very bold and diſobedient: and ſome of the kings that ſucceeded, were hated euen to death, becauſe they would perforce vſe their ancient authority ouer the people. Other, either to winne the loue and good-wils of the people, or becauſe they ſaw they were not ſtrong inough to rule them, did giue themſelues to diſſemble. And this did ſo much increaſe the peoples looſe and rebellious minds, that Lycurgus owne father being king, was ſlaine among them. For one day, as he was parting a fray betweene two that were fighting, he had ſuch a wound with a kitchin knife, that he died: and left his Realme to his eldeſt ſonne Polydectes, who died alſo ſoone after, and without heire of his body, as was ſuppoſed. In ſo much as euery man thought Lycurgus ſhould be king: and ſo he tooke it vpon him, vntill it was vnderſtood that his brothers wife was young with child. Which thing ſo ſoone as he perceiued, he publiſhed openly, that the Realme belonged to the child that ſhould be borne, if it were a ſonne. After this he gouerned the Realme, but as the kings lieutenant and regent. The LACEDÆMONIANS cal the regents of their kings that are left within age, Prodicos Lycurgus brothers widow did ſend, and let him ſecretly vnderſtand, that if he would promiſe to marry her when he ſhould be king, that ſhe would come before her time, and either miſcary or deſtroy that ſhe went with. Lycurgus deteſtably abhorring this brutiſh and ſauage vnnaturalneſſe of the woman, did not reiect her offer made him, but ſeemed rather to be very glad, then to diſlike of it. Neuertheleſſe he ſent her word againe, ſhe ſhould not need to try maſteries, with drinkes and medicines to make her come before her time: for in ſo doing, ſhe might bring her ſelf in danger, and be caſt away for euer. Howbeit he aduiſed her to go her full time, and to be brought a bed in good order, and then he would find meanes inough to make away the child that ſhould be borne. And ſo with ſuch perſwaſions he drew on this woman to her full time of deliuery. But ſo ſoone as he perceiued ſhe was neare her time, he ſent certaine to keep her, and to be preſent at her labour, commanding them that if ſhe were brought a bed of a daughter, they ſhould leaue her with the woman: and if it were a ſonne, they ſhould forthwith bring it to him, in what place ſoeuer he was, and what buſineſſe ſoeuer he had in hand. It chanced that ſhe came euen about ſupper time, and was deliuered of a ſonne. As he was ſitting at the table with the other magiſtrates of the city, his ſeruants entred the hall, and preſented to him the litle babe, which he tenderly tooke in his armes: and ſayd openly to them that were preſent: Behold my Lords of SPARTA, here is a king borne vnto vs. And ſpeaking theſe words, he layd him downe in the kings place, and named him Charilaus, as much to ſay as the ioy of the people. Thus he ſaw all the lookers on reioycing much, and might heare them praiſe and extoll his ſinceritie, iuſtice, and vertue. By this meanes he reigned onely as king but eight moneths; from thenceforth he was taken and eſteemed ſo iuſt and ſincere a man among the citizens, that there were moe that willingly obeyed him for his vertue, then for that he was the kings regent, or that he had the gouernment of the whole Realme in his hands. Notwithſtanding there were ſome that bare him diſpleaſure and malice, who ſought to hinder and diſgrace his credit, and chiefly the friends and kindred of the kings mother: whoſe power and honour were thought much impaired by Lycurgus authoritie: in ſo much, as a brother of hers called Leonidas, entring boldly into great words with him on a day, did not ſticke to ſay to his face: I know for a certainty one of theſe dayes thou wilt be king: meaning thereby to bring him in ſuſpition with the citizens. Which thing thing though Lycurgus neuer meant, yet of a ſubtill and crafty wit, Leonidas thought by giuing out ſuch words, that if the young King happened to dye in his minoritie naturally, it would be miſtruſted that Lycurgus had ſecretly made him away. The Kings mother alſo gaue out ſuch like ſpeeches, which in the end did ſo trouble him, with the feare he had, what euent might fall out thereof, that he determined to depart his country, and by his abſence to auoid the ſuſpition that therein might grow vpon him any way. So he trauelled abroad in the world as a ſtranger, vntill his nephew had begotten a ſonne who was to ſucceed him in his kingdome. He hauing with this determination taken his iourney, went firſt of all into CRETA, where he diligently obſerued and conſidered the manner of their liuing, the order of the gouernement of their Common-weale, and euer kept company with the beſt, and euer was conferring with the moſt learned. There he found very good lawes in his iudgement, which he noted of purpoſe to carry home to his countrey, to ſerue when time ſhould come. He found there other lawes alſo, but of them he made no reckoning. Now there was one man that aboue the reſt was reputed wiſe and skilfull in matters of ſtate and gouernement, who was called Thales: with whom Lycurgus did ſo much by intreaty, and for familiar friendſhip, that he perſwaded him to go with him vnto SPARTA. This Thales was called the Poet Harper, whereupon he had that title and name: but in effect he ſang all that the beſt and ſufficienteſt gouernours of the world could deuiſe. For all his ſongs were goodly ditties, wherein he did exhort and perſwade the people to liue ynder obedience of the law, in peace and concord one with the other. His words were ſet out with ſuch tunes, countenance and accents, that were ſo full of ſweetneſſe, harmonie, and piercing, that inwardly it melted mens hearts, and drew the hearers of a loue to like the moſt honeſt things, and to leaue all hatred, enmitie, ſedition, and diuiſion, which at that time reigned ſore among them. So as it may be ſaid, he it was that prepared the way for Lycurgus, wherby he afterwards reformed and brought the LACEDÆMONIANS vnto reaſon. At his departing out of CRETA, he went into ASIA, with intent (as it is ſaid) to compare the manner of life and policy of thoſe of CRETA (being then very ſtraight and ſeuere) with the ſuperfluities and vanities of IONIA: and thereupon to conſider the difference betweene their two manners and gouernements, as the Phyſition doth, who to know the whole and healthfull the better, doth vſe to compare them with the ſicke and diſeaſed. It is very likely it was there, where he firſt ſaw Homers workes, in the hands of the heires and ſucceſſours of Cliophylus: and finding in the ſame, as well many rules of policy, as the great pleaſure of poets faining, he diligently copied it out, and made a volume thereof to cary into GREECE. It is true, there was much fame abroad of Homers poeſies among the GRECIANS, howbeit there were few of them brought together, but were ſcattered here and there in diuerſe mens hands, in pamphlets and peeces vnſewed and without any order: but the firſt that brought them moſt to light among men, was Lycurgus. The ÆGYPTIANS ſay, that he was in their countrey alſo, and that hauing found there one notable ordinance among other, that their ſouldiers and men of war were ſeparated from the reſt of the people, he brought the practiſe of it into SPARTA: where ſetting the merchants, artificers and labourers euery one apart by themſelues, he did eſtabliſh a noble common wealth. So the ÆGYPTIAN hiſtoriographers, and ſome others alſo of GREECE do write. He was alſo in AFRICKE, and in SPAINE, and as farre as INDIA, to conferre with the wiſe men there, that were called the Philoſophers of INDIA. I know no man that hath written it, ſauing Ariſtocrates, that was Hipparchus ſonne. The LACEDÆMONIANS wiſhed for him often when he was gone, and ſent diuerſe and many a time to call him home: who thought their Kings had but the honour and title of Kings, and not the vertue or maieſtie of a Prince, whereby they did excell the common people. But as for Lycurgus, they thought of him thus: that he was a man borne to rule, to command, and to giue order, as hauing in him a certaine naturall grace and power, to draw men willingly to obey him. Moreouer the Kings themſelues were not vnwilling to haue him to returne home, becauſe they hoped that his preſence would ſomewhat bridle and reſtraine the people from their inſolency and diſobedience towards them. Whereupon Lycurgus returning home in this opinion and affection of men, it fell out that he was no ſooner arriued, but he began to deuiſe how to alter the whole gouernement of the common-weale, and throughout to change the whole courſe and order of the ſtate: thinking that to make only certaine particular lawes were to no purpoſe, but much like, as one ſhould giue ſome eaſie medicine, to purge an ouerthrowne body with all humours and diſeaſes. Therefore he thought firſt that all groſſe and ſuperfluous humours were meet to be dissolued and purged, and then afterwards to giue them a new form and order of gouernment. When he had thus determined with himself, before he would take in hand to do any thing, he went to the city of DELPHES: where after he had sacrificed to Apollo, he consulted with him about his matters. From whom he returned with this glorious title by the oracle of Pythia: O beloued of the gods, and rather god then man. Where when he craued grace of Apollo to establish good lawes in his country, it was answered him: that Apollo granted his petition, and that he should ordaine the best and perfectest maner of a common-wealth, that euer had or should be in the world. This answer did comfort him very much, and so he began to break his purpose to certaine of the chiefe of the city, and secretly to pray and exhort them to helpe him, going first to those he knew to be his friends, and after by litle and litle he wan others to him, who ioined with him in his enterprise. So when he saw the time fit for the matter, he caused thirty of the chiefest men of the city in a morning to come into the market place well appointed and furnished, to suppres those that would attempt to hinder their purpose. Hermippus the historiographer rehearseth twenty of the chiefest: but he that aboue all others did most assist him in his doings, and was the greatest aid vnto the stablishing of his lawes, was called Arithmiadas. The king Charilaus hearing of this assembly, did feare there had bene some conspiracy or insurrection against his person, and for his safety he fled into the temple of Iuno, and Chalceæcos, as much to say, as Iunos brasen tẽple. Howbeit afterwards when he knew the troth, he waxed bold & came out of the temple again, & he himself fauored the enterprise, being a prince of a noble mind, howbeit very soft by nature, as witnesseth Archelaus (that was then the other king of LACEDÆMON) by telling how Charilaus answered one that praised him to his face, in saying he was a good mã. And how shold I not (quoth he) be good, when I cannot be euill to the euill? In this change of the state, many things were altered by Lycurgus, but his chiefest alteration was, his law of the erection of a Senate, which he made to haue a regal power and equall authority with the kings in matters of weight and importance, and was (as Plato saith) to be ỹ healthful counterpoise of the whole body of the common-weale. The other state before was euer wauering, somtime inclining to tyranny, when the kings were too mighty: and somtime to confusion, when the people would vsurpe authority. Lycurgus therfore placed between the kings and the people, a counsell of Senators, which was as a strong beame, that held both these extremes in an euen ballance, and gaue sure footing and ground to either part to make strong the state of the common-weale. For the 28. Senators (which made the whole body of the Senate) tooke somtime the kings part, when it was needfull to pul down the fury of the people: & contrarily, they held somtimes with the people against the kings, to bridle their tyrannicall gouernement. Aristotle saith, he ordained the number of Senators to be but eight and twenty, because two of thirty that ioyned with him as afore, did for feare forsake him at his enterprise. Howbeit Sphærus writeth, that from the beginning, he neuer purposed to haue more then eight and twenty to be the Senate. And perhaps he had great regard to make it a perfect number, considering it is compounded of the number of seuen, multiplied by foure: and is the first perfect number next to six being equall to all parts gathered together. But as for me, my opinion is, he chose this number rather then any other, because he meant the whole body of the counsell should be but thirty persons, adding to that number, the two kings. Lycurgus tooke so great care to establish well this counsell, that he brought an oracle for it, from Apolloes temple in DELPHES. This oracle is called vnto this day Retra, as who would say, the statute oracle: wherof the answer was: When thou hast built a temple vnto Iupiter the Syllanian, and to Minerua, the Syllanian, and deuided the people into lineages, thou shalt establish a Senate of thirty counsellors, with the two kings: and shalt assemble the people at times conuenient, in the place between the bridge and the riuer CNACION. There the Senators shall propound all matters, and breake vp after their assemblies: and it shall not be lawfull for the people to speake one word. In those dayes the people were euer assembled betweene two riuers, for there was no hall to assemble a counsell at large, nor any other place prepared for them. For Lycurgus thought no builded place meet for men to giue good counsell in, or to determine causes, but rather a hinderance: because in such places men be drawne to muse on vaine things, and their minds be caried away with beholding the images, tables, and pictures, commonly set vp for ornament in such open places. And if it be in a Theater, then beholding the place where the playes and sports be made, they think more of them, then of any counsell. Againe, if it be in a great hall, then of the faire embowed or vawted roofs, or of the fretised seelings curiously wrought, and sumptuously set forth, and tend not not ſtill their buſineſſe they come for. When the people were aſſembled in counſell, it was not lawfull for any of them to put forth matters to the counſell to be determined, neither might any of them deliuer his opinion what he thought of any thing: but the people had only authority to giue their aſſent (if they thought good) to the things propounded by the Senators, or the two Kings. Howbeit afterwards, the two kings Polydorus and Theopompus, becauſe the people did many times croſſe and alter the determination of the Senate, by taking away or adding ſomething to it, they did adde theſe words to the Oracle aforeſaid: That if the people would not aſſent to any ordinance of the Senate, then ſhould it be lawfull for the Kings and Senate to breake vp the counſell, and to fruſtrate all things done in the ſame: the wiſe aduice of the Senate being encountred thus, and their meaning to the beſt, ſo peruerted to the worſe. Theſe two kings perſwaded the people, that at the very firſt, this addition came with the Oracle of Apollo. as the poet Tyrtæus maketh mention in the place, where he ſaith:

From Delphos Ile, this oracle is brought
Of Pythia, into their countrey ſoile.
The Kings (euen they to whom of right there ought
A louing care in princely breaſts to boile,
The Spartane wealth, to gard from euery ſpoile:)
Shall be the chiefe, graue cauſes to decide
With Senators: whoſe ſound aduice is tride.
And next to them the people ſhall fulfill
As much as ſeemes to pleaſe their princes will.

Lycurgus now hauing thus tempered the form of his common-weale, it ſeemed notwithſtanding to thoſe that came after him, that this ſmall number of thirty perſons that made the Senate, was yet too mighty, and of too great authority. Wherefore to bridle them in a litle, they gaue them (as Plato ſaith) a bit in their mouths, and that was the authority of the Ephores, which ſignifie as much as controllers: and were erected about a hundred and thirty years after the death of Lycurgus. The firſt which was choſen of theſe, was Elatus, and it was in the time of King Theopompus, whoſe wife on a day in her anger ſaid: How through his negligence he would leaue leſſe to his ſucceſſors, then he had receiued of his predeceſſors. To whom he anſwered againe; Not leſſe but more, for that it ſhall continue longer, and with a more ſurety. For, in loſing thus their too abſolute power that wrought them great enuy and hatred among their citizens, they did eſcape the danger and miſchiefe that their neighbours the ARGIVES and MESSENIANS did feele: who would not giue ouer the ſouereigne authority which they had gotten once. This example maketh Lycurgus great wiſdome and foreſight manifeſtly knowne: who ſo will deeply conſider the ſeditions and ill gouernments of the ARGIVES, and MESSENIANS (their neere neighbors and kinſmen) aſwell from the people, as from the kings; who from the beginning had all things alike to the SPARTANS: and in diuiding of their lands a far better order then theirs. This notwithſtanding, they did not proſper long but through the pride of their kings, & the diſobedience of their people, they entred into ciuill wars one againſt another, ſhewing by their diſorders and miſfortunes the ſpecial grace the gods did beare to SPARTA, to giue the ſuch a reformer, as did ſo wiſely temper the ſtate of their common-weale, as we will ſhew herafter. The ſecond law that Lycurgus made, and the boldeſt and hardeſt he euer tooke in hand, was the making of a new diuiſion of their lands. For he ſaw ſo great a diſorder and inequality among the inhabitants, as well of the country, as of the city LACEDÆMON, by reaſon ſome (and the greateſt number of them) were ſo poore, that they had not a handfull of ground, & other ſome being leaſt in nũber were very rich, that had all: he thought with himſelf to baniſh out of the city all inſolency, enuy, couetouſnes, & deliciouſnes, and alſo all riches & pouerty, which he took for the greateſt, and moſt continual plagues of a city, or common-weale. For this purpoſe, he imagined there was none ſo ready and neceſſary a meane, as to perſwade his citizens to ſuffer all the lands, poſſeſſions, and inheritance of their country, to runne in common together: and that they ſhould make a new diuiſion equally in partition amongſt themſelues, to liue from thenceforth as it were like brothers together, ſo that no one were richer then another, and none ſhould ſeeke to go before each other, any other way then in vertue only: thinking there ſhould be no difference or vnequality among inhabitants of one city, but the reproches of diſhoneſty, and the praiſes of vertue. Thus Lycurgus following his determination, did out of hand make a law of the diuiſion of their lands. For first he did diuide all the country of LACONIA, into thirty thousand equall parts, the which he did set out for those that inhabited about SPARTA: and of those lands that ioyned next to the city of SPARTA, that was the first metropolitan city of LACONIA, he made other nine thousand parts, which he deuided to the naturall citizens of SPARTA, who be those that are properly called SPARTANS. Howbeit some will say, he made but sixe thousand parts, and that king Polydorus afterwards did adde two other three thousand parts. Others say also, that Lycurgus of these nine thousand parts made but the halfe only, and Polydorus the rest. Euery one of these parts was such, as might yeeld vnto the owner yearly, threescore and ten bushels of barley for a man, & twelue bushels for the woman; and of wine and other liquid fruits, much like in proportion, which quantity Lycurgus iudged to be sufficient, to keep the body of a man in health, & to make him strong and lusty, without any further allowance. They say after this, as he returned home one day out of the fields, and came ouer the lands where wheate had bene reaped not long before, and saw the number of sheaues lying in euery shocke together, and no one shocke bigger then another: he fell a laughing, and told them that were with him, Me thinks all LACONIA is as it were an inheritance of many brethren, who had newly made partition together. He gaue an attempt to haue diuided also moueables, and to haue made a common partition betweene them, to the end he would haue vtterly taken away all vnequality. But finding the citizens took it very impatiently, that openly that which they had, should be taken away, he went about to do it more secretly, and in a cunninger wise to take away that couetousnes. For first of all he did forbid all coine of gold and siluer to be currant: and then he did set out certaine coines of iron, which he commanded only to be currant, wherof a great waight and quantity was but litle worth. So as to lay vp therof the value of ten minas, it would haue occupied a whole celler in a house, besides it would haue needed a yoke of oxen to carry it any where. Now gold and siluer being thus banished out of the country, many lewd parts and faults must needs ceasse thereby. For who would rob, steale, pick, take away, hide, procure, or hoord vp any thing, that he had no great occasion to desire, nor any profit to possesse, nor wold be any pleasure to vse or imploy. For, the iron they occupied for their coine, they cast vinegar vpon it while it was red-hot out of the fire, to kill the strength and working of it to any other vse: for thereby it was so eager and brittle, that it would bide no hammer, nor could be made, beaten, or forged to any other fashion. By this meanes he banished also, all superfluous and vnprofitable sciences, which he knew he should not need to do by any proclamation: because they would fall away (or the most part of them) euen of themselues, when the baseneſse of the mony they should take for their work, should vndo them. For their iron monies were not currant elswhere in the cities of GREECE, but euery body made a iest of it there. By this occasion, the LACEDÆMONIANS could buy no forrein wares nor merchandises, neither came there any ship into their hauen to trafficke with them, neither any fine curious Rhetorician did repaire into their country to teach them eloquence, and the cunning cast of lying: nor yet came there to them any wisard to tell them their fortune, nor any Pander to keep any brothell house, nor yet goldsmith or ieweller, to make or sel any toies or trifles of gold or siluer to set forth women: considering all these things are vsed to be made to get mony, and to hoord vp that they had not. After this sort, delicateneſse that wanted many things that entertained it, began by litle and litle to vanish away, and lastly, to fall off from themselues: when the most rich men had no more occasion then the poorest, and riches hauing no meane to shew her selfe openly in the world, was faine to remaine shut at home idly, as not able to do her master any seruice. Thereupon moueables & houshold stuffe (which a man cannot be without, and must be daily occupied) as bedsteds, tables, chaires, and such like necessaries for house, were excellently wel made: and men did greatly praise the fashion of the LACONIAN cup which they called Cothon, and especially for a souldier in the wars, as Critias was wont to say. For it was made after such a fashion, that the color of it did let the eye to discern the foule and vnwholsome water, which men are driuen oft times to drinke in a campe, and goeth many times against ones stomacke to see it: and if by chance there was any filth or mud in the bottome, it would cleaue and sticke fast vpon the ribs of the belly, and nothing came through the necke, but cleane water to his mouth that dranke it. The reformer of their state was the cause of al this: because their artificers tending now to superfluous works, were occupied about the making of their most necessary things. Further, now to driue away all superfluity and delicioufneſse, and to root out vtterly desire to get and gather: he made another third law for eating & drinking, and against feasts & bankets. First he willed and com-

commanded the citizens, that they ſhould eate together all of one meat, and chiefly of thoſe he had permitted by his ordinance. Then he did expreſly forbid them to eate alone, or apart, or ſecretly by themſelues, vpon rich tables and ſumptuous beds, abuſing the labour of excellent workemen, and the deuices of lickeriſh cookes, to cramme themſelues in corners, as they do fat vp beaſts and poultry, which doth not onely breed ill conditions in the minde, but doth marre the complexions of men, and the good ſtate of their bodies, when they giue themſelues ouer to ſuch ſenſuality and gluttony. Whereof it followeth in the end, that men muſt needes ſleepe much, to helpe to digeſt the exceſſe of meates they haue taken, and then muſt they go to the hote houſes to bathe themſelues, and ſpend long time about the ordinary attendance of their ſickly bodies. This was a maruellous thing for him to bring to paſſe, but much more, to make riches not to be ſtolen, and leaſt of all to be coueted, as Theophraſtus ſaid of him: which by this meanes of making thē eat together with all ſobriety at their ordinary diet, was brought to paſſe. For there was no more meane to the rich, then to the poore, to vſe to play, or ſhew riches, ſith both of them were forced to be together in one place, and to eate all of one meate: ſo as that which is commonly ſpoken, that Pluto the god of riches is blind, was truly verified onely in the city of SPARTA, aboue all other places of the world. For there riches were layd on the ground like a corſe without a ſoule, that moueth no whit at all: conſidering it was not lawfull for any man to eat at home ſecretly in his houſe before he came to their open halls, nor might not come thither for a countenance onely to his meales, being already full and well fraught. For euery mans eye was vpon thoſe eſpecially which did not eat and drink with a good ſtomach amongſt them: and it was the vſe to reproch them as gluttons, and dainty mouthed men, which refuſed to eate as it were in common together. So as this was the ordinance they ſay, that grieued moſt the rich aboue all that Lycurgus made, and whereat they were moſt mad and angry with him: in ſo much, as on a day, they all ſetting vpon him to alter it, he was compelled to run out of the market place, and getting ground of them, he recouered the liberties of a Church, before any could ouertake him: ſauing one yong man called Alcander, who otherwiſe had no ill nature in him, but that he was ſomwhat quick of his hand, and cholerike withall. Who following Lycurgus neerer then any other, did giue him a blow ouerthwart the face with a ſtaffe, and ſtrake out one of his eyes, as Lycurgus turned toward him. Yet for all this, Lycurgus neuer baſhed or made word at the matter, but did lift vp his head to thoſe that followed him, and ſhewed them his face all a gore-bloud, & his eye put out cleane: wherof they were ſo ſore aſhamed, that there was not a man that durſt once open his mouth againſt him, but to the contrary, they ſeemed to pity him, and did deliuer Alcander into his hands that had done the deed, to puniſh him as himſelf pleaſed. And ſo they all brought him to his houſe, and ſhewed they were right heartily ſory for his hurt. Lycurgus thanking them, returned them all backe againe, ſaue that he made Alcander to go with him into his houſe, where he neuer hurt him, nor gaue him fowle word: but commanded him onely to waite vpon him, and made his other ordinarie ſeruants to withdraw their waiting. This young man who now began to ſpie his owne fault, did moſt willingly attend vpon him, and neuer ſpake word to the contrary. When he had ſerued him a certaine time, being very neere continually about him, he began to feele and taſte of his naturall liberality, and ſaw of what affection and intention Lycurgus was moued to do all he did: he perceiued what was the ſeuerity of his ordinary life, and what his conſtancy was to endure labour without wearineſſe. Alcander then began to loue and honour Lycurgus from his heart, and told his parents and friends, how he was no ſuch ſeuere man as he ſeemed, but was of ſo kind and gentle a nature to all men as might be. See I pray you how Alcander was transformed by Lycurgus, and his puniſhment alſo, which he ſhould haue receiued: for of a fierce, raſh, and a lewd conditioned youth he was before, he became now a very graue and wiſe man. But for memorie of this his misfortune, Lycurgus built a temple to Minerua, which he ſurnamed Optiletide, becauſe the DORIANS which dwell in thoſe parts of PELOPONNESVS, do call the eyes, Optiles. There are other writers (as Dioſcorides for one) which ſay Lycurgus had a blow with a ſtaffe, but he had not his eye ſtriken out with it: and how contrariwiſe, he founded this temple to Minerua, to giue her thanks for healing of his eye. Hereof it came, that euer ſince the SPARTANS haue bene reſtrained to cary ſtaues in any aſſembly of counſell. But to returne to their common repaſtes, which the CRETANS call Andria, and the LACEDÆMONIANS Phiditia, either becauſe they were places wherein they learned to liue ſoberly and ſtraightly, (for in the GREEKE tong Phido is to saue and spare) or els because their amity and friendship grew there towards one another, as if they would haue called them Philitia, feasts of loue, by changing D. into L. It may be also they added the first letter as superfluous, and meant to call the places Editia, because they did eat and drink there: They sate in their hals by fifteene in a company, litle more or lesse; and at the beginning of euery moneth, euery one brought a bushell of meale, eight gallons of wine, fiue pound of cheese, and two pound and a halfe of figs for a man, besides some litle portion of their mony to buy certaine fresh cates. And ouer & aboue all this, euery man when he did sacrifice in his house was bound to send the best and chiefest things of his sacrifice to the hals to be eaten. Likewise if any man went on hunting, and killed any venison, it was an order, he should send a peece of the flesh thither. Hauing these two lawfull causes, they might eat and drink by themselues, at home, either when they sacrificed any beast to the gods, or when they came late home from hunting: otherwise they were bound of necessitie to meete in their hals at meales, if they would eate any thing. This order they kept very straightly a great time: in so much as king Agis on a day, returning from the wars, where he had ouerthrowne the ATHENIANS, and being desirous to sup at home priuatly with the Queene his wife, he sent to the hals for his portion. But the Polemarchi, that be certain officers assisting the kings in the wars, did deny him. The next day Agis left off for spite, to do the accustomed sacrifice they were wont to celebrate in the end of euery war: wherupon they set a fine on his head, and condemned him to pay it. The yong children also went to these repasts, euē as they should go to schooles to learn grauity & temperance, where they heard wise & graue discourses touching the gouernment of a common weale, but not of masters that were as hirelings. There they learned pretily to play vpon words, & pleasantly to sport one with another, without any broad speeches, or vncomly iests; and at others hands to beare the same again, without choler or anger. For this property aboue al other, the LACEDÆMONIANS take and giue a mock without any offence: neuertheless, if any mans nature could not beare it, he needed but pray the party to forbeare his iesting, and so he left it straight. And it was euer an ordinary thing among thē, that the eldest of the company told the rest that were come into the hall to meale, with shewing them of the dore: Sirs, remember, there goeth not a word here out of this doore. Euen so he that wold be receiued to meale there in their cōpany, must first of necessity be allowed & receiued in this sort, by all the rest. Euery one of them took a litle ball of bran or dow to wash their hands with, & without euer a word speaking, they threw it into a basin, which the seruant that waited on them at the table did cary vpon his head: he that was contented the other should be receiued in company, did cast in his ball as he did receiue it; but if he misliked him, then he pressed it flat betweene his fingers, and threw it in. This ball of bran thus pressed flat, was as much as a beane bored through, and was to them a signe of condemnation. If any one ball were found of this sort, the suiter was reiected: for they would not haue any enter into their company that was not liked of all the rest. He that thus was reiected, they say he was discadded: for the basin wherein the litle bals were caried, was called Caddos. The best dish they serued at these meales, was that they call their black broth: so that when they had that, the old men did eate no flesh, but left it all to the yong men, and they by themselues did eat the broth. There was a king of PONTVS, that being desirous to tast of this black broth, did buy of purpose a LACEDÆMONIAN cooke: but after he had once tasted thereof, he was very angry straight. The cooke then said vnto him: and it please your grace, ere one shall find this broth good, he must be washed first in the riuer of EVROTAS. After they had eate and drunke thus soberly together, euery one repaired home without any light: for it was not lawfull for them to go thither, nor any where els with light, because they should accustome themselues boldly to go vp and downe the dark, and all about in the night. This was the order and maner of their meales. But here is specially to be noted, that Lycurgus would in no wise haue any of his lawes put in writing. For it is expresly set downe in his lawes they call Retra, that none of his lawes should be written. For he thought that which should chiefly make a city happy and vertuous, ought throughly by education to be printed in mens hearts and manners, as to haue continuance for euer: which he tooke to be loue and good will, as a farre stronger knot to tie them with, then any other compulsarie law. Which when men by vse and custome, through good education, do take in their childhood, it maketh euery man to be a law to himselfe. Furthermore, concerning buying and bargaining one with another, which are but trifles, and sometime are changed into one sort, and sometime in another, as occasion serueth: he thought it best not to constraine them to do it by writing, not to eſtabliſh cuſtomes that might not be altered, but rather to leaue them to the libertie and diſcretion of men which had bene brought vp in the ſame, both to take away, and to adde therein, as the caſe and time ſhould require. But to conclude, he thought the chiefeſt point of a good law-maker or reformer of the common-weale was, to cauſe men to be well brought vp and inſtructed. One of his Ordinances therefore was expreſly, that not one of his lawes ſhould be written. Another of his deuices was, againſt ſuperfluous charges and expences: which to auoid, he made a law that all roofes of houſes ſhould be made onely with the axe, and all gates and doores with the ſawe, and that without any other toole of occupation. Wherein he had the like imagination as afterwards Epaminondas had, when he ſaid, ſpeaking of his table: Such a boord neuer receiueth any treaſon. Euen ſo thought Lycurgus, that ſuch a built houſe would neuer receiue curioſitie or daintineſſe. For no man is ſo madly diſpoſed or ſimple witted, as to bring into ſo poore and meane houſes, bedſteads with ſiluer feet, imbrodered couerlets, or counterpoints of purple ſilk, neither yet plate of gold nor of ſiluer, nor ſuch other like coſtly furniture and fineneſſe, as thoſe things require to waite vpon them: becauſe the beds muſt be anſwerable to the meaneneſſe of the houſe, the furnitures of the beds muſt be ſutelike to the ſame, and all other houſhold ſtuffe, diet, meate, and drinke agreeable to the reſt. Hereof proceeded that, which Leontychidas the firſt King of that name, ſaid once: who ſupping on a time in the citie of Corinth, & ſeeing the roofe of the hall where he ſate, ſumptuouſly embowed & carued, he asked ſtraight if the trees did grow carued ſo in that country. The third law was, he did forbid them to make warre often with one enemie, leſt the enemie forced to take often armes in hand, might in the end grow experter and valianter then they. For this cauſe king Ageſilaus was greatly blamed, who was a long time after. For by making often wars with the country of Boeotia, he made the Thebans in the end as expert and valiant ſouldiers as the Lacedæmonians. Whereupon Antalcidas ſeeing him hurt one day, ſaid vnto him: The Thebans haue nobly rewarded thee for their learning, ſith thou haſt made them expert ſouldiers vnwilling to learne the diſcipline of war. Theſe be the lawes Lycurgus ſelfe called Retra, and ſignifie as much as Oracles, that the god Apollo had diſcouered to him. Now the education of children, he eſteemed the chiefeſt and greateſt matter that a reformer of lawes ſhould eſtabliſh. Therefore beginning afarre off, he firſt conſidered the ſtate of mariage, and the generation of children. For Ariſtotle ſaith, that Lycurgus did attempt to reforme women, and did ſoone giue it ouer againe: becauſe he could doe no good therein, by reaſon of the great liberty they had taken by the abſence of their husbands in the warres, compelled often ſo to be abroad, and that they did leaue them miſtreſſes of their houſes, and at their returne did honour them ſo much, and make of them ſo beyond meaſure, with calling them ladies and miſtreſſes. Howbeit this is true, that he had an eye to the rule and order of their life, aſwell as he had of mens: and ſo reaſon did require. Firſt of all, he willed that the maidens ſhould harden their bodies with exerciſe of running, wreſtling, throw the barre, and caſting the dart, to the end that the fruit wherewith they might be afterwards conceiued, taking nouriſhment of a ſtrong and luſty body, ſhould ſhoot out and ſpread the better: and that they by gathering ſtrength thus by exerciſes, ſhould more eaſily away with the paines of child-bearing. And to take away from them their womanniſh daintineſſe and fineneſſe, he brought vp a cuſtome, for young maides and boyes to goe as it were a proceſſion, and to daunce naked at ſolemne feaſtes and ſacrifices, and to ſing certaine ſongs of their owne making, in the preſence and ſight of young men. To whom by the way they gaue many times pretie mockes of purpoſe, as pleaſantly hitting them home, for things wherein before they had forgotten their duties: and ſometimes alſo in their ſong for their vertues, wittes, or manners, they praiſed them which had deſerued it. By this meanes, they did ſet young mens hearts on fire, to ſtriue to winne moſt praiſe and honour. For who ſo was praiſed of them for a valiant man, or whoſe worthie acts were ſung by them, he thereby was encouraged to do the better another time: and the pretie girds and quippes they gaue to others, were of no leſſe force, then the ſharpeſt words and admonitions that otherwiſe could be giuen them. This tooke place the rather, becauſe it was done in the preſence of the Kings, the Senators, & all the reſt of the citizens which came thither to ſee thoſe ſports. And though the maids did ſhew themſelues thus naked openly, yet was there no diſhoneſty ſeene nor offered, but all this ſport was full of play and toyes, without any youthfull part or wantonneſſe: and rather caried a ſhew of demureneſſe, and a deſire to haue their beſt-made bodies ſeen & ſpied. Moreouer, it ſomewhat lifted vp their hearts, and made them noblier minded, by giuing them to vnderſtand, that it was no leſſe comely for them, in their kind and exerciſes to carrie the bell, then it was for men in their games and exerciſes to carry the price. Hereof it came, that the women of LACEDÆMON were ſo bold to ſay, and thinke of themſelues that, which Gorgona the wife of king Leonidas one day anſwered, being in talke with a ſtrange woman that ſaid to her: There be no women in the world that commaund their husbands, but you wiues of LACEDÆMON. Whereto the Queene ſtraight replied: So be there no women but we, which bring forth men. Furthermore, theſe plaies, ſports, and daunces, the maides did naked before young men, were prouocations to draw and allure the young men to marrie: not as perſwaded by geometricall reaſons, as ſaith Plato, but brought to it by liking, & of very loue. Thoſe which would not marrie, he made infamous by law. For it was not lawful for ſuch to be preſet, where thoſe open games and paſtimes were ſhewed naked. Furthermore the officers of the city compelled ſuch as would not marry, euen in the hardeſt time of the winter, to enuiron the place of theſe ſportes, and to go vp and downe ſtarke naked, and to ſing a certaine ſong made for the purpoſe againſt them, which was: that iuſtly were they puniſhed, becauſe that law they diſobeyed. Moreouer, when ſuch were old, they had not the honour and reuerence done them, which old maried men vſually receiued. Therfore there was no man that miſliked, or reproued that, which was ſpoken to Dercillidas: albeit otherwiſe he was a noble Captaine. For, coming into a preſence, there was a young man which would not vouchſafe to riſe and doe him reuerence, nor to giue him place for to ſit downe: And worthily, quoth he, becauſe thou haſt not gotten a ſon, who may do ſo much for me in time to come. Thoſe which were deſirous to marrie any, were driuen to take them away by force whom they would marie, not litle young wenches I meane, which were not of age to be married: but luſty and ſtrong maides, of age to beare children. And when one of them was ſtolen away in this ſort, ſhe that was priuie thereto, and meant to make the mariage, came and ſhaued the haires of her head that was maried: then ſhe put her into mans apparell, and gaue her all things ſute-like to the ſame, and laid her vpon a mattreſſe all alone, without light or candle. After this was done, the bridegroome being neither drunk nor finelier apparelled then he was wont to be, but hauing ſupped ſoberly at his ordinary, came home ſecretly to the houſe where the bride was: and there vntyed his wiues girdle, tooke her in his armes, layd her vpon a bed, and talked together a while, and afterwards faire and ſoftly ſtole away to the place where he was wont to ſleepe with other young men. And ſo from thenceforth, he continued alwaies to do the like, being all the day time with his companions, & ſleeping moſt of the night, vnleſſe he ſometime ſtole to ſee his wife; being afraid, and aſhamed euer to be ſeene by any of the houſe where ſhe was. And hereunto his young wife did helpe for her part, to ſpie meanes and occaſions how they might meete together, and not be ſeene. This manner endured a great while and vntill ſome of them had children, before they boldly met together, and ſaw each other on the day time. This ſecret meeting in this ſort did ſeruе to good purpoſes, not onely becauſe it was ſome meane of continencie, and ſhamefaſtneſſe, but alſo it kept their bodies in ſtrength and better ſtate to bring forth children. It continued alſo in both parties, as ſtill burning loue, and a new deſire of the one to the other, not as it were luke warme, nor weary, as theirs commonly be which haue their bellies full of loue, and as much as they luſt: but they euer parted with an appetite one from another, keeping ſtill a longing deſire to deuiſe how to meete againe. Now when he had ſtabliſhed ſuch a continencie, and ſo kind a framed honeſtie in mariage, he took no leſſe care to driue away all fooliſh iealouſie therein, thinking it very good reaſon to beware there ſhould be no violence, nor confuſion in mariage: and yet as reaſon would, they ſhould ſuffer thoſe which were worthie to get children as it were in common, laughing, at the madde folly of them which reuenge ſuch things with warre and bloudſhed, as though in that caſe men in no wiſe ſhould haue no fellowſhippe together. Therefore a man was not to be blamed, being ſtepped in yeares, and hauing a young wife, if ſeeing a faire young man that liked him, and knowne withall to be of a gentle nature, he brought him home to get his wife with child, and afterwards would auow it for his, as if himſelfe had gotten it. It was lawful alſo for an honeſt man that loued another mans wife, for that he ſaw her wiſe, ſhamefaſt, and bringing forth goodly children, to intreate her husband to ſuffer him to lye with her, and that he might alſo plow in that luſtie ground, and caſt abroade the ſeede of well fauoured children: which by this meanes came to be common in bloud and parentage, with the moſt honourable and honeſteſt perſons. For firſt of all, Lycurgus did not like that children ſhould be priuate priuate to any men, but that they ſhould be common to the common-weale: by which reaſon he would alſo, that ſuch as ſhould become citizens, ſhould not be begotten of euery man, but of the moſt honeſteſt men onely. So Lycurgus thought alſo there were many fooliſh vaine toyes & fancies, in the lawes and orders of other Nations, touching mariage: ſeeing they cauſed their bitches and mares to be limed and couered with the faireſt dogs and goodlieſt ſtalons that might bee gotten, praying or paying the maſters and owners of the ſame: and kept their wiues notwithſtanding ſhut vp ſafe vnder locke and key, for feare leſt other then themſelues might get them with child, although they were ſickely, feeble brained, and extreme old. As if it were not firſt of all, and chiefly a diſcommodity to the fathers & mothers, & likewiſe to thoſe that bring them vp, to haue vnperfect and feeble children borne, as it were begotten of dry and withered men: and then to the contrary, what pleaſure and benefit is it to thoſe that haue faire and good children borne, as gotten of like ſeed and men? Theſe things were done then by natural & ciuill reaſon, neuertheleſſe they ſay women were ſo farre off then from intreatie, as euer they were before: ſo as in old time, in SPARTA, men knew not what adulterie ment. For proofe wherof, the anſwer made by Geradas (one of the firſt ancient SPARTANS) vnto a ſtranger, may be alledged, that asked him, what puniſhment they had for adulterers. My friend, quoth he, there be none here. But if there were? replied the ſtranger againe. Mary ſaid he, thē he muſt pay as great a bul, as ſtanding vpon the top of the mountaine Taygetus, may drinke in the riuer Eurotas. Yea marie: but how is it poſſible (quoth the ſtranger) to find ſuch a bull? Geradas laughing, anſwered him againe: And how were it poſſible alſo to find an adulterer in SPARTA? And this is that which is found of Lycurgus lawes touching mariages. Furthermore, after the birth of euery boy, the father was no more maſter of him, to cocker and bring him vp after his will: but he himſelf caried him to a certaine place called Leſché, where the eldeſt men of his kindred being ſet, did view the child: and if they found him faire, and well proportionated of all his limmes, and ſtrong, they gaue order he ſhould be brought vp, and appointed him one of the nine thouſand parts of inheritance for his education. Contrariwiſe, if they found him deformed, miſhapē, or leane, or pale, they ſent him to be throwne in a deepe pit of water, which they commonly called Apothetes, & as a man would ſay, the common houſe of office: holding opinion it was neither good for the child, nor yet for the cōmonweale, that it ſhould liue, conſidering from his birth he was not wel made, nor giuen to be ſtrong healthfull, nor luſtie of body all his life long. For this cauſe therefore, the nurſe after their birth did not waſh them with water ſimply (as they do euery where at that time) but with water mingled with wine: and thereby did they proue, whether the complexion or temperature of their bodies were good or ill. For they ſuppoſe, that children which are giuen to haue the falling ſickneſſe, or otherwiſe to be full of rewmes and ſickneſſe, cannot abide waſhing with wine, but rather dry & pine away: as contrarily the other which are healthfull, become thereby the ſtronger and the luſtier. The nurces alſo of SPARTA vſe a certaine manner to bring vp their children, without ſwadling, or binding them vp in clothes with ſwadling bands, or hauing on their heads any croſ-clothes: ſo as they made them nimbler of their limmes, better ſhaped and goodlier of body. Beſides that, they acquainted their children to all kind of meates, and brought them vp without much tendance, ſo as they were neither fine nor licorous, nor fearefull to be left alone in the dark: neither were they cryers, wrallers, or vnhappie children, which be all tokens of baſe & cowardly natures. So that there were ſtrangers, that of purpoſe bought nurces out of LACONIA, to bring vp their children: as they ſay Amicla was one of them which nurced Alcibiades. But Pericles his tutor, gaue him afterwards a bondman called Zopyrus, to be his maſter and gouernour: who had no better property in him, than other common ſlaues. This did not Lycurgus. For he did not put the education and gouernement of the children of SPARTA into the hands of hired maſters or ſlaues bought with money: neither was it lawfull for the father himſelfe to bring vp his owne child after his owne manner and liking. For ſo ſoone as they came to ſeuen yeares of age, he tooke and deuided them by companies, to make them to be brought vp together, and to accuſtome them to play, to learne, and to ſtudy one with another. Then he choſe out of euery company one, whom he thought to haue the beſt wit, and had moſt courage in him to fight, to whom he gaue the charge and ouerſight of his owne company. The reſt had their eyes waiting alwaies on him, they did obey his commandements willingly, they did abide patiently all corrections he gaue them, they did ſuch taskes and works as he appointed them: ſo that all their ſtudie was moſt to learne to obey. Furthermore, the old gray headed men were preſent many times to ſee them play, and for the moſt part they gaue them occaſions to fall out, and to fight one with another, that they might thereby the better know and diſcerne the naturall diſpoſition of euery one of them, and whether they gaue any ſignes or tokens in time to come to become cowards or valiant men. Touching learning, they had as much as ſerued their turne: for the reſt of their time they ſpent in learning how to obey, to away with paine, or endure labour, to ouercome ſtill in fight. According to their growth and yeares, they did change the exerciſes of their bodies: they did ſhaue their heads, they went bare-legged, they were conſtrained to play naked together the moſt part of their time. After they were paſt twelue yeares of age, they wore no longer coates: and they gaue them yearely but one ſily gowne. This was the cauſe they were alwaies ſo naſtie & ſluttiſh, and they neuer vſed to bath or noint themſelues, ſauing onely at certaine daies in the yeare, when they were ſuffered to taſt of this refreſhing. They lay & ſlept together vpon beds of ſtraw, which they themſelues did make of the tops of reeds or canes that grew in the riuer of Eurotas: which they were forced to go gather and breake themſelues with their hands, without any toole or iron at all. In the Winter, they did mingle thiſtle downe with theſe, which is called Lycophonas, becauſe that ſtuffe ſeemeth ſomewhat warme of it ſelfe. About this time, the fauourers and likers of this pretie youth, which were commonly the luſtieſt and beſt diſpoſed youths of the citie, began to be otter in their company: and then the old men took the better regard vnto them, and frequented more commonly the places of their daily exerciſes, and where their vſe was to fight together, helping them when they played, how one ſhould mock another. This did their old mē, not by way of paſtime only, but with ſuch care and harty loue towards them, as if they had bene altogether their fathers, maſters, & gouernors, while they were boyes: inſomuch as there was neuer time nor place, where they had not alwaies ſome to admoniſh, reproue, or correct thē, if they did a fault. Notwithſtanding al this, there was euer one of the honeſteſt men of the citie, who had expreſly the charge and gouernance of theſe boyes. He did deuide them in companies, & afterwards gaue the ouerſight of them to ſuch a one of the boyes as was diſcreeteſt, the manlieſt, the moſt hardie, and of the beſt courage amongſt them. They called the children that were paſt infancy two yeares, Irene: and the greateſt boyes Melirenes as who would ſay, readie to go out of boyerie. This boy who was made ouerſeer of them, was commonly twenty yeares of age. He was their captaine whē they fought, & did command them as his ſeruants when they were in the houſe: and willed them which were ſtrongeſt and the moſt growne, to carrie wood when they ſhould prepare dinner or ſupper; & thoſe which were leaſt and weakeſt, to go gather herbes, which they muſt ſteale or lacke them. So they went out to ſteale, ſome in gardens, ſome at the markets, other in the halles where the feaſts were kept, and men did eate together, into the which they conueyed themſelues as cloſely and cunningly as they could deuiſe: for if they were taken with the maner, they were ſcourged terribly, becauſe they were ſo groſſe and negligent, and not fine and cunning in their faculty. They ſtole alſo all other kind of meate, whatſoeuer they could get or lay hands on. They pried and ſought al occaſions how to take and ſteale meate handſomely, both when men were aſleepe, or elſe that they were careleſſe, or did not giue good heed vnto them. But he that was taken with the maner, had his payment roundly, and was puniſhed with faſting beſides: for they had but a ſlender pittance, becauſe neceſſity ſhould driue them to venter boldly, and wit ſhould find out all deuices to ſteale finely. This was the chiefeſt cauſe, why they gaue them ſo ſmall a diet. The ſecōd cauſe was, that their bodies might grow vp higher in height. For the vitall ſpirits not being occupied to concoct and digeſt much meat, nor yet kept down, or ſpread abroad by the quantity or ouerburdē thereof, do enlarge thēſelues into length, & ſhoot vp for their lightnes: & for this reaſon they thought the body did grow in height and length, hauing nothing to let or hinder the riſing of the ſame. It ſeemeth that the ſelfſame cauſe made them fairer alſo. For the bodies that are leane & ſlender, do better and more eaſily yeeld to nature, which bringeth a better proportion & forme to euery member: and contrariwiſe, it ſeemeth theſe groſſe, corpulent, and ouer-fed bodies do encounter nature, and be not ſo nimble and pliant to her, by reaſon of their heauie ſubſtance. As we ſee it by experience, the children which women bring a litle before their time, & be ſomewhat caſt before they ſhould haue bene borne, be ſmaller and fairer alſo, and more pure commonly then other that go their time: becauſe the matter whereof the body is formed, being more ſupple and plyant, is the eaſilier weilded by nature, which giueth them their ſhape and forme. Touching the naturall cauſe of this effect, let vs giue place to other to diſpute it that will, without our further deciding deciding of the ſame. But to returne to the matter of the LACEDÆMONIANS children: They did robbe with ſo great care, and feare to be diſcouered, that they tell of one, which hauing ſtolen a little foxe, did hide him vnder his cloke, and ſuffered him with his teeth and clawes to teare out all his belly, and neuer cried, for feare he ſhould haue bene betrayed, vntill he fell downe dead in the place where he ſtood. This is not vncredible, by that we ſee young boyes do abide at this day: for we haue ſeene diuerſe, which haue bidden whipping euen to death, vpon the altar of Diana, ſurnamed Orthia. Now this vnder maſter, who had the charge of euery company of theſe boyes, vſed after ſupper (ſitting yet at the table) to bid one of them ſing a ſong: to another he put foorth a queſtion, who was to be well aduiſed of his anſwer, as for example: Who is the honeſteſt man in the citie? or how thinkeſt thou by that ſuch a one did? By this exerciſe they were enured from boyes ſtate, to iudge of things well or ill done, and to vnderſtand the life and gouernement of their citizens. For which of them did not anſwer quickely and directly to theſe queſtions, Who is a good man, who is an honeſt citizen, and who not: they thought it was a ſigne of a dull wit, and careleſſe nature, not giuen to any vertue, for deſire of honour and eſtimation. Furthermore this vnder maſter was euer to waite for his anſwer, and to ſee it ſhould be briefe and well knit vp in words: otherwiſe his puniſhment that anſwered croſſely, or to little purpoſe, was, that his maſter bit him by the thumbe. This he did many times in the preſence of the old men & magiſtrates of the citie, that they might ſee whether he puniſhed them with reaſon or not, and according to their deſeruing. And though he did hurt him, they did not by and by reproue him, but when the children were gone away, then was he himſelfe rebuked and puniſhed, if he had corrected them too ſore, or contrarily had fauoured them too much. Moreouer they did aſcribe the good or ill opinion conceiued of the children, vnto euery of their fauourers and louers, which did affect and entertaine them: in as much as they ſay, a young boy vpon a time fighting with another, and a cry ſcaping out of his mouth, which his faint cowardly heart did yeeld, his fauourer and louer was ſtraight condemned by the officers of the cities to a fine. Albeit this loue was a thing euen incorporated into them, that the moſt honeſt and vertuouſeſt women loued the young maides thus alſo: yet was there no iealouſie nor ſuſpition that grew hereof, but rather to the contrarie, there grew a maruellous mutuall loue and kindnes betweene them, which liued in one ſelfe place. For either of them by all the meanes they could, did deuiſe how to make the child they loued in common, the wiſeſt, the gentleſt, and the beſt conditioned aboue all other. They taught theſe children to ſpeake in ſuch ſort, that their ſpeech had euer in it a pleaſant grace, and in few words comprehended much matter. For Lycurgus ordained, a great maſſe and weight of iron money, ſhould be but litle worth, and of a ſmall value, as we haue told you before; and contrarily, that ſpeech in few words, without any affectation, ſhould hold much deepe and graue matter, wherewith the children being acquainted, after long ſilence, ſhould be briefe and pithie in their anſwers. For as the ſeed of incontinent men which are too buſie with euery ragge and colman hedge, can take no roote to bring foorth fruit: euen ſo immoderate ſpeech, full of words & buſie tattle, bringeth forth as little ſence. Hereof it cometh, that the anſwers of the LACONIANS were ſo ſhort and wittie. As they ſay, king Agis anſwered on a day an ATHENIAN, who ieſting at the ſwords the LACEDÆMONIANS did weare, ſaid they were ſo ſhort, that theſe tumblers and iuglers did ſwallow them downe in the ſight of all the world: And yet, ſaid Agis, we hurt our enemies with them for all that. For mine owne opinion, I like well of the LACONIANS manner of ſpeaking: which is not to ſpeake much, but when they ſpeake, to touch the matter effectually, and to make the hearers vnderſtand them. I thinke alſo that Lycurgus ſelfe, was ſhort and quick in his talke. For ſo a man may coniecture by his anſwers which are written: as that which he made to one who earneſtly prayed him to ſtabliſh a popular ſtate in LACEDÆMON, that the baſeſt might haue as great authority as the higheſt. Beginne (quoth he) to do it firſt in thine own houſe. And as that alſo which he anſwered another who asked him, why he had appointed ſo ſmall things, and ſo little of value to be offered to the gods? Becauſe (quoth he) we ſhould neuer ceaſſe to honour them. And as that which he ſpake another time, touching fights and frayes, which was: that he did neuer forbid his citizens any of them, but thoſe wherein they vſe to giue their hand, as you would ſay, to yeeld. Men find alſo ſuch like anſwers, in ſome of his letters written to his citizens, as when they asked him: How can we defend our ſelues againſt our enemies? He anſwered: If ye be poore, and one doe couet no more then another. And in another letter that was ſent, where he diſcourſeth, whether it were requiſite to incloſe the citie with walles: he ſaith, can that city be without walles, which is enuironed with men, though it be vncompaſſed with ſtone? Neuertheleſſe it is hard to reſolue, whether thoſe letters, and other ſuch like that are ſhewed, be to be beleeued, or diſcredited to be his. But that long ſpeech was much diſliked, and reproued among the LACEDÆMONIANS, it is manifeſtly to be ſeene by the words, which ſome amongſt them haue heretofore anſwered. As king Leonidas ſaid one day, to one that diſcourſed with him many good things, but out of ſeaſon: Friend, thou ſpeakeſt many good words, but to litle purpoſe. And Charilaus, nephew to Lycurgus, being asked why his vncle made ſo few lawes: Becauſe, ſaid he, to men of few words, few lawes will ſerue. And Archidamidas ſaid thus to ſome which reproued Hecataus the Orator, for that being biddē to ſupper at one of their feaſts, he ſpake not a word all ſupper time: He who can ſpeak well, knoweth alſo when to ſpeake. And where I haue told before, that in their feate and quicke anſwers commonly there was ſome pretie grace, it may be well ſeene and knowne by theſe that follow. Demeratus anſwered a buſie fellow who troubled him too much with vaine importunate queſtions, asking him ſtill: who was the honeſteſt man of LACEDÆMON? Euen he that is leaſt like thy ſelfe. And Agis ſaid to ſome which highly praiſed the ELIANS for their vpright iudgement, and iuſt dealing in the games Olympicall. What wonder make ye of it (quoth he) if in fiue yeares ſpace the ELIANS one day do good iuſtice? And Theopompus likewiſe to a ſtranger, who as deſirous to ſhew his affection he bare the LACEDÆMONIANS, told him how euery body called him Philolacon (as to ſay) a louer of LACEDÆMON. It were more honeſtie for thee (ſaid he) to be named Philopolites, a louer of her citizens. And Pliſtonax the ſonne of Pauſanias, when an Oratour of ATHENS ſaid the LACEDÆMONIANS were vnlearned and ignorant: Thou ſayeſt true, quoth he, for we only of all the GRECIANS haue learned none of your ill conditions. And Archidamidas, to one that demanded of him, what number of fighting men there might be of the SPARTANS: Enow ſaid he, to driue away the wicked. We may coniecture alſo their manner of ſpeaking, by their words in mirth, which they ſpake ſometimes playing wiſe: for they did neuer vſe to ſpeake vaine words at randon, but it had alwaies ſome ſecret meaning in it, which required anothers good obſeruation that would find it. As he which was deſired to goe heare the Nightingale counterfeited naturally: I haue (ſaid he) heard the Nightingale it ſelfe. And another which hauing read this inſcription vpon a tombe:

When as they had well quenched tyrannie
Throughout their land, by worthy warlike power;
Their hap was yet in wretched wiſe to die,
By ſcaling Selynuntaes ſtrongeſt tower.

They well deſerued death, ſaid hee, that did not quench tyranny: they ſhould haue quite conſumed it with fire. And one younger boy to another, promiſing to giue him ſuch hardie cocks of the game, as ſhould die in the place where they fought. O giue me not thoſe (ſaid he) which will die, but thoſe which with fighting will kill others. Another ſeeing men ſitting in coaches and litters as they went: God forbid (ſaid he) that I ſhould euer ſit in a chaire, where I could not riſe to my elders. Such were their anſwers and encounters. So that ſome had reaſon which ſaid heretofore, to ſpeake LACONIAN like, was to be Philoſopher like: as you would ſay, more to exerciſe the mind, then the bodie. Beſides all this, they did ſtudie to ſing well, and to make goodly ditties and ſongs. Then they ſpake moſt properly and featly. There was in their ſongs alſo a certaine motion, I wote not what, which ſtirred vp the hearers hearts, and did kindle deſire in them to do notable feats. Their tongue was plaine, without affectation: their matter graue and morall, containing for the moſt part the praiſe of thoſe which were ſlaine in battell for the defence of their countrie, as being happie men: and a ſhame to thoſe that liue, which for faint hearts refuſed ſo to die, to leade a miſerable and vnfortunate life. Or elſe they ſang how they were the patternes for time to come, or the right glory of the world, and the true repreſentation of vertuous men; as the ſong would beſt become their ages which did ſing. It ſhall not be impertinent for the better vnderſtanding hereof, to bring you here an example. For in their open feaſts, there were alwaies three dances, according to the difference of the three ages. The dance of the old men, thus began firſt for to ſing:

We haue bene young and ſtrong, yet valiant heretofore,
Till crooked age did hold vs backe, and bad vs do no more.

The young men followed after, ſinging;

To conclude, who nearely will conſider the works and makings of the LACON Poets (whereof ſome are yet extant) and will mark alſo the notes and tunes of the pipe, after the ſound and meaſure wherof they marched in arrays going to charge the enemy: he ſhall find that Terpander and Pindarus, had reaſon to ioyne hardineſſe with muſicke. For Terpander ſpeaking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, ſaith in a place: Terpander of the Lacedæmonians,

This is that land where deeds of chiualrie,
Did flouriſh moſt, in many a martiall feate:
Where muſicke made her choiſe of harmonie,
And iuſtice kept her ſtately royall ſeate.

And Pindarus ſpeaking of them, alſo ſaith: Pyndarus of the Lacedæmonians.

There: graue aduiſe, is found in aged braines:
There: gallant youths are luſtie lads indeede,
Which can both ſing, and dance, in courtlike traines:
Yet daunt their foes with many a doughtie deede.

By which teſtimonies it appeareth, the one and the other made, and deſcribed them to haue loued muſick, and the warres together. For as another LACON Poet ſaith:

It fitteth well, and is a ſeemely thing,
For ſuch as ſpend their time in feates of warre:
To haue the skill, ſweete ſonnets for to ſing,
And touch the harpe without entangling iarre.

For this cauſe therfore in all their warres, when they ſhould giue battell, the King did firſt ſacrifice to the Muſes, to put the ſouldiers in mind (as it ſhould ſeeme) of the diſcipline and wiſdome of the Muſes that they had bene brought vp in, to the end that when his ſouldiers were in the moſt extreme danger, the Muſes ſhould preſent themſelues before the ſouldiers eyes, to pricke them forwards to do ſome noble acts of worthy memorie. In their time of war, they did tollerate their yong men a little of their hard and old accuſtomed life, and ſuffered them then to trim their haires, to haue braue armour, to were gay apparell, and tooke as great delight therein, to ſee them gallant and luſtie, as to behold yong neying and ſnorting horſes, deſirous for to fight. And although from the beginning of their youth, they did vſe to weare long haire: yet were they neuer ſo carefull to combe and bruſh their heads, as when they ſhould to the battell. For then they did noint themſelues with ſweet oyles, and did ſhed their haire, remembring Lycurgus ſaying: who was wont to tell them, that haires to them which were faire, did make them more faire, and to them that were foule, they made them more vgly and dreadfull. The exerciſes alſo of their bodies, were more eaſie and gentle, and not ſo hard and ſtraight in their warres, as they were in peace: and generally, their whole manner of life was not then ſo ſtraightly viewed, nor yet controlled. So as they onely were the men of the world, to whom warres were made a reſt from labour, which men ordinarily doe endure, to make them the fitter for the warres. Afterwards when their armie was ſet in battell-ray, euen in the face of the enemies, the King did ſtraight ſacrifice a goate vnto the gods, and forthwith commanded all his ſouldiers to put their garlands of flowers on their heads, and willed that the pipes ſhould ſound the ſong of Caſtor, at the noiſe and tune whereof, he himſelfe begaune firſt to march forward. So that it was a maruellous pleaſure, and likewiſe a dreadfull ſight, to ſee the whole battell march together in order, at the ſound of the pipes, and neuer to breake their pace, nor confound their rankes, nor to be diſmaied nor amazed themſelues, but to go on quietly and ioyfully at the ſound of theſe pipes, to hazard themſelues euen to death. For it is likely, that ſuch courages are not troubled with much feare, nor yet ouercome with much furie: but rather they haue an aſſured conſtancie and valiantneſſe in good hope, as thoſe which are backed with the aſſiſting fauour of the gods. The king marching in this order, had alwaies ſome about him, which had before time wonne the priſes in games and iuſtes. And they ſay there was one of theſe on a time, that was offered a great ſumme of mony at the games Olympicall, not to preſent himſelf at them: but he refuſed it, liking better with great paine to win the priſe, then for much money to loſe his honour. Whereupon the one ſaid vnto him, LACONIAN: and what haſt thou gotten now, to carry away the priſe with ſo much ſwet? The LACONIAN anſwered him laughing: I ſhall fight in the battel, ſaith he, before the King. When they had once brokē into their enemies, they did ſtill fiercely & fiercelier ſet vpon them, and did neuer ceaſſe, vntil their enemies gaue way & fled: and then they chaſed and followed them ſtill, vntil ſuch time as their ouerthrow and flight had aſſured them of the victory. Then they quickly and quietly returned to their campe, iudging it to be no manhood, neither part of a noble mind, or of ſo worthy a nation as the GRECIANS were, to kill & hew in peeces, men ſo ſcattered & out of order, hauing forſaken all the hope of victory. This fell out not only honourable, but alſo very profitable for them. For they which were in battell againſt them, knowing they killed none but ſuch as reſiſted ſtoutly, and how they did let other go which fled before them: they found it was more their benefit to flie, then to tarrie and abide the ſtrokes. Hippias the ſophiſter ſaith, that Lycurgus himſelfe was a very good captaine, and a great ſouldier, as he that had bene in many foughten fields: and Philoſtephanas aſcribeth to him the deuice to put horſemen in troupes & companies, which they called Oulames, whereof fifty men at armes was a troupe, whoſe maner was to put themſelues in ſquadrons. But Demetrius the Phalerian writeth otherwiſe, that Lycurgus was euer at the wars, and that he made all his lawes and gouernement in a full peace. But in my opinion, the intermiſſion of wars during the plaies Olympical, which they ſay he deuiſed, doth ſhew in appearāce that he was a gentle natured man, and one that loued quietnes and peace. Some notwithſtanding (amongſt whom Hermippus was one) ſay, he was not with Iphitus at the firſt beginning when he ordained the plaies Olympicall, but that by chance he happened to come thither, paſſing by in his iourney only, and that he ſtayed there to ſee the games: where he thought he heard the voice of a man behind him, ſaying, he maruelled much why he did not perſwade his citizens alſo to be partners of this new deuice: and turning backe to ſee who it was that ſpake to him, he ſaw no body. Whereupon he tooke a conceit that it was a ſpeech from the gods: and went therfore preſently to ſeek out Iphitus, with whom he made all the ſtatutes and orders of the feaſt, which afterwards were far more famous, better ordered, & more ſtately then before. But to returne againe to the LACEDÆMONIANS: their diſcipline and order of life continued ſtill, after they were full growne men. For it was not lawfull for any man to liue as he liſted, but they were within their city, as if they had bene a campe, where euery man knoweth what allowance he hath to liue withall, and what buſineſſe he hath elſe to do in his calling. To be ſhort, they were all of this mind, that they were not borne to ſerue themſelues, but to ſerue their countrey. Therefore if they were commanded nothing elſe, they went continually to ſee what the children did, & to teach them ſomwhat which might profit the cōmon weale, or elſe they went to learne of thoſe which were their elders. For one of the beſt and happieſt things which Lycurgus euer brought into his city, was the great reſt & leiſure which he made his citizens to haue, only forbidding them that they ſhould not profeſſe any vile or baſe occupation: and they needed not alſo to be carefull to get great riches, in a place where goods were nothing profitable nor eſteemed. For the Ilotes, which were made bōdmē by the wars, did till their grounds, & yeelded them a certain reuenue euery yeare. And as touching this matter, they tel of a LACEDÆMONIAN, who being on a day at ATHENS where the law was pleaded, did vnderſtand that a citizen there was condemned for idlenes, and how he went home to his houſe very ſorrowful, accompanied with his friends which were ſory for him, and greatly lamented his ill hap: the LACEDÆMONIAN then prayed thoſe which were about him, to ſhew him the man condemned for liuing nobly, and like a gentleman. I haue alledged this, to ſhew how he thought it a vile and ſeruile thing to exerciſe any handy craft, or to work any thing by hand to get money. For ſuites in law, a man may be well aſſured they were baniſhed with the gold & ſiluer from LACEDÆMON, conſidering now there was no more auarice nor couetouſneſſe there, nor yet pouertie nor lack, but equality with abundance, and quiet life with ſobriety. All other times but when they had warres, they followed dancing, feaſts, playes, bankets, hunting, or other exerciſes of body, and meetings to paſſe the time away. For the young men vntill they came to thirty yeares of age, neuer went into the market to buy any prouiſion or things for the houſe, but did their fathers or their friends buſineſſe: nay it was a ſhame for the oldeſt mē, to haunt the market too often. As to the contrary, it was honourable for them to be preſent at the ſhew place the moſt part of the day, where they diuerſly exerciſed their bodies, & likewiſe to be at the places of assembly, there to spend time with walkng together, and discoursing honestly one with another, without talking of any matter of gaine, traffick, or mony. For all their talke (for the most part) was about the praising of some honest thing, or sportingwise to reproue some dishonesty, which alwaies caried with it some gentle lesso or monitio by the way. For Lycurgus was not such a soure ma, as they neuer saw him laugh: but as Sosibius writeth, it was he that first sacrificed to the litle god of laughter, which is at LACEDÆMON, because he would mingle their feasts & assemblies with mirth, as a pleasant sawce to ease the trouble of their strict & hard life. To be briefe, he did accustome his citizens so, that they neither would not could liue alone, but were in maner as men incorporated one with another, & were alwaies in company together, as the bees be about their master bee: still in a continuall loue to serue their country, to win honour, and to aduance the common-weale. Which affection of theirs is plaine and easly seene to be imprinted in them by certain of their answers, as in that which Pedaretus said on a time, being left out of the election of the number of the three hundred. Who departing home to his house mery & iocond as might be, said: It did him good to see there were three hundred found better in the citie than himself. Pisistratidas also being sent ambassador with certain other to the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, the PERSIAN Lords asked him, if they came of their owne desire, or whether they were sent from the whole state: If we obtaine, said he, it is from the state: if we be denied, then we come of our selues. And Argileonida the mother of Brasidas, asked some that wēt to visit her after they were returned home to LACEDÆMON from their iourney to AMPHIPOLIS, if her sonne died like a man, & a worthy SPARTAN: and they straight commended him highly, saying: There was not left in all LACEDÆMON such a valiant man. She replied vnto them. Say not so, my friends, I pray you: for Brasidas was indeed a valiant man, but the countrey of LACONIA hath many moe yet valianter then he was. Now touching their Senate, Lycurgus was the first that erected it among them. The first that were thereof, were Lycurgus chiefe aiders and assisters of that erection, as we haue declared before: but afterwards he ordained, that when any of those first should happen to die, they should chuse in his place the most honest reported man in the citie, so he were threescore yeares old and aboue. This was the noblest glory that could be among men, whē a man bore the bel & praise, not that he was swiftest among the swift, nor strongest amongst the strong, but that he among the honest was honestest. He had the reward of his vertue, as for liberty to speake, soueraigne authority to gouerne, and princely power ouer the commonweale, the honor, the life, and the goods of the whole citizens: howbeit the election was made after this sort. The people first assembled in the market place, where there were some appointed & shut vp thereabout in a house, from whence they could neither see, nor be seene of those that were assembled, but only they might heare the noise which they made there: For the people by their crie & shout, did declare whom they did chuse, and whom they did refuse of the competitours, as they vsed to shew their liking by the like crie in other things. The competitours were not brought in, and presented all together, but one after another in order, as by lot did fall out. He on whom the lot fel, passed through the midst of the assembly of the people, and said neuer a word. The people straight that liked, made a crie or shout aloud. The men appointed which were locked vp, had books or tables in which they wrote & noted the greatnes of the cry & shout the people made, as euery competitor passed by, not knowing nor seeing who he was. These hidden men did only set down in their books, the first, the second, the third, and so many more, as by shouts and cries they perceiued did passe thus through the assembly. They noted also in their said books, which of those had the greatest cry & shout of people at their passing through: and him they came and declared to be Senator chosen. Then he wearing a garland of flowers on his head, went to al the temples of the gods in the citie to giue thankes, hauing a great traine of young men following, and praising of his vertues. There went also with him a maruellous company of women singing songs of his praise, & how blessed he was that he had liued so vertuously. Then euery one of his kinne prepared a banquet for him at home at their houses, and as he entred the house, they said vnto him: The citie honoureth thee with this banquet. That done, he repaired afterwards to the ordinary place of their eating, where he did in all things as he was accustomed, sauing he was serued now at his table with a double allowance, whereof he reserued the one. After supper, all his kinswomen stood in the entrie of the hall where they had eaten: so he called her whom he loued best, and gaue her his allowance he had saued, and said to her: This was giuen me in token I was this day rewarded for my vertue: and euen so I giue it thee for a like token of reward for thy vertue. Then was ſhe brought home by all the women there to her houſe, euen in like ſort as he was by the men. Touching burials, Lycurgus made a wiſe order: For firſt of all, to cut off all ſuperſtition of burying places, he commanded they ſhould bury the dead within the citie, and that their graues ſhould be round about their temples, that young perſons might haue them alwayes in their eyes, and not be affraid to ſee a dead body, as if to touch a coarſe, or to paſſe by their graues, it ſhould defile a man. Then did he forbid them to bury any thing with the coarſe, & willed they ſhould only lap it vp in a red cloth, with oliue leaues. It was not lawful to graue the name of any dead body vpon his graue, but only of ſuch a man as died in the warres, or of ſome holy woman profeſſed into their temples. Furthermore, the time appointed to mourne in, was very ſhort. For it laſted not but eleuen daies, & on the twelfth day, they muſt do ſacrifice to Proſerpina, and ſo leaue off their mourning. To conclude, hee left nothing idle, or vnworking in his citizens: for to all neceſſary things which men cannot lack, Lycurgus ioyned euer a certaine emulation of men; as to deſire vertue, and to contemne vice: and furniſhed his city with many good precepts and examples, among which his citizens being ſtill borne and bred vp, and hauing the ſame in euery place before their eyes where they went, they came to paſſe in time to be framed after the very patterne and mould of vertue it ſelfe. For this cauſe did he not ſuffer any to trauell out of the country, or to go abroad as he would, without ſpecial licence, for feare leſt thoſe which trauelled abroad for their pleaſure, ſhould bring home ſtrange faſhions and manners, & a corrupt diſordered life, which by litle and litle might get way, and bring an alteration and change of the whole ſtate. Furthermore, he kept out of Sparta all ſtrangers, except thoſe which had neceſſary buſineſſe there, or were come thither for ſome profit to the country: not that he was afraid they ſhould learne ſomething wherby to loue vertue, or that they ſhould deſire to follow his faſhion and manner of gouernement, as Thucydides was: but rather fearing they ſhould teach his citizens ſome naughty manners, or ſome ill fauoured vice. For it muſt needs be, that ſtrangers bring euer ſtrange and new deuices with them: which new deuices bring with them alſo new opinions: and new opinions beget new affections and minds, that many times are repugnant to the law, and to the forme of the common-weale eſtabliſhed before, as diſcords do many times in an harmony of muſicke, that before agreed very well together. Therfore he iudged it a thing moſt neceſſary, to keep his city free and ſafe from counterfaiting of any ſtrangers manners or faſhions, that were commonly as perſons infected with ſome contagious ſickneſſe. Now in all we haue ſpoken before, euen to this place, there is no maner of token or ſhew of iniuſtice, or lack of equity, wherewith ſome ſeeme to burden Lycurgus in his lawes: by ſaying they were well made, to make men warlike and valiant, but not to be iuſt and righteous. But concerning the law they call Cryptia, as much to ſay, as their ſecret: if it were of Lycurgus inſtitution, as Ariſtotle ſaith, it might haue caried Plato into the like opinion that Lycurgus had of his common-weale. This was the law: The gouernors which had the charge and ouerſight of the yong men, at certaine appointed times, did chuſe out thoſe they thought to haue the beſt diſcretion, and ſent them abroad into the country, ſome one way, ſome another way, who caried with them daggers, and ſome prouiſion to feed them. Theſe young men being thus diſperſed abroade in the country, did hide themſelues all the day cloſe in ſecret places, and there they lay and tooke their reſt: afterwards when night was come, they went to ſeek out the high waies, & killed the firſt of the Ilotes that they met. Sometimes euen in the broad day, they went into the country to kill the ſtrongeſt and ſtouteſt of them: as Thucydides telleth in his hiſtory of the wars of Peloponnesvs, where he ſaith: That a certaine conuenient number of the Ilotes were crowned, by a publike proclamatiõ of the Spartans: and being infranchiſed for their good ſeruices they had done the common-weale, they were caried to all the temples of the gods for an honour. Within a while after, no man knew what was become of them, being about two thouſand in number: ſo that neuer man heard tell neither then nor ſince, how they came to their deaths. Howbeit Ariſtotle aboue all others ſaith, that the Ephores, ſo ſoone as they were placed in their offices, made warre with the Ilotes, becauſe they might lawfully kill them. And it is true, that in other things they did handle them very hardly. For they forced them ſomtimes to drink wine without water out of meaſure, till they had made them ſtarke drunk. Then they brought them all into their common hals where they did eate, to make their children to behold them, and to ſee what beaſtlineſſe it was for a man to be drunk. Likewiſe they made them ſing ſongs, and daunce daunces, vnfit for honeſt men, and ſuch as were full of deriſion and mockery; and did forbid them expreſly to ſing any honeſt honest songs. So it is reported, that in the iourny the THEBANS made to LACONIA, many of the ILOTES were taken prisoners thereat, & when they were commanded to sing the verses of Terpander, or of Alcman, or of Spendon the Laconian, they would not do it: saying, they durst not sing thē for their masters. Wherfore he that first said in the coūtry of LACEDÆMONIA, he that is free is more free, and he that is bond, is more bond then in other places: knew very well the diuersity betweene the liberty and bondage there, and the liberty and bondage of other countries. But in my opinion, the LACEDÆMONIANS begā to vse these great outrages & cruelties, long time after the death of Lycurgus, and specially since the great earthquake that happened at SPARTA, at which time the ILOTES rose against them with the MESSENIANS, and did great mischiefe thorough the countrey, and put the citie to the greatest distresse and danger that euer it had. For I cannot be perswaded, that euer Lycurgus inuented, or instituted, so wicked and mischieuous an act, as that kind of ordinance was: becausse I imagine his nature was gentle and mercifull, by the clemencie and iustice we see he vsed in all his other doings, and was witnessed besides by open oracle from the gods, for a iust and wise man. Furthermore, they say of him, that when he saw the chiefest points of his gouernement had taken deepe roote, and that the forme of his common-weale went on, and was strong inough to maintaine and keepe it selfe on foot, like as Plato saith, that God reioyced greatly after he had made the world, and saw the same turne and moue his first mouing: euen so Lycurgus taking singular pleasure and delight in his mind, to see his notable lawes put in vre, and so well established and liked of by experience, sought yet to make them immortal, as neere as he could possible, by any forecast of man that no after time whatsoeuer, might change or put them downe. To bring this to passe, he caused all the people to assemble, and told them he thought his ciuil policie & state of common weale was already sufficiently established, for vertuous and happie life: yet there was one matter behind of greater importance then all the rest, which he could not yet declare vnto them, vntill he had first asked counsell of the oracle of Apollo. And therfore in the meane time they should keepe and obserue his lawes and ordinances inuiolably, without changing, remouing, or staying any matter therein, vntill he were returned from the city of DELPHES, and then they should do that other thing behind, if the god then so coūselled him. They all promised him to do it, and praied him to make hast to go on his iourney. But before he departed, he made the kings and senators sweare first, and consequently al the people after, that they would keep his lawes & ordinances without changing or altering any thing, vntill he did returne againe. This done, he went to the city of DELPHES, where so soone as he arriued, he sacrificed in the temple of Apollo, and asked him: If the lawes he had made were good to make a man liue an happie life: Apoilo made him answer, his lawes were very good, and that his city keeping them, should be the most renowned of the world. Lycurgus caused this oracle to be written, which he sent to SPARTA. After he sacrificed to Apollo againe: and then taking leaue of his friends, and of his son, he determined to die, becausse his citizens should neuer be released of the oath they had made betweene his hands. When he had this determination, he was come to the age, wherein a man hath strength inough to liue longer: and yet was old inough also to die if he would. Wherfore finding himself happie to haue obtained his desire, he willingly pined himselfe to death, by abstinence and lacke of meate. For he thought it meete, that the very death of great personages should bring benefit euer to the common-weale, and that the end of their life should be no more idle or vnprofitabe, thē the rest of their life before: nay rather, that it was one of their most meritorious acts, to haue their death extolled for worthinesse. So he imagined, that his death would be the perfectiō & crown of his felicity, after he had made & ordained so many good and notable lawes, for the honor and benefit of his country: and should be as a seale of cōfirmation of his law, and the continuall preseruitour of his citie, considering all his citizens had sworne to keepe them all inuiolably, vntill he were returned. He was not deceiued of his hope, for his city was the chiefest of the world, in glory and honour of gouernement, by the space of fiue hundred yeares. For so long his city kept his lawes without any change or alteration by any of the Kings succeſſours, vntill King Agis, the sonne of Archidamus began to reigne. For the creation of the Ephores, did not breake, nor discontinue any of the lawes of Lycurgus, but reduced them rather to a more straight and strict order: although it seemed at the first that the Ephores were ordained for the maintenance and defence of the liberty of the people, whereas indeed they did also strengthen the authority of the Kings and Senate. Now in the reigne of King Agis, gold and siluer beganne first to creepe in againe to the city of SPARTA, by meanes of

SPARTA ſeemed not to be a policie or common-weale, but rather a certain holy place and order

pacified their ſeditions, without ſending out one ſouldier, but only a ſimple poore ambaſſadour.
At whoſe commandement, the people preſently aſſembled like the bees, which gather together about their king, ſo ſoone as they ſpie him: they did then ſo greatly reuerence the good gouernment and iuſtice of the SPARTANS. Therefore I can but wonder much at thoſe which ſay, the could command wel. Nay, the rather (ſaid he) becauſe the citizens can obey wel. For men commonly diſdaine to obey thoſe which are not wiſe in commanding. So that the faithful obedience of the ſubiects, dependeth much vpon the ſufficient cõmandement of the wiſe prince. For he that directeth wel, muſt needs be wel obeyed. For like as the art of a good rider, is to make his horſe

Good gouernment breedeth due obedience. his ſubiects to obey. Wherefore the LACEDÆMONIANS procured, that not only other people did willingly obey them, but alſo deſired to be ruled and commanded by them. For they asked them, neither ſhips nor money, nor yet did ſend them any number of men of warre to compell them, but only they ſent one citizen of SPARTA to gouerne them, to whom all the other people ſubmitted themſelues, and were holpen by him in their neceſſity, as fearing & reuerencing him.
In this wiſe the SICILIANS were holpen by Gylippus, the CHALCIDONIANS by Braſidas, and al the GRECIANS inhabiting ASIA, by Lyſander, Callicratidus, and by Ageſilaus, who were called the reformers and directers of Princes, peoples and Kings, vnto whom they were ſent here and there: but euer they had their eye vpon the city of SPARTA, as vpõ the moſt perfect patterne to order mans life by, and to gouerne a common-weale after. To this effect tended the mery word ſpoken in ieſt by Stratonicus: who ſaid he did order the ATHENIANS to tend their ſacrifices, and the ELIANS to tend their games: and if they made any fault therein, the LACEDÆMONIANS ſhould be well whipped. That was merily ſpoken, and in a ieſting manner. But Antiſthenes (the Antiſthenes, Socrates ſcholers words. Philoſopher and one of Socrates ſchollers) ſeeing the THEBANS growne very hawty and glorious, after that they had conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS in the iourney of LEVCTRES: Mee thinketh, ſaid he, theſe THEBANS here do like the ſchoole-boyes, which brag and reioyce, when they haue a litle beaten their maſter. But this was not Lycurgus meaning, to haue his city to command many. But he thought the felicity of a citie, as of a priuate man, conſiſted chiefly in the ex-erciſe of vertue, & in the vnity of the inhabitants therof. He framed his common-wealth to this end, that his citizens ſhould be nobly minded, content with their owne, and temperate in their doings, that thereby they might maintaine and keepe themſelues long in ſafety. The ſelfe ſame intention had Plato, Diogenes, and Zenon, in ſetting forth their bookes, which they wrote of the gouernment of common-weales: and ſo had likewiſe many other great and learned men which haue written of the ſame matter. Howbeit they only left behind them words, and written books:
The foundation of a common-weale. but Lycurgus contrariwiſe, left no written bookes nor pamphlets, but ſtabliſhed and left behind him a royall forme of gouernement, which no man euer before had inuented, nor neuer after could be followed. He hath made them plainely ſee a whole citie liue together, and gouerne it ſelfe philoſophically, according to the true rules and precepts of perfect wiſdome: which imagined that true wiſedome was a thing hanging in the ayre, and could not viſibly be ſeene in the world. Whereby he hath worthily excelled in glory all thoſe, which euer tooke vpon them to write or ſtabliſh the gouernement of a common-weale. And therefore ſaith Ariſtotle, that after his death they did him leſſe honor in LACEDÆMONIA, thẽ he had deſerued: albeit they did him all the honor they poſſibly could deuiſe. And yet they built a temple for him, and made ſolemne sacrifice to him euery yeare, as vntō a god. More, they say, that when the ashes of his body were brought to SPARTA, there fell straight lightning vpon his tombe where they were put, which they had not often seene to happen to other men of name after their deceasse, sauing onely to the Poet Euripides, who dying in MACEDONIA, was buried neare the citie of ARETHVSA. The which is some manifest argument, for such as loue the Poet, to lay against them that somewhat depraue him, seeing this signe came to him after his death, which had happened before to a most well beloued man of the gods. Some say, Lycurgus died in the citie of CIRRHA. But Apollothemis saith, he died in ELIDA. Timæus and Aristoxenus write, he ended his daies in CRETA. And Aristoxenus saith further, that those of the Ile of CRETA doe shew his graue in the place which they call Pergamia, by the broade high wayes side. He left one only begotten son named Antiorus, who died without issue, so that his house and name failed with him. But his neare kinsmen and familiar friends, did set vp a company or brotherhood in memorie of him, which continued a long time: and the daies wherein they assembled, were called the Lycurgides. There is another Aristocrates (the sonne of Hipparchus) who saith, that he being dead in CRETA, his friends burned his body, and afterwards threw his ashes into the sea, according as he had praied and requested them. For he feared, that if any part of him should at any time haue bene brought to SPARTA, the inhabitants would haue said he was returned againe, and thereby would haue thought themselues discharged of their oath, and might haue lawfully altered the lawes which he had appointed. And this is the discourse and end of Lycurgus life.

THE LIFE OF Numa Pompilius.

THE Historiographers differ maruellously of the time, in which Numa Pompilius reigned king, albeit some will deriue frō him many noble houses descended in ROME. For one Clodius, who wrote the book intituled, the table of time, affirmeth that the ancient registers of the citie of ROME were lost when it was taken and sacked by the GAVLES: and that those which are extant at this day be not true, but were only made by men desirous to gratifie some, which haue thrust in ancient houses and families of the first ROMAINES, that concerne nothing them whom they meant to represent. On the other side, although the common opinion be, that Numa was a familiar friend and schollar of Pythagoras the Philosopher, yet some say he was neuer learned, nor had any knowledge at all in the Greeke tongue. And yet maintaining that it is possible enough, that he was so well borne, and had such perfection in all kind of vertue, that he neuer needed any master: and though he had needed, they had rather attribute the honour of the instructing of this king vnto some other forreine person, that was more excellent then Pythagoras. Other say, that Pythagoras the Philosopher was long time after the reigne of Numa, & well-nigh fiue ages after him. Howbeit other say, there was another Pythagoras borne in SPARTA (who hauing won the prize in running at the games Olympicall, in the sixteenth Olympiad, & the third yeare of Numaes reigne) did come into ITALIE, where he kept much about Numa, and did assist and helpe him in the gouerning and ordering of his Realme. By meanes whereof there be many customes yet of the LACONIANS, mingled with the ROMAINS, which this second Pythagoras was said to haue taught him. Neuertheles it is not confessed that Numa was borne of the SABYNES, which they say are descended from the LACEDÆMONIANS. So it falleth out hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was, and chiefly for such as will follow the roll or table of those, which from Olympiades to Olympiades haue won the prizes of games Olympicall: considering the roll or table that they haue at this present, was very lately published by one Hippias an Elian, who deliuereth no reason or argument of necessity, why it should be taken for an vndoubted troth, which he in that sort hath gathered. Yet we will not leaue to put in writing those things worthy of memory which we could gather by any meanes of king Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meetest. It was now since ROME was built, seuen and thirty yeares (for so long time reigned Romulus) when Romulus the fifth of the month of Iuly (which they call the Nones of the goates) made a solemne sacrifice without the city, neare to a certain place commonly called, the goate marsh. As all the whole Senate, with the most part of the people were present at this sacrifice, suddenly there arose in the aire a very great tempest, and a maruellous darke thick cloud, which fell on the earth with such boysterous winds, stormes, lightnings, and thunder, that the poore common people being afraid of so sore a tempest, dispersed themselues suddenly, running here and there for succour, and therewithall king Romulus vanished away in such sort, that he was neuer after seene aliue nor dead. This brought the Senatours and Noblemen whom they called Patricians, into great suspition. And there ran a foule tale among the common people, how they had long time borne very impatiently to be subiects to a king, because themselues would haue had & taken vpon them some soueraign authority, and that for this cause they had killed king Romulus. Adding somewhat more vnto it, how a little before he had vsed them more roughly, and commanded them more straightly then he was wont or accustomed. Neuertheles they found the meanes to quench all those brutes and murmurings, by doing diuine honour and sacrifice vnto him, as one not dead, but passed to a better life. To confirm this, one of the noblest men among them called Proclus came in, and by oath affirmed before all the people, that he saw Romulus ascending vp into heauen, armed at all peeces, and that he heard a voice say: From thence foorth call him Quirinus. This being thus appeased, there sprang vp another trouble, to know whom they should choose in his place. For the strangers which were come then from other places to dwell in ROME, were not yet throughly ioyned to the naturall borne ROMAINES: in so much, as the common people did not onely wauer, and stagger vp and downe in opinion, but the Senatours also (that were many, and of diuerse nations) did enter into a suspition one of another. These things notwithstanding they all agreed in this, that of necessity they must choose a king: howbeit in the rest they differed much, not onely whom they should choose, but also of what nation he should be. For those which were the first founders and builders of the citie of ROME with Romulus, could in no wise abide nor suffer that the SABYNES (to whom they had deuided part of their lands, and a moitie of their citie) should attempt and presume to command them, whom they did receiue and associate into their company and fellowship. The SABYNES alledged on the other side for them, a good reason, and such as caried great probability. Which was, that neuer since the death of their king Tatius, they neither had in any thing disobeyed nor disquieted king Romulus, but had suffered him to reigne peaceably: and therefore Romulus being now deceassed, reason would that the new King should be chosen of their nation, And that albeit the ROMAINES had receiued them into their citie, they could not say therefore, that in time of this association, they were lesse to be reckoned of in any thing, then themselues. Further they added, that in ioyning with them, the ROMAINES had doubly increased their might & power, and had made a bodie of a people, which deserued the honour and title of a citie. These were the causes of their contention. But to preuent that of this contention there might grow no confusion in the citie if it ſhould remaine without any head to command: the Senators which were a hundred and fiftie in number, gaue counſell that euery one of them by turnes, one after another, ſhould carrie the royall ſtate of the king, and all the ſhewes and ornaments of his maieſtie and ſhould do the ordinarie ſacrifices of the king, and diſpatch all cauſes ſix houres in the day, & ſix houres in the night, as the king before had vſed. Thus they thought it beſt to deuide the rule, that one might haue aſmuch power as the other, aſwell in reſpect of themſelues, as alſo for regard of the people. For they imagined, that the changing and remouing thus of this regall dignity, and paſſing it from man to man, would cleane take away enuie among them, and make euery of them to rule temperatly, and vprightly ſee, that in one and the ſelfeſame day and night, euery of them ſhould be a King and priuate perſon alſo. The Romaines call this manner of regiment in vacation, Interregnum: as you would ſay, rule for the time. Now albeit their gouernment was very modeſt and ciuill, yet the could not for all that keepe themſelues from falling into the ſuſpition and ſlander of the people: who gaue it out ſtraight, that this was a fine deuice of theirs, to change by this meanes the rule of the Realme into a few Noble mens hands, to the end that the whole authority and gouernment of al publike cauſes, ſhould remaine ſtil in themſelues, becauſe it grieued them to be ſubiect to a King. And in the end, the two parts of the city came to this agreement: that the one part ſhould chooſe one of the body of the other, to be the King. This courſe they liked very well, aſwell for the pacification of preſent ſtirre and diſſention amongſt themſelues, as for procuring equalitie of affection, and ſtirring vp a likeneſſe of good will in the King that thus indifferently ſhould be choſen: whereby he ſhould loue the one part for that they had choſen him, and likewiſe the other part for that he was of their Nation. The Sabynes were the firſt, which referred the election to the Romaines choyce: and the Romaines thought it better to chooſe one of the Nation of the Sabynes, then to haue a Romaine choſen by the Sabynes. After they had conſulted, they determined amongſt themſelues: and did chooſe Numa Pompilius one of the body of the Sabynes to bee King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at Rome, howbeit he was a man ſo famous for his vertue, that the Sabynes ſo ſoone as they named him, did receiue him more willingly, then they who had choſen him. After they had thus publiſhed their election, the firſt and chiefeſt perſons of the one and the other ſide, were choſen out to go vnto him. Now Numa Pompilius was borne in one of the chiefeſt and beſt cities which the Sabynes had, called Cures, whereupon the Romaines and their followers the Sabynes were called afterward Quirites: and he was the ſon of Pompontus a Noble man, the youngeſt of foure brethren: being by the ſecret working of the gods, borne on the very day, on the which Rome was firſt founded by Romulus, which was the one and twentieth day of April. This man being naturally giuen and inclined vnto all vertue, did yet increaſe the ſame by ſtudie, and all kind of good diſcipline: and by the exerciſe thereof, and of true patience, and right philoſophie, he did marueloufly adorne himſelfe and his manners. For he did not only cleare his ſoule and mind of all paſſions and vices commonly vſed in the world: but he conquered in himſelfe all heats, violence and couetouſneſſe. And would neither ſeeke nor vſurpe that which was another mans; a thing at that time honoured among the moſt barbarous people: but thought that to be the true and right victory in man, firſt to conquer and command himſelfe by iudgement and reaſon, and then to ſubdue all couetouſneſſe and greedineſſe. Hauing therefore this opinion, he would in no wiſe haue in his houſe any ſuperfluity or fineneſſe. He became to euery man that would employ him (aſwell ſtranger as his own country man) a wiſe counſeller, and an vpright iudge. He beſtowed his leiſure, not to follow his own delight, or to gather goods together: but to ſerue the gods, and to behold their celeſtial nature & power, as much as mans reaſon and vnderſtanding could comprehend. Therby he got ſo great a name and reputation, that Tatius (which was king of Rome with Romulus) hauing but one only daughter called Tatia, made him his ſon in law. Howbeit this marige put him in no ſuch iolity, that he would dwell at Rome with his father in law, but rather kept at home at his own houſe in the countrie of the Sabynes, there to ſerue and cheriſh his old father with his wife Tatia: who for her part alſo liked better to liue quietly with her husband being a priuate man, then to go to Rome where ſhe might haue liued in much honor and glory, by means of the King her father. She died as it is reported, 13. yeares after ſhe was maried. After her death, Numa leauing to dwel in the city, was better contented to liue in the country alone, & ſolitary, & gaue himſelf to walk much in the fields and woods conſecrated to the gods, as one deſirous of alone life, far from the company of men. Whereupon was raiſed (in my opinion) that which is ſpoken of him, and of the goddeſſe Egeria: That it was not for any ſtrangeneſſe, or melancholineſſe of nature, that Numa withdrew himſelfe from the conuerſation and company of men, but becauſe he had found another more honourable and holy ſocietie of the Nymph, and goddeſſe Egeria, who had done him, as they ſay, that honour, as to make him her husband: with whom as his beloued darling it is ſaid he enioyed happie daies, and by daily frequenting of her company, he was inſpired with the loue and knowledge of all celeſtiall things. Surely, theſe deuices are much like vnto certaine old fables of the Phrygians, which they hauing learned from the father to the ſonne, do loue to tell of one Agus: of the Bithynians, of one Herodotus: of the ARCADIANS, of one Endymion: and of many other ſuch like men, who in their liues were taken for ſaints, and beloued of the gods.

Gods familiar with mẽ

Notwithſtanding, it is likely, that the gods loue neither birds, nor horſe, but men, and haue ſometimes a liking to be familiar with perfect good men, and do not diſdaine ſometime the conuerſation of ſuch as be holy, religious and deuout. But to beleeue the gods haue carnall knowledge, and do delight in the outward beauty of creatures, that ſeemeth to carie a very hard beleefe. Yet the wiſe ÆGYPTIANS thinke it probable enough and likely, that the ſpirit of the gods hath giuen original of generation to women, & do beget fruit of their bodies: howbeit they hold that a man can haue no corporall company with any diuine nature. Wherein they do not conſider, that euery thing that ioyneth together, doth deliuer againe a like ſubſtance, to that wherewith it was ioyned. This notwithſtanding, it is meet we ſhould beleeue the gods beare good will to men, and that of it doth ſpring their loue, whereby men ſay, the gods loue thoſe whoſe manners they purifie and inſpire with vertue. And they do not offend, which faine that Phorbas, Hyacinthus and Admetus, were ſometimes the louers of Apollo, and alſo Hypolitus the SICYONIAN: of whom they report, that euer when he paſſed ouer the arme of the ſea which lieth betweene the cities of SICYONA and of CIRRHA, the god which knew he came, reioyced, and cauſed Pythia the Propheteſſe to pronounce theſe heroycall verſes:

I know full well, my deare Hypolytus Returnes by ſea, my mind diuineth thus.

Who are beloued of the gods.

It is ſaid alſo that Pan was in loue with Pindarus and his verſes, and that the gods honoured the Poets Heſiodus and Archilocus, after their death, by the Muſes. They ſay moreouer that AEſculapius lay with Sophocles in his life time, and at this day they do yet ſhew many tokens thereof: and after his death, another god (as it is reported) made him to be honourably buried. Now if they grant, that ſuch things may be true: how can we refuſe to beleeue, that ſome gods haue bene familiar with Zaleucus, Minos, Zoroaſtres, Lycurgus, Numa, and ſuch other like perſonages, which haue gouerned Kingdomes, and ſtabliſhed Common-weales? And it is not vnlike that the gods indeed did company with them, to inſpire and teach them many notable things, and that they did draw neare vnto thoſe Poets and plaiers of the harpe, that made and applyed many dolefull and ioyfull ditties, at the leaſt for their ſport and pleaſure onely, if euer they came neare them. Neuertheles if any man be of other opinion, the way is open and large, as Bacchylides ſaid, to thinke and ſay as he luſt. For my ſelfe, I do find that which is written of Lycurgus, Numa, and other ſuch perſons, not to be without likelyhood and probabilitie: who hauing to gouerne rude, churliſh, and ſtiffe-necked people, and purpoſing to bring in ſtrange nouelties, into the gouernements of their countries, did faine wiſely to haue conference with the gods, conſidering this faining fell to be profitable and beneficiall to thoſe themſelues, whom they made to beleeue the ſame. But to returne to our hiſtory: Numa was forty yeares old, when the ambaſſadors of ROME were ſent to preſent the kingdome vnto him, and to intreat him to accept therof. Proclus & Veleſus, were the ambaſſadors that were ſent. One of the which the people looked ſhould haue bene choſen for King, becauſe thoſe of Romulus ſide, did fauor much Proclus: & thoſe of Tatius part fauoured Veleſus. Now they vſed no long ſpeech vnto him, becauſe they thought he would haue bene glad of ſuch a great good fortune. But cõtrarily it was indeed a very hard thing, & required great perſwaſions, & much intreaty, to moue a man which had alwaies liued quietly, and at eaſe, to accept the regiment of a city, which as a man would ſay, had bene raiſed vp & grown by wars and martiall deeds. Wherefore he anſwered them in the preſence of his father, and one other of his kinſmen called Martius in this ſort: Change and alteration of mans life is euer dangerous: but for him that lacketh nothing neceſſary, nor hath cauſe to cõplaine of his preſent ſtate, it is a great folly to leaue his old acquainted trade of life, and to enter into another new and vnknowne, if there

there were no other but this only respect: that he leaueth a certainty, to venter vpon vncertainty. Howbeit there is further matter in this, that the dangers and perils of this kingdome which they offer me, are not altogether vncertaine, if we will looke back what happened vnto Romulus: who was not vnsuspected to haue laid wait, to haue had Tatius his fellow and companion murdered: and now after Romulus death, the Senatours selues are mistrusted to haue killed him on the other side by treason. And yet they say it, and sing it euery where: that Romulus was the son of a God, that at his birth he was miraculously preserued, & afterwards he was as incredibly brought vp. Whereas for my owne part, I do confesse, I was begotten by a mortall man, and was fostered, brought vp, and taught by men, as you know: and these few qualities which they praise & commend in me, are conditions farre vnmeet for a man that is to reigne. I euer loued a solitary life, quiet and study, and did exempt my selfe from worldly causes. All my life time I haue sought & loued peace aboue all things, and neuer had to do with any warres. My conuersation hath bene to company with men, which meet onely to serue and honor the gods, or to laugh and be merie one with another, or else to spend their time in their priuate affaires, or otherwise somtime to attend their pastures, and feeding of their cattell. Whereas Romulus (my Romaine lords) hath left you many wars begun, which peraduenture you could be contented to spare: yet now to maintaine the same, your citie had need of a martiall King, actiue, and strong of body. Your people moreouer, through long custome, & the great increase they are growne vnto by feates of armes, desire nought else perhaps but warres: and it is plainely seene, they seeke still to grow, and command their neighbours. So that if there were no other consideration in it, yet were it a meere mockerie for me, to goe to teach a city at this present to serue the gods, to loue iustice, to hate wars, and to fly violence: when it rather hath need of a conquering Captaine, then of a peaceable king. These & such other like reasons & perswasions Numa alledged, to discharge himself of the kingdome which they offered him. Howbeit, the ambassadors of the Romaines most humbly besought and prayed him with all instance possible, that he wold not be the cause of another new stir & commotion among them, seeing both parts in the city haue giuen their consent & liking to him alone, and none other to be their king. Moreouer, when the ambassadors had left him vpon this suit, his father, and Martius his kinsman, began also priuately to perswade him, that he should not refuse so good & godly an offer. And albeit he was contented with his present state, and desired to be no richer then he was, nor coueted no princely honour nor glory, because he sought onely most famous vertue: yet he must needs think, that to rule well, was to do the gods good seruice, whose will it was to employ the iustice they knew in him, and not to suffer it to be idle. Refuse not therefore (quoth they) this royall dignity, which to a graue and wise man is a goodly field, to bring forth many commendable works and fruits. There you may do noble seruice to the gods, to humble the hearts of these martiall people, and to bring them to be holy & religious: for they readily turne, and easily conforme themselues vnto the nature of their Prince. They dearely loued Tatius, although he was a stranger: they haue consecrated a memory to Romulus with diuine honours, which they make vnto him at this day. And it may be, that the people seeing themselues conquerors, will be full enough of wars: and the Romaines being now full of spoiles and triumphes, will be glad to haue a gentle Prince, & one that loueth iustice, that they may thenceforth liue in peace vnder good and holy lawes. And yet if it be otherwise, that their hearts be still full of heat and furie to fight: is it not better to turne this their desire to make wars some other way, when a man hath the bridle in his own hands to do it, and to be a meane in the meane time to ioyne the country, and all the nations of the Sabynes in perpetuall loue and amitie, with so mightie and flourishing a citie? Besides all these perswasions and reasons, there were many signes also (as they say) which promised him good luck, together with the earnest affection and liking of his owne country citizens. Who, so soone as they vnderstood the coming and commission of the ambassadours of Rome, they importunately desired him to go thither, and to accept the offer of the kingdome: that he might more straightly vnite and incorporate them together with the Romaines. Whereupon, Numa accepted the Kingdome. Then after he had done sacrifice to the gods, he set forwards on his iourney towards Rome: where the people and Senate went out to meete him, with wonderfull desire to see him. The women at his entrie, went blessing of him, and singing of his praises. They did sacrifice for him, in all the temples of the gods. There was neither man nor woman but seemed to bee as ioyfull and glad, as if a new Realme, and not a new King, had bene come to the citie of Rome.

Numa beginneth his kingdome with the seruice of the gods.

Thus was he brought with this open ioy and reioycing, vnto the market place, where one of the Senatours, which at that time was regent, called Spurius Vettius, made them pronounce his open election: and so by one consent he was chosen king, with all the voices of the people. Then were brought vnto him the tokens of honour and dignity of the King. But he himself commanded they should be staid a while, saying: He must first be confirmed King by the gods. Then he took the wise men and priests, with whom he went vp into the Capitoll, which at that time was yet called mount Tarpeian. And there, the chiefest of the southsayers called Augures, turned him towards the south, hauing his face couered with a veile, and stood behind him, laying his right hand vpon his head, and praying to the gods that it would please them to declare their wills by flying of birds, or some other token concerning this election: and so the southsayer cast his eyes all about, as farre as he could possibly discerne. During all this time there was a maruellous silence in the market place, although then an infinite number of people were assembled there together, attending with great deuotion what the issue of this diuination would be: vntill there appeared vnto them on the right hand, good and luckie birds, which did confirme the election. Then Numa putting on his royall robes, came downe from mount Tarpeian, into the market place, where all the people receiued him with wonderfull shouts of ioy, as a man the most holy and best beloued of the gods that they could haue chosen. So hauing taken the royall seat of the Kingdome, his first act was this: that he discharged the guard of the three hundred souldiers, which Romulus had alwaies about his person, called Celeres, saying: He would not mistrust them which trusted him, neither would he be King ouer people, which should mistrust him. His second act was, that he did adde to the two priests of Iupiter and Mars, a third in the honour of Romulus, who was called Flamen Quirinalis. For the ancient Romaines also called their priests, instituted in the old time, Flamines, by reason of certaine litle narrow hats which they did weare on their heads, as if they had called them Pilamines: for Pilos in greeke signifieth a hat. And at that time (as they say) there were many mo Greeke words mingled with the Latine, then there are at this day. For they called the mantles the Kings did weare Lænas. And Iuba saith, that it is the very same which the Grecians call Chlænas, & that the young boy which was a seruant in the temple of Iupiter, was called Camillus, as some of the Grecians do yet call the god Mercurie, because he is seruant of the gods. Now Numa hauing done these things at his first entrie into his kingdome, still to win further fauour and good wil of the people, began immediatly to frame his citizens to a certaine ciuility, being as iron wrought to softnesse, and brought them from their violent and warlike desires, to temperate and ciuill manners. For out of doubt, Rome was properly that, which Plato ascribeth to a city full of trouble & pride. For, first it was founded by the most couragious and warlike men of the world, which from al parts were gathered there together, in a most desperat boldnes, and afterwards it increased, and grew strong, by armes & cõtinuall wars, like as piles driuen into the ground, which the more they are rammed in, the further they enter, and stick the faster. Wherfore Numa iudging it no small nor light enterprise, to pluck down the haughty stomacks of so fierce & violent a people, and to frame them vnto a sober and quiet life, did seeme to work it by meanes of the gods, with drawing them on therto by litle and litle, and pacifying of their hot and fierce courages to fight, with sacrifices, feasts, dancings, and common processions, wherin he celebrated euer himself. In the which together with their deuotion, there was mingled now & then pastime & pleasure: and somtimes he laid the terror & feare of the gods before their eyes, making thẽ beleeue that he had seen strange visions, or that he had heard voices, by which the gods did threaten them with some great troubles & plagues, alwaies to pull downe and humble their hearts vnto the feare of the gods. This was the cause why they thought afterwards that he had learned his wisdome of Pythagoras the Philosopher: because the greatest part of the philosophy of the one, and of the gouernment of the other, consisted in such ceremonies & diuine studies. They report also that Numa did put on the outward shew & semblance of Pythagoras holinesse, as following his intention and example. For Pythagoras as they say, made an Eagle so tame and gentle, that she would stoupe & come downe to him by certaine voices, as she flew in the aire ouer his head. And that passing through the assembly of the games Olympical, he shewed her thigh of gold, and many other prety feats & deeds they tel of, which seemed to be wonderfull, and for which Timon Phliasian hath written these verses of him:

Pythagoras which loued to dwell in dignity,
And hath an heart to glory bent, and past in policy.

Much

Much like a man which ſought, by charming to enchaunt,
Did vſe this art, to win mens minds, which vnto him did haunt:
His graue and pleaſant tongue, in ſugred ſpeech did flow,
Whereby he drew moſt minds of men, to bent of his owne bow.

Euen ſo the fained fable of Numa, which he ſo cunningly diſguiſed, was about the loue of a goddeſſe, or ſome Nymph of the mountaine: with whom he ſeemed to haue certaine ſecret meetings and talke, whereof we haue ſpoken before. And it is ſaid, he much frequented the Muſes in the woods. For he would ſay, he had the moſt part of his reuelations of the Muſes, and he taught the ROMAINES to reuerence one of them aboue all the reſt, who was called Tacita, as ye would ſay, Lady Silence. It ſeemeth he inuented this, after the example of Pythagoras, who did ſo ſpecially command and recommend ſilence vnto his ſchollers. Againe, if we conſider what Numa ordained concerning images, and the repreſentation of the gods, it is altogether agreeable vnto the doctrine of Pythagoras: who thought that God was neither ſenſible nor mortall, but inuiſible, incorruptible, & only intelligible. And Numa did forbid the ROMAINES alſo to beleeue, that God hath euer forme or likeneſſe of beaſt or man. So that in thoſe former times, there was in ROME no image of God, either painted or grauen: and it was from the beginning a hundred threeſcore and ten yeares, that they had built temples and chappels vnto the gods in ROME, and yet there was neither picture nor image of God within them. For they took it at the firſt for a ſacriledge, to preſent heauenly things by earthly formes, ſeeing we cānot poſſibly any way attaine to the knowledge of God, but in mind and vnderſtanding. The very ſacrifices which Numa ordained, were altogether agreeable and like vnto the maner of ſeruing of the gods, which the Pythagorians vſed. For in their ſacrifices they ſpilt not the bloud, but they did theirs cōmonly with a litle meale, a litle ſhedding of wine and milke, and with ſuch other light things. Such as affirme that thoſe two men did much companie & were familiar together, do lay further proofes & argumēts for the ſame. The firſt is this: that the ROMAINES did make Pythagoras a free man of the city of ROME, as Epicharmus the Comicall poet an ancient writer (and ſometimes one of Pythagoras ſchollers) ſaith in a book he wrote and dedicated vnto Antenor. The other proofe is: that Numa hauing had foure children, called one of them Mamercus, after Pythagoras ſonnes name, from whom, they ſay, is deſcended the houſe of the AEmilians, which is the nobleſt of the Patricians: for the king gaue him the name of AEmilius, becauſe of his ſweete tongue and pleaſant voice. Furthermore, I my ſelfe haue heard ſay many times in ROME, that the ROMAINES hauing receiued an oracle, which commanded them to ſet vp images in their city, to the wiſeſt and valianteſt man that euer was among the GRECIANS, cauſed two ſtatues of braſſe to be ſet vp in their market place, the one of Pythagoras, the other of Alcibiades. Howbeit to ſtriue about this matter any further, ſeeing there are ſo many doubts, me thinketh it were but vaine. Moreouer they attribute to Numa, the firſt erection of the colledge pontificall: and ſay, he himſelfe was the firſt Pontifex that euer was. But touching the name of Pontifex, ſome will ſay they were ſo called, becauſe they chiefly were ordained and appointed for the ſeruice of the Almightie: for this word Potens in the ROMAINE tongue, betokeneth mightie. Other thinke this name was giuen to them by their founders, as to exempt perſons out of the world: who enioyned them to do all the ſeruice and ſacrifices to the gods they could poſſibly, and yet notwithſtanding, if they had any other lawfull let or impediment thereof, they were not ſtraight condemned for omitting the ſame. Howbeit the moſt part doe bring out another deriuation of this name; wherein me thinks there is little reaſon. As that they ſhould be called Pontifices, becauſe they had the charge and maintenance of the bridge. For that which the GRECIANS call Gephyran, the LATINES call Pontem: that is, a bridge. And to ſay truly, the charges of repairing the bridge, belongeth to the Biſhops: as well as the keeping of the moſt holy and vnchangeable ceremonies. For the ROMAINES thought it not onely a thing vnlawfull, but tooke it for a moſt damnable and wicked act, to deſtroy or breake the bridge of wood, which was onely ioyned together (as they ſay) with pinnes of wood, and without any yron at all, by the commandement of an old oracle. But the ſtone bridge was built long time after the reigne of Numa, and in the time of the reigne of his nephew Martius. Now the firſt and chiefeſt of theſe biſhoppes, which they call the great Pontifex, hath the place, authoritie, and dignitie of the high Prieſt and maſter of their pontificall law: who ſhould be carefull, not onely about all publicke ſacrifices and ceremonies, but alſo about ſuch as were priuate, and to ſee that no man priuately ſhould breake the ancient ceremonies, nor bring in any new thing into religion, but rather euery man ſhould be taught by him, how, and after what ſort he ſhould ſerue and honour the gods. He alſo hath the keeping of the holy virgins which they call Veſtales. For they do giue Numa the firſt foundation and conſecrating of them, and the inſtitution alſo of keeping the immortal fire with honor and reuerence, which theſe virgins haue the charge of. Either for that he thought it meete to commit the ſubſtance of fire (being pure and cleane) vnto the cuſtody of cleane and vncorrupt maids: or elſe becauſe he thought the nature of fire (which is barren, & bringeth forth nothing) was fitteſt and moſt proper vnto virgins. For in GRECE, where they kept continual fire likewiſe (as in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, and at ATHENS) the maidens do not keepe the ſame, but old women which are paſt mariage. And if this fire chãce to faile, as they ſay in ATHENS the holy lamp was put out in the time of the tyranny of Ariſtion: and in the city of DELPHES it was put out, when the temple of Apollo was burnt by the MEDES: and at ROME alſo, in the time of the warres that the ROMAINES had againſt king Mithridates: and in the time of the ciuill warres, when alter, fire, and all were burnt and conſumed together: they ſay that it muſt not be lighted againe with other common fire, but muſt be made anew, with drawing cleane and pure flame from the beames of the Sunne; and that they do in this maner. They haue a hollow veſſell made of a peece of a triangle, hauing a corner right, and two ſides alike: ſo that from all parts of his compaſſe and circumference, it falleth into one point. Then they ſet this veſſell right againſt the beames of the Sun, ſo that the bright Sunne beames come to aſſemble & gather together in the center of this veſſel, where they do pierce the ayre ſo ſtrongly, that they ſet it on fire: & when they put to it any drie matter or ſubſtance, the fire taketh it ſtraight, becauſe the beame of the Sunne, by meanes of the reuerberation, putteth that drie matter into fire, and forceth it to flame. Some thinke that theſe Veſtall virgins keepe no other thing but this fire, which neuer goeth out. Other ſay, there are other holy things alſo, which no body may lawfully ſee but they: whereof we haue written more largely in the life of Camillus, at the leaſt ſo much as may be learned and told. The firſt maidens which were vowed and put into this order of religion by Numa, were (as they ſay) Gegania & Verenia: and after them, Canuleia and Tarpeia. Afterwards king Seruius increaſed the number with two other, and that number of foure continueth vnto this day. Their rule and order ſet down by king Numa was this: that they ſhould vow chaſtity for the ſpace of thirty yeares. In the firſt ten yeares they learne what they haue to do: the next ten yeares following, they do that which they haue learned: and the laſt ten yeares, they teach yong nouices. After they haue paſſed their thirty yeares, they may lawfully mary if they be diſpoſed, and take them to another maner of life, and leaue their religion. But as it is reported, there haue bene very few of them which haue taken this liberty, and fewer alſo which haue ioyed after they were profeſſed, but rather haue repented themſelues, and liued euer after a very grieuous & ſorrowfull life. This did ſo fray the other Veſtals, that they were better contented with their vowed chaſtitie: and ſo remained virgines, vntill they were old, or elſe died. He gaue them alſo great priuiledges & prerogatiues: as, to make their will and teſtament in their fathers life time: to do all things without any gardian or ouerſeer, as women which haue three children at a birth. When they go abroad, they cary maces before them to honour them. And if by chance they meete any offendor in their way going to execution, they ſaue his life: howbeit the profeſſed Veſtall muſt affirme by oath, that ſhe met him vnwares, and not of ſet purpoſe. If any man preſume vnder their chaire, whereupon they are caried through the city, he ſhal die for it. Alſo when they themſelues do any fault, they are corrected by the great Biſhop, who ſometimes doth whip them naked (according to the nature and quality of their offence) in a dark place, and vnder a curten. But ſhe that hath defloured her virginity, is buried quick by one of the gates of the city, which they call Collina gate: where within the city there is a mount of earth of a good length, & with the LATINES is ſaid to be raiſed. Vnder this forced mount, they make a litle hollow vault, and leaue a hole open, whereby one may go downe: and within it there is ſet a litle bed, a burning lampe, and ſome victuals to ſuſtaine life withal. As a litle bread, a litle water, a litle milke, and a litle oyle, and that for honors ſake: to the end they would not be thought to famiſh a body to death, which had bene conſecrated by the moſt holy and deuout ceremonies of the world. This done, they take the offender, and put her into a litter, which they couer ſtrongly, and cloſe it vp with thicke leather, in ſuch ſort, that no body can ſo much as heare her voice, and ſo they carie her thus ſhut vp through the market place.

Euery

Euery one draweth backe, when they ſee this litter a farre off, and do giue it place to paſſe by: and then follow it mourningly with heauy lookes, and ſpeake neuer a word. They do nothing in the city more feareful to behold, then this: neither is there any day wherein the people are more ſorrowful, then on ſuch a day. Then after ſhe is come to the place of this vawt, the ſergeāts ſtraight vnloſe theſe faſt bound couerings: and the chiefe Biſhop after he hath made certaine ſecret praiers vnto the gods, and lift his hands vp to heauen, taketh out of the litter, the condemned Veſtall muffled vp cloſe, and ſo putteth her vpon the ladder, which conueyeth her downe into the vawt. That done, he withdraweth, and all the prieſts with him: and when the ſilly offendour is gone downe, they ſtraight pluck vp the ladder, and caſt abundance of earth in at the open hole, ſo that they fil it vp to the very top of the arch. And this is the puniſhment of the Veſtals which defile their virginity. They thinke alſo it was Numa that built the round temple of the goddeſſe Veſta, in which is kept the euerlaſting fire: meaning to repreſent not the forme of the earth, which they ſay is Veſta, but the figure of the whole world, in the middeſt whereof (according to the Pythagoreans opinion) remaineth the proper ſeate and abiding place of fire, which they call Veſta, and name it the Vnitie. For they are of opinion, neither that the earth is vnmooueable, nor yet that it is ſet in the middeſt of the world, neither that the heauen goeth about it: but ſay to the cōtrary, that the earth hangeth in the aire about the fire, as about the cēter therof. Neither wil they grant, that the earth is one of the firſt and chiefeſt parts of the world: as Plato held opinion in that age, that the earth was in another place then the very middeſt, and that the center of the world, as the moſt honourableſt place, did appertaine to ſome other of more worthie ſubſtance than the earth. Furthermore, the biſhops office was to ſhew thoſe that needed to be taught, all the rites, maners, and cuſtomes of buriall: whom Numa taught not to beleeue that there was any corruption or diſhoneſty in burials, but rather it was to worſhip and honour the gods of the earth, with vſuall and honourable ceremonies, as thoſe which after their death receiue the chiefeſt ſeruice of vs they can. But aboue all other in burials, they did ſpecially honour the goddeſſe called Libitina, that is ſaid, the chiefe gouernour and preſeruer of the rites of the dead: or be it Proſerpina, or Venus, as the moſt learned men among the Romaines do iudge, who not without cauſe do attribute the order of the beginning and end of mans life, to one ſelfe god, and power diuine. Numa ordained alſo, how long time euery body ſhould mourne in black. And for a child from three yeares to ten yeares, of age, that died: he ordained they ſhould mourne no more moneths then it had liued yeares, and not to adde a day more. For he commanded, that the longeſt time of mourning ſhould be but ten moneths onely, and ſo long time at the leaſt he willed the women ſhould remaine widowes, after the deceaſſe of their husbands: or elſe ſhe that would mary within that time, was bound by his order to ſacrifice a whole bullock. Numa alſo erected many other orders of prieſts: of two ſorts whereof I will only make mention. The one ſhall be the order of the Salii, and the other of the Feciales: for me thinkes, both the one and the other doth manifeſtly ſhew the great holineſſe, and ſingular deuotion which he had in him. The Feciales are properly thoſe, which the Grecians cal Irenophylaces, as who would ſay, peacekeepers. And in my iudgement, they had their right name according to their office, becauſe they did pacifie quarrels with reaſon by way of order, and did not ſuffer (as much as in thē lay) that any matter ſhould be tried by violence, vntil they were paſt al hope of any peace. For the Grecians call it properly Irenen, when both parties agree, & decide their controuerſie with reaſon, & not with ſword. Euen ſo thoſe which the Romains called the Feciales, went many times in perſon to thoſe that did the Romains iniury, and ſought to perſwade them with good reaſon, to keepe promiſe with the Romaines, and to offer them no wrong. But if they would not yeeld to reaſon, whom they ſought to perſwade, then they called the gods to the witneſſe thereof, and prayed them, that if they did not moſt earneſtly incenſe the Romaines, to purſue that moſt iuſtly appertained vnto their right, that all euils and miſchiefes of the warres might fall vpon themſelues, and on their countrie. This done, they did threaten open warres againſt ſuch enemies. And if the Feciales would not conſent to open warres, and did happen to ſpeake againſt them, it was not lawfull in that caſe, neither for priuate perſon, nor for the king himſelfe to make any wars. But like a iuſt Prince, he muſt haue leaue by their ſufferance to make the warres. Then did he conſider, and conſult, by what meanes he might beſt procure and proſecute the ſame. Concerning this matter, they iudge that the il hap which came to the Romains, when the city of Rome was taken and ſacked by the Gavles, chanced iuſtly for breaking of this holy inſtitution. For at that time the barbarous people beſieged the city of the CLVSINIANS: and Fabius Ambuſtus was ſent ambaſſador vnto them, to ſee if he could make peace betweene them. The barbarous people gaue him an ill anſwer: whereupon Fabius thinking his embaſſie had bene ended, and being ſomwhat hot, and raſh in defence of the CLVSINIANS, gaue defiance to the valianteſt GAVLE there, to fight with him man to man. Fortune fauoured him in this chalenge: for he ſlue the GAVLE, and ſtripped him in the field. The GAVLES ſeeing their man ſlaine, ſent immediatly an herald to ROME, to accuſe Fabius, how againſt all right and reaſon he began warres with them, without any open proclamation made before. The FECIALES being then conſulted with thereabout, did declare, he ought to be deliuered into the hands of the GAVLES, as one that had broken the law of armes, and had deſerued it: but he made friends to the people which fauoured him very much, and by their meanes eſcaped his deliuery and puniſhment. Neuertheleſſe, the GAVLES within ſhort time after, came before ROME with all their power: which they tooke, ſacked, and burnt euery whit, ſauing the Capitoll, as we haue written more amply in the life of Camillus. Now concerning the Prieſts that were called Salij, they ſay he did inſtitute them vpon this occaſion. In the eight yeare of his reigne, there came a peſtilent diſeaſe through all ITALIE, and at the length it crept alſo into ROME. Whereat euery man being greatly affraid and diſcouraged, they ſay there fell from heauen a target of copper, which lighted betweene the hands of Numa. They tell hereof a wonderfull tale, which the King himſelfe affirmed he heard of the Nymph Egeria, and the Muſes; to wit, that this target was ſent from heauen, for the health and preſeruation of the citie: and therefore he ſhould keepe it carefully, and cauſe eleuen other to be caſt and made, all like vnto the ſame in faſhion and greatneſſe, to the end that if any would enterpriſe to ſteale it, he ſhould not tell which of them to take for the right target. Moreouer he ſaid, he was commanded to conſecrate the place to the Muſes (in the which he did oftentimes companie with them) and alſo the fields which were neare thereabouts: and likewiſe to giue the fountaine that ſprang in that place, vnto the Veſtals profeſſed, that euery day, they might draw water at that Well, to waſh the ſanctuary of their temple. The ſucceſſe hereof proued his words true, for the ſicknes ceaſſed incontinētly. So he aſſembled al the chiefe crafts-men then in ROME, to proue which of them would take vpon him to make one like vnto that. Euery man deſpaired to performe it. Howbeit one called Veturius Mamurius (the excellenteſt workmā that was in thoſe daies) did make them all ſo ſuite-like, that Numa himſelf did not know the firſt target, when they were all layd together: So he ordained the prieſts Salij, to haue the cuſtody of theſe targets, to ſee them ſafe kept. They were called Salij, not after the name of Salian borne in SAMOTHRACIA, or in MANTINEA, as ſome haue vntruly alledged, who firſt inuented the maner of dancing all armed: but they were ſo called, of their faſhion and manner of dancing and leaping. For in the moneth of March, they go skipping and leaping vp and downe the city, with thoſe targets on their armes, apparelled in red caſſockes without ſleeues, and girded about with broad leather ſword girdles, ſtudded with copper, hauing helmets of copper on their heads, and ſtriking vpon their targets with ſhort daggers, which they cary in their hands. Moreouer, al their dancing conſiſteth in mouing of their feet: for they handle them finely, making turnes aboue ground and beneath, with a ſodaine meaſure, and a maruellous force of agility. They call theſe targets Ancylia, becauſe of their faſhion, which is not altogether compaſſe: for they are not all round as other common targets be, but they are cut with circles wreathed about, both the ends bowing in many foldes, and one ſo neare another, that altogether they come to a certaine wreathed forme, which the GRECIANS call Ancylon. Or elſe they are ſo called, becauſe Ancon ſignifieth an elbow, vpon which they cary them. Al theſe deriuations are writtē in the hiſtory of Iuba, who in any caſe will haue this word Ancylia to be drawne out of the Greek tong. And it may be alſo they were ſo called, becauſe the firſt came frō aboue, which the GRECIANS cal Anecathē: or els for healing the ſick, which is called Aceſis: or els for ceaſſing of the drynes, which in Greek is called Anchmon Lyſis: or for the ending of all diſeaſes and euils, for which cauſe the ATHENIANS call Caſtor and Pollux, Anacas: if they luſt to giue this word his deriuation from the Greek tong. Now the reward which Mamurius the goldſmith had for making of theſe targets was, that the Salij vnto this day do make mention of him in their ſong, which they ſing going through the city, and dancing of their dance all armed. Howbeit ſome thinke they ſay not Veturius Mamurius, but veterem memoriam, ancient memory. But Numa after he had ordained and inſtituted theſe orders of prieſts, built his palace neare vnto the temple of Veſta, which holdeth his name Regia at this this day, to say, the kings palace. In which he remained most part of his life, studying either to sacrifice to the gods, or to teach the Priests what they should do, or how with them he should best contemplate all heauenly things. It is true that he had another house on the hill, which they call at this day, Quirinall, the place wherof is yet to be seene. But in all these sacrifices, ceremonies, & processions of the Priests, there were alwaies hushers that went before, crying to the people, Keepe silence, and tend vpon diuine seruice. For they say the Pythagoreans thought it good, that men should not worship the gods, nor make prayers to them in passing by, or doing any other thing: but they thought it meet, that men should of purpose goe out of their houses, to serue and pray vnto them. Euen so king Numa thought it not meet, that his subiects should come to see, & heare diuine seruice negligently, as it were for a fashion, & only to be rid of it, as heeding another thing: but he would haue them set aside all other businesse, and employ their thoughts and hearts only vpon the principall seruice of religion, and deuotion towards the gods. So that during seruice time, he would not haue heard any noise, any knocking, bouncing, or any clapping, as they commonly heare in al artificers shops of occupation, wherof at this day yet they see some signes and tokens remaining in their sacrifices at Rome. For al the time the Augur beholdeth the flying of the birds, or that he is doing any sacrifice, the vergers crie alowd: Hoc age, which meaneth, tēd this. And it is a warning to those that are present, to cal their wits home, & to think on that which is in hand. Also there are many of his orders like the precepts of the Pythagoreans. For as they did warne men, not to sit vpon a litle bushell, not to cut fire with a sword, not to looke behind them when they go abroad: to sacrifice to the celestiall gods in odd number, and to the gods of the earth in an euen number, of which precepts they would not haue the common people to haue any knowledge or vnderstanding. Euen so there are many institutions of Numa, the reasons wherof are hidden and kept secret: as not to offer wine to the gods of the vine neuer cut, and not to sacrifice vnto them without meale: & to turne a turne about when they do reuerence to the gods, and to sit downe after they haue worshipped them. And as touching the two first ordinances, it seemeth that by them he did recommend clemency & humanity, as being a part of the deuotion towards the gods. But as for the turning which he willeth them to make that worship the gods, they say it presenteth the turning which the element maketh by his mouing. But me thinketh it should rather come of this: for that the temples being set to the East, he that worshippeth entring into the temple, sheweth his backe to the West, and for this cause turneth towards that part, and afterwards returneth againe towards God: doing the whole turne, & ending the consummation of his praier, by this double adoratiō which he maketh before & behind. Vnles peraduēture that he meant secretly to signifie, & giue thē to vnderstand by this turning & changing of their look, that which the Ægyptians figured by their wheeles: in shewing thereby, that these worldly things were neuer constant and in one state: and therefore, that we should take it thankfully, and patiently beare it, in what sort soeuer it pleased God to change or alter our life: And where he cōmanded that they should sit after they had worshipped God: they said it was a tokē of a good hope vnto thē that prayed that their prayers shold be exalted, & that their goods should remaine safe, & stick by them. Other say, that this ease & sitting, is a separating them from doing: & therfore he would they should sit in the temples of the gods, to shew they had done that which they had in hād before, to the end to take of the gods the beginning of another. And it may wel be also that it was referred to ỹ thing we spake of a litle before: That Numa wold accustom his people, not to serue the gods, nor to speake to thē at al, as they passed by, or did any other thing, or were in haste: but would haue them pray vnto the gods when they had time & leisure, & al other businesse at that time set apart. By this good instruction and training them vnto religion, the city of Rome by litle and litle came to be so tractable, & had the great power of king Numa in such admiration, that they took al to be as true as the Gospel that he spake, though it had no more likelihood of troth, thē tales deuised of pleasure. Furthermore, they thought nothing incredible, or vnpossible to him, if he wold haue it. And for proofe herof, there goeth a tale of him, that he hauing bidden a great company of the citizens of Rome to come & sup with him, caused them to be serued with plaine grosse meat, & in very poore & homely vessel. And when they were set, & begā to fal to their meate, he cast out words sodainly vnto them, how the goddesse with whom he accompanied, was come to see him euen at that instant, and that sodainly the hall was richly furnished, & the tables couered with al sorts of excellent fine & delicate meats. Howbeit this far passed all the vanity of lying, which is found written of him, about his speaking with Iupiter. The hil

Auentine was not at that time inhabited, nor incloſed within the wals of Rome, but was full of ſprings and ſhadowed groues, whither commonly repaired to ſolace themſelues, the two gods, Picus and Faunus, which otherwiſe might be thought two Satyres, or of the race of the Titanians: ſauing it is ſaid, that they went through all Italy, doing the like wonders and miracles in phyſicke, charmes and art magick, which they report of thoſe the Grecians call Idees Dactyles. There they ſay that Numa tooke them both, hauing put into the ſpring both wine and honie, where they vſed to drink. When they ſaw that they were taken, they transformed themſelues into diuers formes, diſguiſing and disfiguring their naturall ſhape, into many terrible and fearefull ſights to behold. Neuertheleſſe in the end, perceiuing they were ſo faſt, as to eſcape there was no reckoning: they reuealed vnto him many things to come, and taught him the purifying againſt lightning and thunder, which they make yet at this day with onions, haire, and pilchers. Other ſay, he was not taught that by them, but that they fetched Iupiter out of heauen, with their coniuring and magicke: whereat Iupiter being offended, anſwered in choler, that he ſhould make it with heads. But Numa added ſtraight, of onions: Iupiter replied, of men. Then Numa asked him againe, to take a little away the cruelty of the commandement: What haires? Iupiter anſwered, quicke haires. And Numa put too pilchers alſo. And it is reported that this was the goddeſſe Egeria, that taught Numa this ſubtiltie. This done, Iupiter returned appeaſed: by reaſon whereof the place was called Ilicium. For Ileos in the Greeke tongue ſignifieth appeaſed, and fauourable: and this purifying was afterwards made in that ſort. Theſe tales not only vaine, but full of mockerie alſo, do ſhew vs yet plainly the zeale & deuotion men had in thoſe times towards the gods: vnto which Numa through cuſtome had won them. And as for Numa himſelfe, they ſay that he ſo firmely put all his hope and confidence in the helpe of the gods: that one day when he was told his enemies were in armes againſt him, he did but laugh at it, and anſwered: And I do ſacrifice. It is he (as ſome ſay) that firſt built the temple to Faith and Terme: and which made the Romains vnderſtand, that the moſt holy and greateſt oath they could make, was to ſweare by their faith, which they keepe yet at this day. But Terme, which ſignifieth bounds, is the god of confines, or borders: vnto whom they do ſacrifice, both publikely and priuately, vpon the limits of inheritance, and now they ſacrifice vnto him liue beaſts. Howbeit in old time they did ſacrifice vnto him without any bloud, through the wiſe inſtitution of Numa: who declared and preached vnto them, that this god of bounds was ſincere, and vpright, without bloud or murther, as he that is a witneſſe of iuſtice, and keeper of peace. It was he, which in my opinion, did firſt limite out the bounds of the territorie of Rome, which Romulus would neuer doe, for feare leſt in bounding out his own, he ſhould confeſſe that which he occupied of other mens. For bounding & meaſuring, to him that will keepe it iuſtly, is a bond that bridleth power and deſire: but to him that forceth not to keepe it, it is a proofe to ſhew his iniuſtice. To ſay truly, the territory of Rome had no great bounds at the firſt beginning, and Romulus had got by conqueſt the greateſt part of it, and Numa did wholy deuide it vnto the needy inhabitants to relieue them, and to bring them out of pouerty: (which carieth men headlong into miſchiefe, & diſcourageth them to labor) to the end that plowing vp the ſaid land, they ſhould alſo plow vp the weeds of their own barennes, to become ciuill and gentle. For there is no exerciſe nor occupation in the world, which ſo ſodainly bringeth a man to loue and deſire quietnes, as doth husbandry & tillage: and yet to defend a mans own, there is in it courage & hardines to fight. But greedy deſire, violently to take from others, & vniuſtly to occupy that is none of theirs, is neuer in right husbandmen. And therefore Numa hauing brought in husbandry amongſt his ſubiects, as a medicine & meane to make them loue quietneſſe, was deſirous to enure them to this trade of life, the rather to make them humble and gentle of condition, then to increaſe them in riches. He deuided all the territory of Rome into certaine parts which he called Pagos, as much to ſay, as villages. And in euery one of them he ordained controllers and viſiters, which ſhould ſuruey all about: and he himſelfe ſometimes went abroad in perſon, coniecturing by their labour the manners and nature of euery man. Such as he found diligent, he aduanced them vnto honour, and gaue them countenance and authoritie: other which he ſaw ſlothfull and negligent, by rebuking and reproouing of them, he made them amend. But amongſt all his ordinances which he made, one aboue all the reſt caried the praiſe: and that was, that he deuided his people into ſundry occupations. For the city of Rome ſeemed yet to be made of two nations, as we haue ſaid before: and to ſpeake more properly, it was made of two tribes. So that it could not, or would not for any thing be made one: being altogether impoſſible impoſſible to take away all factions, and to make there ſhould be no quarrels nor contentions betweene both parts. Wherefore he conſidered that when one will mingle two bodies or ſimples together, which for their hardneſſe and contrary natures cannot well ſuffer mixture: then he breakes and beates them together, as ſmall as may be. For, ſo being brought into a ſmaller & leſſer powder, they would incorporate and agree the better. Euen ſo he thought it was beſt to deuide the people alſo into many ſmall parts: by meanes whereof they ſhould be put into many parties, which would more eaſily take away the firſt and the greateſt part, when it ſhould be deuided and ſeparated thus into ſundry ſorts. And this diuiſion he made by arts and occupations: as minſtrels, goldſmiths, carpenters, diers, ſhoomakers, tawers, tanners, belfounders, and pot-makers, and ſo forth through other crafts and occupations. So that he brought euery one of theſe into one body, and company by it ſelfe: and ordained vnto euery particular myſtery or craft, their feaſts, aſſemblies, and ſeruices, which they ſhould make vnto the gods, according to the dignity and worthineſſe of euery occupation, And by this meanes, he firſt tooke away all faction: that neither ſide ſaid, nor thought any more, thoſe are SABYNES, theſe are ROMAINES, theſe are of Tatius, theſe are of Romulus. Inſomuch as this diuiſion was an incorporating, and an vniting of the whole together. Among other his ordinances, they did much commend his reforming of the law, that gaue liberty vnto fathers to ſell their children. For he did except children already maried, ſo they were maried with their fathers conſent and good will: iudging it to be too cruell and ouer hard a thing, that a woman who thought ſhe had maried a free man, ſhould find her ſelfe to be the wife of a bondman. He began alſo to mend a litle the calendar, not ſo exactly as he ſhould haue done, nor yet altogether ignorantly. For during the reigne of Romulus, they vſed the moneths confuſedly, without any order or reaſon, making ſome of them 20. dayes and leſſe, and others 35. dayes and more, without knowing the difference betweene the courſe of the Sunne and the Moone: and onely they obſerued this rule, that there was 360. dayes in the yeare. But Numa conſidering the inequality ſtood vpon 11. dayes, for that the 12. reuolutions of the Moone are runne in 354. dayes, and the reuolution of the Sunne, in 365. dayes, he doubled the 11. dayes, whereof he made a moneth: which he placed from 2. yeares to 2. yeers, after the moneth of February, and the ROMAINES called this moneth put betweene, Mercidinum, which had 22. dayes. And this is the correction that Numa made, which ſince hath had a farre better amendment. He did alſo change the order of the moneths. For March which before was the firſt, he made it now the third: and Ianuary the firſt, which vnder Romulus was the eleuenth, and February the twelfth and laſt. Yet many are of opinion, that Numa added theſe two, Ianuary and February. For the ROMAINES at the beginning had but ten moneths in the yeare: as ſome of the barbarous people make but three moneths for their yeare. And the ARCADIANS amongſt the GRECIANS haue but foure moneths for their yeare. The ACARNANIANS haue ſix to the yeare. And the ÆGYPTIANS had firſt but one moneth to their yeare: and afterwards they made foure moneths for their yeare. And this is the cauſe why they ſeeme (albeit they inhabit a new countrey) to be neuertheleſſe the ancienteſt people of the world: for that in their Chronicles they reckon vp ſuch infinite number of yeares, as thoſe which count the moneths for the yeares. And to proue this true, that the ROMAINES at the beginning had but ten moneths in the yeare, and not twelue, it is eaſie to be iudged by the name of the laſt, which they call at this day December. And that the moneth of March was alſo the firſt, may be coniectured by this; for the fifth moneth after that, is yet called Quintilis: the ſixt Sextilis, and ſo the other in order following the numbers. For if Ianuary and February had then bene the firſt, of neceſſity the moneth of Iuly, which they call Quintilis, muſt haue bene named September: conſidering alſo that it is very likely, that the moneth which Romulus had dedicated vnto Mars, was alſo by him ordained to be the firſt. The ſecond was Aprill: ſo called of the name Aphrodite, that is to ſay, Venus, vnto whom they make open ſacrifice in this moneth. And on the firſt day of the ſame, women do waſh themſelues, hauing a garland of myrtle vpon their heads. Howbeit ſome other ſay, that it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it was onely called Aprilis. becauſe then is the chiefeſt force and ſtrength of the ſpring, at which ſeaſon the earth doth open, and the ſeeds of plants and hearbes begin to bud and ſhew foorth, which the word it ſelfe doth ſignifie. The moneth following next after this, is called May: after the name of Maia the mother of Mercury, vnto whom the moneth is conſecrated. * The moneth of Iune is ſo called alſo, becauſe of the quality of that ſeaſon, which is as the youth of the

yeare. Although some will say, that the moneth of May was named of this word Maiores, which signifieth as much as the elders: and the moneth of Iune, of Iuniores, which signifies the yonger men. All the other following, were named in old time by the numbers according to their order, Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, and December. But Quintilis, was after called Iulius, of the name of Iulius Cæsar, who slew Pompeius: and Sextilis was named Augustus of Octauius Cæsar his successour in the empire, who was also surnamed Augustus. It is true also that Domitian would they should call the two moneths following (which are September and October) the one Germanicus and the other Domitianus. But that held not long: for so soone as Domitian was killed, the moneths recouered their ancient names againe. The two last moneths only, haue euer continued their names, without changing or altering. But of the two which Numa added, or at the least translated, the moneth of February doth signifie as much as purging, or at least the deriuation of the word soundeth neere it. In this moneth, they do sacrifice of plants, * and do celebrate the feast of the LVPERCALES, in which there are many things agreeable and like to the sacrifices made for purification. And the first, which is Ianuary, was called after the name of Ianus. Wherefore me thinkes that Numa tooke away the moneth of March from the first place, and gaue it vnto Ianuary: because he would haue peace preferred before war, and ciuill things before martiall. For this Ianus (were he King, or demigod) in the former age was counted very ciuill and politike. For he changed the life of men, which before his time was rude, cruell, and wild: and brought it to be honest, gentle, and ciuill. For this cause they do paint his image at this day with two faces, the one before, and the other behind, for thus changing the liues of men. And there is in ROME a temple dedicated vnto him, which hath two doores, that be called the doores of war: for the custome is to open them, when the ROMAINES haue any warres in any place, and to shut them when they be at peace. To haue them shut, it was a rare thing to see, and happened very seldome: by reason of the greatnesse of their empire, which on all sides sides was enuironed with barbarous nations, whom they were compelled to keepe vnder with force of armes. Notwithstanding it was once shut vp in the time of Augustus, after he had slaine Antonie: and once before also in the yeare when Marcus Attilius and Titus Manlius were Consuls. But that continued not long, for it was opened againe incontinently, by reason of wars that came vpon them soone after. Howbeit during the reigne of Numa, it was neuer one day opened, but remained shut continually by the space of three and forty yeares together. For all occasions of warres, were then vtterly dead and forgotten: because at ROME the people were not onely through the example of iustice, clemency, and the goodnesse of the King, brought to be quiet, and to loue peace: but in the cities thereabouts, there began a maruellous change of maners, and alteration of life, as if some gentle aire had breathed on them, by some gracious and healthfull wind blowne from ROME to refresh them. And thereby bred in mens minds such a hearty desire to liue in peace, to till the ground, to bring vp their children, and to serue the gods truly: that almost through all ITALY, there was nothing but feasts, playes, sacrifices, and bankets. The people did trafficke and frequent together, without feare or danger, and visited one another, making great cheere: as if out of the springing fountaine of Numaes wisdome many prety brookes and streames of good and honest life had run ouer all ITALY, and had watered it: and that the mildnesse of his wisdome had from hand to hand bin dispersed through the whole world. Insomuch, as the ouer excessiue speeches the Poets accustomably do vse, were not sufficient inough to expresse the peaceable reigne of that time.

Why Ianus is painted with two faces.

At what time the temple of Ianus is shut in Rome. Liu lib. 1.

The Romaines had no wars in all Numaes time.

There: spiders weaue, there cobwebs day and night
In harnesses, which wont to serue for warre:
There: cancred rust doth fret, the steele full bright
Of trenchant blades, well whet in many a iarre.
There: mighty speares, for lacke of vse are eaten,
With rotten wormes: and in that country there,
The braying trompe doth neuer seeme to threaten
Their quiet eares, with blasts of bloudy feare.
There: in that land, no drowsie sleepe is broken
With hot alarmes, which terrors do betoken.

For during all king Numaes reigne, it was neuer heard that euer there were any warres, ciuill dissention, or innouation of gouernement attempted against him, nor yet any secret enmity or malice malice borne him, neither any conſpiracy once thought on to reigne in his place. And whether it was for feare of diſpleaſing the gods, (which viſibly ſeemed to take him into their protection) or for the reuerent regard they had vnto his vertue, or for his proſperous & good ſucceſſe all the time he reigned, I cannot tell: howbeit he ſought to keepe men ſtill pure, and honeſt, from all wickedneſſe, and laid moſt open before the eyes of the whole world, a cleere example of that which Plato long time after did affirme, and ſay, concerning true gouernement: which was: That the onely meane of true quietneſſe, and remedy from all euill (which euer troubleth men) was: when by ſome diuine ordinance from aboue there meeteth in one perſon, the right maieſtie of a King, and the mind of a wiſe philoſopher, to make vertue gouerneſſe and ruler ouer vice. For indeed happy is ſuch a wiſe man, and more happy are they, which may heare the graue counſell, and good leſſons of ſuch a mouth: and there (me thinkes) needeth no force, no compulſion, no threats, nor extremity to bridle the people. For men ſeeing the true image of vertue in their viſible Prince, and in the example of his life, do willingly grow to be wiſe, and of themſelues do fall into loue, liking, and friendſhip together, and do vſe all temperance, iuſt dealing, and good order one towards another, leading their life without offence, and with the commendation of other: which is the chiefe point of felicity, and the moſt happy good that can light vnto men. And he by nature is beſt worthy to be a King, who through his wiſdome and vertue, can graffe in mens manners ſuch a good diſpoſition: and this, Numa aboue all other, ſeemed beſt to know and vnderſtand. Furthermore, touching his wiues and children, there are great contrarieties among the hiſtorigraphers. For ſome of them ſay, he neuer maried other wife then Tatia, and that he neuer had any children, but one onely daughter, and ſhe was called Pompilia. Other write to the contrary, that he had foure ſonnes, Pompo, Pinus, Calpus, and Mamercus, of euery one of the which (by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne) haue deſcended the nobleſt races, and moſt ancient houſes of the Romaines. As the houſe of the Pomponians, of Pompo: the houſe of the Pinarians, of Pinus: the houſe of the Calphurnians, of Calpus: and the houſe of the Mamercians, of Mamercus. All which families by reaſon of their progenitor haue kept the ſurname of Reges, Kings. There are three other writers, which dó reproue the two firſt: ſaying, that they did write to gratifie the families, making them falſely to deſcend of the noble race of king Numa. Moreouer it is ſaid, he had his daughter Pompilia, not by Tatia, but by his other wife called Lucretia, whom he maried after he was made King. Howbeit they all agree, that his daughter Pompilia was maried vnto one Martius, the ſonne of the ſame Martius which perſwaded him to accept the kingdome of Rome. For he went with him to Rome, to remaine there: where they did him the honour to receiue him into the number of the Senators. After the death of Numa, Martius the father ſtood againſt Tullus Hoſtilius for the ſucceſſion of the Realme, and being ouercome, he killed himſelfe for ſorrow. But his ſon Martius, who maried Pompilia, continued ſtill at Rome, where he begot Ancus Martius, who was king of Rome, after Tullus Hoſtilius, and was but fiue yeares old when Numa died. Whoſe death was not ſudden. For he died conſuming by little and little, as well through age, as alſo through a lingring diſeaſe that waited on him to his end, as Piſo hath written: and Numa at his death was little more then foureſcore yeares old. But the pompe and honour done vnto him at his funerals, made his life yet more happy and glorious. For all the people his neighbours, friends, kinſmen, and allies of the Romaines came thither, bringing crownes with them, and other publick contributions to honor his obſequies. The noble men ſelues of the city (which were called Patricians) caried on their ſhoulders the very bed, on which the corſe lay, to be conueyed to his graue. The Prieſts attended alſo on his body, and ſo did al the reſt of the people, women and children in like caſe, which followed him to his tombe, all bewailing and lamenting his death, with teares, ſighs, and mournings: not as a King dead for very age, but as they had mourned for the death of their deareſt kinſman, and neareſt friend that had died before he was old. They burnt not his body, becauſe (as ſome ſay) he commanded the contrary by his will and teſtament: but they made two coffins of ſtone, which they buried at the foot of the hill called Ianiculum. In the one they layd his body, and in the other the holy bookes which he had written himſelfe, much like vnto thoſe, which they that made the lawes among the Grecians did write in tables. But becauſe in his life time he had taught the prieſts the ſubſtance of the whole contained in the ſame, he willed the holy tables which he had written, ſhould be buried with his body. For he thought it not reaſonable that ſo holy matters ſhould be kept by dead letters and writings, but by mens maners and exercises. And he followed herein they say, the Pythagorians, who would not put their works in writing, but did print the knowledge of them in their memories, whom they knew to be worthy men, and that without any writing at all. And if they had taught any manner of person the hidden rules and secrets of Geometry, which had not bene worthy of them, then they said the gods by manifest tokens would threaten to reuenge such sacriledge and impiety, with some great destruction and misery. Therefore, seeing so many things agreeable, and altogether like betweene Numa and Pythagoras, I easily pardon those which maintaine their opinion, that Numa and Pythagoras were familiarly acquainted and conuersant together. Valerius Antias the historian writeth, there were twelue books written concerning the office of Priests, and twelue other containing the phylosophy of the GRECIANS. And that foure hundred yeers after (in the same yeare when Publius Cornelius, and Marcus Bebius were consuls) there fell a great rage of waters and raine, which opened the earth, and discouered these coffins: and the lids and couers thereof being caried away, they found the one altogether voide, hauing no manner of likelihood, or token of a body that had layen in it: and in the other they found these bookes, which were deliuered vnto one named Petilius (at that time Prætor) who had the charge to read them ouer, and to make the report of them. But he hauing perused them ouer, declared to the Senate, that he thought it not conuenient the matters contained in them should bee published vnto the simple people: and for that cause they were caried into the market place, & there were openly burnt. Surely it is a common thing, that happeneth vnto all good and iust men, that they are farre more praised and esteemed after their death, then before: because that enuy doth not long continue after their death, and oftentimes it dieth before them. But notwithstanding, the misfortunes which chanced afterwards vnto the fiue Kings which reigned at ROME after Numa, haue made his honour shine, with much more noble glory then before. For the last of them was driuen out of his Kingdome, and died in exile, after he was very old: and of the other foure, none of them died their naturall death, but three of them were killed by treason. And Tullus Hostilius which reigned after Numa, deriding and contemning the most part of his good and holy institutions, and chiefly his deuotion towards the gods, as a thing which made men lowly & faint hearted: did as soone as euer he came to be king, turne al his subiects hearts to the wars. But this madde humour of his, continued not long, For he was plagued with a strange and most grieuous disease that followed him, which brought him to change his mind, and did farre otherwise turne his contempt of Religion, into an ouer fearefull superstition, which did nothing yet resemble the true Religion and deuotion of Numa: and besides, he infected others with his contagious errour, through the inconuenience which happened vnto him at his death. For he was striken and burnt with lightening.

THVS hauing written the liues of Lycurgus and Numa, the matter requireth, though it be somewhat hard to do, that we comparing the one with the other, should set out the difference betweene them. For in those things wherein they were like of condition, their deeds do shew it sufficiently. As in their temperance, their deuotion to the gods, their wisedome in gouerning, and their discreet handling of their people, by making them beleeue that the gods had reuealed the lawes vnto them, which they established. And now to come vnto their qualities, which are diuersely, and seuerally commended in either of them: Their first quality is, that Numa accepted the kingdome, and Lycurgus gaue it vp. The one receiued it, not seeking for it: and the other hauing it in his hands did restore it againe. The one being a stranger and a priuate man, was by strangers elected and chosen their Lord and King. The other being in possession a King, made himselfe againe a priuate person. Sure it is a goodly thing to obtaine a Realme by iustice: but it is a goodlier thing to esteeme iustice aboue a Realme. Vertue brought the one to be in such reputation, that he was iudged worthy to be chosen a King: and vertue bred so noble a mind in the other, that he esteemed not to be a king. Their second quality is, that like as in an instrument of musick, the one of them did tune and wrest vp the slacke strings which were in SPARTA: so the other slackened, and set them lower, which were two high mounted in ROME. Wherein Lycurgus difficulty was the greater. For he did not perswade his citizens, to pluck off their armor & curates, nor to lay by their swords; but only to leaue their gold and siluer, to forsake their soft beds, their fine wrought tables, and other curious rich furniture, & not to leaue off the trauell of warres, to giue themselues onely vnto feasts, sacrifices, and playes: but to the contrary, to giue vp banquetting and feasting, and continually to take paines in the wars, yeelding their bodies to all kind of paines. By which meanes, the one for the loue and reuerence they did beare him, easily perswaded all that he would: and the other, by putting himselfe in danger, and being hurt also, obtained not without great trauell and aduenture, the end of his intended purpose and desire. Numa his muse was so gentle, louing, and curteous, that the manners of his citizens, which before were furious and violent, were now so tractable and ciuill, that he taught them to loue peace and iustice. And to the contrary, if they will compell me to number amongst the lawes and ordinances of Lycurgus, that which we haue written touching the ILOTES, which was a barbarous cruell thing: I must of force confesse that Numa was much wiser, more gentle, and ciuill in his lawes, considering that euen vnto those which indeed were borne slaues, he gaue some little tast of honour, and sweetnesse of liberty, hauing ordained, that in the feasts of Saturne, they should sit downe at meate at their masters owne table. Some hold opinion, that this custome was brought in by king Numa: who willed that those, which through their labour in tillage brought in much fruite, should haue some pleasure thereof to make good cheere with the fruits of the same. Other imagine, that it is yet a token and remembrance of the equality which was amongſt men in the world in Saturnes time, when there was neither maſter nor ſeruant, but all men were alike equall, as brethren or kinſmen. To conclude, it ſeemeth either of them took a direct courſe, thought beſt to themſelues, to frame their people vnto temperance, and to be contented with their owne. But for their other vertues, it appeareth that the one loued warre beſt, and the other iuſtice: vnleſſe it were that men would ſay, that for the diuerſitie of the nature or cuſtome of their people (which were almoſt contrary in manners) they were both compelled to vſe alſo contrary and diuerſe meanes from other. For it was not of a faint hart, that Numa took from his people the vſe of armes, and deſire to be in warres: but it was to the end they ſhould not do any wrong to others. Neither did Lycurgus alſo ſtudy to make his people ſouldiers and warlike, to hurt others: but for feare rather that others ſhould hurt them. And ſo, to cut off the exceſſe in the one, and to ſupply the defect of the other, they were both enforced to bring in a ſtrange manner of gouernement. Furthermore, touching their ſeuerall kind of gouernement, and diuiding of their people into ſtates and companies: that of Numa was maruellous meane and baſe, and framed to the liking of the meaneſt people, making a body of a city, and a people compounded together, of all ſorts, as goldſmiths, minſtrels, founders, ſhoemakers, and of all ſorts of crafts men and occupations together. But that of Lycurgus was directly contrary: for his was more ſeuere and tyrannicall, in gouerning of the Nobility, caſting all crafts and baſe occupations vpon bondmen and ſtrangers, and putting into the hands of his citizens the ſhield and launce, ſuffering them to exerciſe no other art or ſcience, but the art and diſcipline of wars, as the true miniſters of Mars: which all their life time neuer knew other ſcience, but onely learned to obey their captaines, and to command their enemies. For to haue any occupation, to buy and ſell, or to trafficke, free men were expreſſely forbidden: becauſe they ſhould wholly and abſolutely be free. And all ſciences to get money was lawfull for ſlaues, and the Ilotes: being counted for as vile an occupation as to dreſſe meate, and to be a ſcullian of a kitchin. Numa put not this difference amongſt his people, but only tooke away couetous deſire to be rich by wars: but otherwiſe, he did not forbid them to get goods by any other lawfull meanes, neither tooke any regard to bring all to equality, and to be alike wealthy, but ſuffering euery man to get what he could, taking no order to preuent pouerty, which crept in, and ſpread farre in his city: which he ſhould haue looked vnto at the beginning, at that time when there was not too great an vnequality amongſt them, and that his citizens for ſubſtance were in manner equall one with another: for then was the time when he ſhould haue made head againſt auarice, to haue ſtopped the miſchiefes and inconueniences which fell out afterwards, and they were not litle. For that onely was the fountaine and roote of the moſt part of the greateſt euils and miſchiefes, which happened afterwards in Rome. And as touching the deuiſion of goods, neither ought Lycurgus to be blamed for doing it, nor Numa for that he did it not. For this equality to the one, was a ground & foundatiõ of his common-wealth, which he afterwards inſtituted: and to the other, it could not be. For this diuiſion being made not long before the time of his predeceſſor, there was no great need to change the firſt, the which (as it is likely) remained yet in full perfection. As touching mariages, and their children to be in common, both the one and the other wiſely ſought to take away all occaſion of iealouſie: but yet they tooke not both one courſe. For the Romaine husband, hauing children inough to his contentation, if another that lacked children came vnto him, to pray him to lend him his wife, he might grant her vnto him, and it was in him to giue her altogether, or to lend her for a time, and to take her afterwards againe. But the Laconian keeping his wife in his houſe, and the mariage remaining whole and vnbroken, might let out his wife to any man that would require her to haue children by her: nay furthermore, many (as we haue told you before) did themſelues intreate men, by whom they thought to haue a trim brood of children, and layd them with their wiues. What difference, I pray you was betweene theſe two cuſtomes? ſauing that the cuſtome of the Laconians ſhewed, that the husbands were nothing angry, nor grieued with their wiues for thoſe things, which for ſorrow & iealouſie doth rent the hearts of moſt maried men in the world. And that of the Romaines was a ſimplicity ſomewhat more ſhamefaſt, which to couer, it was ſhadowed yet with the cloake of matrimony and contract of mariage: confeſſing that to vſe wife and children by halfes together, was a thing moſt intollerable for him. Furthermore, the keeping of maidens to be maried by Numaes order, was much ſtraighter, & more honorable for womanhood: and Lycurgus order hauing too much ſcope and liberty, gaue Poets occaſion to ſpeake, and to giue them ſurnames not very honeſt. As Ibycus called them Phænomeridas: to ſay, thigh-ſhewers: and Andromanes: to ſay, man-wood. And Euripides ſaith alſo of them.

The vertues of Numa and Lycurgus were alike, but their deeds vnlike.

And ſought for young mens company, and tooke their ware in charge:
And ſhewed their thighes all bare; the taylour did them wrong,
On each ſide open were their cotes, the ſlits were all too long.

And indeed to ſay truly, the ſides of their peticotes were not ſewed beneath: ſo that as they went, they ſhewed their thighs naked and bare. The which Sophocles doth eaſily declare by theſe verſes:

The ſong which you ſhall ſing, ſhall be the ſonnet ſayd
By Hermony luſty laſſe, that ſtrong and ſturdy maide:
Which truſt her peticote, about her middle ſhort,
And ſet to ſhew her naked hippes, in francke and friendly ſort.

And therfore it is ſaid, the LACON wiues were bold, manly, and ſtout againſt their husbands, namely the firſt. For they were wholy miſtreſſes in their houſe, and abroad: yea they had law on their ſide alſo, to vtter their minds frankly concerning the chiefeſt matters. But Numa euer reſerued the honor & dignity vnto the women, which was left them by Romulus in his time, when their husbands, after they had taken thē away perforce, diſpoſed themſelues to vſe them as gētly as poſſibly they could: neuertheleſſe, he added otherwiſe thereto great honeſty, and took away all curioſity from them, and taught them ſobriety, and did enure them to ſpeake little. For he did vtterly forbid them wine, and did prohibit them to ſpeake, although it were for things neceſſary, vnleſſe it were in the preſence of their husbands. In ſo much as it is reported, that a woman chancing one day to pleade her cauſe in perſon, openly before the Iudges: the Senate hearing of it, did ſend immediatly vnto the oracle of Apollo, to know what that did prognoſticate to the city. And therfore Numa thought the memory of the naughty women, would much commend the great humility, gētlenes, & obediēce of the good. For like as our GRECIAN hiſtoriographers do note thoſe which were the firſt that killed any of their citizens, or haue fought with their brethrē, or haue killed their fathers or mothers: euen ſo the ROMAINES doe note that Spurius Caruilius was the firſt that forſook his wife, two hundred & thirty yeares after the firſt foundation of ROME, which was neuer done by any before. And that the wife of one Pinarius, called Thalea, was the firſt which euer brauled or quarrelled with her mother in law called Gegānia, in the time whē Tarquin ſurnamed the proud reigned: ſo well and honeſtly were the orders of Numa deuiſed cōcerning mariage. Moreouer, the age and time of marying of maids, which both the one & the other ordained, doth agree with the reſt of their education. For Lycurgus would not that they ſhould be maried, till they were of good yeares & women grown, to the end that they knowing the cōpany of man at ſuch time as nature requireth, it ſhould be a beginning of their pleaſure and loue, & not of griefe & hate, when ſhe ſhould be cōpelled vnto it before time agreeable by nature; & becauſe their bodies alſo ſhould be more ſtrong & able to beare children, & to endure the mothers painfull throwes & trauel in child-bearing, conſidering they are maried to no other end, but to beare children. But the ROMANES to the contrary, doe marry them at twelue yeares of age and vnder: ſaying, that by this meanes their bodies & manners be wholly theirs which do marry them, being aſſured that no body elſe could touch them. By this reaſon it is manifeſt, that the one is more natural, to make thē ſtrong to beare children: & the other more morall, to giue thē the forme & maner of conditions, which a man wold haue thē to keepe all their life time. Moreouer touching orders for education of children, that they ſhould be brought vp, inſtructed, & taught, vnder the ſelfe ſame maſters and gouernors, which ſhould haue an eye to make them drink, eate, play, and exerciſe themſelues honeſtly & orderly together: Numa made no more prouiſion for the ſame, then the leaſt maker of lawes that euer was, & nothing in compariſon of Lycurgus For Numa left the parents at liberty, to vſe their diſcretiō (according to their couetouſnes or neceſſity) to cauſe their children to be brought vp as they thought good: whether they wold put them to be labourers, carpenters, founders, or minſtrels. As if they ſhould not frame the maners of children, and faſhion them from their cradle all to one end: but ſhould be as it were like paſſengers into one ſhip, which being there, ſome for one buſines, other for another purpoſe, but all to diuerſe ends, do neuer meddle one with another, but in a rough ſtorme or tempeſt, when euery man is affraid of his own life. For otherwiſe, no mā careth but for himſelf. And other makers of lawes alſo, are to be borne withall, if any thing hath ſcaped them through ignorance, or ſometime through lacke of ſufficient power and authority. But a wiſe Philoſopher hauing receiued a realme of people newly gathered together, which did contrary him in nothing: whereto ſhould he moſt ply his ſtudy and indeuour, but to cauſe children to be well brought vp, and to make yong men exerciſe themſelues, to the end they ſhould not differ in manners, nor that they ſhould be troubleſome, by their diuerſe manner of bringing vp, but that they ſhould all agree together, for that they had bene trained from their childhood vnto one ſelfe trade, and faſhioned vnder one ſelfe patterne of vertue? That good education, beſides other commodities, did alſo ſerue to preſerue Lycurgus lawes. For the feare of their oath which they had made, had bene of ſmall effect, if he had not through inſtitution, and education (as it were) died in wooll the maners of children, and had not made them from their nurſes breaſts in manner, ſucke the iuyce and loue of his lawes and ciuill ordinances. And this was of ſuch force, that for the ſpace of fiue hundred yeares and more, Lycurgus chiefe lawes and ordinances remained in full perfection, as a deepe wodded die, which went to the bottome, and pierced into the tender wooll. Contrariwiſe, that which was Numaes chiefe end and purpoſe, to continue ROME in peace & amity, died by and by with him. For he was no ſooner dead, but they opened both the gates of the temple of Ianus, which he ſo carefully had kept ſhut all his reigne, as if indeed he had kept in wars there, vnder lock and key, and they filled all ITALIE with murther and bloud: and this his godly, holy, & iuſt gouernment which his realme enioyed all his time, did not laſt long after, becauſe it had not the bond of education, and the diſcipline of children which ſhould maintaine it. Why, may a man ſay to me here: hath not ROME excelled ſtill, and preuailed more and more in chiualry? This queſtion requireth a long anſwer, and ſpecially vnto ſuch men as place felicity in riches, in poſſeſſions, and in the greatneſſe of empire, rather then in the quiet ſafety, peace, and concord of a commonweale, and in clemency and iuſtice, ioyned with contention. Neuertheleſſe, howſoeuer it was, that maketh for Lycurgus alſo, that the ROMAINES after they had changed the ſtate which they had of Numa, did ſo maruellouſly increaſe and grow mighty: and that the LACEDÆMONIANS to the contrary, ſo ſoone as they began to breake Lycurgus lawes, being of great authoritie and ſway, fell afterwards to be of ſmall account. So that hauing loſt the ſoueraignty and commandement ouer GREECE, they ſtood in great hazard alſo to be ouerthrowne for euer. But in troth it was ſome diuine thing in Numa, that he being a meere ſtranger, the ROMAINS did ſeeke him, to make him king, and that he could ſo change all, and rule a whole city as he liſted (not yet ioyned together) without need of any force or violence: as it was in Lycurgus, to be aſſiſted with the beſt of the city, in reſiſting the commons of LACEDÆMON, but he could neuer otherwiſe haue kept them in peace, and made them loue together, but by his onely wiſdome and iuſtice.

THE LIFE OF Solon.

DIDYMVS the Grammarian, in a little booke that he wrote, and dedicated vnto Aſclepiades, touching the tables of the lawes of Solon, alledgeth the words of one Philocles, in which he ſpeaketh againſt the common opinion of thoſe that haue written, that Solons father was called Euphorion. For all other writers agree, that he was the ſonne of Execeſtides, a man but reaſonably to liue, although otherwiſe he was of the nobleſt and moſt ancient houſe of the city of ATHENS. For of his fathers ſide, he was deſcended of King Codrus: and for his mother, Heraclides Ponticus writeth, ſhe was coſin germaine vnto Pyſiſtratus mother. For this cauſe euen from the beginning there was great friendſhip betweene them, partly for their kindred, and partly alſo for the courteſie and beauty of Pyſiſtratus, with whom it is reported Solon on a time was in loue. Afterwards they fortuned to fall at iarre one with the other, about matter of ſtate and gouernement: yet this ſquare bred no violent inconuenience betweene them, but they reſerued in their hearts ſtill their ancient amity, which continued the memory of their loue, as a great fire doth a burning flame. That Solon was no ſtayed man to withſtand beauty, nor any great doer to preuaile in loue, it is manifeſt to all, as well by other poeticall writings that he hath made, as by a law of his owne: wherein he did forbid bondmen to perfume themſelues, or to be louers of children. Who placed this law among honeſt matters, and commendable: as allowing it to the better ſort, and forbidding it to the baſeſt. They ſay alſo that Pyſiſtratus ſelfe was in loue with Charmus, and that he did ſet vp the little image of loue, which is in ACADEMIA, where they were wont to light the holy candle. But Solons father (as Hermippus writeth) hauing ſpent his goods in liberality and deeds of courteſie, though he might eaſily haue bene relieued at diuerſe mens hands with money, he was yet aſhamed to take any, becauſe he came of a houſe which was wont rather to giue and relieue others, then to take themſelues: ſo being yet a yong man, he deuiſed to trade merchandiſe. Howbeit other ſay, that Solon trauelled countries, rather to ſee the world, and to learne, then to trafficke, or gaine. For ſure he was very deſirous of knowledge, as appeareth manifeſtly: for that being now old, he commonly vſed to ſay this verſe:

Solons linage.

Great friendſhip betwixt Solon and Pyſiſtratus.

A ſtatute for bondmen.

Solon gaue himſelfe in youth to trade merchandiſe.

I grow old, learning ſtill.

Alſo he was not couetouſly bent, nor loued riches too much: for he ſaid in one place:

Who ſo hath goods, and gold inough at call,
Great heards of beaſts, and flockes in many a fold,
Both horſe and mule, yea ſtore of corne, and all
That may content each man aboue the mould:
No richer is, for all thoſe heapes and hoords,
Then he which hath, ſufficiently to feede,
And cloth his corpes, with ſuch as God afoords.
But if his ioy, and chiefe delight do breede,
For to behold the faire and heauenly face
Of ſome ſweete wife, which is adornd with grace,
Or elſe ſome child, of beauty faire and bright,
Then hath he cauſe (indeed) of deepe delight.

Solons iudgement of riches.

And in another place alſo he ſaith:

Indeed I do deſire, ſome wealth to haue at will:
But not vnleſſe the ſame be got, by faithfull dealing ſtill.
For ſure who ſo deſires by wickedneſſe to thriue:
Shall find that iuſtice from ſuch goods, will iuſtly him depriue.

Howbeit, as an honeſt man is not to buſie himſelfe ouermuch in ſcraping together of ſuperfluous and vnneceſſary goods; ſo nothing letteth but that he may haue a care to ſtore himſelfe with ſuch things as he ſhall haue need of.

In thoſe daies no ſtate was diſcommended, as ſaith Heſiodus, nor any art or ſcience made any difference betweene men: but merchandiſe they thought an honorable ſtate, as that which deliuered meanes to trafficke into ſtrange and farre countries, to get acquaintance with ſtates, to procure the loue of Princes, and chiefly to gather the experience of the world. So that there haue bene merchants, which heretofore haue bene founders of great cities: as he which built MARSILIA, after he had obtained the friendſhip of the GAVLES, dwelling by the riuer of Rhoſne. And they ſay alſo, that Thales Mileſius the wiſe did trafficke merchandiſe, and that Hippocrates the mathematike did eüen ſo: and likewiſe that Plato trauelling into ÆGYPT, did beare the whole charges of his iourney, with the gaines he made of the ſale of oyle he caried thither. They remember alſo that Solon learned to be lauiſh in expence, to fare delicately, and to ſpeake wantonly of pleaſures in his Poems, ſomwhat more licentiouſly then became the grauity of a Philoſopher: only becauſe he was brought vp in the trade of merchandiſe, wherein for that men are maruellous ſubiect to great loſſes and dangers, they ſeeke otherwhiles good cheere to driue theſe cares away, and liberty to make much of themſelues. Yet it appeareth by theſe verſes, that Solon accounted himſelfe rather in the number of the poore, then of the rich:

The commodities of merchãdiſe. A merchant builded Marſilia. Thales, Hippocrates, Plato, al merchãts

Rich men (oft times) in lewdeſt liues do range,
And often ſeene, that vertuous men be poore:
Yet would the good their goodneſſe neuer change
With lewd eſtate, although their wealth be more.
For vertue ſtands alwayes both firme and ſtable:
When riches roue, and ſeldome are durable.

Pouerty with vertue better then riches.

This poetry at the beginning he vſed but for pleaſure, and when he had leiſure, writing no matter of importance in his verſes. Afterwards he did ſet out many graue matters of philoſophy, and the moſt part of ſuch things as he had deuiſed before, in the gouernment of a commonweale, which he did not for hiſtory or memories ſake, but only of a pleaſure to diſcourſe: for he ſheweth the reaſons of that he did, and in ſome places he exhorteth, chideth, and reproueth the ATHENIANS. And ſome affirme alſo he went about to write his lawes and ordinances in verſe, and do recite his preface, which was this:

How Solon vſed his poetry.

Vouchſafe ô mighty Ioue, of heauen and earth high King:
To grant good fortune to my lawes, and heaſts in euery thing.
And that their glory grow, in ſuch triumphant wiſe,
As may remaine in fame for aye, which liues and neuer dyes.

He chiefly delighted in morall philoſophy, which treated of gouernement and commonweales: as the moſt part of the wiſe men did of thoſe times. But for naturall philoſophy, he was very groſſe and ſimple, as appeareth by theſe verſes:

Solon delighted in morall but not in naturall philoſophy.

The

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the ſeuen wiſe men of GREECE, who ſearched further the contemplation of things in common vſe among men, than he. For ſetting him apart, all the others got the name of wiſedome, onely for their vnderſtanding in matters of ſtate and gouernement. It is reported that they met on a day all ſeuen together in the city of DELPHES, and another time in the city of CORINTH, where Periander got them together at a feaſt that he made to the other ſixe. But that which moſt increaſed their glory, and made their fame moſt ſpoken of, was the ſending backe againe of the three footed ſtoole when they all had refuſed it, and turned it ouer one to another with great humanitie. For the tale is, how certaine fiſher-men of the Ile of Co, caſt their nets into the ſea, and certaine ſtrangers paſſing by, that came from the city of MILETVM, did buy their draught of fiſh at aduenture, before the net was drawne. And when they drew it vp, there came vp in the net a three footed ſtoole of maſſie gold, which men ſay, Hellen (as ſhe did returne from TROY) had throwne in that place, in memorie of an ancient Oracle ſhe called then vnto her mind. Thereupon the ſtrangers and fiſher-men firſt fell at ſtrife about this three footed ſtoole, who ſhould haue it: but afterwards the two cities tooke part of both ſides, on their citizens behalfe. In ſo much as wars had like to haue followed betweene them, had not the propheteſſe Pythia giuen a like Oracle vnto them both: That they ſhould giue this three footed ſtoole vnto the wiſeſt man. Whereupon the men of Co, ſent it firſt to Thales in the city of MILETVM, as being willing to grant that vnto a priuate perſon, for which they had made warres with all the MILESIANS before. Thales ſaid, hee thought Bias a wiſer man then himſelfe: and ſo it was ſent vnto him. He likewiſe ſent it againe vnto another, as a wiſer man. And that other, ſent it alſo vnto another. So that being thus poſted from man to man, and through diuerſe hands, in the end it was brought backe againe vnto the city of MILETVM, and deliuered into the hands of Thales the ſecond time: and laſt of all was caried vnto THEBES, and offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo Iſmenian. Howbeit Theophraſtus writeth, that firſt it was ſent to the city of PRIENA, vnto Bias: and then vnto Thales, in the city of MILETVM, by Bias conſent. And after that it had paſſed through all their hands, it was brought againe vnto Bias: and laſtly it was ſent to the city of DELPHES. And thus much haue the beſt and moſt ancient writers written: ſauing that ſome ſay in ſtead of a three footed ſtoole, it was a cup that King Cræſus ſent vnto the city of DELPHES. Other ſay, it was a peece of plate which Bathycles left there. They made mentiō alſo of another priuate meeting betwixt Anacharſis and Solon, and of another betweene him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talke. Anacharſis being ariued at ATHENS, went to knock at Solons gate, ſaying that he was a ſtranger which came of purpoſe to ſee him, and to deſire his acquaintance and friendſhip. Solon anſwered him, that it was better to ſeeke friendſhip in his owne countrey. Anacharſis replied againe: Thou then that art at home, and in thine owne countrey, begin to ſhew me friendſhip. Then Solon wondering at his bold ready wit, entertained him very courteouſly, & kept him a certaine time in his houſe, & made him very good cheere, at the ſelfe ſame time wherin he was moſt buſie in gouerning the common-weale, and making lawes for the ſtate thereof. Which when Anacharſis vnderſtood, he laughed at it: to ſee that Solon imagined with written lawes, to bridle mens couetouſneſſe and iniuſtice. For ſuch lawes, ſaid he, do rightly reſemble the ſpiders cobwebs: becauſe they take hold of litle flyes and gnats which fall into them, but the rich and mighty will breake and runne through them at their will. Solon anſwered him, that men do iuſtly keepe all couenants and bargaines which one make with another, becauſe it is to the hinderance of either partie to breake them: and euen ſo, he did ſo temper his lawes, that he made his citizens know, it was more for their profit to obey law and iuſtice, then to breake it. Neuertheleſſe afterwards, matters proued rather according to Anacharſis compariſon, then agreeable to the hope that Solon had conceiued. Anacharſis being by hap one day in a common aſſembly of the people at ATHENS, ſaid that he marueiled much, why in the consultations and meetings of the GRECIANS wise men propounded matters, and fooles did decide them. It is said moreouer, that Solon was somtime in the city of MILETVM at Thales house, where he said that he could not but maruell at Thales, that he would neuer marry to haue children. Thales gaue him neuer a word at that present: but within few dayes after he suborned a stranger, which said that he came but newly home from ATHENS, departing from thence but ten dayes before. Solon asked him immediatly, What newes there? This stranger whom Thales had schooled before, answered: None other there, sauing that they caried a young man to buriall, whom all the city followed: for that he was one of the greatest mens sonnes of the city, and the honestest man withall, who at that present was out of the countrey, and had bene a long time (as they said) abroad. O poore vnfortunate father, then said Solon: and what was his name? I haue heard him named, said the stranger, but I haue forgotten him now: sauing that they all said, he was a worthy wise man. So Solon still trembling more and more for feare, at euery answer of this stranger: in the end he could hold no longer, being full of trouble, but told his name himselfe vnto the stranger, and asked him againe, if he were not the sonne of Solon which was buried. The very same, said the stranger. Solon with that like a madde man straight began to beate his head, and to say, and do, like men impatient in affliction, and ouercome with sorrow. But Thales laughing to see this pageant, staid him, and said: Lo, Solon, this is it that keepeth me from marying, and getting of children: which is of such a violence, that thou seest it hath now ouercome thee, although otherwise thou art strong, and able to wrestle with any. Howbeit for any thing he hath said vnto thee, be of good cheere man, for it is but a tale, and nothing so. Hermippus writeth, that Patæcus (he which said he had Æsops soule) reciteth this story thus. Neuertheless it lacketh iudgement, and the courage of a man also, to be affraid to get things necessary, fearing the losse of them: for by this reckoning he should neither esteeme honor, goods, nor knowledge when he hath them, for feare to lose them. For we see that vertue it selfe, which is the greatest and sweetest riches a man can haue, decayeth oft times through sicknesse, or else by physick and potions. Furthermore Thales self, although he was not maried, was not therefore free from this feare, vnlesse he would confesse that he neither loued friends, kinsmen, nor country: howbeit Thales had an adopted son, called Cybistus, which was his sisters son. For our soule hauing in it a naturall inclination to loue, & being borne as well to loue, as to feel, to reason, or vnderstand, and to remember: hauing nothing of her owne whereupon she might bestow that naturall loue, borroweth of other. As where there is a house of inheritance without lawfull heires, many times strangers, and base borne children, do creepe into the kind affection of the owner, and when they haue once won and possessed his loue, they make him euer after to be kind and tender ouer them. So that ye shall see many times men of such a hard and rough nature, that they like not of them that moue them to marry, and get lawfull children: and yet afterwards are ready to die for feare and sorrow, when they see their bastards (that they haue gotten of their slaues or concubines) fall sicke or die, and doe vtter words far vnmeet for men of noble courage. And some such there be, that for the death of a dog, or their horse, are so out of heart & take such thought, that they are ready to go into the ground, they look so pitifully. Other some are cleane contrary, who though they haue lost their children, forgone their friends, or some gentleman deare vnto them, yet no sorrowfull word hath come from them, neither haue they done any vnseemely thing: but haue passed the rest of their life likewise, constant and vertuous men. For it is not loue but weaknes, which breedeth these extreme sorrowes, & exceeding feare, in men that are not exercised, nor acquainted to fight against fortune with reason. And this is the cause that plucketh from them the pleasure of that they loue & desire, by reason of the cõtinuall trouble, feare & griefe they feele, by thinking how in time they may be depriued of it. Now we must not arme our selues with pouerty, against the griefe of losse of goods: neither with lacke of affection, against the losse of our friends: neither with want of mariage, against the death of children: but we must be armed with reason against misfortunes. Thus haue we sufficiently enlarged this matter. The ATHENIANS hauing now sustained a long and troublesome warre against the MEGARIANS, for the possession of the Ile of SALAMINA, were in the end weary of it, and made proclamation, straightly commanding vpon paine of death, that no man should presume to prefer any more to the councell of the city, the title or question of the possession of the Ile of SALAMINA. Solon could not beare this open shame, & seeing the most part of the lustiest youths desirous still of warre, though their tongues were tied for feare of the proclamation, he fained himselfe himselfe to be out of his wits, and caused it to be giuen out that Solon was become a foole: and secretly he had made certaine lamentable verses, which he had cunned without booke, to sing abroad the city. So one day he ranne suddenly out of his house with a garland on his head, and got him to the market place, where the people straight swarmed like Bees about him: and getting him vpon the stone where all proclamations are vsually made, out he singeth these Elegies he had made, which began after this sort:

Solon faigned madnes to recouer Salamina.

Here present my selfe (an Herald) in this case,
Which come from Salamina land, that noble worthy place.
My mind in pelting prose shall neuer be expresst,
But sung in verse Heroicall, for so I thinke it best.

Solons Elegies of the Salaminiās

This Elegie is intituled SALAMINA, and containeth an hundred verses, which are excellently well written. And these being openly sung by Solon at that time, his friends incontinently praised them beyond measure, and specially Pysistratus: and they went about perswading the people that were present, to credit that he spake. Hereupon the matter was so handled amongst them, that by and by the proclamation was reuoked, and they began to follow the wars with greater fury then before, appointing Solon to be Generall in the same. But the common tale & report is, that he went by sea with Pysistratus vnto the temple of Venus, surnamed Coliade: where he found all the women at a solemne feast and sacrifice, which they made of custome to the goddesse. He taking occasion thereby, sent from thence a trustie man of his owne vnto the MEGARIANS, which then had SALAMINA: whom he instructed to faine himselfe a reuolted traitour, and that he came of purpose to tel them, that if they would but go with him, they might take al the chiefe ladies and gentlewomen of ATHENS on a sudden. The MEGARIANS easily beleeued him, and shipped forthwith certaine souldiers to goe with him. But when Solon perceiued the ship vnder saile coming from SALAMINA, he commanded the women to depart, and in stead of them he put lusty beardlesse springals into their apparell, & gaue them litle short daggers to conuey vnder their cloakes, commanding them to play and dance together vpon the sea side, vntill their enemies were landed, and their ship at anker; and so it came to passe. For the MEGARIANS being deceiued by that they saw afarre off, assoone as euer they came to the shore side, did land in heapes, one in anothers necke, euen for greedinesse, to take these women: but not a man of them escaped, for they were slaine euery mothers son. This stratageme being finely handled, and to good effect, the ATHENIANS tooke sea straight, and coasted ouer to the Isle of SALAMINA: which they tooke vpon the sudden, and wanne it without much resistance. Other say that it was not taken after this sort: but that Apollo Delphicus gaue Solon first such an Oracle:

Of the temple of Venus Coliad. Strab. lib. 4. & Pausan of the Athenians.

Solons stratageme.

Solon wan Salamina.

Thou shalt first winne by vowes and sacrifice,
The helpe of Lords and demy gods full bright:
Of whose dead bones, the dust engraued lyes,
In weste ne soyle, Asopia that hight.

By order of this oracle, he one night passed ouer to SALAMINA, and did sacrifice to Periphemus, and to Cichris, demy-gods of the country. Which done, the ATHENIANS deliuered him fiue hundred men, who willingly offered themselues: and the city made an accord with them, that if they tooke the Isle of SALAMINA, they should beare greatest authority in the commonweale. Solon imbarked his souldiers into diuers fisher boats, & appointed a galliot of thirty owers to come after him, & he ankered hard by the city of SALAMINA, vnder the point which looketh towards the Isle of NEGREPONT. The MEGARIANS which were within SALAMINA, hauing by chance heard some inkling of it, but yet knew nothing of certainty, ran presently in hurly burly to arme them, and manned out a ship to descry what it was. But they fondly coming within danger, were taken by Solon, who clapped the MEGARIANS vnder hatches fast bound, & in their roomes put aboord in their ship the choisest souldiers he had of the ATHENIANS, commanding them to set their course direct vpon the citie, and to keepe themselues as close out of sight as could be. And he himselfe with all the rest of his souldiers landed presently, and marched to encounter with the MEGARIANS, which were come out into the field. Now whilst they were fighting together, Solons men whom he had sent in the MEGARIANS ship, entred the hauen and wan the towne. This is certainely true, and testified by that which is shewed yet at this day. For to keepe a memoriall hereof, a ship of ATHENS arriueth quietly at the first, and by and by those that are in the ship make a great shout, and a man armed leaping out of the ship, runneth ſhowting towards the rocke called Sciradion, which is as they come from the firme land: and hard by the ſame is the temple of Mars, which Solon built there after he had ouercome the MEGARIANS in battell, from whence he ſent back againe thoſe priſoners that he had taken (which were ſaued from the ſlaughter of the battel) without any ranſome paying. Neuertheles, the MEGARIANS were ſharpely bent ſtill to recouer SALAMINA againe. Much hurt being done and ſuffered on both ſides: both parts in the end made the LACEDÆMONIANS iudges of the quarrell. But vpon iudgement giuen, common report is, that Homers authority did Solon good ſeruice, becauſe he did adde theſe verſes to the number of ſhips, which are in the Iliads of Homer, which he rehearſed before the Iudges, as if they had bene indeed written by Homer:

Aiax that champion ſtout, did leade with him in charge, Twelue ſhips from Salamina ſoyle, which he had left at large,
And euen thoſe ſelfe ſame ſhips, in battell did he caſt,
And place in order for to fight, with enemies force at laſt,
In that ſame very place, whereas it ſeemed then,
The captaines which from Athens came, imbatteld had their men.

Howbeit the ATHENIANS ſelues thinke, it was but a tale of pleaſure: and ſay that Solon made it appeare to the iudges, that Philæus, and Euryſaces (both Aiax ſons) were made free denizens of ATHENS. Wherupon they gaue the Iſle of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, & one of them came to dwell in a place called Brauron, in the country of ATTICA: and the other in a town called MILETVM. And for due proofe thereof, they ſay there is yet a certaine canton or quarter of the country of ATTICA, which is called the canton of the Philaides, after the name of this Philæus, where Pyſiſtratus was borne. And it is ſaid moreouer, that Solon (becauſe he would throughly conuince the MEGARIANS) did alledge that the SALAMINIANS buried not the dead after the MEGARIANS maner, but after the ATHENIANS maner. For in MEGARA they bury the dead with their faces to the Eaſt: and in ATHENS their faces are towards the Weſt. Yet Hereas the Megarian denyeth it ſaying, that the MEGARIANS did bury them alſo with their faces towards the Weſt: alledging moreouer, that at ATHENS euery corſe had his owne beere or coffin by it ſelf, & that at MEGARA they did put three or foure corſes together. They ſay alſo there were certaine oracles of Apollo Pythias, which did greatly help Solon by which the god called SALAMINA, IONIA. Their ſtrife was iudged by fiue Arbitrators, all SPARTANS borne: that is to ſay, Critolaidas, Amompharetus, Hypſechidas, Anaxilas, and Cleomenes. Solon vndoubtedly won great glory and honor by this exploit, yet was he much more honored and eſteemed, for the oration he made in defence of the temple of Apollo, in the city of DELPHES: declaring that it was not meete to be ſuffered, that the CYRRHÆIANS, ſhould at their pleaſure abuſe the ſanctuary of the Oracle, and that they ſhould ayde the DELPHIANS in honour and reuerence of Apollo. Whereupon the councell of the Amphictyons, being moued with his words and perſwaſions, proclaimed warres againſt the CYRRHÆIANS, as diuers others do witneſſe, and eſpecially Ariſtotle, in the ſtorie he wrote of thoſe that wan the Pythian games, where he aſcribeth vnto Solon the honour of that determination. Neuertheleſſe Hermippus ſaith, Solon was not made Generall of their armie, as Euanthes Samian hath written. For Æſchines the Orator wrote no ſuch thing of him: and in the Chronicles of the DELPHIANS they find, that one Alcmaon, and not Solon, was the Generall of the ATHENIANS. Now the city of ATHENS had a long time bene vexed and troubled through Cylons hainous offence, euer ſince the yeare that Megacles (gouernor of the city of ATHENS) did with faire words handle ſo the confederats of the rebellion of Cylon, which had taken ſanctuary within the libertie, of the temple of Minerua: that he perſwaded them to be wiſe, and to preſent themſelues before the Iudges, holding by a threed, which they ſhould tye about the baſe of the image of the goddeſſe where ſhe ſtood, becauſe they ſhould not loſe their liberty. But when they were come to the place of the honourable goddeſſes ſo called, (which be the images of the Furies) coming down to preſent themſelues before ŷ Iudges, the threed brake of it ſelf. Then Megacles, & other officers his companions, laid hold on them preſently, ſaying, that it was a manifeſt ſigne that the goddeſſe Minerua refuſed to ſaue them. So thoſe they took, and all they could lay hands on were immediatly ſtoned to death without the city: the reſt which took the altars of refuge, were ſlain there alſo. And none were ſaued, but ſuch as had made meanes to the gouernours wiues of the city, to intreate for them: which from that time forth were euer hated of the people, & cõmonly called the abiects and excommunicates. Who being the iſſues of the rebels that roſe with Cylon, chanced chãced to riſe againe in credit,& growing to great authority,they neuer left quarrelling & fighting continually with the of-ſpring of Megacles.Theſe factions were greateſt & higheſt in Solons time: who being of authority,and ſeeing the people thus deuided in two parts,he ſtepped in betweene them,with the chiefeſt men of ATHENS,& did ſo perſwade & intreat thoſe whom they called the abiects and excommunicates,that they were contented to be iudged. So 300.of the chiefeſt citizens were choſen iudges to heare this matter.The accuſer was Myron Phlyeian.This matter was heard and pleaded,& by ſentence of the iudges,the excommunicates were condemned.Thoſe that were aliue,to perpetual exile:& the bones of thẽ that were dead,to be digged vp, & throwne out of the confines of the territory of ATHENS.But whilſt the city of ATHENS was occupied with theſe vpróres,the MEGARIANS wiſely caught hold of the occaſion deliuered,& ſet vpon the ATHENIANS, took from them the hauen of NISÆA,and recouered againe out of their hands the Ile of SALAMINA.Furthermore,all the city was poſſeſſed with a certaine ſuperſtitious feare: for ſome ſaid, that ſpirits were come againe, and ſtrange ſights were ſeene. The prognoſticators alſo ſaid,they perceiued by their ſacrifices the city was defiled with ſome abominable and wicked things,which were of neceſſity to be purged and throwne out. Hereupon they ſent into CRETA for Epimenides Phæſtian,whom they reckned the ſeuenth of the wiſe men, at the leaſt ſuch as will not allow Periander for one of the number. He was a holy and deuout man,and very wiſe in celeſtiall things,by inſpiration from aboue:by reaſon whereof,men of his time called him the new Curetes,that is to ſay,Prophet: & he was thought the ſon of a Nymph called Balte. When he was come to ATHENS, and growne in friendſhip with Solon,he did helpe him much, and made his way for eſtabliſhing of his lawes. For he acquainted the ATHENIANS to make their ſacrifices much lighter,and of leſſe coſt:and brought the citizens to be more moderate in their mourning, with cutting off certaine ſeuere and barbarous ceremonies,which the moſt part of women obſerued in their mourning: and he ordained certaine ſacrifices which he would haue done immediatly after the obſequies of the dead. But that which exceeded all the reſt,was,that by vſing the citizens vnto holineſſe and deuotion,daily ſacrifices,prayers vnto the gods,purging of themſelues, and humble offerings: he wan mens hearts by litle and litle, to yeeld them more conformable to iuſtice,and to be more inclined to concord and vnity.It is reported alſo that Epimenides when he ſaw the hauen of Munychia, and had long conſidered of it: told thoſe about him,that men were very blind in foreſeeing things to come. For if the ATHENIANS (ſaid he) knew what hurt this hauen would bring them,they would eate it (as they ſay) with their teeth.It is ſaid alſo that Thales did prognoſticate ſuch a like thing,who after his death commanded they ſhould bury his body in ſome vile place of no reckening,within the territory of the MILESIANS, ſaying,that one day there ſhould be the place of a city. Epimenides therfore being maruellouſly eſteemed of euery man for theſe cauſes,was greatly honored of the ATHENIANS,& they offered him great preſents of mony and other things,but he would take nothing, and only prayed them to giue him a bough of the holy oliue:which they granted him,and ſo he returned ſhortly home into CRETA.Now that this ſedition of Cylon was vtterly appeaſed in ATHENS, for that the excommunicates were baniſhed the country, the city fell againe into their old troubles & diſſentions about the gouernment of the common-weale:and they were deuided into ſo diuers parts and factions,as there were people of ſundry places and territories within the country of ATTICA. For there were the people of the mountaines,the people of the vallies,and the people of the ſea coaſt. Thoſe of the mountaines,tooke the common peoples part for their liues. Thoſe of the valley,would a few of the beſt citizens ſhould cary the ſway.The coaſt-men would that neither of them ſhould preuaile,becauſe they would haue had a mean gouernment & mingled of them both.Furthermore,the faction betweene the poore & rich,proceeding of their vnequality,was at that time very great. By reaſon whereof the city was in great danger, and it ſeemed there was no way to pacifie or take vp theſe cõtrouerſies,vnleſſe ſome tyrant hapned to riſe,that would take vpon him to rule the whole.For al the common people were ſo ſore indebted to the rich,that either they plowed their lands,and yeelded them the ſixt part of their crop: (for which cauſe they were called Hectemorij and ſeruants) or elſe they borrowed mony of them at vſurie,vpon gage of their bodies to ſerue it out.And if they were not able to pay thẽ,thẽ were they by the law deliuered to their creditors,who kept thẽ as bondmen & ſlaues in their houſes, or elſe they ſent them into ſtrange countries to be ſold:& many euen for very pouerty were forced to ſel their own childrẽ(for there was no law to forbid the contrary) or els to forſake their city and country, for the extreme cruelty and hard dealing of these abominable vserers their creditors. Insomuch that many of the lustiest and stoutest of them, banded together in companies, & incouraged one another, not to suffer and beare any longer such extremity, but to chuse them a stout and trusty captaine, that might set them at liberty, and redeeme those out of captiuitie, which were iudged to be bondmen & seruants, for lack of paying of their dets at their daies appointed: and so to make againe a new diuision of all lands and tenements, and wholly to change and turne vp the whole state and gouernment. Then the wisest men of the citie, who saw Solon only neither partner with the rich in their oppression, neither partaker with the poore in their necessity, made suite to him, that it would please him to take the matter in hand, and to appease & pacifie all these broiles and sedition. Yet Phanias Lesbian writeth, that he vsed a subtilty, whereby he deceiued both the one and the other side, concerning the common-weale. For he secretly promised the poore to deuide the lands againe: and the rich also, to confirme their couenants & bargaines. Howsoeuer it fell out, it is very certaine that Solon from the beginning made it a great matter, and was very scrupulous to deale betweene them: fearing the couetousnesse of the one, and arrogancie of the other. Howbeit in the end he was chosen gouernor after Philōbrotus, and was made reformer of the rigour of the lawes, and the temperer of the state & common-weale, by consent and agreement of both parties. The rich accepted him, because he was no begger: the poore did also like him, because he was an honest man. They say more ouer, that one word and sentence which he spake, (which at that present was rife in euery mans mouth) that equality did breed no strife, did aswell please the rich and wealthy, as the poore and needie. For the one sort conceiued of this word equality, that he would measure all things according to the quality of the man: and the other tooke it for their purpose, that hee would measure all things by the number, and by the polle only. Thus the captains of both factions perswaded and prayed him, boldly to take vpon him that soueraigne authority, sithens he had the whole city now at his commandement. The neuters also of euery part, when they saw it very hard to pacifie these things with law and reason, were well content that the wisest, and honestest man, should alone haue the royall power in his hands. Some say also that there was such an oracle of Apollo:

Solons equitie and vprightnes.

Solon by subtilte set order betwixt the poore and rich.

Solon chosen reformer of the law, and chiefe gouernour.

Sit thou at helme, as gouernour to steere,
To guide our course, and rule the rowling ship:
For thou shalt see, full many Athenians there,
Will take thy part, and after thee will trip.

But his familiar friends aboue all rebuked him, saying he was to be accompted no better then a beast, if for feare of the name of tyrant, he would refuse to take vpon him a Kingdome: which is the most iust and honorable state, if one take it vpon him that is an honest man. As in old time, Tennondas made himselfe King of those of NEGREPONT, with their consent: and as Pittacus was then presently of those of METELIN. Notwithstanding, all these goodly reasons could not make him once alter his opinion. And they say that hee answered his friends, that principalitie and tyranny, was indeed a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, when he was once entred into it. And in certaine verses that he wrote to Phocus, thus hee said:

Solon refuseth to be a tyrant Tynnondas, & Pittacus tyrants.

Solons answer for tyranny.

I neither blush, nor yet repent my selfe,
That haue preseru'd my natiue soyle alwaies,
And that therein (to hoord vp trash and pelfe)
No tyrants thought could once eclipse my praise.
No might could mone my mind to any wrong,
Which might beblot the glory of my name:
For so I thought, to liue in honour long,
And farre excell all other men of fame.

Hereby appeareth plainely, that euen before he was chosen reformer of the state, to stablish new lawes, he was then of great countenance and authority. But he himselfe writeth, that many said of him thus, after he had refused the occasion of vsurping of this tyrannie:

Sure Solon was a foole, and of a bashfull mind,
That would refuse the great good hap, which gods to him assignd.
The prey was in his hands, yet durst he neuer draw
The net therefore: but stood abasht, and like a dastard daw.

For

For had not that ſo bene, he would (for one daies reigne,
To be a king in Athens towne) himſelfe (all quicke) haue ſlaine.
And eke ſubuerted quite, his familie withall,
So ſweete it is to rule the roſt, yclad in princely pall.

Thus brought he common rumor to taber on his head. Now, notwithſtanding he had refuſed the kingdome, yet he waxed nothing the more remiſſe nor ſoft therefore in gouerning, neither would he bow for feare of the great, nor yet would frame his lawes to their liking that had choſen him their reformer. For where the miſchiefe was tollerable, he did not ſtraight pluck it vp by the rootes: neither did he ſo change the ſtate, as he might haue done, leſt if he ſhould haue attempted to turne vpſide downe the whole gouernment, he might afterwards haue bene neuer able to ſettle & ſtabliſh the ſame again. Therfore he only altred that, which he thought by reaſon he would perſwade his citizens vnto, or elſe by force he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he ſaid, ſoure with ſweete, and force with iuſtice. And herewith agreeth his anſwer that he made afterwards vnto one that asked him, if he had made the beſt lawes he could for the ATHENIANS? Yea ſure, ſaith he, ſuch as they were to conceiue. And this that followeth alſo, they haue euer ſince obſerued in the Athenian tong: to make certaine things pleaſant, that be hateful, finely conueying them vnder colour of pleaſing names. As calling whores, lemans: taxes, contributions: garriſons, guards: priſons, houſes. And all this came vp firſt by Solons inuention, who called clearing of debts, Seiſachtheian: in Engliſh, diſcharge. For the firſt change and reformation he made in gouernment was this: he ordained that all manner of debts paſt ſhould be cleare, and no body ſhould aske his debtour any thing for the time paſt. That no man ſhould thenceforth lend money out to vſurie, vpon couenants for the body to be bound, if it were not repayed. Howbeit ſome write (as Androtion among other) that the poore were contented that the intereſt onely for vſurie ſhould be moderated, without taking away the whole debt: and that Solon called this eaſie and gentle diſcharge, Seiſachtheian, with crying vp the value of money. For he raiſed the pound of ſiluer, being before but threeſcore and thirteene Drachmes, full vp to an hundred: ſo they which were to pay great ſums of mony, payed by tale as much as they ought, but with leſſe number of peeces then the debt could haue bene payed whē it was borowed. And ſo the detters gained much, and the creditors loſt nothing. Neuertheleſſe the greater part of them which haue written the ſame, ſay, that this crying vp of mony, was a general diſcharge of al debts, conditiōs and couenants vpon the ſame: whereto the very poems themſelues, which Solon wrote, do ſeeme to agree. For he glorieth, and breaketh forth in his verſes, that he had taken away all bawkes and marks that ſeparated mens lands through the country of ATTICA: and that now he had ſet at liberty, that which before was in bondage. And that of the citizens of ATHENS, which for lacke of paiment of their debts had bene condemned for ſlaues to their creditors, he had brought many home againe out of ſtrange countries, where they had bene ſo long, that they had forgotten to ſpeake their naturall tongue: and other which remained at home in captiuity, he had now ſet them all at good liberty. But while he was in doing this, men ſay a thing thwarted him, that troubled him maruellouſly. For hauing framed an Edict for clearing al dets, and lacking only a litle to grace it with words, & to giue it ſome pretie preface, that otherwiſe was readie to be proclaimed: he opened himſelf ſomewhat to certaine of his familiars whom he truſted (as Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus) and told them how he would not meddle with lands and poſſeſſions, but would only cleare and cut off all maner of debts. Theſe men before the proclamation came out, went preſently to the money-men, and borowed great ſums of mony of them, and laid it out ſtraight vpon land. So when the proclamation came out, they kept the lands they had purchaſed, but reſtored not the mony they had borrowed. This foule part of theirs made Solon very il ſpoken of, & wrongfully blamed: as if he had not only ſuffered it, but had bene partaker of this wrong and iniuſtice. Notwithſtanding he cleared himſelf of this ſlanderous report, loſing fiue talents by his owne law. For it was well knowne that ſo much was due vnto him, and he was the firſt that following his own proclamation, did clearely releaſe his debtours of the ſame. Other ſay he was owing fifteene talents, and among the ſame, Polyzelus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it. Notwithſtanding they euer after called Solons friends, Greocopides, cutters of debts. This law neither liked the one nor the other ſort. For it greatly offended the rich for cancelling their bonds: and it much more miſliked the poore, becauſe all lands and poſſeſſions they gaped for, were not made againe common, and euery body alike rich and wealthie, as Lycurgus had made the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleuenth deſcended of the right line from Hercules, and had many yeares bene King of LACEDÆMON, where he had gotten great authority, and made himſelfe many friends: all which things together, did greatly helpe him to execute that, which he wiſely had imagined for the order of the Common weale. Yet alſo, he vſed more perſwaſion then force, a good witneſſe thereof the loſſe of his eye: preferring a law before his priuate iniurie, which hath power to preſerue a citie long in vnion and concord, and to make citizens to be neither poore nor rich. Solon could not attaine to this, for he was borne in a popular ſtate, and a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did what he could poſſible, with the power he had, as one ſeeking to winne no credit with his citizens, but onely by his counſell. Now, that he got the ill will of the greater part of the city, by his proclamation which he made, he himſelf doth witneſſe it ſaying:

Euen thoſe which earſt, did beare mee friendly face,
And ſpake full faire, where euer I them met:
Gan now beginne, to looke full grim of grace,
And were (like foes) in force againſt me ſet.
As if I had done them ſome ſpite or ſcorne,
Or open wrong, which were not to be borne.

Neuertheleſſe he ſaith immediatly after, that with the ſame authority and power he had, a man poſſibly

Could not controll the peoples minds:
Nor ſtill their braines, which wrought like winds.

But ſhortly after, hauing a feeling of the benefit of his ordinance, and euery one forgetting his priuate quarrel: they altogether made a common ſacrifice, which they called the ſacrifice of Seiſachtheia, or diſcharge, and choſe Solon generall reformer of the law, and of the whole ſtate of the common-weale, without limiting his power, but referred all matters indifferently to his will: as the office of ſtate, common aſſemblies, voices in election, iudgements in iuſtice, and the body of the Senate. And they gaue him alſo full power and authority, to ſeiſe & taxe any of them, to appoint the number, what time the ſeſſe ſhould continue, and to keepe, confirme, and diſanull at his pleaſure, any of the ancient lawes & cuſtomes then in being. To begin withal, he firſt took away all Dracons bloudy lawes, ſauing for murther, & manſlaughter, which were too ſeuere & cruell. For almoſt he did ordaine but one kind of puniſhment for all kind of faults and offences, which was death. So that they which were condemned for idleneſſe, were iudged to dye. And pety larcenie, as robbing mēs hortyards & gardens of fruit, or herbes, was as ſeuerely puniſhed, as thoſe who had committed ſacriledge or murder. Demades therefore encountred it pleaſantly, when he ſaid: that Dracons lawes were not written with inke, but with bloud. And Draco himſelfe being asked one day, why his puniſhments were ſo vnequall, as death for all kinds of faults, he anſwered: Becauſe he thought the leaſt offence worthy ſo much puniſhment: and for the greateſt, he found none more grieuous. Then Solon being deſirous to haue the chiefe offices of the city to remaine in rich mens hands, as already they did, and yet to mingle the authority of gouernment in ſuch ſort, as the meaner people might beare a little ſway, which they neuer could before: he made an eſtimate of the goods of euery priuate citizen. And thoſe which he found yearly worth 500. buſhels of corne, & other liquid fruits and vpwards, he called Pentacoſiomedimnes: as to ſay, fiue hundred buſhell men of reuenue. And thoſe that had 300. buſhels a yeare, and were able to keep a horſe of ſeruice, he put in the ſecond degree, & called them knights. They that might diſpend but two hundred buſhels a yeare, were put in the third place, and called Zeugites. All other vnder thoſe, were called Thetes, as ye would ſay, hirelings, or crafts mē liuing of their labor: whō he did not admit to beare any office in the city, neither were they taken as free citizens, ſauing they had voices in elections, and aſſemblies of the city, & in iudgements, where the people wholy iudged. This at the firſt ſeemed nothing, but afterwards they felt it was to great purpoſe, for hereby the moſt part of priuate quarrels and ſtrife that grew among them, were in the end laid open before the people. For he ſuffered thoſe to appeale vnto the people, which thought they had wrong iudgement in their cauſes. Furthermore becauſe his laws were written ſomwhat obſcurely, & might be diuerſly taken & interpreted, this did giue a great deale more authority and power to the Iudges. For, conſidering all their controuerſies could not be ended and iudged by expreſſe law, they were driuen of neceſſity alwaies to run to the Iudges, and debated their matters ters before them. In ſo much as the Iudges by this meanes came to be ſomewhat aboue the law: for they did euen expound it as they would themſelues. Solon ſelfe doth note this equall diuiſion of the publike authority, in a place of his poeſies, were he ſayth:

Such power haue I giuen, to common peoples hand,
As might become their meane eſtate, with equitie to ſtand:
And as I haue not pluckt, from them their dignitie,
So haue I not too much increaſ'd their ſmall authoritie.
Vnto the rich likewiſe, I haue allowed no more,
Then well might ſeeme (in iuſt conceite) ſufficient for their ſtore.
And ſo I haue for both prouided in ſuch wiſe,
That neither ſhall each other wrong, nor ſeeme for to deſpiſe.

Yet conſidering it was meete to prouide for the pouertie of the common ſort of people, hee ſuffered any man that would, to take vpon him the defence of any poore mans caſe that had the wrong. For if a man were hurt, beaten, forced, or otherwiſe wronged, any other man that would might lawfully ſue the offendor, & proſecute law againſt him. And this was a wiſe law ordained of him, to cuſtome his citizens to be ſorie for anothers hurt, and ſo to feele it, as if any part of his owne body had bene iniured. And they ſay he made an anſwer on a time agreeable to this law. For, being asked what citie he thought beſt gouerned, he anſwered: That citie where ſuch as receiue no wrong, do as earneſtly defend wrong offered to other, as the very wrong and iniury had bene done vnto themſelues. He erected alſo the councell of the Areopagites, of thoſe magiſtrates of the city, out of which they did yearely chuſe their gouernour: and he himſelf had bene of that number, for that he had bene gouernor for a yeare. Wherefore perceiuing now the people were growne to a ſtomack & haughtines of mind becauſe they were cleare diſcharged of their debts, he ſet vp for matters of ſtate, another Councel of an hundred, choſen out of euery tribe, whereof foure hundred of them were to cõſult and debate of all matters, before they were propounded to the people: that when the great Councell of the people at large ſhould be aſſembled, no matter ſhould be put forth, vnles it had bene before well conſidered of, & digeſted, by the councell of the foure hundred. Moreouer, he ordained the higher court ſhould haue the chiefe authority and power ouer al things, and chiefly to ſee the law executed and maintained: ſuppoſing that the common weale being ſetled, & ſtaied with theſe two courts (as with two ſtrong anker holds) it ſhould be the leſſe turmoiled and troubled, and the people alſo better pacified & quieted. The moſt part of writers hold this opinion, that it was Solon which erected the councell of the Areopagites, as we haue ſaid, and it is very likely to be true, for that Dracon in al his lawes and ordinances made no manner of mention of the Areopagites, but alwaies ſpeaketh to the Ephetes (which were Iudges of life and death) when he ſpake of murther, or of any mans death. Notwithſtanding, the eight law of the thirteenth table of Solon ſaith thus, in theſe very words: All ſuch as haue bene baniſhed or detected of naughtie life, before Solon made his lawes, ſhal be reſtored againe to their goods and good name, except thoſe which were condemned by order of the councel of the Areopagites, or by the Ephetes, or by the Kings in open court, for murther, and death of any man, or for aſpiring to vſurp tyrannie. Theſe words to the contrary ſeeme to proue & teſtifie, that the councell of the Areopagites was, before Solon was choſen reformer of the lawes. For how could offendors and wicked men be condemned, by order of the councell of the Areopagites before Solon, if Solon was the firſt that gaue it authority to iudge? vnleſſe a man will ſay peraduenture, that he would a litle helpe the matter of his lawes which were obſcure and darke, and would ſupply that they lacked, with expounding of the ſame by them. Thoſe which ſhall be found attainted and conuicted of any matter, that hath bene heard before the councell of the Areopagites, the Ephetes, or the gouernors of the city, when this law ſhall come forth, ſhall ſtand condemned ſtill, and all other ſhall be pardoned, reſtored and ſet at liberty. Howſoeuer it is, ſure that was his intent and meaning. Furthermore among the reſt of his lawes, one of them indeed was of his own deuice: for the like was neuer ſtabliſhed elſewhere. And it is that law, that pronounceth him defamed, and vnhoneſt, who in a ciuill vproare among the citizens, ſitteth ſtill a looker on, and a neuter, and taketh part with neither ſide. Whereby his mind was, as it ſhould appeare, that priuate men ſhould not be only carefull to put themſelues and their cauſes in ſafetie, nor yet ſhould be careleſſe for other mens matters, or thinke it a vertue not to meddle with the miſeries and misfortunes of their countrey, but from the beginning of euery ſedition that they ſhould ioyne with thoſe that take the iuſteſt cauſe in hand, and rather to hazard themſelues with ſuch, then to tary looking (without putting themſelues in danger) which of the two ſhould haue the victory. There is another law alſo, which at the firſt ſight me thinketh is very vnhoneſt and fond: That if any man according to the law hath matched with a rich heire and inheritour, and of himſelfe is impotẽt, & vnable to do the office of a husband, ſhe may lawfully lie with any whom ſhe liketh, of her husbands neareſt kinſmen. Howbeit ſome affirme, that it is a wiſe made law for thoſe, which knowing themſelues vnmeet to entertaine wedlocke, will for couetouſneſſe of lands, marie with rich heires and poſſeſſioners, and mind to abuſe poore gentlewomen vnder the colour of law: and will thinke to force and reſtraine nature. For, ſeeing the law ſuffereth an inheritor or poſſeſſioner thus ill beſtowed, at her pleaſure to be bold with any of her husbands kin, men will either leaue to purchaſe ſuch mariages, or if they be ſo careleſſe that they will needs marie, it ſhal be to their extreme ſhame and ignominy, and ſo ſhall they deſeruedly pay for their greedy couetouſnes. And the law is made well alſo, becauſe the wife hath not ſcope to all her husbands kinſmen, but vnto one choiſe man whom ſhe liketh beſt of his houſe: to the end that the children that ſhall be borne, ſhall be at the leaſt of her husbands blood and kindred. This alſo confirmeth the ſame, that ſuch a new maried wife ſhould be ſhut vp with her husband, and eate a quince with him: and that he alſo which marieth ſuch an inheritor, ſhould of duty ſee her thriſe a moneth at the leaſt. For although he get no children of her, yet it is an honor the husband doth to his wife, arguing that he taketh her for an honeſt woman, that he loueth her, and that he eſteemeth of her. Beſides, it taketh away many miſlikings and diſpleaſures which oftentimes happen in ſuch caſes, and keepeth loue and good will waking, that it die not vtterly betweene them. Furthermore, he tooke away all ioynters and dowries in other mariages, and willed that the wiues ſhould bring their husbands but three gownes only, with ſome other litle moueables of ſmal value, and without any other thing as it were: vtterly forbidding that they ſhould buy their husbands, or that they ſhould make merchandize of mariages, as of other trades to gaine, but would that man and woman ſhould marie together for iſſue, for pleaſure, and for loue, but in no caſe for money. And for proofe hereof, Dionyſius the tyrant of SICILIE, one day anſwered his mother (which would needs be maried to a yong man of SYRACVSA) in this ſort: I haue power (ſaith he) to breake the lawes of SYRACVSA, by hauing the kingdome: but to force the law of nature, or to make mariage without the reaſonable compaſſe of age, that paſſeth my reach and power. So is it not tollerable, and much leſſe allowable alſo, that ſuch diſorder ſhould be in well ordered cities, that ſuch vncomely and vnfit mariages ſhould be made, betweene couples of vnequall yeares: conſidering there is no meete nor neceſſary end of ſuch matches. A wiſe gouernor of a citie, or a Iudge and reformer of lawes and manners, might well ſay to an old man that ſhould marie with a yong maide, as the Poet ſaith of Philoctetes:

At theſe yong yeares, for to be married now?

And finding a young man in an old rich womans houſe, getting his liuing by riding of her errands, and waxing fat, as they ſay the partridge doth, by treading of the hens: he may take him from thence, to beſtow him on ſome yong maide that ſhall haue neede of a husband. And thus much for this matter. But they greatly commend another law of Solons, which forbiddeth to ſpeake ill of the dead. For it is a good and godly thing to think, that they ought not to touch the dead, no more than to touch holy things: and men ſhould take great heed to offend thoſe that are departed out of this world: beſides, it is a token of wiſdome and ciuility, to beware of immortall enemies. He commanded alſo in the ſelfe ſame law, that no man ſhould ſpeake ill of the liuing, ſpecially in Churches, during diuine ſeruice, or in councel chamber of the city, nor in the Theaters whileſt games were a playing: vpon paine of three ſiluer *Drachmes to be payed to him that was iniured, and two to the common treaſury. For he thought it too much ſhameleſſe boldnes, in no place to keepe in ones choler; and moreouer, that ſuch lacked ciuilitie and good manners: and yet altogether to ſuppreſſe and ſmother it, he knew it was not onely a hard matter, but to ſome natures vnpoſſible. And he that maketh lawes, muſt haue regard to the common poſſibility of men, if he wil puniſh litle, with profitable example, and not much without ſome profit. So was he maruellouſly well thought of, for the law that he made touching wils and teſtaments. For before, men might not lawfully make their heires whom they would, but the goods came to the children or kinred of the teſtator. But he leauing it at liberty, to diſpoſe their goods where they

they thought good, so they had no children of their own: did therein preferre friendship before kindred, and good wil and fauor before necessity and constraint, and so made euery one lord and master of his own goods. Yet he did not simply & alike allow of al sorts of gifts, howsoeuer they were made, but those only which were made by men of sound memory, or by those whose wits failed them not by extreme sickness, or through drinks, medicines, poisonings, charmes, or other such violence and extraordinary meanes, neither yet through the inticements & perswasions of women. As thinking very wisely, there was no difference at al between those that were euidently forced by constraint, and those that were compassed & wrought by subornation at length to do a thing against their will, taking fraud in this case equall with violence, & pleasure with sorrow, as passions with madnes, which commonly haue as much force the one as the other, to draw and driue men from reason. He made another law also, in which he appointed women their times to go abroad into the fields, their mourning, their feasts and sacrifices, plucking from them all disorder & wilfull liberty, which they vsed before. For he did forbid that they should carrie out of the citie with them aboue three gownes, and to take victuals with them aboue the value of an halfe penny, neither basket nor pannier aboue a cubite high: and specially he did forbid them to go in the night, other then in their coach, and that a torch should be carried before them. He did forbid them also at the buriall of the dead, to teare and spoile themselues with blowes, to make lamentatiõs in verses, to weepe at the funerals of a stranger not being their kinsman, to sacrifice an oxe on the graue of the dead, to bury aboue three gownes with the corse, to go to other mens graues, but at the very time of burying the corse: all which or the most part of them, are forbidden by our lawes this day. Moreouer, those lawes appoint a penaltie vpon such women as offend in the same, to be distrained for, by certain officers expresly named, to controll & reforme the abuses of women, as womanish persons and faint harted, which suffer themselues to be ouercome with such passions and fondnesse in their mourning. And perceiuing that the citie of Athens began to replenish daily more and more, by mens repairing thither from all parts, and by reason of the great assured safety and liberty that they found there: and also considering how the greatest part of the Realme became in manner heathy, and was very barren, and that men traffiquing the seas, are not wont to bring any merchandize to those which can giue them nothing againe in exchange: he began to practise that his citizens should giue themselues vnto crafts and occupations, and made a law, that the son should not be bound to relieue his father being old, vnlesse he had set him in his youth to some occupation. It was a wise part of Lycurgus (who dwelt in a city where was no resort of strangers, and had so great a territorie, as could haue furnished twise as many people, as Euripides saith, and moreouer on all sides was enuironed with a great number of slaues of the Ilotes, whom it was needfull to keepe still in labour and work continually) to haue his citizens alwaies occupied in exercises of feates of armes, without making them to learne any other science, but discharged them of all other miserable occupations and handy-crafts. But Solon framing his lawes vnto things, and not things vnto lawes, when he saw the countrey of Attica so leane and barren, that it could hardly bring forth to sustaine those that tilled the ground onely, and therefore much more impossible to keepe so great a multitude of idle people as were in Athens: thought it very requisite to set vp occupations, and to giue them countenance and estimation. Therefore he ordained, that the councell of the Areopagites, should haue full power and authority to enquire how euery man liued in the citie, and also to punish such as they found idle people, and did not labour. But this was thought too seuere and straight a law which he ordained, (as Heraclides Ponticus writeth) that the children borne of common harlots and strumpets should not be bound to relieue their fathers. For he that maketh no accompt of matrimonie, plainly sheweth that he tooke not a wife to haue children, but onely to satisfie his lust and pleasure: and so such a one hath his iust reward, and is disappointed of the reuerence that a father ought to haue of his children, since through his owne fault the birth of his child falleth out to his reproach. Yet to say truly, in Solons lawes touching women, there are many absurdities, as they fall out ill fauouredly. For he maketh it lawful for any man to kill an adulterer taking him with the fact. But he that rauisheth or forcibly taketh away a free woman, is only condemned to pay a hundred siluer *drachmes. And he that was the Pandar to procure her, should onely pay twenty drachmes; vnlesse she had bene a common strumpet or curtisan: for such do iustifie open accesse to all that will hire them. Furthermore, he doth forbid any person to sel his daughters or sisters, vnlesse the father or brother had taken the abuſing themſelues before mariage. Me thinketh it is far from purpoſe and reaſon, with ſeuerity to puniſh a thing in one place, and ouer lightly to paſſe it ouer in another: or to ſet ſome light fine on ones head for a great fault, and after to diſcharge him, as it were but a matter of ſport. Vnleſſe they will excuſe it thus, that money being very hard and ſcant at that time in ATHENS, thoſe fines were then very great and grieuous to pay. For in ſetting out the charges of offerings which ſhould be made in ſacrifices, he appointed a weather to be a conuenient offering, and he ſetteth a buſhell of corne at a ſiluer drachme. More he ordained, that they which won any of the games at ATHENS, ſhould pay to the common treaſurie an hundred drachmes. And thoſe that wonne any of the games Olympicall, fiue hundred drachmes. Alſo he appointed that he which brought a he woolfe, ſhould haue fiue drachmes, & him one drachme for a reward of a ſhe woolfe. Whereof as Demetrius Valerian writeth, the one was the price of an oxe, and the other of a mutton. For, touching the rates he ordained in the ſixteenth table of his lawes meete for burnt ſacrifices, it is likely he did rate them at a much higher price, then ordinarily they were worth: and yet notwithſtanding, the price which he ſetteth, is very litle in compariſon of that which they are worth at this day. Now it was a cuſtome euer amongſt the ATHENIANS to kill their woolues, becauſe all their country lay for paſture, and not for tillage. Some there be that ſay, the tribes of the people of ATHENS haue not bene called after the names of the children of Ion, as the common opinion hath bene: but that they were called after their diuers trades and maners of liuing, which they tooke themſelues vnto from the beginning. For, ſuch as gaue themſelues vnto the warres, were called Oplites: as who would, ſay, men of armes. Thoſe that wrought in their occupations, were called Ergades: as much to ſay, as men of occupation. The other two which were husbandmen, & followed the plough, were called Teleontes: as you would ſay, labouring men. And thoſe that kept beaſts and cattell, were called Ægicores: as much to ſay, as heardmen. Now, foraſmuch as the whole prouince of ATTICA was very drie, and had great lacke of water, being not full of riuers, rūning ſtreames, not lakes, nor yet ſtored with any great number of ſprings, in ſo much as they are driuen there to vſe (through the moſt part of the countrey) water drawne out of wells made with mens hands: he made ſuch an order, that where there was any Well within the ſpace of an Hippicon, that euery body within that circuite, might come and draw water onely at that Well, for his vſe and neceſſity. Hippicon is the diſtance of foure furlongs, which is halfe a mile: & thoſe that dwell further off, ſhould go ſeek their water in other places where they would. But if they had digged ten yards deepe in the ground, & could find no water in the bottome, in this caſe, they might lawfully go to their next neighbors wel, and take a pot full of water containing ſix gallons, twiſe a day: iudging it great reaſon that neceſſity ſhould be holpen, but not that idleneſſe ſhould be cheriſhed. He appointed alſo the ſpaces that ſhould be kept and obſerued by thoſe that would ſet or plant trees in their ground, as being a man very skilfull in theſe matters. For he ordained, that whoſoeuer would plant any kind of trees in his ground, he ſhould ſet them fiue foot aſunder one from another: but for the fig tree and oliue tree ſpecially, that they ſhould in any caſe be nine foot aſunder, becauſe theſe two trees do ſpread out their branches farre off, and they cannot ſtand neare other trees but they muſt needs hurt them very much. For beſides that they draw away the ſap that doth nouriſh the other trees, they caſt alſo a certaine moiſture and ſteame vpon them, that is very hurtfull and incommodious. More he ordained, that whoſoeuer would digge a pit or hole in his ground, ſhould digge it as far off from his neighbours pit, as the pit he digged was in depth to the bottome. And he that would ſet vp a hiue of bees in his ground, he ſhould ſet them at the leaſt three hundred foot from other hiues ſet about him before. And of the fruits of the earth, he was contented they ſhould tranſport and ſell onely oyle out of the Realme to ſtrangers, but no other fruit or graine. He ordained that the gouernor of the citie ſhould yearely proclaime open curſes againſt thoſe that ſhould do to the contrary, or elſe he himſelf making default therein, ſhould be fined at an hundred drachmes. This ordinance is in the firſt table of Solons lawes, and therefore we may not altogether diſcredit thoſe which ſay, they did forbid in the old time that men ſhould carie figges out of the country of ATTICA, and that from thence it came that theſe pick-thankes, which bewray and accuſe them that tranſported figges, were called Sycophantes. He made another law alſo againſt the hurt that beaſts might do vnto men. Wherein he ordained, that if a dogge did bite any man, he that ought him ſhould deliuer to him that was bitten, his dogge tied to a logge of timber of foure cubites long: & this was a very good deuice, to make men ſafe from dogs. But he was very ſtraight in one law he

he made, that no ſtranger might be made denizen & free man of the city of Athens, vnleſſe he were a baniſhed man for euer out of his country, or elſe that he ſhould come and dwell there with all his family, to exerciſe ſome craft or ſcience. Notwithſtanding, they ſay he made not this law ſo much to put ſtrangers from their freedome there, as to draw them thither, aſſuring them by this ordinance, they might come and be free of the city: and he thought moreouer, that both the one and the other would be more faithfull to the common-weale of Athens. The one of thē, for that againſt their wils they were driuē to forſake their country: & the other ſort, for that aduiſedly and willingly they were contented to forſake it. This alſo was another of Solons lawes which he ordained for thoſe that ſhould feaſt certain daies at the town houſe of the city, at other mens coſt. For he would not allow that one man ſhould come often to feaſts there. And if any man were inuited thither to the feaſts, and did refuſe to come, he did ſet a fine on his head, as reprouing the miſerable niggardlines of the one, and the preſumptuous arrogancie of the other, to contemne and deſpiſe common order. After he had made his lawes, he did ſtabliſh them to continue for the ſpace of an hundred yeares, and they were written in tables of wood called Axones, which were made more long then broad, in the which they were grauen: whereof there remaine ſome monuments yet in our time, which are to be ſeen in the towne hall of the city of Athens. Ariſtotle ſaith, that theſe tables were called Cyrbes. And Cratinus alſo the Comicall poet ſaith in one place, of Solon & Dracon: that Cyrbes was a veſſel or pan wherein they did frie millet or hirſe. Howbeit other ſay, that Cyrbes properly were the tables, which contained the ordinances of the ſacrifices: and Axones were the other tables, that concerned the common-weale. So, al the councels & magiſtrates together did ſweare, that they would keepe Solons lawes themſelues, and alſo cauſe them to be obſerued of others throughly and particularly. Then euery one of the Theſmothetes (which were certaine officers attendant on the councell, and had ſpeciall charge to ſee the lawes obſerued) did ſolemnly ſweare in the open market place, neare the ſtone where the proclamations are proclaimed: and euery of them both promiſed, and vowed openly to keepe the ſame lawes, and that if any of them did in any one point breake the ſaid ordinances, then they were content that ſuch offender ſhould pay to the temple of Apollo, at the city of Delphes, an image of fine gold, that ſhould wey as much as himſelfe. Moreouer, Solon ſeeing the diſorder of the moneths, and the mouing of the Moone, which followed not the courſe of the Sunne, and vſed not to riſe and fall when the Sunne doth, but oft times in one day it doth both touch and paſſe the Sunne: he was the firſt that called the change of the Moone, Ene cai néa, as much to ſay, as old and new Moone. Allowing that which appeared before the coniunction, to be of the moneth paſt: and that which ſhewed it ſelf after the coniunction, to be of the moneth following. And he was the firſt alſo (in my opinion) that vnderſtood Homer rightly, when he ſaid: Then beginneth the moneth when it endeth. The day following the change, he called Neomenia, as much to ſay, as the new moneth, or the new Moone. After the twentieth day of the moneth which they called Icada, he reckned not the reſt of the moneth, as increaſing, but as in the wane: and gathered it by ſeeing the light of the Moone decreaſing, vntill the thirtieth day. Now after his lawes were come abroad, and proclaimed, there came ſome daily vnto him, which either praiſed them, or miſliked them, and praied him either to take away, or to adde ſomething vnto them. Many againe came and asked him, how he vnderſtood ſome ſentence of his lawes: and requeſted him to declare his meaning, and how it ſhould be taken. Wherefore conſidering that it were to no purpoſe to refuſe to doe it, and againe that it would get him much enuie and ill will to yeeld thereunto: he determined (happen what would) to winde himſelfe out of theſe briers, and to flie the groanings, complaints, and quarrels of his citizens. For he ſaith himſelfe:

Full hard it is, all minds content to haue,
And ſpecially in matters hard and graue.

So, to conuey himſelf a while out of the way, he tooke vpon him to be maſter of a ſhip in a certaine voyage, and asked licence for ten yeares of the Athenians to go beyond ſea, hoping by that time the Athenians would be very wel acquainted with his lawes. So wē he to the ſeas, and the firſt place of his arriuall was in Ægypt, where he remained a while, as he himſelf ſaith.

Euen there where Nilus, with his crooked crankes,

He went to his booke there, and did conferre a certaine time with Pſenophis Heliopolitan, and Sonchis Saitan, two of the wiſeſt prieſts at that time that were in Ægypt: whom when he heard rehearſe the ſtory of the Iles ATLANTIDES as Plato writeth, he proued to put the ſame into verſe, & did ſend it abroad through GRECE. At his departure out of ÆGYPT he went into CYPRVS, where he had great courteſie and friendſhip of one of the Princes of that country, called Philocyprus, who was Lord of a prety litle citie which Demophon (Theſus ſonne) cauſed to be built vpon the riuer of Clarie, & was of a goodly ſtrong ſituation, but in a very leane & barren countrey. Whereupon Solon told him, it would do better a great deale to remoue it out of that place, into a very faire and pleaſant valley that lay vnderneath it, and there to make it larger & ſtatelier then it was: which was done according to his perſwaſion. And Solons ſelf being preſent at it, was made ouerſeer of the buildings, which he did help to deuiſe and order in good ſort, aſwel in reſpect of pleaſure, as for force and defence: inſomuch as many people came from other places to dwel there. And herein many other Lords of the country did follow the example of this Philocyprus, who to honor Solon, called this city SOLES, which before was called ÆPIA. Solon in his Elegies maketh mention of this foundation, directing his words vnto Philocyprus, as followeth:

Clarius fl.

ÆEpia called Soles.

So grant the gods, that thou, and thine of-ſpring
May clime to great and paſſing princely ſtate:
Long time to liue, in Soles flouriſhing.
And that they graunt, my ſhip and me good gate,
When I from hence by ſeas ſhall take my way:
That with her harpe, dame Venus do vouchſafe
To waft me ſtill, vntill ſhe may conuey
My ſelfe againe, into my countrey ſafe.
Since I haue bene, the onely meane and man,
Which here to build, this citie firſt began.

And as for the meeting and talke betwixt him and king Cræſus, I know there are that by diſtance of time will proue it but a fable, and deuiſed of pleaſure: but for my part I will not reiect, nor condemne ſo famous an hiſtorie, receiued and approoued by ſo many graue teſtimonies. Moreouer it is very agreeable to Solons manners and nature, and alſo [illegible] vnlike to his wiſedome and magnanimitie: although in all points it agreeth not with certain [illegible]ales (which they call Chronicles) where they haue buſily noted the order and courſe of [illegible]s which euen to this day, many haue curiouſly ſought to correct, and could yet neuer diſcuſſe it, nor accord all contrarieties and manifeſt repugnances in the ſame. Solon at the deſire and requeſt of Cræſus, went to ſee him in the citie of SARDIS, When Solon was come thither, he ſeemed to be in the ſelfe ſame taking that a man was once reported to be: who being borne and bred vpon the maine land, and had neuer ſeene the ſea neither farre nor neare, did imagine euery riuer that hee ſaw had bene the ſea. So Solon paſſing alongſt Cræſus pallace, and meeting by the way many of the Lords of his Court richly apparelled, and carying great traines of ſeruing men, and ſouldiers, about them: thought euer that one of them had bene the King, vntill he was brought vnto Cræſus ſelfe. Who was paſſing richly arrayed, what for precious ſtones and iewels, and for rich coloured ſilkes, layed on with curious goldſmiths worke, and all to ſhew himſelfe to Solon in moſt ſtately, ſumptuous, and magnificent manner. Who perceiuing by Solons repaire to his preſence, that he ſhewed no manner of ſigne, nor countenance of wondring, to ſee ſo great a ſtate before him, neither had giuen out any word neare or likely to that which Cræſus looked for in his owne imagination, but rather had deliuered ſpeeches for men of iudgement and vnderſtanding to know, how inwardly he much did miſlike Cræſus fooliſh vanity and baſe mind: then Cræſus commanded all his treaſuries to bee opened, where his gold and ſiluer lay: next, that they ſhould ſhew him his rich and ſumptuous wardrobes, although that needed not: for to ſee Cræſus ſelfe, it was enough to diſcerne his nature and condition. After he had ſeene all ouer and ouer, being brought againe vnto the preſence of the King: Cræſus asked him, if euer he had ſeene any man more happy than himſelfe was? Solon anſwered him, I haue: and that was one Tellus a citizen of ATHENS, who was a maruellous honeſt man, and had left his children behind him in good eſtimation, and well to liue: and laſtly, was moſt happie at his death, by dying honourably in the field, in defence of his countrey. Cræſus hearing this anſwer, began to iudge him a man of little wit, or of groſſe vnderſtanding, becauſe hee did not thinke that to haue ſtore of gold and ſiluer, was the onely ioy and felicity of the world, and that he would preferre the life and death of a meane meane and priuate man as more happie, then all the riches and power of ſo mighty a king. Notwithſtanding all this, Cræſus yet asked him again: What other man beſide Tellus he had ſeen happier then himſelfe? Solon anſwered him, that he had ſeene Cleobis and Biton, which were both brethren, and loued one another ſingularly well, and their mother in ſuch ſort, that vpon a ſolemne feſtiuall day, when ſhe ſhould go to the temple of Iuno in her coach drawne with oxen: becauſe they taried too long ere they could be brought, they both willingly yoaked themſelues by the neeks, and drue their mothers coach in ſtead of the oxen, which maruellouſly reioyced her, and ſhe was thought moſt happy of al other, to haue borne two ſuch ſons. Afterwards when they had done ſacrifice to the goddeſſe, and made good cheare at the feaſt of this ſacrifice, they went to bed: but they roſe not againe the next morning, for they were found dead without ſuffering hurt or ſorrow, after they had receiued ſo much glory and honor. Cræſus then could no longer bridle in his patience, but breaking out in choler, ſaid vnto him: Why, doſt thou recken me then in no degree of happy men? Solon would neither flatter him, nor further increaſe his heate, but anſwered him thus: O king of LYDIANS, the gods haue giuen vs GRECIANS all things in a meane, and amongſt other things chiefly, a baſe and popular wiſdome, not princely nor noble: which conſidering how mans life is ſubiect to infinite chãces, doth forbid vs to truſt or glory in theſe worldly riches. For time bringeth daily misfortunes vnto man, which he neuer thought of, nor looked for. But when the gods haue continued a mans good fortune to his end, then we think that man happy and bleſſed, and neuer before. Otherwiſe, if we ſhould iudge a man happy that liueth, conſidering he is euer in danger of change during life: we ſhould be much like to him, who iudgeth him the victory before hand, that is ſtill a fighting, and may be ouercome, hauing no ſurety yet to cary it away. After Solon had ſpoken theſe words, he departed from the kings preſence, & returned back againe, leauing king Cræſus offended, but nothing the wiſer, nor amended. Now Æſope that wrote the fables, being at that time in the city of SARDIS, and ſent for thither by the king, who entertained him very honorably, was very ſory to ſee that the king had giuen Solon no better entertainment: ſo by way of aduice he ſaid vnto him: O Solon, either we muſt not come to princes at all, or elſe we muſt ſeeke to pleaſe and content them. But Solon turning it to the contrary, anſwered him: Either we muſt not come to princes, or elſe we muſt needs tell them truly, and counſell them for the beſt. So Cræſus made light account of Solon at that time. But after he had loſt the battell againſt Cyrus, and that his city was taken, himſelfe become priſoner, and was bound faſt to a gibbet, ouer a great ſtack of wood, to be burnt in the ſight of all the PERSIANS, and of Cyrus his enemie: he then cryed out as loud as he could, thrice together: O Solon. Cyrus being abaſhed, ſent to aske him whether this Solon he onely cryed vpon in his extreme miſerie, was a god or man. Cræſus kept it not ſecret from him, but ſaid: He was one of the wiſe men of GRECE, whom I ſent for to come vnto me a certaine time, not to learne any thing of him which I ſtood in need of, but only that he might witneſſe my felicity, which then I did enioy: the loſſe whereof is now more hurtfull, then the enioying of the ſame was good or profitable. But now (alas) too late I know it, that the riches I poſſeſſed then, were but words and opinion, all which are returned now to my bitter ſorrow, and to preſent & remedileſſe calamity. Which the wiſe GRECIAN conſidering then, and foreſeeing afarre off by my doings at that time, the inſtant miſery I ſuffer now: gaue me warning I ſhould marke the end of my life, and that I ſhould not too far preſume of my ſelfe, as puffed vp then with vaine glory of opinion of happineſſe, the ground thereof being ſo ſlippery, and of ſo litle ſuretie. Theſe words being reported vnto Cyrus, who was wiſer then Cræſus, and ſeeing Solons ſaying confirmed by ſo notable an example: he did not only deliuer Cræſus from preſent perill of death, but euer after honored him ſo long as he liued. Thus had Solon glory, for ſauing the honor of one of theſe Kings, and the life of the other, by his graue and wiſe counſell. But during the time of his abſence, great ſeditions roſe at ATHENS amongſt the inhabitants, who had gotten them ſeuerall heads amongſt them; as thoſe of the vallie had made Lycurgus their head. The coaſt men, Megacles, the ſonne of Alcmæon. And thoſe of the mountaines, Pyſiſtratus: with whom all artificers & crafts men liuing of their handy labour were ioyned, which were the ſtouteſt againſt the rich. So that notwithſtanding the city kept Solons lawes & ordinances, yet was there not that man but gaped for a change, & deſired to ſee things in another ſtate: either parties hoping their condition would mend by change, and that euery of thẽ ſhould be better thẽ their aduerſaries. The whole cõmonweale broiling thus with troubles, Solon arriued at ATHENS, where euery man did honour and reuerence him: howbeit he was no more able to ſpeake aloud in open aſſembly to the people, nor to deale in matters as he had done before, becauſe his age would not ſuffer him and therefore he ſpake with euery one of the heads of the ſeuerall factions apart, trying if he could agree & reconcile them together againe. Whereunto Pyſiſtratus ſeemed to be more willing then any of the reſt, for he was courteous, & maruellous faire ſpoken, and ſhewed himſelfe beſides, very good and pitifull to ỹ poore, and temperate alſo to his enemies: further, if any good quality were lacking in him, he did ſo finely counterfeit it, that men imagined it was more in him, then in thoſe that naturally had it in them indeed. As to be a quiet man, no medler, contented with his owne, aſpiring no higher, and hating thoſe which would attempt to change the preſent ſtate of the common weale, and would practiſe any innouation. By this art and fine maner of his, he deceiued the poore common people. Howbeit Solon found him ſtraight, and ſaw the marke he ſhot at: but yet hated him not at that time, and ſought ſtill to win him, and bring him to reaſon, ſaying oft times, both to himſelfe and to other: That who ſo could pluck out of his head the worme of ambition, by which he aſpired to be the chiefeſt, and could heale him of his greedy deſire to rule, there could not be a man of more vertue, or a better citizen then he would proue. About this time began Theſpis to ſet out his tragedies, which was a thing that much delighted the people for the rareneſſe thereof, being not many Poets yet in number, to ſtriue one againſt another for victory, as afterwards there were. Solon being naturally deſirous to heare and learne, and by reaſon of his age ſeeking to paſſe his time away in ſports, in muſick, & making good cheare more then euer he did, went one day to ſee Theſpis, who plaid a part himſelf, as the old faſhion of the Poets was; and after the play was ended, he called him to him, & asked him: If he were not aſhamed to lye ſo openly in the face of the world. Theſpis anſwered him, that it was not materiall to do or ſay any ſuch things, conſidering all was but in ſport. Then Solon beating the ground with his ſtaffe he had in his hand: But if we cõmend lying in ſport (quoth he) we ſhal find it afterwards in good earneſt, in al our bargains & dealings. Shortly after Pyſiſtratus hauing wounded himſelf, and bloudied al his body ouer, cauſed his men to carry him in his coach into the market place, where he put the people in an vprore, & told thẽ that they were his enemies that thus traiterouſly had handled and araied him, for that he ſtood with thẽ about the gouerning of the common-weale: inſomuch as many of them were maruellouſly offended, & mutined by and by, crying out, it was ſhamefully done. Then Solon drawing neere ſaid vnto him: O thou ſon of Hippocrates, thou doſt ilfauouredly counterfet the perſon of Homers Vlyſſes: for thou haſt whipped thy ſelf to deceiue thy citizẽs, as he did teare & ſcratch himſelf, to deceiue his enemies. Notwithſtanding this, the common people were ſtil in vprore, being ready to take armes for Pyſiſtratus: and there was a generall councell aſſembled, in the which one Ariſton ſpake, that they ſhould grant fiftie men, to carry halbards and maces before Pyſiſtratus for guard of his perſon. But Solon going vp into the pulpit for orations, ſtoutly inueyed againſt it: and perſwaded the people with many reaſons, like vnto theſe he wrote afterwards in verſe:

Pyſiſtratus wicked craft and and ſubtilties.

Theſpis a maker of tragedies.

Solon reproued Theſpis for lying.

Each one of you (o men) in priuate acts
Can play the foxe, for ſlie and ſubtill craft:
But when you come, yfore (in all your facts)
Then are you blind, dull witted and bedaſt:
For pleaſant ſpeech and painted flattery,
Beguile you ſtill, the which you neuer ſpie.

But in the end, ſeeing the poore people did tumult ſtill, taking Pyſiſtratus part, and that the rich fled here and there, he went his way alſo, ſaying: He had ſhewed himſelfe wiſer then ſome, and hardier then other. Meaning, wiſer then thoſe which ſaw not Pyſiſtratus reach and fetch: and hardier then they which knew very well he did aſpire to be king, and neuertheleſſe durſt not reſiſt him. The people went on with the motion of Ariſton, and authoriſed the ſame, touching the grant of halbarders: limiting no number, but ſuffered him to haue about him, and to aſſemble as many as he would, vntil ſuch time as he had gotten poſſeſſion of the caſtle. Then the city was maruellouſly afraid and amazed: and preſently Megacles, and all thoſe which were of the houſe of the Alcmeonides did flie. Solon, who for yeares was now at his laſt caſt, and had no man to ſticke vnto him, went notwithſtanding into the market place, and ſpake to the citizens whom he found there, and rebuked their beaſtlineſſe, and faint cowardly hearts, and encouraged them, not to loſe their liberty. He ſpake at that time notably, and worthy memorie, which euer after was remembred. Before, ſaid he, you might more eaſily haue ſtaied this preſent tyrãny: but now that it is already fashioned, you shall win more glory vtterly to suppresse it. But for all his goodly reasons, he found no man that would hearken vnto him, they were all so amazed. Wherefore he hied him home againe, and tooke his weapons out of his house, and laid them before his gate in the middest of the street, saying: For my part, I haue done what I can possible, to helpe and defend the lawes and liberties of my country. So from that time he betooke himselfe vnto his ease, and neuer after dealt any more in matters of state, or common weale. His friends did counsell him to flie: but all they could not perswade him to it. For he kept his house, and gaue himself to make verses: in which he sore reproued the ATHENIANS faults, saying: Solons liberty and constancie.

If presently your burden heauie be,
Yet murmure not against the gods therefore.
The fault is yours, as you your selues may see,
Which granted haue of mighty Mars the lore
To such as now, by your direction
Do hold your neckes in this subiection.

His friends hereupon did warne him, to beware of such speeches, and to take heed what he said: lest if it came to the tyrants eares, he might put him to death for it. And further they asked him wherein he trusted, that he spake so boldly. He answered them; In my age. Howbeit Pysistratus after he had obtained his purpose, sending for him vpon his word and faith, did honour and entertaine him so well, that Solon in the end became one of his councell, and approoued many things which he did. For Pysistratus himselfe did straightly keepe, and caused his friends to keepe Solons lawes. Insomuch as when he was called by proces into the court of the Areopagites for a murther, euen at that time when he was a tyrant, he presented himselfe very modestly to answer his accusation, and to purge himselfe thereof. But his accuser let fall the matter, and followed it no further. Pysistratus himselfe also did make new lawes, as this: That he that had bene maimed, and made lame of any member in the wars, should be maintained all his life long at the common charges of the citie. The selfe same was before decreed by Therſippus (as Heraclides writeth) by Solons perswasion: who did preferre it to the councell. Pysistratus afterwards tooke hold of the motion, and from thenceforth made it a generall law. Theophrastus saith also, it was Pysistratus, and not Solon, that made the law for idlenesse; which was the onely cause that the countrey of ATTICA became more fruitfull, being better manured: and the citie of ATHENS waxed more quiet. But Solon hauing begun to write the storie of the Isles ATLANTIDES in verse (which he had learned of the wise men of the citie of SAIS in ÆGYPT, and was very necessary for the ATHENIANS) grew wearie, and gaue it ouer in mid way: not for any matters or businesse that troubled him, as Plato said, but onely for his age, and because he feared the tediousnesse of the worke. For otherwise he had leysure enough, as appeareth by these verses, where he saith: A good law for reward of seruice.

I grow old, and yet I learne still.

And in another place where he saith:

Now Venus yeelds me sweet delights,
And Bacchus lends me comfort still:
The Muses eke refresh my sprights,
And much releeue my weary will.
These be the points of perfect ease,
Which all mens minds oft times do please.

Plato afterwards for beautifying of the story and fables of the Isles ATLANTIDES, was desirous to dilate them out at length, as if he would by way of speech haue broken vp a field or lay land of his owne, or that this gift had descended to him of right from Solon. He began to raise vp a stately front vnto the same, and enclosed it with high wals, and large squared courts at the entry thereof: such was it, as neuer any other worke, fable or poeticall inuention had euer so notable, or the like. But because he began a litle too late, he ended his life before his worke, leauing the readers more sorrowfull for that was left vnwritten, then they tooke pleasure in that they found written. For euen as in the city of ATHENS, the temple of Iupiter Olympian only remained vnperfect: so the wisdome of Plato (amongst many goodly matters of his that haue come abroad) left none of them vnperfect, but the only tale of the Isles ATLANTIDES. Solon liued long time after Pysistratus had vsurped the tyranny, as Heraclides Ponticus writeth. Howbeit Phanias Ephesian writeth, that he liued not aboue two yeares after. For Pysistratus vsurped tyrannicall power in the yeare that Comias was chiefe gouernor in ATHENS. And Phanias writeth, that Solon dyed in the yeare that Hegeſtratus was gouernour, which was the next yeare after that. And where ſome ſay, the aſhes of his body were after his death ſtrewed abroad through the Iſle of SALAMINA, that ſeemeth to be but a fable, and altogether vntrue. Neuertheleſſe it hath bene written by many notable Authors, and amongſt others, by Ariſtotle the Philoſopher.

The end of Solons life.

THE LIFE OF PVBLIVS Valerius Publicola.

The houſe of P. Valerius.

NOW we haue declared what Solon was, we haue thought good to compare him with Publicola, to whom the ROMAINE people for an honor gaue that ſurname: for he was called before Publius Valerius, deſcended from that ancient Valerius, who was one of the chiefeſt workers and meanes to bring the ROMAINES and the SABYNES, that were mortall enemies, to ioyne together as one people. For it was he that moſt mooued the two Kings to agree, and ioyne together. Publicola being deſcended of him, whileſt the Kings did rule yet at ROME, was in very great eſtimation, as well for his eloquence as for his riches: vſing the one rightly & freely for the maintenance of iuſtice, and the other liberally and courteouſly for the releefe of the poore. So that it was manifeſt, if the Realme came to be conuerted into a publike ſtate, he ſhould be one of the chiefeſt men of the ſame. It chanced that king Tarquine ſurnamed the proud, being come to the crowne by no good lawfull meane, but contrarily by indirect and wicked waies, and behauing himſelfe not like a king, but like a cruell tyrant; the people much hated and deteſted him, by reaſon of the death of Lucretia (which killed her ſelfe for that ſhe was forcibly rauiſhed by him) and ſo the whole city aroſe & rebelled againſt him. Lucius Brutus taking vpon him to be the head & captaine of this inſurrection and rebellion, did ioyne firſt with this Valerius: who did greatly fauour and aſſiſt his enterpriſe, and did helpe him to driue out king Tarquine with al his houſe and familie. Now whileſt they were thinking that the people would chooſe ſome one alone to be chiefe ruler ouer them, in ſtead of a king: Valerius kept himſelfe quiet, as yeelding willingly vn-

to Brutus the firſt place, who was meeteſt for it, hauing bene the chiefe author and worker of their recouered liberty. But when they ſaw the name of Monarchy (as much to ſay, as ſoueraignty alone) was diſpleaſant to the people, and that they would like better to haue the rule deuided vnto two, and how for this cauſe they would rather chooſe two Conſuls: Valerius then began to hope, he ſhould be the ſecond perſon with Brutus. Howbeit this hope failed him. For againſt Brutus will, Tarquinius Collatinus (the husband of Lucretia) was choſen Conſull with him: not becauſe he was a man of greater vertue, or of better eſtimation then Valerius; but the noble men of the city fearing the practiſes of thoſe of the kings bloud, which ſought by all the faire and flattering meanes they could to returne againe into the citie, did determine to make ſuch a one Conſull, whom occaſion forced to be their hard and heauie enemy, perſwading themſelues that Tarquinius Collatinus would for no reſpect yeeld vnto them. Valerius tooke this matter grieuouſly, that they had a miſtruſt in him, as if he would not doe any thing he could, for the benefit of his countrie: for that he had neuer any priuate iniurie offered him by the tyrants. Wherefore he repaired no more vnto the Senate to pleade for priuate men, and wholly gaue vp to meddle in matters of ſtate: inſomuch as he gaue many occaſion to thinke of his abſence, and it troubled ſome men much, who feared leſt vpon this his miſliking and withdrawing, he would fall to the kings ſide, & ſo bring al the city in an vprore, conſidering it ſtood then but in very tickle termes. But when Brutus, who ſtood in ielouſie of ſome, would by oath be aſſured of the Senate, and had appointed them a day ſolemnly to take their oathes vpon the ſacrifices: Valerius thē with a good cheereful countenance came into the market place, and was the firſt that took his oath he would leaue nothing vndone that might preiudice the Tarquines but with all his able power he would fight againſt them, and defend the liberty of the city. This oath of his maruelouſly reioyced the Senate, and gaue great aſſurance alſo to the Conſuls, but ſpecially, becauſe his deeds did ſhortly after performe his words. For there came ambaſſadours to ROME which brought letters from king Tarquine, full of ſweet and lowly ſpeeches to win the fauor of the people, with commiſſion to vſe all the mildeſt meanes they could, to dulce and ſoften the hardned hearts of the multitude: who declared how the king had left all pride and cruelty, and meant to aske nought but reaſonable things. The Conſuls thought beſt to giue them open audience, and to ſuffer them to ſpeake to the people. But Valerius was againſt it, declaring it might peril the ſtate much, and deliuer occaſion of new ſtir vnto a multitude of poore people, which were more afraid of wars, then of tyranny. After that, there came other ambaſſadours alſo, which ſaid that Tarquine would from thenceforth for euer giue ouer and renounce his title to the kingdome, and to make any more wars, but beſought them only, that they would at the leaſt deliuer him and his friends their mony and goods, that they might haue wherwithall to keepe them in their baniſhment. Many came on a pace, and were very ready to yeeld to this requeſt, and ſpecially Collatinus, one of the Conſuls who did fauour their motion. But Brutus that was a faſt and reſolute man, and very fierce in his heate, ran immediatly into the market place, crying out that his fellow Conſul was a traitor, and contented to grant the tyrants matter and meanes to make war vpon the city, where indeed they deſerued not ſo much as to be relieued in their exile. Hereupō the people aſſembled together, & the firſt that ſpake in this aſſembly was a priuat man called Gaius Minutius, who ſpeaking vnto Brutus, and to the whole aſſembly, ſaid vnto them: O noble Conſull and Senate, handle ſo the matter, that the tyrants goods be rather in your cuſtody to make war with thē, then in theirs to bring war vpon your ſelues. Notwithſtanding the ROMAINES were of opinion, that hauing gotten the liberty, for which they fought with the tyrants, they ſhould not diſappoint the offred peace with keeping back their goods, but rather they ſhould throw their goods out after them. Howbeit this was the leaſt part of Tarquines intent, to ſeek his goods againe: but vnder pretence of that demand, he ſecretly corrupted the people, and practiſed treaſon, which his ambaſſadors followed, pretending only to get the kings goods & his fauorers together, ſaying, that they had already ſold ſome part, and ſome part they kept, and ſent them daily. So as by delaying the time in this ſort with ſuch pretences, they had corrupted two of the beſt and ancienteſt houſes of the city: to wit, the family of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Senators, and the family of the Vitellians, whereof there were two Senators: all which by their mothers, were Conſul Collatinus nephewes. The Vitellians alſo were allied vnto Brutus, for he had maried their own ſiſter, & had many children by her. Of the which the Vitellians had drawn to their ſtring two of the eldeſt of them, becauſe they familiarly frequented together, being coſin germains, whō they had entiſed

to be of their conſpiracie, allying them with the houſe of the Tarquines, which was of great power, and through the which they might perſwade themſelues to riſe to great honour and preferment by meanes of the king, rather then truſt to their fathers wilfull hardneſſe: for they called his ſeuerjtie to the wicked, hardneſſe: for that he would neuer pardon any. Furthermore, Brutus had fained himſelf mad, and a foole of long time for ſafety of his life, becauſe the tyrants ſhould not put him to death: ſo that the name of Brutus only remained. After theſe two yong men had giuen their conſent to be of the confederacie, & had ſpoken with the Aquilians: they all thought good to be bound one to another, with a great and horrible oath, drinking the bloud of a man, & ſhaking hands in his bowels, whom they would ſacrifice. This matter agreed vpon betweene them, they met together to put their ſacrifice in execution, in the houſe of the Aquilians. They had fitly pickt out a dark place in the houſe to do this ſacrifice in, & where almoſt no body came: yet it hapned by chance, that one of the ſeruants of the houſe called Vindicius, had hidden himſelfe there, vnknowing to the traitors, and of no ſet purpoſe, to ſpie and ſee what they did, or that he had any manner of inkling thereof before: but falling by chance vpon the matter: euen as the traitors came into that place with a countenance to do ſome ſecret thing of importance, fearing to be ſeene, he kept himſelf cloſe, and lay behind a coffer that was there, ſo that he ſaw al that was done, and what they ſaid and determined. The concluſion of their counſell in the end was this, that they would kil both the Conſuls: and they wrote letters to Tarquinius aduertiſing the ſame, which they gaue vnto his ambaſſadors, being lodged in the houſe of the Aquilians, and were preſent at this concluſion. With this determination they departed from thence, and Vindicius came out alſo as ſecretly as he could, being marueilouſly troubled in mind, and at a maze how to deale in this matter. For he thought it dangerous (as it was indeed) to go and accuſe the two ſonnes vnto the father, which was Brutus) of ſo wicked and deteſtable a treaſon, and the nephewes vnto their vncle, which was Collatinus. On the other ſide alſo, he thought this was a ſecret, not to be imported to any priuate perſon, and not poſſible for him to conceale it, that was bound in duty to reueale it. So he reſolued at the laſt to go to Valerius to bewray this treaſon, of a ſpeciall affection to this man, by reaſon of his gentle and courteous vſing of men, giuing eaſie acceſſe and audience vnto any that came to ſpeake with him, and ſpecially for that he diſdained not to heare poore mens cauſes. Vindicius being gone to ſpeake with him, and hauing told him the whole conſpiracie before his brother Marcus Valerius, and his wife, he was abaſhed and fearefull withall: whereupon he ſtayed him leſt he ſhould ſlip away, and locked him in a chamber, charging his wife to watch the doore, that no body went in or out vnto him. And willed his brother alſo, that he ſhould go and beſet the kings palace round about, to intercept theſe letters if it were poſſible, and to ſee that none of their ſeruants fled. Valerius himſelf being followed (according to his manner) with a great traine of his friends and people that waited on him, went ſtraight vnto the houſe of the Aquilians, who by chance were from home at that time: and entring in at the gate, without let or trouble of any man, he found the letters in the chamber, where king Tarquins ambaſſadors lay. Whileſt he was thus occupied, the Aquilians hauing intelligence thereof, ran home immediatly, and found Valerius coming out at their gate. So they would haue taken thoſe letters from him by force and ſtrong hand: but Valerius and his company did reſiſt them, and moreouer hooded them with their gownes ouer their heads, and by force brought thē (do what they could) into the market place. The like was done alſo in the kings palace, where Marcus Valerius found other letters alſo wrapt vp in certaine fardels for their more ſafe cariage, and brought away with him by force into the market place all the Kings ſeruants he found there. There the Conſuls hauing cauſed ſilence to be made, Valerius ſent home to his houſe for this bondman Vindicius, to be brought before the Conſuls: then the traitours were openly accuſed, and their letters read, and they had not the face to anſwer one word. All that were preſent, being amazed, hung downe their heads, and beheld the ground, and not a man durſt once open his mouth to ſpeake, excepting a few, who to gratifie Brutus, beganne to ſay that they ſhould baniſh them: and Collatinus alſo gaue them ſome hope, becauſe he fell to weeping, and Valerius in like manner for that he held his peace. But Brutus calling his ſonnes by their names: Come on (ſaid he) Titus and thou Valerius, why do you not anſwer to that you are accuſed of? and hauing ſpoken thriſe vnto them to anſwer, when he ſaw they ſtood mute, and ſaid nothing: he turned him to the Sergeants, and ſaid vnto them: They are now in your hands, do iuſtice. So ſoone as he had ſpoken theſe words, the Sergeants layed hold imme-immediatly vpon the two yong men, and tearing their clothes off their backs, bound their hands behind them, and then whipped them with rods: which was such a pitifull sight to all the people, that they could not find in their hearts to behold it, but turned themselues another way, because they would not see it. But contrariwise, they say that their own father had neuer his eye off them, neither did change his austere and fierce countenance, with any pitie or naturall affection towards them; but stedfastly did behold the punishment of his owne children, vntill they were layed flat on the ground, and both their heads stricken off with an axe before him. When they were executed, Brutus arose from the bench, and left the execution of the rest vnto his fellow Consull. This was such an act, as men cannot sufficiently praise, nor reprooue enough. For either it was his excellent vertue, that made his mind so quiet, or else the greatnesse of his miserie that tooke away the feeling of his sorrow: whereof neither the one nor the other was any small matter, but passing the common nature of man, that hath in it both diuinenesse, and sometime beastly brutishnesse. But it is better the iudgement of men should commend his fame, then that the affection of men by their iudgements should diminish his vertue. For the ROMAINS hold opinion, it was not so great an act done of Romulus first to build ROME, as it was for Brutus to recouer ROME, and the best libertie thereof, and to renew the ancient gouernement of the same. When Brutus was gone, all the people in the market place remained as they had bene in a maze, full of feare and wonder, and a great while without speaking to see what was don. The Aquilians straight grew bold, for that they saw the other Consull Collatinus proceede gently and mildly against them: and so made petition they might haue time giuen them to answer to the articles they were accused of, and that they might haue their slaue and bondman Vindicius deliuered into their hands, because there was no reason he should remaine with their accusers. The Consull seemed willing to yeeld thereto, and was ready to breake vp the assembly thereupon. But Valerius said, he would not deliuer Vindicius (who was among the assembly that attended vpon his person:) and staied the people besides for departing away, lest they should negligently let those escape that had so wickedly sought to betray their countrie: vntill he himself had layed hands vpō them, calling vpon Brutus to assist him, with open exclamation against Collatinus, that he did not behaue himself like a iust and true man, seeing his fellow Brutus was forced for iustice sake to see his own sons put to death: and he in contrary manner, to please a few women, sought to let goe manifest traitours, and open enemies to their countrie. The Consull being offended herewith, commanded they should bring away the bondman Vindicius. So the sergeants making way through the preasse, laid hands vpon him to bring him away with them, and began to strike at them which offered to resist them. But Valerius friends stept out before them, & put them by. The people shouted straight, and cryed out for Brutus: who with this noise returned againe into the market place, and after silence made him, he spake in this wise: For mine own children, I alone haue bene their sufficient Iudge, to see them haue the law according to their deseruings: the rest I haue left freely to the iudgement of the people. Wherefore (said he) if any man be disposed to speake, let him stand vp, and perswade the people as he thinketh best. Then there needed no more words, but onely to harken what the people cried: who with one voice and consent condemned them, & cried execution, & accordingly they had their heads striken off. Now was Consul Collatinus long before had in some suspition, as allied to the kings, & disliked for his surname, because he was called Tarquinius: who perceiuing himself in this case much hated and mistrusted of the people, voluntarily yeelded vp his Consulship, and departed the city. The people then assembled themselues, to place a successour in his roome: they chose Valerius in his stead, without the contradiction of any, for his faithful trauel & diligence bestowed in this great matter. Then Valerius iudging that Vindicius the bondman had wel deserued also some recompence, caused him not onely to be manumissed by the whole grant of the people, but made him a free man of the city besides: and he was the first bondman manumissed, that was made citizen of ROME, with permission also to giue his voice in all elections of officers, in any company or tribe he would be enrolled in. Long time after that, and very lately, Appius to currie fauour with the common people, made it lawful for bondmen manumissed, to giue their voices also in elections, as other citizens did: and vnto this day the perfect manumissing and freeing of bondmen, is called Vindicta, after the name of this Vindicius, that was then made a free-man. These things thus passed ouer, the goods of the kings were giuen to the spoile of the people, and their palaces were razed and ouerthrowne. Now amongst other lands, the goodliest part of the field of Mars was belonging vnto king Tarquine: the same they consecrated forthwith vnto the god Mars, and not long before they had cut downe the wheat thereof. The sheaues being yet in shocks in the field, they thought they might not grinde the wheat, nor make any commoditie of the profit therof: wherfore they threw both corne and sheaues into the riuer, and trees also which they had hewen downe and rooted vp, to the end that the field being dedicated to the god Mars, should be left bare, without bearing any fruite at all. These sheaues thus throwne into the riuer, were caried downe by the streame not far from thence, vnto a foord and shallow place of the water, where they first did stay, and did let the other which came after, that it could goe no further: there these heapes gathered together, and lay so close one to another, that they began to sink and settle fast in the water. Afterwards the streame of the riuer brought downe continually such mud and grauell, that it euer increased the heape of corne more and more, in such sort, that the force of the water could no more remoue it from thence, but rather softly pressing and driuing it together, did firme and harden it, and made it grow so to land. Thus this heape rising still in greatnesse and firmenesse, by reason that all that came downe the riuer staied there, it grew in the end, and by time to spread so farre, that at this day it is called the holy Iland in ROME: in which are many goodly temples of diuerse gods, and sundry walkes about it, and they call it in latine, Inter duos pontes. in our tongue, Betweene the two bridges. Yet some write, that this thing fell not out at that time when the field of the Tarquines was consecrated vnto Mars: but that it happened afterwards, when one of the Vestall Nunnes, called Tarquinia, gaue a field of hers vnto the people, which was hard adioyning vnto Tarquins field. For which liberality and bounty of hers, they did grant her in recompence many priuiledges, and did her great honour besides. As amongst others, it was ordained, that her word and witnesse should stand good, and be allowed in matters iudiciall: which priuiledge neuer woman besides herselfe did enioy. By speciall grace of the people also, it was granted her, that she might mary if she thought it good: but yet she would not accept the benefit of that offer. Thus you heare the report how this thing happened. Tarquinius then being past hope of euer entring into his kingdome againe, went yet vnto the THVSCANES for succour, which were very glad of him: and so they leauied a great armie together, hoping to haue put him in his kingdome againe. The Consuls also hearing thereof, went out with their armie against him. Both the armies presented themselues in battell ray, one against another, in the holy places consecrated to the gods: wherof the one was called the wood Arsia, and the other the meadow Aesunia. And as both armies began to giue charge vpon each other, Arnus the eldest son of King Tarquine, and the Consul Brutus encountred together, not by chance, but sought for of set purpose to execute the deadly fode and malice they did beare each other. The one, as against a tyrant and enemie of the liberty of his country: the other, as against him that had bene chiefe author and worker of their exile and expulsion. So they set spurres to their horses, so soone as they had spied each other, with more furie then reason, and fought so desperatly together, that they both fell starke dead to the ground. The first onset of the battell being so cruell, the end thereof was no lesse bloudie: vntill both the armies hauing receiued and done like damage to each other, were parted by a maruellous great tempest that fell vpon them. Now was Valerius maruellously perplexed, for that he knew not which of them wanne the field that day: seeing his souldiers as sorrowfull for the great losse of their men lying dead before them, as they were glad of the slaughter and victory of their enemies. For, to view the multitude of the slaine bodies of either side, the number was so equall in sight, that it was very hard to iudge, of which side fell out the greatest slaughter: so that both the one and the other viewing by the eye the remaine of their campe, were perswaded in their opinion, that they had rather lost then won, coniecturing afar off the fall of their enemies. The night being come, such things fell out as may be looked for after so terrible a battell. For when both campes were all laied to rest, they say the wood wherein they lay incamped, quaked and trembled; and they heard a voice say, that only one man more was slaine on the THVSCANES side, than on the ROMAINES part. Out of doubt this was some voice from heauen: for the ROMAINES thereupon gaue a shrill shout, as those whose hearts receiued a new quickning spirit or courage. The THVSCANS on the contrary part were so afraid, that the most part of thē stole out of the camp, and scattered here and there: and there remained behind about the number of fiue thousand men, whom the ROMAINES tooke prisoners euery one, and had the spoile of their campe. The carkasses were viewed afterwards, and they found that there were slaine in the battell, eleuen thousand thousand and three hundred of the THVSCANES: and of the ROMAINES, so many saue one. This battel was fought (as they say) the last day of February, & the Consul Valerius triumphed, being the first of the Consuls that euer entred into ROME triumphing vpon a chariot drawne with foure horses, which sight the people found honourable & goodly to behold, and were not offended with al (as some seeme to report) nor yet did enuie him for that he began it. For if it had bene so, that custome had not bene folowed with so good acceptatiō, nor had continued so many yeers as it did afterwards. They much commended also the honor he did to his fellow Consull Brutus, in setting out his funerals and obsequies, at the which he made a funeral oration in his praise. They did so like and please the ROMAINES, that they haue euer since continued that custome at the buriall of any noble man, or great personage, that he is openly praised at his buriall, by the worthiest man that liueth among them. They report this funeral oration is far more ancient then the first that was made in GREECE in the like case: vnlesse they wil confirme that which the orator Anaximenes hath written, that the manner of praising the dead at their funerals, was first of all instituted by Solon. But they did most enuy Valerius, & beare him grudge, because Brutus (whom the people did acknowledge for father of their liberty) would neuer be alone in office, but had procured twise, that they should appoint Valerius fellow Consull with him. This man in contrariwise (said the people) taking vpon him alone the rule and soueraignty, sheweth plainely he wil not be Brutus successour in his Consulship, but Tarquinius selfe in the kingdome. For to great purpose was it to praise Brutus in words, and to follow Tarquinius in deeds: hauing borne before him selfe only all the maces, the axes & the rods, when he commeth abroad out of his own house, which is farre greater, and more stately, then the kings palace which he himselfe ouerthrew. And to say truly, Valerius dwelt in a house a litle too sumptuously built and seated, vpon the hanging of the hill called mount Velia: and because it stood high, it ouerlooked all the market place, so that any man might easily see from thēce what was done there. Furthermore, it was very il to come to it: but when he came out of his house, it was a maruellous pompe & state to see him come downe from so high a place, and with a traine after him, that caried the maiestie of a kings court. But herein Valerius left a noble example, shewing how much it importeth a noble man and magistrate, ruling weighty causes, to haue his eares open to heare, and willingly to receiue free speech in steed of flatterie, and plaine troth in place of lies. For, being informed by some of his friends, how the people misliked and complained of it, he stood not in his own conceit, neither was angry with them: but forthwith set a world of workmen vpon it, early in the morning before breake of day, and commanded them to plucke downe his house, and to raze it to the ground. Insomuch as the next day following, when the ROMAINES were gathered together in the market place, and saw this great sodaine ruine, they much commended the noble act and mind of Valerius, in doing that he did: but so were they angry, and sorie both to see so faire and stately a built house (which was an ornament to the city) ouerthrowne vpon a sodain. Much like in comparison to a man, whom through spite and enuy they had vniustly put to death: and to see their chiefe magistrate also like a stranger and vagabond, compelled to seek his lodging in another mans house. For his friends receiued him into their houses, vntill such time as the people had giuen him a place, where they did build him a new house, far more orderly and nothing so stately and curious as the first was, & it was in the same place, where the temple called Vicus Publicus standeth at this day. Now because he would not only reforme his person, but the office of his Consulship, and also would frame himselfe to the good acceptation and liking of the people: where before he seemed vnto them to be fearefull, he put away the carying of the axes from the rods, which the sergeants vsed to beare before ỹ Consul. Moreouer when he came into the market place, where the people were assembled, he caused the rods to be borne downwards, as in token of reuerence of the soueraigne maiesty of the people: which al the magistrates obserue yet at this day. Now in all this humble shew and lowlines of his, he did not so much imbase his dignity and greatnes, which the common people thought him to haue at the first: as he did ther by cut off enuy from him, winning againe as much true authority, as in semblance he would seeme to haue lost. For this made the people willinger to obey, and readier to submit themselues vnto him: insomuch as vpon this occasion he was surnamed Publicola, as much to say, as the people pleaser. Which surname he kept euer after, & we from henceforth also writing the rest of his life wil vse no other name: for he was contented to suffer any man that would, to offer himselfe to aske the Consulship in Brutus place. But he yet not knowing what kind of man they would ioyne fellow

Consull with him, and fearing lest through enuie or ignorance, the partie might thwart his purpose and meaning: employed his sole power and authority whilest he ruled alone, vpon high and noble attempts. For first of al he supplied vp the number of the Senatours that were greatly decayed, because king Tarquin had put some of them to death not long before, and other also had bene lately slaine in the wars, in whose places he had chosen new Senatours, to the number of a hundred threescore and foure. After that, he made new decrees and laws which greatly did aduance the authority of the people. The first law gaue liberty to all offenders, condemned by iudgement of the Consuls, to appeale vnto the people. The second, that no man vpon paine of death should take vpon him the exercise of any office, vnlesse he had come to it by the gift of the people. The third was, all in fauor of the poore, that the poore citizens of Rome should pay no more custome, nor any impost whatsoeuer. This made euery man the more willing to giue himselfe to some craft or occupation, when he saw his trauell should not be taxed, or taken from him. As for the law that he made against those that disobeyed the Consuls, it was found to be so fauourable to the communaltie, as they thought it was rather made for the poore, then for the rich and great men. For the offenders and breakers of that law, were condemned to pay for a penaltie, the value of fiue oxen and two muttons. The price of a mutton was then, ten oboles, and of an oxe, an hundred oboles. For in those daies, the Romanes had no store of coyned money: otherwise, they lacked no sheep, nor other rother beasts. Hereof it came, that to this day they call their riches or substance, Peculium, because Pecus signifieth sheepe and muttons. And in the old time the stampe vpon their money was an oxe, a mutton, or a hogge: and some of them called their children Bubulci, which signifieth cowheards: others Caprarij, to say, goateheards: and other Porcij, as you would say, swineheards. Now though in all his other lawes he was very fauourable and temperate towards the people: yet in that moderation, sometimes he did set grieuous paines and punishments. For he made it lawfull to kill any man without any accusation, that did aspire to the kingdome, and he did set the murderer free of all punishment: so he brought forth manifest proofe, that the partie slaine, had practised to make himselfe King. As being impossible a man should pretend so great a matter, and no man should find it: and contrariwise being possible, albeit he were spied, that otherwise he might attempt it, by making himselfe so strong, that he needed not passe for the law. In this case he gaue euery man liberty by such an act or meane, to preuent him if he could of discretion, who by strength otherwise sought to aspire to reigne. They greatly commẽded him also for the law that he made touching the treasure. For being very necessarie that euery priuate citizen should according to his ability, be contributor to the charges and maintenance of the wars: he himself would neither take such collection into his charge, nor suffer any man of his to meddle with the same, nor yet that it should be laid in any priuate mans house, but he did ordaine that Saturnes temple should be the treasurie thereof. This order they keepe to this present day. Furthermore, he granted the people to chuse two young men Quæstores of the same, as you would say the treasurers, to take the charge of this money: and the two first which were chosen, were Publius Veturius, and Marcus Minutus, who gathered great summes of mony together. For numbring the people by the polle, there were found a hundred and thirty thousand persons which had paied subsidie, not reckoning in this account, orphans, or widowes, which were exempted from all payments. After he had established all these things, he caused Lucretius (the father of Lucretia) to be chosen fellow Consull with him, vnto whom, for that he was his ancient, he gaue the vpper hand, and commanded they should carrie before him the rods, which were the signes of the chiefe magistrate: and euer since they haue giuen this honor vnto age. But Lucretius dying not long after his election, they chose againe in his place Marcus Horatius, who held out the Consulship with Publicola the rest of the yeare. Now about that time King Tarquine remained in the countrie of Thvscane, where he prepared a second armie against the Romains, and there fell out a maruellous strange thing thereupon. For when he reigned King of Rome, he had almost made an end of the building of the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, and was determined (whether by any oracle receiued, or vpon any fantasie, it is not knowne) to set vp a couch of earth baked by a potter, in the highest place of the temple, and he put it out to be done by certain Thvscane workmen of the city of Veies: but whilest they were in hand with the worke, he was driuen out of his Realme. When the Workemen had formed this couch, and that they had put it into the fornace to bake it, it fell out contrary to the nature of the earth, and the common order of their worke put into the fornace. For the earth

earth did not ſhut and cloſe together in the fire, nor dryed vp all the moiſture thereof: but rather to the contrary it did ſwell to ſuch a bigneſſe, and grew ſo hard & ſtrong withall, that they were driuen to break vp the head and walles of the fornace to get it out. The ſoothſayers did expound this, that it was a celeſtiall token from aboue, and promiſed great proſperity and increaſe of power vnto thoſe that ſhould enioy this coach. Whereupon the VEIANS reſolued not to deliuer it vnto the ROMAINES that demanded it, but anſwered that it did belong vnto King Tarquine, and not vnto thoſe that had baniſhed him. Not many daies after, there was a ſolemne feaſt of games for running of horſes in the city of VEIES, where they did alſo many other notable acts, worthy ſight according to their cuſtome. But after the game was played, he that had won the bell, being crowned in token of victory, as they did vſe at that time, brought his coach and horſes faire and ſoftly out of the ſhew place: and ſodainely the horſes being affraid vpon no preſent cauſe or occaſion ſeene, whether it was by chance, or by ſome ſecret working from aboue, ranne as they had bene mad with their coach to the city of ROME. The coach driuer did what he could poſſible at the firſt to ſtay them, by holding in the reines, by clapping them on the backes, and ſpeaking gently to them: but in the end, perceiuing he could doe no good, and that they would haue their ſwinge, he gaue place to their fury, and they neuer left running, till they brought him neare to the Capitoll, where they ouerthrew him and his coach, not farre from the gate called at this preſent, Ratumena. The VEIANS wondering much at this matter, and being affraid withall, were contented the workmen ſhould deliuer their coach made of earth vnto the ROMAINES. Now concerning Iupiter Capitolins temple, king Tarquin the firſt (which was the ſonne of Demaratus) vowed in the warres that he made againſt the SABYNES, that he would build it. And Tarquin the proud, being the ſonne of him that made this vow did build it: howbeit he did not conſecrate it, becauſe he was driuen out of his Kingdome before he had finiſhed it. When this temple was built and throughly finiſhed, and ſet forth with all his ornaments: Publicola was maruellouſly deſirous to haue the honor of the dedication thereof. But the noble men and Senatours enuying his glory, being very angry that he could not content himſelfe with all thoſe honours that he had receiued in peace for the good lawes he had made, and in warres for the victories he had obtained and well deſerued, but further that he would ſeeke the honour of this dedication, which nothing did pertaine vnto him: they then did egge Horatius, and perſwaded him to make ſuite for the ſame. Occaſion fell out at that time, that Publicola muſt haue the leading of the ROMAINES army into the field: in the meane time while Publicola was abſent, it was procured that the people gaue their voices to Horatius, to conſecrate the temple, knowing they could not ſo wel haue brought it to paſſe he being preſēt. Other ſay, the Conſuls drew lots betweene them, and that it lighted vpon Publicola to lead the army againſt his wil, and vpon Horatius to conſecrate this temple, which may be coniectured by the thing that fortuned in the dedicatiō therof. For al the people being aſſembled together in the Capitol with great ſilence, on the 15. day of the moneth of September, which is about the new moone of the moneth which the GRECIANS call Metagitnion: Horatius hauing done all the ceremonies needfull in ſuch a caſe, & holding then the doores of the temple as the vſe was, euen to vtter the ſolemne words of dedication, Marcus Valerius, the brother of Publicola, hauing ſtood a long time there at the temple doore, to take an oportunity to ſpeake, began to ſay alowd in this wiſe: My Lord Conſull, your ſonne is dead of a ſickneſſe in the Campe. This made all the aſſembly ſorie to heare it, but it nothing amazed Horatius, who ſpake onely thus much: Caſt his body then where you will, for me the thought is taken. So hee continued on to end his conſecration. This was but a deuice and nothing true, of Marcus Valerius, onely to make Horatius leaue off his conſecration. Horatius in this ſhewed himſelfe a maruellous reſolute man, were it that he ſtraight found his deuice, or that he beleeued it to be true: for the ſodaineneſſe of the matter nothing altered him. The very like matter fell out in conſecrating of the ſecond temple. For this firſt which Tarquine had built and Horatius conſecrated, was conſumed by fire in the ciuill warres: and the ſecond was built vp againe by Sylla, who made no dedication of it. For Catulus ſet vp the ſuperſcription of the dedication, becauſe Sylla died before he could dedicate it. The ſecond temple was burnt againe not long after the troubles and tumults which were at ROME, vnder Vitellius the Emperour. The third in like manner was reedified and built againe by Veſpaſian, from the ground to the top. But this good happe he had aboue other: to ſee his worke perfected and finiſhed before his death, and not ouerthrowne, as it was immediatly after his death. Wherein he did farre paſſe

the happines of Sylla, who died before he could dedicate that he had built: and the other deceased before he saw his work ouerthrowne. For all the Capitoll was burnt to the ground incontinently after his death. It is reported the only foundations of the first temple, cost Tarquinius fortie thousand Pondos of siluer. And to gild only the temple which we see now in our time, they say all the goods and substance that the richest citizen of ROME then had, will come nothing neare vnto it: for it cost aboue 12. thousand talents. The pillars of this temple are cut out of a quarry of marble, called pentlike marble, and they were squared parpine, as thick as long: these I saw at ATHENS. But afterwards they were cut againe, & polished in ROME, by which doing they got not so much grace, as they lost proportion: for they were made too slender, & left naked of their first beauty. Now he that would wonder at the stately building of the Capitol, if he came afterwards vnto the palace of Domitian, and did but see some gallery, porch, hall, or hot house, or his concubines chambers: he would say (in my opinion) as the Poet Epicarmus said of a prodigall man:

How much was spent in building the Capitoll

It is a fault, and folly both in thee,
To lash out gifts, and prodigall rewards:
For fond delights, without all rule that bee,
Regarding not what happens afterwards.

So might they iustly say of Domitian: Thou art not liberall, nor deuout vnto the gods: but it is a vice thou hast to loue to build, and desirest (as they say of old Midas) that all about thee were turned to gold and precious stones. And thus much for this matter. Tarquin after that great foughten battell wherein he lost his sonne (that was slaine by Brutus in fighting together hand to hand) went to the city of CLVSIVM, vnto King Claras Porsena, the mightiest Prince that reigned at that time in all ITALIE, and was both noble and a courteous Prince. Porsena promised him aide: and first of all he sent to ROME to summon the citizens to receiue their King againe. But the ROMAINES refusing the summons, he sent forthwith an Herald to proclaime open warres against them, and to tell them where, and when he would meete them: and then marched thitherwards immediatly with a great armie. Publicola now being absent, was chosen Consull the second time, and Titus Lucretius with him. When he was returned home againe to ROME, because he would exceed King Porsena in greatnesse of mind, he began to build a city called SIGLIVRIA, euen when the King with all his armie was not farre from ROME: and hauing walled it about to his maruellous charge, he sent thither seuen hundred citizens to dwell there, to shew that he made litle account of this warre. Howbeit Porsena at his comming did giue such a lusty assault to the mount Ianiculum, that they draue out the souldiers which kept the same, who flying towards ROME, were pursued so hard with the enemies, that with them they had entred the towne, had not Publicola made a sally out to resist them. Who began a hot skirmish hard by the riuer of Tyber, and there thought to haue staied the enemies, to follow any further: which being the greater number did ouerlay the ROMAINES, and did hurt Publicola very sore in this skirmish, so as he was caried away into the citie in his souldiers armes. And euen so was the other Consull Lucretius hurt in like case: which so discouraged and frayed the ROMANES, that they all took them to their legges, and fled towards the city. The enemies pursued them at their heeles, as farre as the woodden bridge: so that the city was in maruellous hazard of taking vpon the sodaine. But Horatius Cocles, and Herminius, and Lucretius, two other of the chiefest noble yong men of the citie, stood with them to the defence of the bridge, and made head against the enemie. This Horatius was surnamed Cocles (as much to say, as one eye) because he had lost one of the in the wars. Howbeit other writers say, it was because of his flat nose, which was so sunke into his head, that they saw nothing to part his eyes, but that the eye browes did meete together: by reason whereof the people thinking to surname him Cyclops, by corruption of the tongue they called him (as they say) Cocles. But howsoeuer it was, this Horatius Cocles had the courage to shew his face against the enemy, and to keep the bridge, vntill such time as they had cut & broken it vp behind him. When he saw they had done that, armed as he was, and hurt in the hip with a pike of the THVSCANES, he leaped into the riuer of Tyber, and saued himselfe by swimming vnto the other side. Publicola wondering at this manly act of his, perswaded the ROMAINES straight, euery one according to his ability, to giue him so much as he spent in a day: and afterwards also he caused the common treasurie to giue him as much land as he could compasse about with his plow in a day. Furthermore he made his image of brasse to be set vp in the temple of Vulcane, comforting by this honour his wounded hippe, whereof he was lame euer after. Now whilest

King

King Porſena was hotly bent very ſtraightly to beſiege ROME, there began a famine among the ROMAINES: and to increaſe the danger, there came a new army out of THVSCANE which ouerranne, burnt, and made waſte, all the territorie of ROME. Whereupon Publicola being choſen Conſull then the third time, thought hee ſhould needs to do no more to reſiſt Porſena bravely, but to be quiet only, and to looke well to the ſafe keeping of the city. Howbeit ſpying his oportunity, he ſecretly ſtole out of ROME with a power, and did ſet vpon the THVSCANES that deſtroyed the countrey about: and ouerthrew and ſlue of them fiue thouſand men. As for the hiſtorie of Mutius, many do diuerſly report it: but I will write it in ſuch ſort, as I think ſhall beſt agree with the truth. This Mutius was a worthy man in all reſpects, but ſpecially for the warres. He deuiſing how he might come to kill King Porſena, diſguiſed himſelfe in THVSCANES apparell, and ſpeaking THVSCANE very perfectly, went into his campe, and came to the Kings chaire, in the which he gaue audience: and not knowing him perfectly, he durſt not aske which was he, leſt he ſhould be diſcouered, but drew his ſword at aduenture, and ſlue him whom hee tooke to be King. Vpon that they layd hold on him, and examined him. And a pan full of fire being brought for the King that intended to do ſacrifice vnto the gods, Mutius held out his right hand ouer the fire, and boldly looking the King full in his face, whileſt the fleſh of his hand did frie off, he neuer changed hew nor countenance: the King wondering to ſee ſo ſtrange a ſight, called to them to withdraw the fire, and he himſelfe did deliuer him his ſword againe. Mutius tooke it of him with his left hand, whereupon they ſay afterwards, he had giuen him the ſurname of Scæuola, as much to ſay, as left handed, and told him in taking of it: Thou couldeſt not Porſena with feare haue ouercomed me, but now through courteſie thou haſt wonne me. Therefore for good will I will reueale that vnto thee, which no force nor extremitie could haue made me vtter. There are three hundred ROMAINS diſperſed through thy camp, all which are prepared with like minds to follow that I haue begunne, onely gaping for oportunitie to put it in practiſe. The lot fell on me to be the firſt to breake the ice of the enterpriſe: and yet I am not ſory my hand failed to kill ſo worthy a man, that deſerueth rather to be a friend then an enemy vnto the ROMAINES. Porſena hearing this, did beleeue it, and euer after he gaue the more willing eare to thoſe that treated with him of peace: not ſo much (in my opinion) for that he feared the three hundred lying in waite to kill him, as for the admiration of the ROMAINES noble mind and great courage. All other writers call this man, Mutius Scæuola: howbeit Athenodorus ſurnamed Sandon, in a booke he wrote vnto Octauia, Auguſtus ſiſter, ſaith that he was alſo called Opſigonus, But Publicola taking king Porſena not to be ſo dangerous an enemy to ROME, as he ſhould be a profitable friend and ally to the ſame, let him vnderſtand that he was contented to make him iudge of the controuerſie betweene them and Tarquine: whom he did many times prouoke to come and haue his cauſe heard before king Porſena, where he would iuſtifie to his face, that he was the naughtieſt and moſt wicked man of the world, and that he was iuſtly driuen out of his countrie. Tarquine ſharpely anſwered, that he would make no man his iudge, and Porſena leaſt of all other, for that hauing promiſed him to put him againe in his Kingdome, he was now gone from his word, and had changed his minde. Porſena was very angry with this anſwere iudging this a manifeſt token that his cauſe was ill. Wherefore Porſena being ſolicited againe by his owne ſonne Aruns, who loued the ROMAINES, did eaſily grant them peace vpon condition: that they ſhould redeliuer backe againe to him the lands they had gotten before within the country of THVSCANE, with the priſoners alſo which they had taken in this warre, and in lieu thereof he offered to deliuer to them againe the ROMAINS, that had fled from them vnto him. To confirme this peace, the ROMAINES deliuered him hoſtages, ten of the nobleſt mens ſonnes of the city, and ſo many of their daughters: among which was Valeria, Publicolaes owne daughter. Peace being thus concluded, Porſena brake his army, and withdrew his ſtrength, truſting to the peace concluded. The ROMAINES daughters deliuered for hoſtages, came downe to the riuers ſide to waſh them, in a quiet place where the ſtreame ranne but gently, without any force or ſwiftneſſe at all. When they were there, and ſaw they had no guard about them, nor any came that way, nor yet any boates going vp nor downe the ſtreame: they had a deſire to ſwimme ouer the riuer, which ranne with a ſwift ſtreame, and was maruellous deepe. Some ſay, that one Clelia ſwamme the riuer vpon her horſe backe, and that ſhe did embolden and encourage the other to ſwimme hard by her horſe ſide: and recouering the other banke, and being paſt all danger, they went and preſented themſelues before

Whereof Tarquine hauing intelligence, he layed an ambush for them that had the conduction of them. Who so soone as they were past the riuer, did shew themselues, and brake vpon the ROMAINES: they being farre fewer in number then the other, did yet very stoutly defend themselues. Now whiles they were in earnest fight together, Valeria Publicolaes daughter, and three of her fathers seruants, escaped through the midst of them, and saued themselues. The residue of the virgins remained in the middest among their swords, in great danger of their liues. Aruns king Porsenas sonne aduertised hereof, ran thither incontinently to the rescue: but when he came the enemies fled, and the ROMAINES held on their iourny to redeliuer their hostages. Porsena seeing them againe, asked which of them it was that began first to passe the riuer, and had encouraged the other to follow her. One pointed him vnto her, and told him her name was Clælia. He looked vpon her very earnestly, and with a pleasant countenance, and commanded they should bring him one of his best horses in the stable, and the richest furniture he had for the same, and so he gaue it vnto her. Those which hold opinion that none but Clælia passed the riuer on horsebacke, do alledge this to proue their opinion true. Other do deny it, saying that this THVSCANS king, did only honour her noble courage. Howsoeuer it was, they see her image on horsebacke in the holy streete, as they goe to the pallace: and some say it is the statue of Valeria other of Clælia. After Porsena had made peace with the ROMAINES, in breaking vp his campe, he shewed his noble mind vnto them in many other things, and specially in that he commanded his souldiers they should cary nothing but their armour and weapon only, leauing his campe full of corne, victuals, and other kind of goods. From whence this custome came, that at this day when they make open sale of any thing belonging to the common-weale, the sergeant or common crier crieth, that they are king Porsenas goods, and taken of thankefulnesse and perpetuall memory of his bounty & liberality towards them. Further, Porsenas image standeth adioyning to the pallace where the Senate is vsed to be kept, which is made of great antique worke. Afterwards the SABYNES inuading the ROMAINS territory with a great force, Marcus Valerius Publicolaes brother, was then chosen Consull, with one Posthumius Tubertus. Howbeit all matters of weight and importance passed by Publicolaes counsell and authoritie, who was present at any thing that was done: and by whose meanes Marcus his brother wan two great battels, in the last whereof he slue thirteene thousand of his enemies, not losing one of his owne men. For which his victories, besides the honour of triumph he had, the people also at their owne charges, built him a house in the street of mount Palatine, & granted him moreouer that his dore should open outwards into the street, where al other mens doores did open inwards into their house: signifying by grant of this honour and priuiledge, that he should alwaies haue benefit by the common-weale. It is reported that the GRECIANS doores of their houses in old time, did all open outwards after that fashion: and they doe coniecture it by the comedies that are plaied: where those that would go out of their houses, did first knocke at their doores, and make a noise within the house, lest in opening their doore vpon a sudden, they might ouerthrow or hurt him that taried at the street doore, or passed by the way, who hearing the noise, had warning straight to auoid the danger. The next yeare after that, Publicola was chosen Consul the fourth time, because they stood in great doubt that the SABYNES and LATINES would ioyne together to make wars vpon them: besides all this, there was a certaine superstitious feare ran through the city, of some ill hap toward it, because most part of the women with child were deliuered of vnperfect children, lacking some one lim or other, and al of them came before their time. Wherefore Publicola looking in some of Sybillaes bookes, made priuate sacrifice vnto Pluto, and did set vp againe some feasts and solemne games that were left off, and had bene commanded before time to be kept by the Oracle of Apollo. These meanes hauing a little reioyced the city with good hope, because they thought that the anger of the gods had bene appeased: Publicola then began to prouide for the dangers that they were threatned withall by men, for that newes was brought him that their enemies were vp in al places, and made great preparation to inuade them. Now there was at that time amongst the SABYNES, a great rich mā called Appius Clausius, very strong and actiue of body, and otherwise a man of great reputation and eloquence, aboue all the reſt of his country men: but notwithſtanding he was much enuied, and could not auoide it, being a thing common to great men. He went about to ſtay thoſe intended wars againſt the Romaines. Whereupon, many which before tooke occaſion to murmur againſt him, did now much more increaſe the ſame: with ſaying hee ſought to maintaine the power of the Romaines, that afterwards by their aide he might make himſelf tyrant & king of the country. The cõmon people gaue eaſie eare vnto ſuch ſpeeches, & Appius perceiuing wel inough how the ſoldiers hated him deadly, he feared they would complaine and accuſe him. Wherefore being wel backed & ſtood to by his kinſemen, friends, and followers, he practiſed to make a ſtir among the Sabynes, which was the cauſe of ſtaying the wars againſt the Romaines. Publicola alſo for his part was very diligent, not only to vnderſtand the originall cauſe of this ſedition, but to feede on further and increaſe the ſame, hauing gotten men meete for that purpoſe, which carried Appius ſuch a meſſage from him: That Publicola knew very well he was a iuſt man, and one that would not be reuenged of his citizens to the generall hurt of his countrey, although the iniuries he receiued at their hands, deliuered him iuſt occaſion to do it: neuertheleſſe if he had any deſire to prouide for his ſafety, and to repaire to Rome, leauing them which cauſeleſſe wiſhed him ſo much euill, they would both openly and priuatly receiue him with that due honour which his vertue deſerued, and the worthineſſe of the Romaine people required. Clauſus hauing long and many times conſidered this matter with himſelf, reſolued that it was the beſt way he could take, making vertue of neceſſity; and therefore being determined to do it, he did procure his friends to do as he did, and they got other alſo to them, ſo that he brought away with him out of the countrey of the Sabynes, fiue thouſand families with their wiues and children (of the quieteſt and moſt peaceable people among the Sabynes) to dwell at Rome. Publicola being aduertiſed thereof before they came, did receiue them at their coming to Rome, with great ioy, and all manner of good courteous entertainement. For at their firſt coming, he made them all and their families free citizens, and aſſigned vnto euery perſon of them two iugera of land (which contained one acre, one rood, eleuen pole, and ſixtie nine parts of a pole) by the riuer of Tyber: and vnto Appius ſelfe he gaue fiue and twenty iugera (to wit, ſixteene acres and a halfe, foure pole and ſeuenty ſixe parts of a pole) and receiued him into the number of the Senatours. And thus came he firſt vnto the gouernement of the common-weale in Rome, where he did ſo wiſely behaue himſelfe, that in the end he came to be the chiefeſt man of dignity and authority in Rome, ſo long as he liued. After his death he left behind him the family of the Claudians, deſcending from him: which for honour, and worthineſſe, gaue no place to the nobleſt family in Rome. But now the ſedition amongſt the Sabynes being pacified, by the departure of thoſe that were gone to Rome: the ſeditious gouernours would not ſuffer thoſe that remained to liue in peace, but ſtil cried out, it were too much ſhame for them, that Clauſus being a fugitiue, and become an enemy, ſhould honour their enemies abroad, that being preſent durſt not ſhew ſo much at home, and that the Romaines ſhould eſcape vnreuenged, who had done them ſuch apparant wrongs. So they raiſed great force and power, and went and encamped with their army neere the city of Fidenes, and layd an ambuſh hard by Rome, in certaine hidden and hollow places, where they put two thouſand choiſe footmen, very well armed, and did appoint the next morning to ſend certaine light horſemen to runne and prey to Rome gates: commanding them, that when the Romaines came out of the city to charge them, they ſhould ſeeme leiſurely to retire, vntill they had drawne them within danger of their ambuſh. Publicola receiuing full intelligence of all their intention, by a traitour that fled from them vnto him, made due preparation to encounter with their priuy ambuſh, and ſo deuided his army into two parts: for he gaue his ſonne in law Poſthumius Balbus, three thouſand footmen, whom hee ſent away by night, commanding them the ſame night to take the hils, in the bottome whereof the Sabyns were laid in ambuſh. Lucretius, fellow Conſull with Publicola, hauing the lighteſt and luſtieſt men of the citie, was appointed to make head againſt the vantcurrers of the Sabynes that minded to approch the gates. And Publicola with the reſt of the army, marched a great compaſſe about to incloſe his enemies behind. The next morning betimes, by chance it was a thicke miſte, and at that preſent time, Poſthumius comming downe from the hilles, with great ſhoutes charged them that lay in ambuſh. Lucretius on the other ſide, ſet vpon the light horſemen of the Sabynes: and Publicola fell vpon their campe. without any turning againe to make reſiſtance. Thus the place which gaue them hope of beſt ſafety, turned moſt to their deadly ouerthrow. For euery one of their companies ſuppoſing the other had bene whole and vnbroken, when a charge was giuen vpon them, did ſtraight breake, & neuer a company of them turned head toward their enemy. For they that were in the camp, ran toward them that were in ambuſh: and thoſe which were in ambuſh on the contrary ſide, ranne towards them that were in campe. So that in flying the one met with the other, and found thoſe, towards whom they were flying to haue bene ſafe, to ſtand in as much need of helpe as themſelues. That which ſaued ſome that were not ſlaine, was the city of FIDENES, which was neere the camp, and ſpecially ſaued thoſe which fled thither. But ſuch as came ſhort of the city, and could not in time recouer it, were all ſlaine in the field, or taken priſoners. As for the glory of this honourable victory, albeit the ROMAINES were wont to aſcribe all ſuch great notable matters to the ſpeciall prouidence and grace of the gods, yet at that time notwithſtanding, they did iudge that this happy ſucceſſe fell out by the wiſe foreſight and valiantneſſe of the Captaine. For euery man that had ſerued in this iourney, had no other talke in his mouth, but that Publicola had deliuered their enemies into their hands, lame, and blind, and as a man might ſay, bound hand and feete to kill them at their pleaſure. The people were maruellouſly enriched by this victory, as well for the ſpoyle, as for the ranſome of the priſoners that they had gotten.

The Sabynes ſlaine

Now Publicola after he had triumphed, and left the gouernement of the citie to thoſe which were choſen Conſuls for the yeare following, died inconuinently, hauing liued as honourably and vertuouſly all the dayes of his life, as any man liuing might do. The people then took order for his funerals, that the charges therof ſhould be defrayed by the city, as if they had neuer done him any honour in his life, and that they had bene ſtill debters vnto him for the noble ſeruice he had done vnto the ſtate and common-weale whileſt he liued. Therefore towards his funerall charges, euery citizen gaue a peece of mony called Quatrine. The women alſo for their part to honour his funerals, agreed among themſelues to mourne a whole yeare in blacke for him, which was a great and honourable memoriall. He was buried alſo by expreſſe order of the people, within the city, in the ſtreete called Velia; and they granted priuiledge alſo vnto all his poſterity, to be buried in the ſelfe ſame place. Howbeit they do no more bury any of his there. But when any dye, they bring the corſe vnto this place, and one holding a torch burning in his hand, doth put it vnder the place, and take it ſtraight away againe, to ſhew that they haue liberty to bury him there, but that they willingly refuſe this honour: and this done, they cary the corſe away againe.

THE COMPARISON OF Solon with Publicola.

NOW presently to compare these two personages together, it seemeth they both had one vertue in them: which is not found in any other of their liues which we haue written of before. And the same is, that the one hath bene a witnesse, and the other a follower of him, to whom he was like. So as the sentence that Solon spake to king Crœsus, touching Tellus felicity and happinesse, might haue bene better applyed vnto Publicola then to Tellus: whom he iudged to be very happy, because he dyed honourably, he had liued vertuously, and had left behind him goodly children. And yet Solon speaketh nothing of his excellency or vertue in any of his poems: neither did he euer beare any honourable office in all his time, nor yet left any children that caried any great fame or renowne after his death. Whereas Publicola so long as he liued, was alwaies the chiefe among the ROMAINES, of credit and authority: and afterwards since his death, certaine of the noblest families, and most ancient houses of ROME in these our daies, as the PVBLICOLES, the MESSALES, and the VALERIANS, for sixe hundred yeares continuance, do referre the glory of the nobility and ancientry of their houses vnto him. Furthermore, Tellus was slaine by his enemies, fighting valiantly like a worthy honest man. But Publicola died after he had slaine his enemies: which is farre more greater good hap, then to be slaine. For after he as Generall had honourably serued his country in the wars and had left them conquerers, hauing in his life time receiued al honours and triumphs due vnto his seruice, he attained to that happy end of life, which Solon accompted and esteemed most happy and blessed. Also in wissing manner, he would his end should be lamented to his praise, in a place where he confuteth Mimnermus, about the continuance of mans life, by saying:

Publicola happy.

Let not my death without lamenting passe,
But rather let my friends bewaile the same:
Whose grieuous teares, and cries of out alas,
May oft resound the Eccho of my name.

If that be good happe, then most happie maketh he Publicola: for at his death, not only his friends and kinsfolkes, but the whole citie also, and many thousand persons besides, did bitterly bewaile the losse of him. For all the women of ROME did mourne for him in blacke, and did most pitifully lament his death, as euery one of them had lost either father, brother, or husband.

True it is, that I couet goods to haue:
But yet so got as may me not deprane.

Solon saith this, because vengeance followed ill gotten goods. And Publicola tooke great heede, not onely to get his goods most iustly, but had regard that those which hee had, hee ſpent moſt honeſtly in helping the needie. So that if Solon was iuſtly reputed the wiſeſt man, we muſt needs confeſſe alſo that Publicola was the happieſt. For what the one deſired for the greateſt and moſt perfect good a man can haue in the world, the other hath wonne it, kept it, and vſed it all his life time, vntill the houre of his death. And thus hath Solon honoured Publicola, and Publicola hath done the like vnto Solon; ſhewing himſelfe a perfect example & looking-glaſſe, where men may ſee how to gouerne a popular ſtate: when he made his Conſulſhip void of all pride and ſtately ſhew, and became himſelfe affable, courteous, and beloued of euery body. So tooke he profit by many of his lawes: as when he ordained, that the people onely ſhould haue authority to chuſe and create all common officers and magiſtrates, and that they might appeale from any Iudge to the people · as Solon when he ſuffered them to appeale vnto the iudges of the people. Indeed Publicola did not create any new Senate, as Solon did: but hee did augment the firſt number, with as many perſons almoſt as there were before. He did alſo firſt erect the office of Quæſtores, for keeping of all fines, taxes, and other collections of money. Becauſe the chiefeſt magiſtrate, if he were an honeſt man, ſhould not for ſo light an occaſion be taken from the care of better and more weighty affaires: and if hee were wickedly giuen, and ill diſpoſed, that he ſhould haue no ſuch meane or occaſion to worke his wicked will, by hauing the treaſure of the city in his hands, and to command what hee liſt. Moreouer in hating the tyrants, Publicola therein was farre more ſharpe and terrible. For Solon in his lawes puniſhed him that went about to make himſelfe a tyrant, yet after he was conuicted thereof by law; but Publicola ordained that they ſhould kill him, before the law did paſſe vpon him, that ſought to be king. And where Solon iuſtly and truly vaunteth himſelfe, that being offered to be King and Lord of ATHENS, and that with the whole conſent of the citizens, yet he did notwithſtanding refuſe it: this vaunt and glory is as due vnto Publicola; who finding the dignitie of a Conſull tyrannicall, he brought it to be more lowly and fauourable for the people, not taking vpon him all the authority he might lawfully haue done. And it ſeemeth that Solon knew before him, what was the true and direct way to gouerne a common-weale vpright. For he ſaith in one place:

Publicola erected the office of Quæſtores.

Both great and ſmall of power, the better will obay,
If wee too little or too much, vpon them do not lay.

The diſcharging of debts was proper to Solon, which was a full confirmation of liberty. For little preuaileth law to make equality among citizens, when debts doe hinder the poore people to enioy the benefit thereof. And where it ſeemeth that they haue moſt libertie, as in that they may be choſen Iudges and officers, to ſpeake their opinion in the councell, and giue their voyces alſo: there indeed are they moſt bound and ſubiect, becauſe they do but obey the rich in all they do command. But yet in this act there is a thing more wonderfull, and worthie to be noted: That commonly diſcharging of debts, was wont to breede great tumults and ſeditions in common-weales. And Solon hauing vſed it in a very good time (as the Phyſition venturing a dangerous medicine) did appeaſe the ſedition already begun, and did vtterly quench through his glory, and the common opinion they had of his wiſdome and vertue, all the infamy and accuſation that might haue growne of that act. As for their firſt entrie into the gouernement, Solons beginning was farre more noble: for he went before, and followed not another; and himſelfe alone without any others helpe, did put in execution the beſt, and more part of his notable and goodly lawes. Yet was Publicolaes end and death much more glorious and happie: for Solon before hee died, ſaw all his common-wealth ouerthrowne; but Publicolaes common-weale continued whole as he left it, vntill the broile of ciuill wars began againe among them. Solon, after he had made his lawes, and written them in wooden tables, leauing them without defence of any man, went his way immediatly out of the city of ATHENS. Publicola abiding continually in ROME gouerning the ſtate, did throughly ſtabliſh and confirme the lawes he made. Furthermore Solon hauing wiſely foreſeene Pyſiſtratus practiſes, aſpiring to make himſelfe King, he could neuer let him for all that, but was himſelfe ouercome and oppreſſed with the tyranny he ſaw ſtabliſhed in his owne ſight, and in deſpite of him: where Publicola ouerthrew and did put downe a mighty Kingdome, that had continued of long time, and was throughly ſtabliſhed; his vertue and deſire being equall with Solons, and hauing had beſides fortune fauourable, and ſufficient power to execute his vertuous and well diſpoſed mind. But as for warres and martiall deeds, there is no compariſon to be made betweene them. For Daimachus

Plataian

Plataian, doth not attribute the warres of the MEGARIANS vnto Solon, as we haue written it: where Publicola being Generall of an army, and fighting himſelfe in perſon, hath wonne many great battels. And as for matters of peace and ciuill gouernement, Solon neuer durſt preſent himſelf openly to perſwade the enterpriſe of SALAMINA, but vnder a counterfeit madneſſe, and as a foole to make ſport: where Publicola taking his aduenture from the beginning, ſhewed himſelfe without diſſimulation, an open enemy to Tarquine, and afterwards he reuealed all the whole conſpiracy. And when he had bene the onely cauſe and author of puniſhing the traytours, he did not only driue out of ROME the tyrants ſelues in perſon, but tooke from them alſo all hope of returne againe. Who hauing alwaies thus nobly and valiantly behaued himſelfe, without ſhrinking backe, or flying from ought that required force, a manly courage, or open reſiſtance: did yet ſhew himſelfe diſcreet, where wiſedome was requiſite, or reaſon and perſwaſion needfull. As when he cunningly wanne King Porſena, who was a dreadfull enemy vnto him, and inuincible by force: whom he handled in ſuch good ſort, that he made him his friend. Peraduenture ſome might ſtand in this, and ſay: that Solon recouered the Ile of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, which they would haue loſt. Publicola to the contrary, reſtored the lands vnto Porſena againe, which the ROMAINS had conquered before, within the country of THVSCANE. But the times in which theſe things were done, are alwaies to be conſidered of. For a wiſe gouernour of a Realme, and politicke man, doth gouerne diuerſly according to the occaſions offered, taking euery thing in his time wherein he will deale: and many times, in letting go one thing, he ſaueth the whole; and in loſing a little, he gaineth much: as Publicola did, who loſing a little peece of another mans countrey which they had vſurped, ſaued by that meanes all that was aſſuredly his owne. And whereas the ROMAINES thought he ſhould do very much for them, to ſaue their city onely, he got them moreouer, all the goods that were in their enemies campe, which did beſiege them. And in making his enemy iudge of his quarrell, he wan the victorie: winning that moreouer, which he would gladly haue giuen to haue ouercome, and haue ſentence paſſe on his ſide. For the King their enemy did not onely make peace with them, but did alſo leaue them all his furniture, prouiſion, and munition for the warres: euen for the vertue, manhood, and iuſtice, which the great wiſdome of the Conſul perſwaded Porſena to beleeue to be in all the other ROMAINES.

The end of Publicolaes life.

THE LIFE OF Themiſtocles.

THEMISTOCLES parentage did litle aduance his glory: for his father Neocles was of ſmall reputation in ATHENS, being of the hundred of Phrear, and tribe of Leontis: of his mother an alien or ſtranger: as theſe verſes do witneſſe:

Abrotonon I am, yborne in Thracia,
And yet this high good hap I haue, that into Grecia
I haue brought forth a ſonne, Themiſtocles by name,
The glory of the Greekiſh blouds, and man of greateſt fame.

Howbeit Phanias writeth, that his mother was not a THRACIAN, but borne in the country of CARIA: and they do not call her Abrotonon, but Euterpé. And Neanthes ſaith furthermore, that ſhe was of HALICARNASSVS, the chiefeſt city of al the Realme of CARIA. For which cauſe when the ſtrangers did aſſemble at Cynoſargos (a place of exerciſe without ŷ gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, in that his mother was a mortall woman:) Themiſtocles perſwaded diuerſe youths of the moſt honourable houſes, to go downe with him, and to anoint themſelues at Cynoſargos, cunningly thereby taking away the difference between the right & alien ſort. But ſetting apart al theſe circumſtances, he was no doubt alied vnto the houſe of the Lycomedians: for Themiſtocles cauſed the chappel of this family, which is in the village of PHLYES, being once burnt by the barbarous people, to be built vp againe at his own charges: & as Simonides ſaith, he did ſet it forth and enrich it with pictures. Moreouer euery man doth confeſſe it, that euen from his childhood they did perceiue he was giuen to be very hot headed, ſtirring, wiſe, and of good ſpirit, and enterpriſing of himſelfe to do great things, and borne to rule weighty cauſes. For at ſuch daies and howres as he was taken from his book, and had leaue to play, he neuer played, nor would neuer be idle, as other children were: but they alwaies found him conning ſome oration without booke, or making it alone by himſelfe: and the ground of this matter was euer commonly, either to defend, or accuſe ſome of his companions. Whereupon his ſchoolemaſter obſeruing him, oft ſaid vnto him: Sure ſome great matter hangeth ouer thy head my boy, for it cannot be choſen but that one day thou ſhalt do ſome notable good thing, or ſome extreme miſchiefe. Therefore when they went about to teach him any thing, onely to checke his nature, or to faſhion him with good manners and ciuility, or to ſtudy any matter for pleaſure or honeſt paſtime, he would ſlowly and careleſſly learne of them.

But

But if they deliuered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning ſtate, they ſaw he would beate at it marueilouſly, and would vnderſtand more then any could of his age & cariage, truſting altogether to his naturall mother wit. This was the cauſe, that being mocked afterwards by ſome that had ſtudied humanity, and other liberall ſciences, he was driuen for reuenge & his own defence, to anſwer with great and ſtout words, ſaying, that indeed he could not skil to tune a harpe, nor a viol, nor to play on a pſalterion: but if they did put a city into his hands that was of ſmall name, weake, and litle, he knew waies inough how to make it noble, ſtrong, and great. Neuertheleſſe, Steſimbrotus writeth, how he went to Anaxagoras ſchoole, and that vnder Meliſſus, he ſtudied naturall Philoſophy. But herein he was greatly deceiued, for that he took no great heed vnto the time. For Meliſſus was captaine of the SAMIANS againſt Pericles, at what time he did lay ſiege vnto the city of SAMOS. Now this is true, Pericles was much yonger then Themiſtocles, and Anaxagoras dwelt with Pericles in his own houſe. Therefore we haue better reaſon and occaſion to beleeue thoſe that write, Themiſtocles did determine to follow Mneſiphilus Phrearian. For he was no profeſſed orator, nor natural Philoſopher, as they termed him in that time: but made profeſſion of that which then they called wiſdome. Which was no other thing, but a certaine knowledge to handle great cauſes, and an indeuor to haue a good wit & iudgement in matters of ſtate & gouernement: which profeſſion beginning in Solon, did continue, & was taken vp from man to man, as a ſect of Philoſophy. But thoſe that came ſithence, haue mingled it with art of ſpeech, & by litle and litle haue tranſlated the exerciſe of deeds, vnto bare and curious words: whereupon they were called Sophiſters, as who would ſay, counterfeit wiſe mē. Notwithſtanding, when Themiſtocles began to meddle with the gouernment of the common-weale, he followed much Mneſiphilus. In the firſt part of his youth, his behauiour & doings were very light & vnconſtant, as one caried away with a raſh head, & without any order or diſcretion: by reaſon whereof his maners and conditions ſeemed marueilouſly to change, and oft times fell into very ill fauored euents, as himſelf did afterwards cōfeſſe, by ſaying: that a ragged colt oft times proues a good horſe, ſpecially if he be wel riddē, & brokē as he ſhould be. Other tales which ſome wil ſeeme to ad to this, are in my opinion but fables. As, that his father did diſinherit him, and that his mother for very care & ſorow ſhe took to ſee the lewd life of her ſon, did kill her ſelfe. For there are that write to the contrary, that his father being deſirous to take him from dealing in gouernment, did go and ſhew him al along the ſea ſhore, the ſhipwracks and ribs of old galleys caſt here & there, whereof no reckoning was made, and ſaid to him: thus the people vſe their gouernours, when they can ſerue no lōger. Howſoeuer it was, it is moſt true that Themiſtocles earneſtly gaue himſelf to ſtate, & was ſuddenly taken with deſire of glory. For euen at his firſt entry, becauſe he wold ſet foot before the proudeſt, he ſtood at pike againſt the greateſt & mightieſt perſons that bare the ſway and gouernment, and ſpecially againſt Ariſtides, Lyſimachus ſon, who euer encountred him, and was ſtil his aduerſary oppoſite. Yet it ſeemeth the euil will he conceiued toward him, came of a very light cauſe. For they both loued Steſilaus, that was borne in the city of TEOS, as Ariſton the Philoſopher writeth. And after this ielouſie was kindled betweene them, they alwaies took cōtrary part one againſt another, not only in their priuate likings, but alſo in the gouernment of the common-weale. Yet I am perſwaded, that the difference of their manners and conditions, did much increaſe the gradge and diſcord betwixt them. For Ariſtides (being by nature a very good man, a iuſt dealer, and honeſt of life, and one that in al his doings would neuer flatter the people, nor ſerue his own glory, but rather to the contrary would do, ſay, and counſell alwaies for the moſt benefit & commodity of the common-weale) was oft times enforced to reſiſt Themiſtocles, & diſappoint his ambitiō, being euer buſily mouing the people, to take ſome new matter in hād. For they report of him, that he was enflamed with deſire of glory, and to enterpriſe great matters, that being but a very yong man at the battel of MARATHON, where there was no talke but of the worthineſſe of captaine Miltiades that had won the battell: he was found many times ſolitary alone deuiſing with himſelf: beſides, they ſay he could take no reſt in ŷ night, neither would go to playes in the day time, nor would keepe company with thoſe whom he was accuſtomed to be familiar withal before. Furthermore, he would tell thē that wondred to ſee ſo great alteratiō in his manners, and āsked him what he ailed: that Miltiades victory would not let him ſleepe: becauſe other thought this ouerthrow at MARATHON, would haue made an end of al wars. Howbeit Themiſtocles was of a contrary opinion, and that it was but a beginning of greater troubles. Therefore he daily ſtudied how to preuent thē, & how to ſee to the ſafety of GREECE; & before occasiõ offered, he did exercise his city in feats of war, foreseeing what shold follow after. Wherfore, where the citizens of ATHENS before did vse to deuide among themselues the reuenue of their mines of siluer, which were in a part of ATTICA called LAVRION, he alone was ŷ first that durst speake to the people, & perswade thẽ, that from thenceforth they should ceasse that distribution among themselues, & employ the mony of the same in making of gallies, to make wars against the ÆGYNETES. For their wars of al GRECE were most cruel, because they were lords of the sea, & had so great a number of ships. This perswasion drew the citizens more easily to Themistocles mind, than the threatning them with king Dartus, or the Persians would haue done: who were far from them, and not feared that they would come neere vnto them. So this oportunity taken of the hatred & ielousie between the ATHENIANS & the ÆGYNETES, made the people to agree, of the said mony to make an 100 galleys, with which they fought against king Xerxes, and did ouercome him by sea. Now after this good beginning & successe, he wan the citizens by degrees to bend their force to sea, declaring vnto them, how by land they were scant able to make head against their equals, whereas by their power at sea they should not only defend themselues from the barbarous people, but moreouer be able to cõmand al GRECE. Hereupon he made thẽ good mariners, & passing sea mẽ, as Plato saith, where before they were stout & valiant souldiers by land. This gaue his enimies occasion to cast it in his teeth afterwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike & the target, and had brought them to the banke and the ower: and so he got the vpper hand of Miltiades, who inueighed against him in that, as Stesimbrotus writeth. Now after he had thus his wil, by bringing this sea seruice to passe, whether thereby he did ouerthrow the iustice of the cõmon weale or not, I leaue that to the philosophers to dispute. But that the preseruation of all GRECE stood at that time vpon the sea, and that the galleys only were the cause of setting vp ATHENS againe Xerxes himself is a sufficient witnes, besides other proofes that might be brought therof. For his army by land being yet whole, and vnset on, when he saw his army by sea broken, dispersed, & sunk, he fled straight vpon it, cõfessing as it were that he was now too weake to deale any more with ŷ GRECIANS, & left Mardonius his lieutenãt in GRECE, of purpose in my opinion, rather to let that the GRECIANS should not follow him, then for any hope he had to ouercome them. Some write of Themistocles, that he was a very good husbãd for his own profit, and carefull to looke to his things: for he did spend liberally, & loued oft to make sacrifices, and honorably to receiue & entertaine strangers: wherfore he had good reason to be careful to get, to defray his charges. Other to the cõtrary, blame him much that he was too neere & miserable: for some say, he wold sell presẽts of meat that were giuen him. He did aske one Philides on a time, wth had a breed of mares, a colt of gift: who denying him flatly, he was so angry, that he threatned him ere it were long he wold make his house the horse of wood, with ŷ which TROIA was taken. Meaning couertly to let him vnderstãd, that he wold shortly set strife & quarrel betwix him, & his neareſt kinsmẽ & familiar friẽds. It is true that he was the most ambitious man of the world. For when he was but a yong man, & scantly known, he earnestly intreated one Epicles borne at HERMIONNA, an excellent player of the citerne, & counted at that time the cũningest man in al ATHENS at that instrument, that he wold come & teach his art at his house: & all was no more, but that many people being desirous to heare him play, shold ask for his house, & come thither to him. And one yeare when he went vnto the feast and assembly of the playes Olympicall, he would needs keepe open house for all comers, haue his tents richly furnished, & a great traine of seruants and all other furniture, only to contend with Cimon. This maruelously spited the GRECIANS, who thought Themistocles expences fit for Cimons countenãce & ability, because he was a yong gentleman, & of a noble house: but for him that was but a new come mã, & would beare a greater port then either became his calling or ability, they thought it not only vnallowable in him, but meere presumption & vainglory. Another time he defrayed the whole charges of a tragedy which was played openly: & being set out therein to haue won the prise, & the ATHENIANS being maruellous desirous of the honour in such playes, he caused this victory of his to be painted in a table, which he did dedicate and set vp in a temple, with this inscription: Themistocles Phrearian defrayed the charges: Phrynicus made it: Adimantus was chiefe ruler. Yet notwithstanding he was wel taken of the common people, partly because he would speake to euery citizen by his name, no man telling him their names: & partly also because he shewed himself an vpright iudge in priuate mẽs causes. As one day he answered the Poet Simõides, borne in CHIO, who did request an vnreasonable matter at his hands, at that time when he was gouernour of the city.

citie. Thou couldeſt be no good Poet, Simonides, if thou didſt ſing againſt the rules of Muſicke: neither my ſelf a good gouernour of a city, if I ſhould do any thing againſt the law. And mocking the ſame Simonides another time, he told him he was but a foole to ſpeake ill of the CORINTHIANS, conſidering they were lords of ſo great and ſtrong a city: and that he was not wiſe to make himſelf to be drawne, being ſo deformed and ill fauoured. But being growne in credit, and hauing won the fauour of the people, he was ſuch an enemy to Ariſtides, that in the end he made him to be expulſed & baniſhed ATHENS for fiue yeares. When newes were brought that the king of PERSIA was onwards on his iourny, and comming downe to make warres vpon the GRECIANS: the ATHENIANS conſulted whom they ſhould make their Generall. And it is reported, that all their common counſellers which were wont to ſpeake in matters, fearing the dãger, drew back, ſaue an orator called Epicydes, Euphemides ſon, very eloquent in ſpeech, but ſomwhat womaniſh, faint hearted, & greedy of mony, who offered himſelfe to ſue for this charge, & had ſome hope to obtaine it. Wherfore Themiſtocles fearing all would not be well, if it fell to this man to be Generall of the army, he bought out Epicydes ambition with ready money, and ſo made him let fall his ſuite. It fell out Themiſtocles was greatly commended, about that was done to the Interpreter, that came with the king of PERSIAS ambaſſadors, and demanded the empire of the GRECIANS both by ſea and land, that they ſhould acknowledge obedience to the king. For he cauſed him to be taken, and put to death by a common conſent, for vſing the Greek tong in the ſeruice & commandement of the barbarous people. It was a notable thing alſo, that at his motion, Arthmius borne at ZELBA, was noted of infamy, both he, his children, and all his poſterity after him, becauſe he brought gold from the king of PERSIA, to corrupt & win the GRECIANS. But the greateſt and worthieſt act he did in thoſe parts, was this: that he pacified all ciuill wars among the GRECIANS, perſwading the cities to leaue off their quarrels vntill the warres were done, in the which they ſay Chileus Arcadian did helpe him more then any other man. He being now choſen General of the ATHENIANS, went about preſently to imbark his citizens into gallies, declaring to them they ſhould leaue their city, & go meet with the barbarous king by ſea, ſo far frõ the coaſt of GREECE as they could: but the people did not think that good. Wherefore he led great numbers of ſouldiers by land, into the country of TEMPES with ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS, to keepe the paſſage & entry into THESSALY, againſt the barbarous people, which country ſtood yet ſound to GREECE, and not reuolted to the MEDES. Afterwards ỹ GRECIANS coming from thence without any act done, & the THESSALIANS alſo being won ſomwhat on the kings ſide, for that al the whole country vnto BOEOTIA was at the deuotiõ & good wil of ỹ barbarous people, the ATHENIANS began then to find, how Themiſtocles opinion to fight by ſea was very good. Wherupon they ſent him with their nauy to the city of ARTEMISIVM, to keepe the ſtraight. There the other GRECIANS would haue had the LACEDÆMONIANS & their Admirall Eurybiades to haue had the authority and commandement of the reſt. But the ATHENIANS would not ſet ſaile vnder any other Admiral then their own, becauſe theirs were the greateſt number of ſhips in the army, & aboue all the other GRECIANS. Themiſtocles foreſeeing the danger that was likely to fall out amongſt thẽſelues, did willingly yeeld ỹ whole authority vnto Eurybiades, and got the ATHENIANS to agree vnto it: aſſuring them, that if they behaued themſelues valiantly in theſe wars, the other GRECIANS of their own accord wold afterward ſubmit themſelues vnto their obedience. Hereby it appeareth, that he only of all other was at that time, the original cauſe of the ſauing of GREECE, & did moſt aduance the honor & glory of ỹ ATHENIANS, by making them to ouercome their enemies by force, and their friends & allies, with liberality. In the meane time, Eurybiades ſeeing the barbarous fleete riding at anker, al alongſt the Ile of APHETES, with ſuch a great number of ſhips in the vaward, he begã to be affraid. And vnderſtãding moreouer, there were other two hundred ſaile that went to caſt about the Ile of SCIATHE, and ſo to come in: he preſently would haue retired further into GREECE, & would haue drawn neerer vnto PELOPONNESVS, to the end their army by ſea might be neere their army by land, as thinking it vnpoſſible to fight with king Xerxes power by ſea. Wherupon the inhabitants of the Ile of EVBOEA, fearing leſt the GRECIANS wold leaue thẽ to the ſpoile of the enemy, they cauſed Themiſtocles ſecretly to be ſpoken withall, and ſent him a good ſumme of money by one called Pelagon. Themiſtocles tooke the money, as Herodotus writeth, and gaue it to Eurybiades. But there was one Architeles amongſt the ATHENIANS, Captaine of the galley called the holy galley, that was much againſt Themiſtocles intended purpoſe: who hauing no money to pay his mariners, did what he could that they might depart with speed from thence. Themistocles stirred vp then his souldiers more against him then before, insomuch as they went aboord his gally and tooke his supper from him. Architeles being maruellous angry and offended withall, Themistocles sent him both bread & meate in a pannier, and in the bottome thereof he had put a talent of siluer, bidding him for that night to suppe with that, and the next morning he should prouide for his mariners, or else he would complaine, and accuse him to the citizens that he had taken money of the enemies. Thus it is written by Phanias Lesbian. Moreouer the first fights in the straite of EVBOEA, betweene the GRECIANS and the barbarous people, were nothing to purpose to end the wars betweene them. For it was but a taste giuen vnto them, which serued the GRECIANS turne very much, by making them to see by experience, and the maner of the fight that it was not the great multitude of ships, nor the pomp & sumptuous setting out of the same, nor the proud barbarous shouts and songs of victory, that could stand them to purpose, against noble hearts, and valiant minded souldiers, that durst grapple with them, and come to hand-strokes with their enemies: and that they should make no reckening of all that brauery & brags, but should sticke to it like men, and lay it on the iackes of them. The which (as it seemeth) the poet Pindarus vnderstood very well, when he said touching the battell of ARTEMISIVM:

The stout Athenians haue now foundation layed
Vnto the liberte of Greece, by these assaults assayed.

The coast of Artemisium.

For out of doubt the beginning of victory, is to be hardy. This place ARTEMISIVM is a part of the Ile of EVBOEA, looking towards the North, aboue the citie of ESTIÆA, lying directly ouer against the country which sometimes was vnder the obedience of the PHILOCTETES, & specially of the city of OLIZON. There is a little temple of Diana, surnamed Orientall, round about the which there are trees, and a compasse of pillars of white stone, which when a man rubs with his hand, they shew of the colour and sauour of saffron. And in one of those pillars there is an inscription of lamentable verses to this effect:

When boldest bloods of Athens by their might,
Had ouercome the numbers infinite
Of Asia: they then in memory
Of all their deeds, and valiant victory,
Began to build this noble monument,
And to Diane the same they did present,
For that they had the Medes likewise subdued,
And with their blood their hardy hands embrued.

There is a place seene also vpon that coast at this day, a good way into the land, in the midst whereof are great sands full of blacke dust like ashes: and they thinke that they burnt in that place all dead bodies and old shipwrackes. Newes being brought what had bene done in the countrey of THERMOPYLES, how that king Leonidas was dead, and how that Xerxes had won that entry into GREECE by land: the GRECIANS then brought their whole army by sea more into GREECE, the ATHENIANS being in the rereward in this retraite, as men whose harts were lift vp with the glory of their former valiant deedes. Now Themistocles passing by those places where he knew the enemies must of necessity fall vpon the lee shore for harbour: hee did ingraue certaine words spoken vnto the IONIANS, in great letters in stone, which he found there by chance, or purposely brought thither for that purpose, where there was very good harbour for ships, and fit places also to lye in. These were the words: that the IONIANS should take the GRECIANS parts being their founders and ancestors, and such as fought for their liberty: or at the least they should trouble the army of the barbarous people, and doe them all the mischiefe they could, when the GRECIANS should come to fight with them. By these words he hoped either to bring the IONIANS to take their part, or at the least he should make the barbarous people iealous & mistrustfull of them Xerxes being already entred into the vppermost part of the prouince of DORICA, into the country PHOCIDA, burning and destroying the townes and cities of the PHOCIANS: the other GRECIANS lay still & suffered the inuasion, notwithstanding the ATHENIANS did request them to meete with the barbarous army in BOEOTIA, to saue the country of ATTICA, as before they had done, when they went by sea to ARTEMISIVM. But they would not hearken to it in no wise: and all was because they were desirous they should draw to the straight of PELOPONNESVS, and there they should assemble the whole

whole ſtrength and power of GRECE within the bar of the ſame, and make a ſtrong ſubſtantiall wall from the one ſea to the other. The ATHENIANS were very angry at this deuice, and were halfe diſcouraged and out of heart, to ſee themſelues thus forſaken and caſt off by the reſt of the GRECIANS. For it was out by all ſpeech that they alone ſhould fight againſt ſo many thouſands of enemies: and therefore their only remedy was, to leaue their city, and to get them to the ſea. The people were very vnwilling to liſten hereunto, making their reckening it was needleſſe to be carefull to ouercome, or to ſaue themſelues, hauing once forſaken the temples of their gods, and the graues of their parents. Wherefore Themiſtocles ſeeing that neither reaſon nor mans perſwaſion could bring the people to like his opinion: he began to frame a deuice (as men do vſe ſometimes in tragedies) and to threaten the ATHENIANS with ſignes from heauen, with oracles and anſwers from the gods. And the occaſion of Minerues dragon ſerued his turne for a celeſtiall ſigne and token, which by good fortune did not appeare in thoſe daies in the temple as it was wont to do: and the prieſts found the ſacrifices which were daily offered to him, whole and vntouched by any. Wherefore being informed by Themiſtocles what they ſhould do, they ſpread a bruite abroad amongſt the people, that the goddeſſe Minerua, the protector & defendor of the city, had forſaken it, pointing them the way vnto the ſea. And againe he wan them by a Prophecie, which commanded them to ſaue themſelues in wals of wood: ſaying that the wals of wood did ſignifie nothing elſe but ſhips. And for this cauſe he ſaid, Apollo in the oracle called SALAMINA diuine, not miſerable nor vnfortunate, becauſe it ſhould giue the name of a moſt happy victorie which the GRECIANS ſhould get there. And ſo at the laſt they following his counſell, he made this decree, that they ſhould leaue the city of ATHENS to the cuſtody of the goddeſſe Pallas, that was lady and gouernor of the country, and that all thoſe which were of age to carie any weapon ſhould get them to the gallies: and for the reſt, that euery man ſhould ſee his wife, children, and bondmen placed in ſome ſure place as well as he could. After this decree was paſt and authorized by the people, the moſt part of them did conuey their aged fathers & mothers, their wiues & little children, into the city of TROEZEN, where the TROEZENIANS receiued them very louingly & gently. For they gaue order that they ſhould be entertained of the common charge, allowing them a peece, two oboloes of their mony a day, and ſuffered the yong children to gather fruit whereſoeuer they found it: and furthermore did hire ſchoolemaſters at the charge of the commonwealth, to bring them vp at ſchoole. He that was the penner of this decree, was one called Nicagoras. The ATHENIANS at that time, had no common mony, but the Senate of the Areopagites (as Ariſtotle ſaith) furniſhed euery ſouldier with eight drachmas, which was the only meane that the gallies were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a craft deuiſed of Themiſtocles. The ATHENIANS being come downe vnto the hauen of PIRÆA, he made as though Pallas target (on the which Meduſaes head was grauen) had bene loſt, and was not found with the image of the goddeſſe: and faining to ſeeke for it, he ranſacked euery corner of the gallies, and found a great deale of ſiluer which priuate perſons had hidde amongſt their fardels. This mony was brought out vnto the people, and by this meanes the ſouldiers that were ſhipped had wherwithall to prouide them of neceſſary things. When time came that they were to depart the hauen, and that all the city of ATHENS had taken ſea, one way it was a pitie to behold them: another way it made all ſorts to wonder, that conſidered the boldneſſe and courage of thoſe men, which before ſent away their fathers and mothers from them, and were nothing moued at their teares, cries, ſhrikes, and embracings of their wiues, their children, and departures, but ſtoutly and reſolutely held on their courſe to SALAMINA. Notwithſtanding, there were many old citizens left ſtill of neceſſity in ATHENS, becauſe they could not be remoued for very extreme age, which ſtirred many with compaſſion toward them. There was beſides, a certaine pity that made mens hearts to yerne, when they ſaw the poore dogges, beaſts, and cattell runne vp and downe bleating, lowing, and howling out aloude after their maſters, in token of ſorrow, when they did imbarke. Amongſt theſe, there goeth a ſtrange tale of Xanthippus dogge, who was Pericles father: which for ſorrow his maſter had left him behind him, did caſt himſelfe after into the ſea, and ſwimming ſtill by the gallies ſide wherein his maſter was, he held on to the Iſle of SALAMINA, where ſo ſoone as the poore curre landed, his breath failed him, and he died preſently. They ſay, at this day the place called the dogs graue, is the very place where he was buried. Theſe were ſtrange acts, of Themiſtocles, that beholding the ATHENIANS ſory for the abſence of Ariſtides, and fearing leſt of ſpite he taking part with the barbarous nation, might haue bene

the ruine and deſtruction of the ſtate of GREECE, being baniſhed fiue yeares alſo before the wars by Themiſtocles procurement: that he did ſet forth a decree, that all thoſe which had bene baniſhed for a time, might returne home againe, to doe, to ſay, and to giue counſell to the citizens in thoſe things, which they thought beſt for the preſeruation of GREECE. And alſo where Eurybiades being General of the GRECIANS whole army by ſea, for the worthines of the city of SPARTA, but otherwiſe a rank coward at time of need, would in any caſe depart from thence, and retire into the gulfe of PELOPONNESVS, where all the army of the PELOPONNESIANS was by land aſſembled: that Themiſtocles withſtood him, and did hinder it all he could. At that time alſo it was, that Themiſtocles made ſo notable anſwers, which ſpecially are noted & gathered together. For when Eurybiades ſaid one day vnto him: Themiſtocles, thoſe that at playes and games do riſe before the cõpany, are whiſtled at. It is true, ſaid Themiſtocles: but thoſe alſo that tary laſt, do neuer win any game. Another time Eurybiades hauing a ſtaffe in his hand lift it vp, as though he would haue ſtricken him: Strike and thou wilt, ſaid he, ſo thou wilt heare me. Eurybiades wondring to ſee him ſo patient, ſuffered him then to ſay what he would. Then Themiſtocles began to bring him to reaſon: but one that ſtood by, ſaid vnto him: Themiſtocles, for a man that hath neither city nor houſe, it is an ill part to will others that haue, to forſake all. Themiſtocles turning to him, replied: We haue willingly forſaken our houſes and wals, ſaid he, cowardly beaſt that thou art, becauſe we would not become ſlaues for feare to loſe things that haue neither ſoule nor life. And yet our city I tell thee is the greateſt of all GREECE: for it is a fleet of 200. galleys ready to fight, which are come hither to ſaue you if you liſt. But if you will needs go your wayes and forſake vs the ſecond time, you ſhall heare tell ere it belong, that the ATHENIANS haue another free city, and haue poſſeſſed againe as much good land, as that they haue already loſt. Theſe words made Eurybiades preſently thinke, and feare, that the ATHENIANS would not goe, and that they would forſake thẽ. And as another Eretrian was about to vtter his reaſon againſt Themiſtocles opinion, he could not but anſwer him: Alas, and muſt you my maſters talke of wars too, that are like to a Sleeue? Indeed you haue a ſword, but you lacke a heart. Some write, that whilſt Themiſtocles was talking thus from his galley, they ſpied an owle flying on the right hand of the ſhips which came to light on one of the maſts of the galleys: and that hereupon all the other GRECIANS did agree to his opinion, and prepared to fight by ſea. But when the fleet of their enemies ſhips ſhewed on the coaſts of ATTICA, hard by the hauen Phalericus, and couered all the riuers thereabouts, as farre as any body could ſee, and that king Xerxes himſelfe was come in perſon with all his army by land, to campe by the ſea ſide: ſo that his whole power both by land and ſea might be ſeene in fight: then the GRECIANS had forgotten all Themiſtocles goodly perſwaſions, and began to incline againe to the PELOPONNESIANS, conſidering how they might recouer the gulfe of PELOPONNESVS, and they did grow very angry, when any man went about to talke of any other matter. To be ſhort, it was concluded that they ſhould ſaile away the next night following, and the maſters of the ſhips had order giuen them to make all things ready for them to depart. Themiſtocles perceiuing their determination, he was maruellous angry in his mind, that the GRECIANS would thus diſperſe themſelues aſunder, repairing euery man to his owne citie, and leauing the aduantage which the nature of the place, and the ſtraight of the arme of the ſea, where they lay in harbour together, did offer them: and ſo he bethought himſelfe how this was to be holpen. Sodainely the practiſe of one Sicinus came into his mind, who being a PERSIAN borne, and taken priſoner before in the warres, loued Themiſtocles very wel, and was ſchoole-maſter to his children. This Sicinus he ſecretly ſent vnto the king of PERSIA, to aduertiſe him that Themiſtocles (Generall of the ATHENIANS) was very deſirous to become his Maieſties ſeruant, & that he did let him vnderſtand betimes, that the GRECIANS were determined to flie: and therefore that he wiſhed him not to let them eſcape, but to ſet vpon them, whileſt they were troubled and afraid, and far from their army by land, to the end that vpon a ſudden he might ouerthrow their whole power by ſea. Xerxes ſuppoſing this intelligence came from a man that wiſhed him well, receiued the meſſenger with great ioy, and thereupon gaue preſent order to his captaines by ſea, that they ſhould imbarke their men into the other ſhips at better leiſure, and that preſently they ſhould put out with all poſſible ſpeed, two hundred ſaile to follow the GRECIANS in the taile, to ſhut vp the foreland of the ſtraight, and to compaſſe the Iſles all about, that not one of his enemies ſhips might eſcape: and ſo it fell out. Then Ariſtides (Lyſimachus ſonne) being the firſt that perceiued it, went to Themiſtocles

cles tent, though he was his enemy,& through his only meanes had bene banished before,as ye haue heard: and calling him out, told him how they were enuironed. Themistocles, who knew well inough the goodnes of this man,being very glad he came at that time to seeke him out,declared vnto him the policie he had vsed by the message of Sicinus, praying him to put too his helpe to stay the GRECIANS, and to procure with him, considering his word had more authority among them,that they would fight within the straight of SALAMINA. Aristides commending his great wisedome, went to deale with the Captaines of the other gallies, and to procure them to fight. For all this,they would not credite that he said, vntill such time as there arriued a galley of TENEDIENA, whereof one Panetius was captaine, who being stolne out of the host of the barbarous armie, brought certaine newes,that the straight out of doubt was shut vp. So that besides the necessity which did vrge them,the spite which the GRECIANS conceiued thereof, did prouoke them to hazard the battel. The next morning by breake of day, King Xerxes placed himselfe on a maruellous steepe high hill, from whence he might discerne his whole fleete,and the ordering of his army by sea,about the temple of Hercules, as Phanodemus writeth. Which is the narrow way or channell betwixt the Isle of SALAMINA, and the coast of ATTICA: or as Acestodorus saith, vpon the confines of the territories of MEGARA, aboue the point which they commonly call the Hornes. There Xerxes set vp a throne of gold, and had about him many secretaries to write all that was done in the battel. But as Themistocles was sacrificing vnto the gods in his galley that was Admirall, they brought to him three yong prisoners, faire of complexion, richly arrayed with gold and iewels, whom they said were the children of Sandace the Kings sister,and of Prince Autarctus. So soone as Euphrantides the soothsayer had seene them, and at their arriuall obserued there rose a great bright flame out of the sacrifice,and at the very selfe same instant that one on his right hand had sneezed: he tooke Themistocles by the hand, and willed him to sacrifice all those three prisoners vnto the god Bacchus,surnamed Omestes, as much to say, as the cruell Bacchus: for in doing it, the GRECIANS should not onely be saued, but they should haue the victory ouer their enemies. Themistocles wondred much, to heare so strange and terrible a commandement of the Soothsayer. Neuertheless, the common sort following their custome,which is, to promise safety sooner in the greatest dangers and most desperate cases, by strange and vnreasonable,rather then by reasonable and ordinary meanes: they began to call vpon the god with one voice,and bringing the three prisoners neare vnto the altar, they compelled him to performe the sacrifice in that sort as the Soothsayer had appointed. Phanias Lesbian,an excellent Philosopher, and well seene in stories and antiquities, reporteth this matter thus. As for the number of the ships of the barbarous nauie, Æschilus the poet,in a tragedie which he intituled the PERSIANS, knowing certainely the troth,saith thus:

Themistocles and Aristides consent together to giue battell

King Xerxes had a thousand ships I know,
Amongst the which, two hundred were (I trow)
And seuen: which all the rest did ouer-saile
With swifter course. This is without en faile.

Xerxes king of Persia had a thousand ships.

The ATHENIANS had nine score, in euery one of the which there were eighteene souldiers, whereof foure of them were archers, and all the rest armed men. Themistocles also did with no lesse skill and wisedome choose his time & place to fight, forbearing to charge his enemies, vntill the howre was come, that of ordinarie custome the sea wind arose, and brought in a rough tide within the channell, which did not hurt the GRECIAN gallies, being made low and snug, but greatly offended the PERSIAN gallies, being high cargued, heauy, and not yare of steredge, and made them lye sidelong to the GRECIANS, who fiercely set vpon them, hauing alwaies an eye to Themistocles direction, that best foresaw their aduãtage. At the same time, Ariamenes, Xerxes Admirall, a man of great valour and worthiest of the Kings brethren, bestowed arrowes and darts as it were from the wals of a castle, charging the galley of Aminias Decelian, and Sosicles Pedian, which were ioyned and grapled with him, and fiercely entring the same, was by them valiantly receiued vpon their pikes, & thrust ouer boord into the sea. Whose body floting amongst other shipwrackes Artemisia knowing, caused to be carried to king Xerxes. Now whilest this battell stood in these termes, they say that there appeared a great flame in the element toward the city of ELEVSIN, and that a loud voice was heard through all the plaine of THRACIA vnto the sea, as if there had bene a number of men together, that had song out aloude the holy song of Iacchus. And it seemed by litle and litle, that there rose a cloud in the ayre from those which ſang, that left the land, and came and lighted on the galleys in the ſea. Other affirmed, that they ſaw armed men, which did reach out their hands from the Iſle of Ægina, towards the Grecian gallies: and they thought they were the Æacides, for whoſe helpe they all prayed before the battell was begunne. The firſt man of the Athenians that tooke any of the enemies ſhips, was Lycomedes, a captaine of a galley: who hauing taken very rich furniture and flags, did afterwards conſecrate them to Apollo laurell: as ye would ſay, victorious. The other Grecians in the front being equall in number with the barbarous ſhips, by reaſon of the ſtraightneſſe of the arme of the ſea wherein they fought, and ſo ſtraightned as they could not fight but by one and one, whereby the Barbarians diſorderly laied one another aboord, that they did hinder themſelues with their ouer multitude: and in the end were ſo ſore preſſed vpon by the Grecians, that they were conſtrained to flie by night, after they had fought and maintained battell vntill it was very darke. So that the Grecians wan that glorious and famous victory: of the which may truly be affirmed that, as Simonides ſaith:

The Grecians victory of the Perſians nauie by ſea.

Was neuer yet, nor Grecke nor barbarous crew,
That could by ſea ſo many men ſubdew:
Nor that obtained ſo famous victorie,
In any fight againſt their enemie.

Thus was the victorie won through the valiantneſſe and courage of thoſe that fought that battell, but eſpecially through Themiſtocles great policy and wiſdome. After this battell Xerxes being mad for his loſſe, thought to fill vp the arme of the ſea, and to paſſe his army by land, vpon a bridge, into the Iſle of Salamina. Themiſtocles, becauſe he would feele Ariſtides opinion, told him as they were talking together, that he thought beſt to go and occupie the ſtraight of Hellespont with the army by ſea, to breake the bridge of ſhippes which Xerxes had cauſed to be made: to the end, ſaid he, that we may take Asia into Evrope. Ariſtides liked not this opinion: for we haue (ſaid he) fought all this while againſt this barbarous King, who thought but to play with vs: but if we ſhut him within Greece, and bring him to fight of neceſſity to ſaue his life: ſuch an enemy that commandeth ſo great an army, wil no more ſtand ſtill, as a looker on, and ſit at his eaſe vnder his golden pauillion, to ſee the paſtime of the battell, but wil proue euery way, and be himſelf in euery place at all aſſaies to ſaue himſelf from ſuch a ſtraight and danger. Thus with politike care and foreſight, he may eaſily amend his former fault committed by negligence, and do well enough, when he ſhall ſee his life and kingdome both depend vpon it. Therefore Themiſtocles, I would thinke beſt not to breake his bridge at all, which he hath cauſed to be made; but rather if we could, to build another to it, to driue him out of Evrope as ſoone as we could. Themiſtocles then replyed: Seeing you think this were good to bee done, wee muſt all lay our heads together, to deuiſe how he may be forced to come out as ſoone as we could. They breaking off with this reſolution, Themiſtocles ſent immediatly one of the Kings Eunuches, called Arſaces that was one of the groomes of his chamber, whom he found out amongſt the priſoners, and by him he ſent this meſſage vnto the king: That the Grecians hauing won the battell of him by ſea, had decreed in their counſell, how they would go to the ſtraight of Hellespont, to break the bridge of the ſhips he had cauſed to be made there. Whereof he thought good to aduertiſe him for the good will he did beare him, and to the end he might bethink him betimes, to get him away to the ſea within his own dominion, & ſo paſſe back againe into Asia as ſoone as he could, whileſt he gaue order to his allies and confederates, to ſtay following him at the poope. The barbarous king vnderſtanding theſe newes, was ſo afraid that he hoiſſed away with all poſſible ſpeed. The further foreſight and great wiſdome of Themiſtocles, and Ariſtides, in marine cauſes, did manifeſtly appeare afterwards in the battell the Grecians fought before the citie of Platea, againſt Mardonius, king Xerxes Lieutenant: who hauing but a ſmall power of the King his ſoueraignes there, did yet put the Grecians to great diſtreſſe, and in hazard to haue loſt all. Of all the townes and cities that fought in this battell, Herodotus writeth, that the city of Ægina wanne the fame for valiantneſſe aboue the reſt: and of priuate men, among the Grecians, Themiſtocles was iudged the worthieſt man: although it was ſore againſt their willes, becauſe they enuied much his glory. For after the battell done, all the captaines being gotten into the ſtraight of Peloponnesvs, and hauing ſworne vpon the altar of their ſacrifices, that they would giue their voices after their conſciences, to thoſe they thought had beſt deſerued it: euery one gaue himſelfe the firſt place for worthineſſe, and the ſecond vnto Themiſtocles.

Themiſtocles ſtratageme.

ſtocles. The LACEDÆMONIANS caried him into SPARTA, where they iudged the honour and dignity of valiantneſſe to their Admirall Eurybiades: but the wiſedome and policie they attributed vnto Themiſtocles. In token thereof they gaue him an oliue branch, and the goodlieſt coach that was in their citie: and moreouer they ſent three hundred of their luſtie youths to accompany him, and conduct him out of their countrey. And they ſay, that at the next feaſts and aſſemblies of the playes Olympicall which were made after this victorie, when Themiſtocles was once come into the ſhew place where theſe games were played, the people looked no more on them that fought, but all caſt their eyes on him, ſhewing him to the ſtrangers which knew him not, with their fingers, and by clapping of their hands did witneſſe how much they eſteemed him. Whereat he himſelfe tooke ſo great delight, that hee confeſſed to his familiar friends, he then did reape the fruite and benefit of his ſundrie and painefull ſeruices hee had taken in hand, for the preſeruation of GREECE: ſo ambitious was he of nature, and couetous of honour, as we may eaſily perceiue by certaine of his deedes and notable ſayings they haue noted of him. For being choſen Admirall of ATHENS, hee neuer diſpatched any cauſes priuate or publike, howſoeuer they fell out, vntill the very day of his departure, and taking ſhippe: and all becauſe that men ſeeing him diſpatch much buſineſſe at once, and to ſpeake with ſo many perſons together, they ſhould eſteeme him to be the notabler man, and of the greater authority. Another time he walked vpon the ſands by the ſea ſide, beholding the dead bodies of the barbarous people, which the ſea had caſt vp vpon the ſhore: and ſeeing ſome of them that had on ſtill their chaines of gold, and bracelets, hee paſſed by on his way, but ſhewed them yet to a familiar friend of his that followed him, and ſaid vnto him: Take thou thoſe, for thou art not Themiſtocles. And vnto one Antiphates, who in his youth had bene a goodly young boy, and at that time did ſcornefully behaue himſelfe vnto him, making no reckening of him: and now that he ſaw him in great authority came to ſee him, hee ſaid: O my young ſonne, and friend: wee are both euen at one time (but too late) growne wiſe. He ſaid the ATHENIANS did not eſteeme of him nor honour him in time of peace: but when any ſtormes of warres were towards, and they ſtood in any danger, they ranne to him then, as men runne to the ſhadow of a Plane tree, vpon any ſodaine raine: and afterwards when faire weather commeth againe, they cut away the branches, and boughes thereof. There was a man borne in the Iſle of SERIPHA, who being fallen out with him, did caſt him in the teeth, that it was not for his worthineſſe, but for the noble citie wherein he was borne, that hee had wonne ſuch glory: Thou ſayeſt true ſaid he: but neither ſhould I euer haue wonne any great honour, if I had bene a SERIPHIAN, nor thou alſo if thou hadſt bene an ATHENIAN. Another time one of the captaines of the citie, hauing done good ſeruice vnto the commonweale, made boaſt before Themiſtocles, and compared his ſeruice equall with his. Themiſtocles to anſwer him, told him a pretie tale. That the working day brauled on a time with the holy day, repining againſt her, that he laboured for his liuing continually and how ſhe did nothing but fill her belly, and ſpend that they had gotten. Thou haſt reaſon, ſaid the holy day. But if I had not bene before thee, thou haddeſt not bene here now. And ſo, if I had not bene then: where had you my maſters bene now? His own ſon was a litle too fawcie with his mother, and with him alſo, bearing himſelfe ouer-boldly of her good wil, by meanes of her cockering of him. Wherupon being merily diſpoſed, he wold ſay that his ſon could do more then any man in al GREECE. For, ſaith he, the ATHENIANS command the GRECIANS, I command the ATHENIANS, my wife commandeth me, and my ſon commandeth her. Moreouer becauſe hee would be ſingular by himſelfe aboue all other men: hauing a peece of land he would ſell, he willed the crier to proclaime open ſale of it in the market place, and withall he ſhould adde vnto the ſale, that his land lay by a good neighbour. Another time, two men being ſuiters to his daughter, he preferred the honeſter before the richer, ſaying: He had rather haue to his ſonne in law a man that lacked goods, then goods to lacke a man. Theſe were Themiſtocles pleaſant conceipts and anſwers. But after he had done all theſe things we haue ſpoken of before, he took in hand to build againe the city and wals of ATHENS, and did corrupt the officers of LACEDÆMONIA with mony, to the end they ſhould not hinder his purpoſe, as Theopompus writeth. Or as all other ſay, when he had deceiued them by this ſubtiltie, he went vnto SPARTA, as ambaſſadour, ſent thither of purpoſe vpon the complaints of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that the ATHENIANS did incloſe their citie againe with wals, who were accuſed vnto the Councell of SPARTA, by an Orator called Poliarchus, who was ſent thither from the ÆGINETES, of purpoſe to proſecute this matter againſt the ATHENIANS. Themiſtocles ſtoutly denyed it to them, and prayed them for better vnderſtanding of the troth, they would ſend ſome of their men thither to ſee it. This was but a fetch, only to winne by this delay, the ATHENIANS ſo much more time to raiſe vp their wals, and that the ATHENIANS ſhould keepe as hoſtages for ſurety of his perſon, thoſe they ſhould ſend to ATHENS, to bring backe the report thereof: and ſo it fell out. For the LACEDÆMONIANS being enformed of the troth as it was, did him no hurt, but diſſembling the miſliking they had to be thus abuſed by him, ſent him away ſafe and ſound. Afterwards he made them alſo mend and fortifie the hauen of PIRÆA, hauing conſidered the ſituation of the place, and all to encline the city to the ſea. Wherein he did directly contrary to all the counſell of the ancient Kings of ATHENS: who ſeeking (as they ſay) to withdraw their people from the ſea, and to accuſtome them to liue vpon the land, by planting, ſowing, and plowing their grounds, did deuiſe and giue out abroad, the fable they tell of the goddeſſe Pallas. And that is this, how ſhe contending with Neptune about the patronage of the country of ATHENS, brought foorth and ſhewed to the Iudges the oliue tree, by meanes whereof ſhe preuailed and obtained the preheminence. Euen ſo Themiſtocles did not ioyne the hauen of PIRÆA vnto the city of ATHENS, as the Comicall poet Ariſtophanes ſaith: but rather ioyned the city vnto the hauen PIRÆA, and the land vnto the ſea. By this meanes he made the people ſtrong againſt the nobility, and brought the communaltie to waxe bolder then they were before, by reaſon the rule and authority fell into the hands of ſaylers, marines, pilots, ſhip-maſters, and ſuch kind of ſeafaring men: ſo as the pulpit where all the orations were made, ſtood in the market place of PNYX, and did looke towards the ſea. But the thirty tyrants that came in afterwards, did remoue it, and turne it towards the land: holding opinion to be ſtrong by ſea, was it that did maintaine the authority of the popular ſtate: and that contrariwiſe they which liue by the labour and toile of the earth, do more willingly like the gouernement of Nobility. Themiſtocles called to mind another matter alſo of greater importance, to make the city of ATHENS of greater power by ſea. For after the retire of Xerxes, and that all the fleete and nauie of the GRECIANS wintred in the hauen of PEGASES: he ſaid one day in an open aſſembly of the people, that he had thought of a thing which would be very profitable & beneficiall for them, but it was not to be told openly. The people willed him then to impart it to Ariſtides: and if he thought it good, they would execute it ſpeedily. Themiſtocles then told Ariſtides the thing he had conſidered of, was to burne the Arcenall where the GRECIANS nauie lay, and to ſet on fire all their ſhippes. Ariſtides hearing his purpoſe, returned to the people, and told them: how nothing could be more profitable, but with all more vniuſt, then that which Themiſtocles had deuiſed. The ATHENIANS then willed Ariſtides it ſhould be let alone altogether. Furthermore when the LACEDÆMONIANS had exhibited their petition to the councell of the Amphictions (that is, the generall councell of all the ſtates of GRECE, aſſembled) how the townes and cities of GRECE which had not bene parties with the GRECIANS in the league, againſt the barbarous people, ſhould be put off wholly from this counſell, Themiſtocles doubting that if the ARGIVES, the THESSALIANS, and the THEBANS alſo ſhould by this meanes be exempted, that the LACEDÆMONIANS would be then the greater number in voyces, and by this meanes might do what they would in this councell: he ſpake ſo conſiderately for the cities which they would haue thus diſcharged, that he made the petitioners in the aſſembly vtterly to change their opinion. Declaring, how there were but one and thirtie cities compriſed only in the league, and yet that ſome of them were very weake and ſmall: and how it were no reaſon, that reiecting all the reſt of GRECE, the greateſt authority of this councell ſhould fall into the hands of two or three of the chiefeſt cities alone. For this cauſe chiefly the LACEDÆMONIANS did euer beare him extreme hatred, and did ſtir vp Cimon all they could, to be alwaies aduerſarie oppoſite vnto him, and as it were to beard him in all matters of ſtate, and the gouernment of ATHENS. They procured him beſides the ill will and diſpleaſure of all the friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS, for that he went ſayling ſtill too and fro along ſt the Iſls, exacting money of the inhabitants of the ſame. And this is to be knowne by the matter propounded by him to the ANDRIANS (of whom he would haue had money) and by the anſwer they made him, as Herodotus writeth. Which was, how he had brought them two mightie gods: Loue and Force. And they anſwered him againe, that they alſo had two great goddeſſes, which kept them from giuing of him any money: Pouertie and Impoßibilitie. And to make this good alſo, Timocreon the Rhodian Poet galled him to the quicke, when he ſharply taunted him, for calling many home againe for money that were baniſhed: and how for the couetouſneſſe of money he had betraied, and forſaken his hoſt and friend. The verſes wherein this matter is mentioned, are to this effect:

Themiſtocles by right and due deſert,
Is hated of Latona, for his lies,
And for he bare a traiterous wicked heart,
Who like a wretch, and niggard did deuiſe,
For ſmall reward his hoſt Timocreon
To hold out of his countrey Ialiſon.
He tooke for bribe (vniuſtly yet therewhile)
Of ready coine three talents faire and bright,
Reuoking ſuch as pleaſ'd him, from exile,
And baniſhing full many a worthy wight.
Or putting them to death, without cauſe told,
He gate thereby great heapes of coyne and gold.
But in the end (o right reward for ſuch)
This bribing wretch, was forced for to hold
A tipling booth, moſt like a clowne or ſnuch,
At holy feaſts and paſtimes manifold,
Which were amongſt the people in thoſe dayes,
Iſtmiciane folke, did vſe the like alwayes.
And there he ſeru'd his gueſts with cold meate ſtill,
Whilſt they that taſted of his cookerie,
Gan wiſh that they (to eaſe their weary will)
Had neuer lined, to ſee the treacherie Of falſe Themiſtocles, and that he might
No longer liue, which wrought them ſuch deſpight.

After this, he did more openly blaſe him to the world, when he was baniſhed and condemned, in a ſong that had beginning thus:

O Muſe, let theſe my verſes be diſperſt
Throughout all Grece, ſince they deſerue no leſſe:
And ſince the truth which is in them rehearſt,
Deſerueth fame; whom no man ſhould ſuppreſſe.

They ſay the cauſe why this Timocreon was baniſhed, was, the friendſhip which he had with the Barbarous people, and for giuing them intelligence. Whereof Themiſtocles was one that iudicially condemned him. Wherefore when Themiſtocles himſelfe was accuſed afterwards of the ſame fault, Timocreon then made theſe verſes following againſt him:

Timocreon was not without his pheere,
Which did conferre with Medes priuily,
Since others mo, the ſelfe ſame blame might beare,
Mo foxes lurke in dennes, as well as I.

Beſides theſe verſes, Themiſtocles owne citizens for ill will they bare him, beganne now with great contentment and applauſe, to harken to thoſe that gaue out euill ſpeeches and ſlanders of him. Therefore while he ſought wayes to redreſſe all this, he was driuen to vſe ſuch meanes, which more increaſed their hatred towards him. For in his orations to the people, he did oft remember them of the good ſeruices he had done them: and perceiuing how they were offended withall, he was driuen to ſay: Why, are ye wearie ſo often to receiue good by one man? Many of them were very angry with him alſo, when he ſurnamed Diana (in the dedication of her temple he made vnto her) Ariſtobule, as much to ſay, as the good counſeller: meaning thereby, how hee had giuen graue and wiſe counſell, both vnto his city, and to all the reſt of the GRECIANS. He built this temple alſo neare his houſe, in a place called Melita, where the hang-men did caſt the dead bodies of thoſe that were executed, and throw the ragges and haulters ends of thoſe that were hanged, or otherwiſe put to death by law. There was alſo in our dayes in the temple of Diana Ariſtobule, a little image of Themiſtocles, which ſhewed plainely, that he was not onely wiſe, and of a noble minde, but alſo of a great maieſtie and countenance in the face. In the end the ATHENIANS baniſhed him ATHENS for fiue yeares, becauſe they would plucke downe his ouer great courage and authority, as they did vſe to ſerue thoſe, whoſe greatneſſe they thought to be more, then common equality that ought to be among citizens would beare. For this manner of baniſhment for a time, called Oſtraciſmon, was no puniſhment for any fault committed, but a mitigation and taking away of the enuie of the people, which delighted to plucke downe their ſtomackes that too much ſeemed to exceed in greatneſſe: and by this meanes they tooke away the poyſon of his malice, with diminiſhing his glory and honour. So Themiſtocles being baniſhed from ATHENS, went to dwell in ARGOS. In this meane ſeaſon, Pauſanias treacherie fell out, which gaue his enemies occaſion to lie heauie on his backe. But hee which became his accuſer, and was partner of the treaſon, was one called Leobotes (Alcmeons ſonne) borne in a village called AGRAVLA. Beſides this, the SPARTANS alſo did ſit on his skirts, and charged him ſorely. For Pauſanias neuer before reuealed to Themiſtocles the treaſon he had purpoſed, although hee was his very familiar friend. But after hee ſaw Themiſtocles was baniſhed, and did take his exile very vnpatiently: then Pauſanias was bold to open his treaſon vnto him, to procure him to take his part, and ſhewed him the letters the King of PERSIA had written to him, and all to ſtirre him vp againſt the GRECIANS, as againſt vngratefull and vnnaturall people. Howbeit Themiſtocles ſhooke him off, and told him plainely he would bee no partner of his treaſon. Notwithſtanding, he neuer reuealed it to any liuing creature, nor diſcouered the practiſe hee intended: hoping either hee would haue giuen it ouer, or that ſhortly it would appeare by ſome other meane, conſidering he ſo fondly aſpired to things of great daunger, and without purpoſe or poſſibility. After Pauſanias was condemned, and had ſuffered paines of death for the ſame: they found amongſt his papers, certaine writings and letters, which made Themiſtocles to bee very ſore ſuſpected. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS on the one ſide cryed out of him, and his enemies and ill willers at ATHENS accuſed him on the other ſide. To the which hee made anſwere by letters from the beginning, and wrote vnto the people; that it was not likely that he (who ſought all the wayes to rule, and was not borne to ſerue, neither had any mind thereto) would euer haue thought in his head, to ſell his owne libertie, and the GRECIANS alſo vnto the Barbarous people their enemies. Notwithſtanding this purgation of his, the people by the procurement of his enemies, ſent to apprehend him, and to bring him before the ſtates of all GREECE, to be iudged by that counſell. Whereof Themiſtocles hauing intelligence in time, hee did conuey himſelfe into the Ile of CORPHV, becauſe the citie there was greatly beholding to him, for a certaine pleaſure he had done them in times paſt. For they being at ſuite and ſtrife with the CORINTHIANS he tooke vp the matter betweene them, and gaue iudgement on their ſide, and condemned the CORINTHIANS to pay them twenty talents damages: and did ſet downe an order, that they ſhould occupie the Ile of LEVCADE in common together, as ground that had bene inhabited with the people, aſwell of the one citie, as of the other. From thence he fled to Epirus, whither being followed by the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS, he was compelled to venter himſelfe vpon a doubtfull and very dangerous hope. For hee went to yeeld himſelfe into the hands of Admetus, King of the MOLOSSIANS. Who hauing heretofore made certaine requeſts vnto the ATHENIANS, and being ſhamefully denied them by meanes of Themiſtocles (who then was at his chiefeſt height and authority) the King was maruellouſly offended with him: and it was a cleere caſe indeede, that if hee could then haue layed hands hands on him, he would haue bene reuenged of him throughly. Howbeit feeling the preſent miſerie of his exile, he thought he might leſſe feare the Kings old quarrell and diſpleaſure, then the freſh hate and enuie of his country men. Whereupon he went vnto King Admetus, truſting to his mercy, and became an humble ſuiter to him in a ſtrange extraordinarie ſort. For he took the Kings little yong ſon in his armes, and went and kneeled downe before the altar in his chappel: which humble manner of ſuing the MOLOSSIANS take to be moſt effectuall, and ſuch as they dare not denie nor refuſe. Some ſay that Queene Phthia her ſelfe, the Kings wife did enforme him of this their country cuſtome and maner, and brought her little ſonne alſo neare vnto the altar. Other write alſo, that it was Admetus himſelf that taught and ſhewed him this enforcing maner of petition, only for a cloke to excuſe himſelf to thoſe that ſhould come to demand Themiſtocles of him: that by duty of religion he was ſo ſtraightly bound and reſtrained, that he might not deliuer him out of his protectiõ. In this mean time Epicrates Acharnian found the meanes ſecretly to conuey Themiſtocles wife & children out of ATHENS, and did ſend them priuily vnto him: whereupon he was afterwards accuſed, and put to death, vpon Cimons accuſation and motion, as Steſimbrotus writeth. Who not remembring thoſe matters I know not how, or making as though Themiſtocles had not remembred himſelf doth ſay, that Themiſtocles ſailed into SICILE, where he ſought to marie Hierons daughter, the tyrant of SYRACVSA: promiſing him if he wold let him haue her, he would aſſure him to conquer al GRECE for him, & to bring them vnder his obedience. But Hieron refuſing this offer, Themiſtocles went from thence into ASIA: but that is not likely. For Theophraſtus writeth in his book intituled of Kingdomes, that Hieron hauing ſent certaine running horſes, to the feaſt of the games Olimpical, and hauing ſet vp a maruellous rich and ſumptuous tent there: Themiſtocles made an oration to the GRECIANS, declaring vnto them how they ſhould teare the tyrants tents in peeces, and not to ſuffer his horſes to run with other ſwift & light horſes, and to carie away the priſe in thoſe holy games. Thucydides again declareth how he went vnto the other ſea, and imbarked in the city of PYDNE, being not knowne of neuer a man in the ſhip, vntill ſuch time as the wind began to carie them into the Ile of NAXOS, which ỹ ATHENIANS by chance did beſiege at that time; where being afeard to be ſet on land, he was forced to bewray himſelfe to the maſter of the ſhip, and the maſters mate, and wrought them, what with faire words and what with threates (by ſaying he would accuſe them to the ATHENIANS, that they did not ignorantly receiue him in, but hired for mony) ſo as he compelled them to ſaile no further, and to carrie him into ASIA. As for his goods, his friends ſaued the moſt part of them, and ſent them into ASIA to him. But for thoſe that came to light, and were confiſcate vnto the ſtate, Theopompus writeth, they did amount to the value of one hundred * talents; and Theophraſtus ſaith, but to foureſcore talents only: whereas all his goods was not worth three * talents, when he beganne to gouerne the ſtate of the common-weale. When he came vnto the city of CVMA, he perceiued that all the coaſts by ſea were layed for him to apprehend him, and that he had many ſpials vpon him: among the which, theſe were two ſpeciall noted men, Ergoteles, and one Pythodorus, the reward being very great, for men that ſought their gaine any way they could. For the King of PERSIA had proclaimed by ſound of trumpet, two hundred talents to him that brought him Themiſtocles. Whereupon he fled vnto a litle towne of ÆOLIA, called ÆGES, where no liuing body knew him, but his hoſt only, called Nicogenes: who was the richeſt man of all the ÆOLIANS, and knew all the noble men of authority that were about the King of PERSIA. Themiſtocles continued hidden certaine daies in his houſe: in which time, on a night after the feaſt of a ſacrifice, one Olbius, ſchoolemaſter to Nicogenes children, by ſome ſecret working of the gods, ſuddenly fell beſides himſelfe, and began to ſing theſe verſes out aloud:

The maner of ſupplication among the Molоſſians.

* Three ſcore thouſand crownes
* Eighteene hundred crownes.

Do thou beleeue what ſo the night thee tels,
And giue thy voice, thy counſell and conceits
Vnto the night, in darkſomeneſſe that dwels,
Thereon alſo thy victorie awaits.

The next night following, Themiſtocles being faſt aſleepe in his bed, dreamed that a ſnake wound it ſelfe round about his belly, and glided vpwards to his necke, vntil it touched his face, and ſuddenly then it became an Eagle, and imbraced him with his wings: and ſo at length did lift him vp in the aire, and caried him a maruellous way off, vntill hee thought hee ſaw a golden rodde (ſuch as Heralds vſe to carie in their hand) whereupon the Eagle did ſet him, and so was deliuered of all this feare and trouble he thought himself in. The troth was, Nicogenes had this deuice in his head, how he might bring him safe to the king of PERSIAES court. The barbarous nations for the most part (and specially the PERSIANS) are of a very strange nature, and maruellous iealous ouer their women, and that not only of their wiues, but also of their bondwomen, and concubines: which they keepe so straightly locked vp, that no man euer seeth them abroad at any time, but are alwaies like house-doues kept within doores. And when they haue any occasion to go into the country, they are caried in close coaches couered all abour, that no man can look into them. Themistocles was cõueyed into one of these coaches drest after this mãner, and had warned his men to answer those they met by the way, that asked whom they caried: that it was a yong GRECIAN gentlewoman of the country of IONIA, which they caried to the court for a noble man there. Thucydides, and Charon Lampsacenian say, he went thither after the death of Xerxes, and spake with his sonne there. But Ephorus, Dino, Clitarchus, Heraclides, and many other writẽ, that he spake with himselfe. Yet notwithstanding it appeareth that Thucydides words do best agree with the chronicles and tables, recording the succession of times, although they be of no great certainty. Themistocles being come now to the swords point (as it were) and to the extremity of his danger, did first present him vnto one Artabanus, Colonell of a thousand footmen, and said vnto him: Sir, I am a GRECIAN borne, and desire to speake with ý king: I haue matters of importance to open to his Maiesty, and such as I know he will thankfully receiue. Artabanus answered him in this manner: My friend sir stranger, the lawes and customes of men are diuerse, and some take one thing for honest, other some another thing: but it is most honesty for all men, to keepe and obserue the lawes and manners of their owne countrey. For you GRECIANS haue the name to loue liberty, and equality aboue all things: and for vs, amongst all the goodly lawes and customes we haue, we esteeme this aboue the rest: to reuerence and honour our king, as the image of the God of nature, who keepeth al things in their perfect life and state. Wherefore, if thou wilt fashion thy selfe after our manner to honour the king, thou maiest both see him, and speake with him: but if thou haue another mind with thee, then must thou of necessity vse some third person for thy meane. For this is the manner of our countrey: the King neuer giueth audience to any man, that hath not first honoured him. Themistocles hearing what he said, answered him againe: My Lord Artabanus, the great good will I beare vnto the King, and the desire I haue to aduance his glory and power, is the onely cause of my present repaire vnto his court: therefore I meane not onely to obey your lawes (since it hath so pleased the gods to raise vp the noble empire of PERSIA vnto this greatnesse) but will cause many other people also to honour the King, more then there do at this present. Therefore let there be no stay, but that my selfe in person may deliuer to the King that I haue to say vnto him. Well, sayd Artabanus: whom then shall we say thou art? For by thy speech it seemeth, thou art a man of no meane state and condition. Themistocles answered him: As for that Artabanus, none shall know before the king himselfe. Thus doth Phanias report it. But Eratosthenes, in his booke he wrote of riches, addeth further: how Themistocles had accesse vnto this Artabanus, being recommended to the King by a woman of ERETRIA, whom the King kept. Themistocles being brought to his presence, after he had presented his humble duty and reuerence to him, stood on his feete, and said neuer a word, vntill the King commanded the interpreter to aske him what he was? and he answered: May it please your Maiesty, O noble King, I am Themistocles the ATHENIAN, a banished man out of my countrey by the GRECIANS, who humbly repaireth to your Highnesse, knowing I haue done great hurt to the PERSIANS, but I perswade my self I haue done them far more good then harme. For I it was that kept the GRECIANS backe they did not follow you, whẽ the state of GRECE was deliuered from thraldome, & my natiue country from danger, & that I knew I stood in good state to pleasure you. Now for me, I find al mens good wills agreeable to my present misery and calamity: for I come determined, most humbly to thanke your Highnesse for any grace and fauour you shall shew me, and also to craue humble pardon if your Maiesty be yet offended with me. And therfore licẽce me (most noble king) to beseech you, that taking mine enemies the GRECIANS for witnesses of the pleasures I haue done the PERSIAN nation, you wil of your princely grace vse my hard fortune as a good occasion to shew your honourable vertue, rather then to satisfie thẽ passion of your heat and choler. For in sauing my life, your Maiesty saueth an humble suter that put himself to your mercy: and in putting me to death, you shall rid away an enemy of the GRECIANS. Hauing spoken thus these words, he said further:

ther: That the gods by diuerſe ſignes and tokens had procured him to come to ſubmit himſelfe vnto him, and told the king what viſion he had ſeene in his dreame in Nicogenes houſe: and declared alſo the oracle of Iupiter Dodonian, who had commanded him that he ſhould go vnto him that was called as a god, and how hee thought it was the perſon of his Maieſty, becauſe that god and he in troth were called both great Kings. The King hauing thus heard him ſpeake, gaue him then no preſent anſwere againe, notwithſtanding he maruellouſly wondred at his great wiſedome and boldneſſe. But afterwards amongſt his familiars the King ſaid, he thought himſelfe very happy to meete with the good fortune of Themiſtocles comming to him: and ſo beſought his great god Arimanius, that he would alwaies ſend his enemies ſuch minds, as to baniſh the greateſt and wiſeſt men amongſt them. It is reported alſo he did ſacrifice vnto the gods, to giue them thankes therefore, and diſpoſed himſelfe preſently to be merie. Inſomuch as dreaming in the night, in the middeſt of his dreame he cried out three times together for ioy: I haue Themiſtocles the ATHENIAN. The next morning the King hauing ſent for the chiefeſt Lords of his Court, he made Themiſtocles alſo to be brought before him: who looked for no goodneſſe at all, ſpecially when he ſaw the ſouldiers warding at the Court gates, giue him ill countenance and language both, when they beheld him, and vnderſtood his name. Moreouer, Roxanes, one of the captaines, as Themiſtocles paſſed by him going to the King, (who was ſet in his chaire of ſtate, and euery man keeping ſilence) ſoftly ſighing, ſaid vnto him: O thou Greekiſh ſerpent, ſubtile & malicious, the kings good fortune hath brought thee hither. Neuertheleſſe when he came to the king, and had once againe made him a very humble and low reuerence: the king ſaluted him, & ſpake very courteouſly to him, ſaying: I am now your debter of two hundred talents, for preſenting your ſelf. It is good reaſon I ſhould deliuer you the mony promiſed him that ſhould haue brought you: but I giue you a further warrant, be bold I charge you, and ſpeake your minde freely, ſay what you think of the ſtate of GREECE. Themiſtocles then anſwered him: That mẽs words did properly reſemble the ſtories and imagerie in a peece of arras: for both in the one and in the other, the goodly images of either of them are ſeene, when they are vnfolded and laid open. Contrariwiſe they appeare not, but are loſt, when they are ſhut vp, and cloſe folded: whereupon he ſaid to the king: he muſt needs require ſome further time of anſwer. The king liked his compariſon paſſing well, and willed him to appoint his owne time. Themiſtocles asked a yeare: in which time hauing pretily learned the Perſian tongue, he afterwards ſpake to the king himſelfe without any interpreter. So, ſuch as were no Courtiers, thought he only talked with the King of matters of GREECE. But becauſe the change and alteration of the court fell out great at that time, the noblemen imagined he had bene ſo bold to common with the king of them alſo. Thereupon they greatly enuied him, and afterwards murmured much againſt him, For indeed the King did honour Themiſtocles aboue al other ſtrangers whatſoeuer they were. On a time the king had him out a hunting with him, he made him ſee his mother, with whom he grew familiar: and by the Kings own commandement he was to heare the diſpurations of the wiſe men of PERSIA touching ſecret philoſophie, which they call magicke. Demaratus the LACEDÆMONIAN being at that time in the court of PERSIA, the king willing him to aske what gift he would, he beſought the king to grant him this fauour: to licence him to go vp & downe the city of SARDIS with his royall hat on his head as the kings of PERSIA do. Mithropauſtes, the kings coſin, taking him by the hand, ſaid vnto him: Demaratus, the Kings hat thou demandeſt, and if it were on thy head, it would couer but little wit: Nay though Iupiter did giue thee his lightning in thy hand, yet that would not make thee Iupiter. But the King gaue him ſo ſharpe a repulſe for his vnreaſonable requeſt, and was ſo angry with him for it, that it was thought he would neuer haue forgiuen him: howbeit Themiſtocles was ſo earneſt a ſuter for him, that he brought him into fauour againe. And the report goeth, that the Kings ſucceſſours which haue bene ſince that time, vnder whom the PERSIANS haue had more dealings with the GRECIANS, then in former dayes: when they would retaine any great ſtate or perſonage of GRECE into their ſeruice, they wrote vnto him, and promiſed him they would make him greater about them, then euer was Themiſtocles about Xerxes. That which is written of him, doth alſo confirme it. For he being ſtept vp to great countenance & authority, and followed with great traines of ſuiters after him by reaſon of his greatnes: ſeeing himſelf one day very honorably ſerued at his table, & with all ſorts of dainty meats, he turned him to his childrẽ, & ſaid vnto them: My ſons, we ſhould haue bene vndone, if we had not bene vndone. The moſt writers do agree, that he had giuẽ him the reuenue of 3. cities for his

allowance of bread, wine, and victuals: to wit, MAGNESIA, LAMPSACVS, and MYVNTA. But Neanthes Cyzicenian, and Phanias do adde two other cities more, PERCOTA, and PALESCEPSIA: the one to defray his charges of apparell, and the other for his lodging. Afterwards Themiſtocles going into the low countries towards the ſea, to take order againſt the practiſes of the GRECIANS: there was a PERSIAN Lord called Epixies (gouernour of the high PHRYGIA) that had laid a traine to kil him (hauing of long time hired certain murderers of PISIDIA to do it) ſo ſoon as he ſhould come into a towne of his gouernement, called the Lions head. But as he ſlept on a day in his houſe in the after noone, the mother of the gods appeared vnto him, and ſaid: Themiſtocles, go not to the Lions head, for feare thou meete with the Lion: and for this warning, I do ask thy daughter Mneſiptolema for my ſeruant. Themiſtocles waking ſodainely out of his dreame, made his prayer vnto the goddeſſe, and turning out of the high way, fetched another compaſſe about. Afterwards hauing paſſed that towne, he tooke his lodging being benighted: but one of the beaſts which caried his tent, fell by the way vnfortunatly in a riuer, & all his arras & tapeſtry hangings being throughly wet, his ſeruãts were driuen to lay them out a drying by moon light. The Piſidians that lay in waite, and could not diſcerne by Moone light that they were hangings layed out to dry, thought it had bene the very tent Themiſtocles ſelfe did lie in: whereupon they went vnto it with their ſwords drawne in their hands, hoping to haue taken him ſleeping. But when they were come thither, and began to lift vp a peece of the hangings, ſome of the people of Themiſtocles (which kept watch) perceiuing them, ran vpon them, and took them. So Themiſtocles hauing eſcaped this danger, wondered greatly at the fauour of the goddeſſe which had appeared vnto him. In recompence whereof, when he was in the city of MAGNESIA, he built a temple vnto Dindymena, and made his daughter Mneſiptolema prioreſſe of the ſame. As he paſſed by the city of SARDIS for his recreation, he went to viſit the temples, & offerings that had bene giuen there. So he ſaw an image of a maide in copper, in the temple of the mother of the gods, being two yards high, which they called the Hydrophora, as much to ſay, as the watercarier. And it was a ſtatue, which himſelfe had heretofore dedicated and cauſed to be made with the fines of thoſe that had paid forfeitures, for ſtealing or turning away the water courſe at ATHENS, at ſuch time as he was maſter ſurueyer of the water workes & conduits there. Wherfore, whether Themiſtocles was ſory to ſee this goodly image a priſoner in the hands of the barbarous people, or that he would ſhew vnto the ATHENIANS the greatneſſe of his credit and authority through all the Kings dominions: he ſpake to the gouernor of LYDIA, and prayed him for his ſake that he would ſend this image againe to ATHENS. But this barbarous gouernour was very angry with his requeſt, and told him he would aduertiſe the King thereof. Then Themiſtocles began to be afeard, and was driuen to ſeeke to the gouernours women and concubines, whom he got for mony to intreat him, and ſo made faire weather againe with the gouernour. But from thenceforth, he took better gard of him in all his doings, greatly fearing the enuy of the barbarous people. For he progreſſed not vp and downe ASIA, as Theopompus writeth, but lay a long time in the citie of MAGNESIA, quietly enioying the Kings gracious gifts beſtowed on him: where he was honoured and reuerenced for one of the greateſt perſons of PERSIA, whileſt the King was elſewhere occupied in the affaires of the prouinces of ASIA, and had no leiſure to thinke vpon thoſe of GRECE. But when newes was brought him, that ÆGYPT was rebelled, by meanes of the fauour and aſſiſtance of the ATHENIANS, and that the GRECIANS gallies did ſcowre the ſeas euen vnto the Ile of CYPRVS, and vnto the coaſts of CILICIA, and that Cimon had all the ſea in ſubiection: that made him then to bend all his thoughts how to reſiſt the GRECIANS, that their greatneſſe might not turne to his harme. Then commiſſions went out to leauie men; to aſſemble captaines, and to diſpatch poſtes vnto Themiſtocles at MAGNESIA, with the Kings letters, ſtraightly charging him to haue an eye to the GRECIANS doings, and moreouer that he ſhould faithfully keepe his promiſe he had made to him. But he, to ſhew that he neither maliced his citizens, nor was moued with the deſire of greatneſſe and authority he might haue growne vnto in thoſe warres, or elſe for that he thought the Kings expectation would prooue to a greater matter then he could end or wade through, conſidering GRECE was full at that time of famous captaines, and that Cimon amongſt the reſt had maruellous good fortune, and that it ſhould be a reproch to him to ſtaine the glory of ſo many noble acts, ſo many triumphs, and ſo great victories as Cimon had done and wonne: he tooke a wiſe reſolution with himſelfe, to make ſuch an end of his life, as the fame therof deſerued; for he made a ſolemne ſacrifice vnto the gods and feasted at the same all his friends. And after he had taken his leaue of them all, he drank buls bloud as most men thinke, or (as other say) poyson, which dispatcheth a man in 24. houres, and so ended his daies in the citie of MAGNESIA, after he had liued threescore and fiue yeares, and ỹ most part of them alwaies in office, and great charge. It is written that the King of PERSIA vnderstanding the cause and maner of his death, did more esteeme him afterwards, then he did before, and that euer after he continued to vse his friends and familiars in very good sort. For he left children behind him, which he had of Archippa (Lysanders daughter) of the towne of ALOPECIA: Archeptolis, Polyeuctus, and Cleophantus, of whom Plato the Philosopher maketh mention, saying that he was a good man at armes, but otherwise that there was no goodnesse in him. His other sonnes that were elder, as Neocles, died being bitten with a horse: and as for Diocles another sonne, his grandfather Lysander did adopt him for his son. He had many daughters, of the which Mnesiptolema (which he had by a second wife) was maried vnto her halfe brother Archeptolis: for they were not both of one venter: another called Italia, was maried vnto one Panthides of CHIO: Sybaris, vnto Nicomedes an ATHENIAN: and Nicomacha, vnto Pharsicles, Themistocles nephew; vnto whom her brethren did marry her within the city of MAGNESIA, after the death of their father. This Pharsicles did bring vp Asia, which was the yongest of al his daughters. Furthermore his sumptuous tombe standeth yet in the market place of MAGNESIA. But that Andocites writeth of his bones, in a book he made to his friends, is not to be credited, which was: that the ATHENIANS hauing found the ashes of his bones, did cast them vp into the aire, as a deuice to stirre vp the noble men against the people. And Phylarchus in his history (much like vnto the fained subtilties of a tragedie) bringeth in I cannot tell what Neocles and Demopolis, for Themistocles sonnes, to moue the readers with compassion. Howbeit no man is so simple, but will iudge it straight a very faining and deuice. Diodorus the cosmographer also in a book he hath written of tombes and monuments saith, by coniecture, rather then of any certaine knowledge: that along the hauen of PIRÆA, coming towards the head of Alcimus, there is a foreland in forme of an elbow, within the which when they haue doubled the point, the sea is alwaies calme, and there they find a great and long foundation or base, vpon the which there is as it were the forme of an altar, and that is (saith he) Themistocles tombe. And he supposeth that Plato the comicall Poet doth witnesse it in these verses:

Thy graue is set and plac't commodiously,
Where passengers and merchants that come by May visite thee, and where it may regard
All such as seeke that port to be their ward.
Sometimes also, it may reioyce to see,
The bloudy fights vpon the sea that be.

And furthermore, those of MAGNESIA did institute certaine honours vnto the issue of Themistocles, which continue yet vnto this day. And in my time, another Themistocles also of ATHENS did enioy the same honours, with whom I was familiarly conuersant in the house of Amonius the Philosopher.

THE LIFE OF
Furius Camillus.

AMONGST many great matters which are ſpoken of this Furius Camillus, this ſeemeth moſt ſtrange and wonderfull aboue the reſt: that hee hauing borne the chiefeſt offices of charge in his countrey, and hauing done many notable and worthie deedes in the ſame; as one that was choſen fiue times Dictator, and had triumphed foure times, and had won himſelfe the name and title of the ſecond founder of Rome; and yet neuer came to be Conſull. But the onely cauſe thereof was, that the common-weale of Rome ſtood then in ſuch ſtate and ſort. The people were then at diſſention with the Senate: they would chuſe no more Conſuls, but other kind of gouernours whom they call Tribuni militares: theſe did all things with like power and authority as the Conſuls, yet were they nothing ſo odious vnto the people, by reaſon of the number that was of them. For it was ſome hope to them that could il beare ỹ rule of the ſmall number of nobility, that the gouernmẽt of the ſtate being put into ſix, and not into two officers hands, their rule would be the eaſier, and tollerabler. Now Camillus being at that time in his beſt credit and authority, and in the prime and glory of his doings, did not deſire to be made Conſul without the goodwil of the people, although whileſt he was in authority, there were many times Conſuls created. But being called and choſen to all other offices & dignities, he behaued himſelfe in ſuch ſort, that when he was alone, he made his authority common to other: and when he had companions and aſſociates, the glory of all redounded to himſelfe alone. The cauſe whereof, was his modeſty on the one ſide, for he commanded euer without enuie: and his great wiſedome and ſufficiencie on the other ſide, for the which al others willingly gaue him place and yeelded to him. The houſe of Furians being at that time of no great fame, he was the firſt that began to ſet himſelf forwards. For in a great battell which was fought againſt the Æques and Volſces, he being but a priuate man at armes vnder the Dictator Poſthumius Tubertus, was the firſt that riding out of the army, aduanced himſelfe and gaue the charge. And being runne into the thigh at that time with a ſtaffe broken vpon his thigh, he plucked the trunchen out, and retired not for all that: but giuing charge againe vpon the ſtouteſt of the enemies, he fought it out ſo valiantly to the encouraging of other, that he was the chiefe cauſe they turned their backs. Whereupon, to requite his ſeruice done at that time (beſides other honors they did him) they made him Cenſor: an office at that time of great preheminence and dignity. In his office of Cenſorſhip, he did two notable acts. The one very honeſt: when he brought men that were not maried, to marry the women whom the wars had left widowes, which were in number many.

many. To this he got them partly by perſwaſion, and partly by threatnings, to ſet round fines vpon their heads that refuſed. The other very neceſſary: in that he brought orphanes to bee contributories vnto taxes and ſubſidies, which before payed nothing. The cauſe thereof was the continuall wars, about the which the common-weale ſuſtained great charges, but ſpecially about the ſiege of the city of the VEIANS (which ſome call VENETIANS) that was a very ſore burthen to them at that time. For it was ỹ capital city of al THVSCAN, the which for ſtore of armor, and number of ſouldiers, was nothing inferior to the city of ROME. For the VEIANS being growne to ſtomacke and courage in time, by reaſon of their wealth and proſperity, and for the ſundry great battels they had fought againſt the ROMAINES, that cõtended with them for glory and empire: and now it fell ſo out, that they finding themſelues weakned by many great ouerthrowes, which they had receiued of the ROMAINES, they did let fall their former peacockes brauery and ambition, to bid them battell any more in the field. Howbeit the inhabitants of the city of VEIES hauing raiſed the wals, & made very great high rampiers, began to fortifie themſelues, and made good prouiſion for armour and munition, beſides ſtore of corne, ſhot, and other neceſſary things: they valiantly, and without feare of any thing, defended the ſiege of the ROMAINES, that continued a long time, and was no leſſe hard and painefull vnto them that did beſiege, then it was vnto thoſe that were beſieged. For where ỹ ROMAINES were wont before-time to keepe their houſes in the Winter ſeaſon, and the field only in the Sommer time: that was the firſt time they were compelled by the captaines and Tribuni militares, to build forts, and to intrench their campe with a wall, euen in their enemies countrey, and to winter abroad as they were wont to lye in the campe in Sommer. Now this ſiege had continued ſeuen yeares together. The captaines were burthened that they did not their duties, nor ſtood manfully to their charge: whereupon in the end they were diſcharged, and other captaines placed in their roomes to follow the ſiege. Among thoſe, Camillus was one, whom then the ſecond time they created Tribunus militaris. Who notwithſtanding did nothing then in that ſiege, becauſe it was his hap by lot, to make wars vpon the PHALERIANS, and the CAPENATES. Theſe people whileſt the ROMAINES were occupied otherwhere, had inuaded their country & done them great harme, during the time of their warre with the THVSCANES. But Camillus hauing ouerthrowne a great number of them in the field, had the reſt in chaſe, and draue them to take their city, and did ſhut them vp within their owne walles. The chance that happened at the lake of ALBANVS, about the time the THVSCANE wars were greateſt, did maruellouſly amaze the ROMAINS, being no leſſe wonderful, then the moſt ſtrange and vncredible thing that could be told by man. For they could not find out the cauſe of it by common reaſon, nor any naturall ground: conſidering it was in the later end of Autumne, and Sõmer was ended, & that there had not bene much raine, nor notable South-winds. And although there are many lakes, many brookes, and riuers, many ſprings, and other waters in ITALY: yet ſome of them dried vp altogether, other ran but faintly by reaſon of the drought, & all the riuers then were (as they are wont to be cõmonly in Sõmer) very low, and there was ſcant any water. But the lake ALBANVS contrariwiſe, that cometh from no other place, neither runneth any whither out of it ſelfe, being enuironed al about with hils & mountaines, and where the earth is good: began to ſwell, and riſe to euery mans ſight without any cauſe at all (but ſecret and hidden vnto the gods alone) and went alwaies increaſing along thoſe hils ſides, vntill ſuch time as it came to be euen with the height of the higheſt mountaine, gathering vpwards ſtill without any waues or tempeſt of weather at all. This at the firſt, made poore ſheepheards and heardmen keeping their cattell thereabouts, maruellouſly afraid: but at the length when the earth and the weight of one of the hils (which kept in the lake as a wall, from running ouer into the field) began to breake by reaſon of the weight and great quantity of water, that ran ſtraight with a maruellous extreme force and violence ouer all the arable lands and grounds planted with trees, and ſo tooke his courſe into the ſea: the ROMAINES then not alone, but the whole inhabitants of ITALY were wonderfully afraid, and iudged that it was ſome ſigne and prognoſtication of ſome wonderfull thing to come. And there was no other newes currant in the campe, which lay at ſiege of the citie of VEIES: in ſo much as the very brute of it fled ouer the wals of the city, vnto them that were beſieged. And as it happeneth very oft in long ſieges, that thoſe which lie in campe do oftentimes talke with them that are beſieged: there was a ROMAINE who fell acquainted, and commonly vſed to talke familiarly with one of the city, who could tell of many old and ſtrange things done and happened, and was very

skilfull aboue any other in the city, in the art of diuination, or soothsaying. The Romaine then told him one day the violent breaking out of the lake Albanvs, and perceiuing that the other after he had heard him, was as merrie as a pye at the matter, and that he gibed at their siege: he told him further, that this wonderfull chance was not onely happened vnto the Romaines at that time, but that they had bene acquainted with many other farre more strange then this, which he would very willingly open vnto him, to see if there were any remedy, that though the affaires of the common-weale had but hard successe, yet he would procure that his own priuate matters might prosper well with him. The Veian answered him, hee would heare him with a goodwill, and gaue good eare vnto him, hoping to haue heard some great secret. So the Romaine training him on still from one matter to another, holding on his way, vntill he saw he was a good distance off from the gates of the city, he suddenly caught hold on him, and by strong hand caried him away with him, and with helpe of other souldiers which came running out of the campe vnto him, he brought him to the Captaines. The Veian seeing himselfe thus forcibly vsed, and knowing also that fatall destiny cannot be auoided, began to declare vnto the Romaines, the ancient Oracles and prophesies touching the fortune of their city: by which it was reported vnto them, that the city of Veies should neuer be taken, vntil the enemy had caused the water of the lake Albanvs (which should break out) to be brought back againe, and to turne it some other way from thence, that it shold not fall into the sea. This was caried vnto the Senate at Rome, to be consulted of in the councell: and there it was determined they should send to the Oracle of Apollo at the city of Delphes, and aske him what they should do therein. So thither were sent great and notable men, Cossus Licinius, Valerius Politus, and Fabius Ambustus: who hauing ended their iourney by sea, and receiued answer of that they demanded, returned home againe, & amongst other oracles they brought one that said thus: That through negligence they had omitted some ancient ceremonies in the holy daies of the Latines. And another willed them, that they should by all possible meanes they could, keepe the water of the lake Albanvs that it fell not into the sea, and should (if it were possible) bring it backe againe into his old place: if not, that yet they should cut as many trenches and ditches as might be, that it might be drunke vp in the middest of the field. When these oracles were vnderstood, the priests prepared all things for diuine seruice, and the people went about the water of the lake to turne it againe. After these things were done, the Senate in the tenth yeare of the warres against the Veians, put off all those which did beare office, and created Camillus Dictator, who named for generall of the horsemen, Cornelius Scipio. And before he went in hand with any thing, he made a vow vnto the gods, that if it pleased thē to grant a happy end of these wars, in honor of them he would celebrate great playes, and build a temple vnto the goddesse which the Romaines call Matuta, which seemeth to be her whom we cal Leucothea, considering the ceremonies done in these sacrifices. For they cause a chambermaide to enter into her temple, and there they box her about the eares. Then they put her out of the temple, & do embrace their brothers children rather then their own. They make many other ceremonies, & they are much like vnto those that are done vnto Bacchus nurces, and to the misfortunes that chanced vnto Ino, by reason of her husbands concubine. After all these vowes & prayers made, he entred with his army into the Falicians territories, whō he ouerthrew in a great battell, together with ŷ Capenates also, which came to aide thē. From thence he went to the siege of the city of Veies, where perceiuing to take it by assault, was not to be done without great danger: he began to vndermine it (finding the earth all about very minable) and withall so deepe, that the enemies could perceiue nothing. Now when his mining fell out according to his good hope, he gaue an assault to the wals in all places alike about the city at one instant, to bring out all the inhabitants of the city to man the wals. Whilest they were all thus vpon the walles to make defence, Camillus souldiers entred secretly through the mines within the castell, hard by the temple of Iuno: which was the chiefe Church of all the city, and whereunto the citizens had most deuotion. They say that euen at that present time the Generall of the Thvscanes did sacrifice vnto the gods, and that his soothsayer hauing considered the intrails of the beasts offered vp in sacrifice, cried out aloud, that the gods gaue the victory vnto him, which should happen to come vpon them in this sacrifice. The Romaines which were within the mine hearing this, brake the earth incontinently, and leaped out, crying, and making noyse with their weapons: wherewith the enemies were so astonied, that they fled vpon it, and so the Romaines tooke the intrails intrails and caried them vnto Camillus. And these be euen much like the Poets tales and fables. Howbeit Camillus hauing by this meanes taken the city, and seeing from the top of the castell the infinite goods and riches within the citie, which the souldiers spoyled and made hauock of, he wept for very pitie. And when those that were about him told him he was a happie man, he lift vp his hands vnto heauen, and made this prayer: O mighty god Iupiter, and you ô gods, which see and iudge mens good and ill workes: you know right well, that we haue not willingly (without wrong and cause offered vs) begun this warre, but iustly, and by compulsion, to be reuenged of a city our enemy, which hath done vs great iniuries. But if to counteruaile this our great good prosperity and victory, some bitter aduersitie and ouerthrow be predestinated vnto vs: I beseech you then (most mercifull gods) in sparing our citie of ROME, and this her army, you will (with as litle hurt as may be) let it all fall & light vpon my person alone. And as he had spoken these words, and was turning on his right hand (according to the manner of the ROMAINES after they haue prayed vnto the gods) he fell downe flat before them all. The standers by taking this fall for an ill token, were somewhat troubled with the matter: but after he got vp on his feete againe, he told them that the thing he requested of the gods was happened vnto him; and that was, a litle hurt, in exchange of a great good fortune. So the whole city being spoiled and rifled, he was also desirous to carry Iunos image to ROME, to accomplish the vow he had made. And hauing sent for workmen for this purpose, he did sacrifice first vnto the goddesse, beseeching her to accept well of the ROMAINES goodwill, and that she would willingly vouchsafe to come and dwell with the other gods, who had the protection of the city of ROME. Some say, that the image answered, we was contented. But Liuius writeth, that Camillus, made this prayer, as he touched the image, and that the assistants answered, she was contented, and would go with a good will. Yet they which do affirme, it was the image self that spake, do fauor this miracle, grounding their proofe vpon the opinion of the fortune of ROME: the which, from so base & meane beginning had impossibly attained vnto so high glory & power as it had, without the singular fauour of the gods: and that hath manifestly appeared vnto the world, by sundry great proofes and examples. They bring forth also such other like wonders; as, that images haue heretofore let fall drops of swet from thē: that they haue bene heard to sigh: that they haue turned: and that they haue made certaine signes with their eyes, as we find written in many ancient stories. And we could our selues also tell such like wōders, which we haue heard mē of our time affirme, which are not vncredible, nor lightly to be condemned. But for such matters, it is as dāgerous to giue too much credit to them, as also to discredit thē too much, by reason of the weakenesse of mans nature, which hath no certaine bounds, nor can rule it selfe, but runneth sometimes after vanity & superstition, and otherwhile also despiseth and contemneth holy and diuine matters: and therfore the meane is the vertue, and not to go too farre in this, as in all other things besides, it is the best. Now Camillus, whether his late enterprise performed, in winning a citie that stood out with ROME, and held siege with them ten yeares together, had put him into an ouerweening or conceipt of himselfe: or that the words of the people, which did blesse and praise him, had made him looke high, and presume vpon himselfe, more then became the modesty of a ciuill magistrate and gouernour of the common-weale, and one that was subiect to the law: he shewed a stately triumph, set forth with all rich furniture, & specially for that himself was caried through ROME vpō his triumphant chariot drawne with foure faire white coursers. This, neuer captaine nor generall before him durst vndertake to do, neither any euer after him attempted it: for they think it as a sacred cariage, and only meet for the king, and father of the gods. This bred him much enuy amongst the citizens, which had not bene acquainted with so great statelinesse. There was another occasion also that made thē mislike him much: which was, because he stood against the law put forth that they should deuide the city of ROME. For the Tribunes of the people did set out an Edict, that the Senate and people of ROME should be deuided into two parts: and that those on whom the lot should fall, should abide still in ROME, and the other should go dwell in the new wonne city of VEIES. These were the reasons to perswade this: that both the one & the other sort should be richer then they were before, and should more easily keepe their lands & goods from the inuasion of their enemies, by meanes of these two great cities. The people which were multiplied now into great numbers, and had serued dutifully and dangerously, thought it the best way in the world: Therefore they still cried out, and thronged with great tumult, about their pulpet for orations, praying that this law might be put vnto the voyces of the people. But the whole Senate and wiſeſt citizens among them, iudging this motion of the Tribunes would be the deſtruction, and not the diuiſion of the city of Rome, could in no wiſe abide it ſhould go any further. Whereupon they went and prayed Camillus helpe: who fearing to bring it to the point, whether the law ſhould paſſe or no, did alwaies ſeeke new occaſions and lets, ſtill to delay and put off the matter, and ſtay the confirmation of this law. For theſe cauſes, he was hated of the common people. But the originall and apparant cauſe of the peoples ill wil towards him, was for taking from them the tenth part of their ſpoiles: and it was not altogether without ſome reaſon, and to ſay truly, the people did him much wrong to beare him ſuch malice for that. For before he went to the city of Veies, he made a ſolemne vow to offer the tenth part vnto the gods, of the ſpoiles of the city, if he wan the ſame. But when it was taken and ſacked, whether it was that he was loth to trouble the citizens, or hauing a world of ſubtileſſe in his head, that he eaſily forgat his vow, he ſuffered the ſouldiers to deuide the ſpoile amongſt them, and to take the benefit to themſelues. Shortly after he was diſcharged of his charge, he did enforme the Senate of his vow. Furthermore, the ſoothſayers made report at that very time, how they knew by certaine ſignes & tokens of their ſacrifices, that the gods were offended for ſomewhat, and how they muſt of neceſſity be pacified againe. Whereupon the Senate preſently made an order, where it was vnpoſſible euery man ſhould bring in againe the ſelfe ſame things he had gotten, to make a new deuiſion of euery mans ſhare: that euery one therefore vpon his oath ſhould preſent the tenth part of his gaines he had gotten by that booty. There was great trouble about it. They were driuen to vſe great extremity to the poore ſouldiers (which had trauelled ſore, and taken great paines in the wars) to make them to reſtore backe ſuch a collop out of their gaine, and the rather becauſe many of them had already ſpent it euery penny: and for this trouble, they all cryed out with open mouth againſt Camillus. But he (not knowing otherwiſe how to excuſe himſelfe) was forced to bring foorth as cold and as vnreaſonable an excuſe as he could make, which was: forſooth that hee had forgotten his vow he had made. The people notwithſtanding were eager ſtill againſt him, ſaying: how he had vowed then to offer the tenth part of the enemies goods to the gods, and that now he would performe it with the tenths of the citizens goods. Neuertheleſſe, euery man hauing brought that he ſhould for his part, it was thought good they ſhould cauſe a maſſie cup of gold to be made, to ſend to the temple of Apollo at Delphes. And ſmall ſtore of gold being in the city of Rome, as the officers of the city were ſearching vp and downe to get it, the women of Rome of their owne voluntarie wils without motion, agreed among themſelues, that they would depart withall the iewels they had towards the making vp of this offering, which came to the weight of eight talents. In recompence whereof, to honour them withall, the Senate ordained that they ſhould be praiſed openly with funerall orations at their buriall, as they did vſe at honourable and noble mens obſequies. For before that law, it was not the manner to praiſe women openly at their funerals. Now there were appointed there of the nobleſt men of the city to go to carie this offering, and they ſent them out in a galley well manned, ſtored alſo with good mariners, and trimly ſet forth in all triumphing manner: howbeit both in ſtorme, and calme weather, they were in danger of their liues. For after that they had ſcaped drowning very narrowly by tempeſt, when the wind was downe againe, they fell into another danger, which they eſcaped alſo beyond all hope. For hard by the Iſles of Æolvs, the galleys of the Liparians fell vpon them, as if they had bene rouers. But when the Liparians ſaw they made no reſiſtance, and intreated them, holding vp their hands, they gaue no further charge vpon them, but only faſtened their galley vnto theirs. So when they had haled them to the ſhore, they declared they were pirats, and offered to make port ſale of the men and goods, as if they had bene a lawfull priſe: and had ſold them indeed, had not the wiſdome and authority of Timeſitheus letted them, who was gouernour at that time of the city, and had great ado to perſwade them to let them go. And he did not ſo leaue them, but ſent out certaine of his owne ſhips to accompany them in their iourney, who did helpe them to go and performe the offering. For which curteſie of his, the Romaines afterwards did him great honour at Rome, according to his well deſeruing. The Tribunes of the people began now to ſet a foot againſt the law for the diuiding of the inhabitants of Rome vnto the city of Veies. But the wars of the Faliſces, fell out happily at that time, whereby the noble men did chuſe ſuch officers as they would. So they choſe Camillus, Tribunus militaris of the ſouldiers, & fiue others to aſſiſt him, the ſeruice in that caſe requiring a Generall that caried both authority and

and reputation among them, as an old experienced ſouldier in the wars. When the people had confirmed the election, Camillus immediatly entred the territories of the FALISCES with the ROMAINS army, where he layd ſiege to the city of the FALERIANS, being very well fortified, victualled, and ſtored with all other munition of war. Knowing therefore that it was no ſmall attempt to win this city, and that it would not be done in a ſhort time, he politickely ſought (whatſoeuer came of it) to keepe his countrey men occupied about ſome thing, and to ſtay them for going home, leſt by repairing to ROME, they ſhould haue many occaſions to rebell, and raiſe ſome ciuill diſſention. For the ROMAINES did wiſely vſe this remedy, to diſperſe abroad like good phyſitiõs, the humors which troubled the quiet ſtate of their commonweale at home. But the FALERIANS truſting in the ſituation of their city, which was very ſtrong in al parts, made ſo little account of the ſiege, that thoſe which kept no watch vpon the wals, walked vp and downe in their gownes in the city, without any weapon about them, and their children went to ſchoole, the ſchoole-maſter alſo would commonly leade them abroad out of the city a walking, to play and paſſe the time by the towne wals. For the whole city had one common ſchoole-maſter, as the GRECIANS alſo haue, which do bring vp their children from litle ones in company together, becauſe one may be familiarly acquainted with another. This ſchoole-maſter ſpying his time to do the FALERIANS a ſhrewd turne, did accuſtomably take al his ſcholers out of the city with him, to play not far from the wals at the beginning, and afterwards brought them into the city againe after they had played their fill. Now after he had led thẽ abroad thus once or twiſe, he trained them out euery day a litle further, to make them to be bold, perſwading them there was no danger. But at the length, one day hauing gotten all the citizens children with him he led them within the watch of the ROMAINES campe, and there deliuered all his ſcholers into their hands, and prayed them they would bring him vnto their Generall. So they did. And when he came before Camillus, he began to tell him that he was ſchoole-maſter vnto al theſe childrẽ, neuertheleſſe that he did more eſteeme to haue his grace and fauor, thẽ regard his office he had by this name and title. Camillus hearing what he ſaid, and beholding his treacherous part, he ſaid to thoſe that were about him: Warre of it ſelf ſurely is an euill thing, for in wars many iniuries and miſchiefes are done: neuertheleſſe, among good men there is a law and diſcipline, which doth forbid them to ſeeke victory by wicked & traiterous meanes, and that a noble & worthy generall ſhould make war, and procure victory by truſting to his owne valiantneſſe, and not by anothers vileneſſe & villany. Therfore he commanded his ſergeants to teare the cloths off the back of this vile ſchoole-maſter, and to bind his hands behind him: and that they ſhould giue the children rods & whips in their hands, to whip the traitor back againe into the city, that had betraied them, & grieued their parents. Now whẽ the FALERIANS heard newes that the ſchoole-maſter had thus betrayed them, all the city fell a weeping (as euery man may think for ſo great a loſſe) and men & women ran together one in anothers necke, to the towne wals, and gates of the city, like people out of their wits, they were ſo troubled. Whẽ they came thither, they ſaw their children bringing their ſchoole-maſter backe againe, ſtarke naked and bound, whipping of him, and calling Camillus their father, their god, and their ſauiour: ſo that not only the fathers & mothers of the children, but all other the citizens alſo in generall, did conceiue in themſelues, a wonderfull admiration and great loue, of the wiſedome, goodneſſe, and iuſtice of Camillus. So that euen preſently they called a councell, & there it was concluded they ſhould ſend ambaſſadors forthwith vnto him, to put their liues and goods to his mercy & fauor. Camillus ſent their ambaſſadors vnto ROME, where audience being giuen vnto thẽ by the Senate, the ambaſſadors ſaid: Becauſe the ROMAINS preferred iuſtice aboue victory, they taught them to be better contented to ſubmit themſelues vnto them, then to be their own men at liberty: confeſſing their vertue did more ouercome them then any force or power could do. The Senate diſpatched letters vnto Camillus, giuing him commiſſion to do and determine as he thought good. So he hauing taken a certaine ſum of mony of ẏ FALERIANS, did furthermore make peace & league with all ẏ reſt of the FALISCES: and therupon returned backe againe to ROME. But the ſouldiers grudged maruellouſly at it. For they ſtood in hope to haue had the ſacking of the city. When there was no remedy, but they muſt needes returne home empty handed, they began to accuſe Camillus to the reſt of the citizens, as ſoone as they came to ROME, ſaying: he loued not the common people, and how for ſpite he diſappointed their army of the ſpoile. On the other ſide, the Tribunes of the people began to reuiue the law for the deuiding of the inhabitants of ROME, and were ready to paſſe

it by the voices of the people. Camillus not fearing the ill wil of the commons, did boldly speake, and do in open presence, all he could against it. So that plainely he was the chiefest cause, that the people against their wils (intreate what they could) were driuen to let it alone. But withall they were so spiteful against him, that notwithstanding his sorrow and misfortune for the death of his sonne (dying of a sickenesse) was great, they would not of malice once take pitie or compassion of him. The losse whereof (albeit he was of a very good and courteous nature) was so grieuous, and made him so vnquiet, that being accused before the people, he stirred not once out of his house, but was locked vp with the women, which lamented for his son departed. He that did accuse him, was one Lucius Apuleius, burthening him that he had stolne and taken away part of the spoile of the THVSCANES: and said they had seene certaine brasen gates at his house, which had bene brought out of THVSCANE. Now the people were so maliciously bent against him, that euery man might see, if they could once take him in a trip, vpon any aduantage whatsoeuer, they would doubtlesse haue condemned him. Wherefore calling together his friends and souldiers that had serued vnder him in the wars, or that had taken charge with him, which were many in number: he earnestly besought them, that they would not suffer him thus vilely to be condemned, through false and vniust accusations layd against him, nor to be so scorned and defamed by his enemies. His friends hauing laid their heads together, and consulted thereupon, made him answer: that for his iudgement they could not remedy it, but if he were condemned, they would al ioyne together with a very good wil, to helpe to pay his fine. But he being of mind not to beare such an open shame & ignominy, determined in choler to leaue the city, & to exile himself from it. And after he had taken his leaue of his wife & children bidding them farewell, he went out of his house to the gates of the city, and said neuer a word. When he came thither, he stayed suddenly, and returning backe againe, he lift vp his hands towards the Capitoll, and made his prayers vnto the gods: that if it were of very spite and malice, and not of iust deseruing, that the common people compelled him thus shamefully to forsake the city, that the ROMAINES might quickly repent them, and in the face of the world might wish for him, and haue need of him. After he had made these prayers against the citizēs (as Achilles did against the GRECIANS) he went his way, and was condemned for his contempt, in the summe of fifteene thousand Asses of the ROMAINE coyne, which make of Greekish mony, a thousand fiue hundred Drachmas of siluer: for an As was a peece of mony, whereof ten of them made a ROMAINE peny. Howbeit there was not a ROMAINE of any vnderstanding but beleeued certainly that some great punishment would follow them incontinently, and that the wrong and iniury they had done him would be quickly requited, with some most sharpe and terrible reuenge, not only vnpleasant to think vpon, but further most notable to be spoken of through the world. There fel out so suddēly vpon it, such mischiefe towards the city of ROME, & the present time also brought forth such occasion of danger and destruction thereof, to their shame and infamy: that it was vncertaine whether it happened by chance, or else it was the handy work of some god, that would not suffer vertue recompensed with ingratitude, to passe vnreuenged. Their first token that threatned some great mischiefe to light vpon them, was the death of Iulius, one of the Censors: for the ROMAINS do greatly reuerence the Office of a Censor, and esteeme it as a sacred place. The second token that happened a litle before Camillus exile, was, that one Marcus Caditius, a man but of meane quality, and none of the Senators (but otherwise a faire conditioned honest man, and of good conscience) told the Tribuns militares of a thing that was to be well considered of. For he said that the night before, as he was going on his way in the new streete, he heard one call him aloud: and returning backe to see what it was, he saw no liuing creature, but only heard a voice bigger thē a mans, which said vnto him, Marcus Caditius, go thy way to morrow morning to the Tribuni militares, and bid them looke quickly for the GAVLES. The Tribunes were merry at the matter, and made but a ieast at his warning, & straight after followed the condemnation of Camillus. Now as touching the GAVLES: they came (as they say) of the CELTÆ, whose country not being able to maintaine the multitudes of them, they were driuen to go seeke other countries to inhabit in: and there were amongst them many thousands of yong men of seruice and good souldiers, but yet more women & litle children by a great number. Of these people some of them went towards the North sea, passing the mountaines RIPHEI, and did dwell in the extreme parts of EVROPE. Other of them remained betweene the mountaines PIRENEI, and the greatest mountaines of the ALPES, neere vnto the SENONES, and the CELTORII. There they continued

continued a long time, vntill they fortuned in the end to taſte of the wine, which was firſt brought out of ITALY vnto them. Which drink they found ſo good, and were ſo delighted with it, that ſuddenly they armed themſelues, and taking their wiues and children with them, they went directly towards the ALPES, to goe ſeeke out the country that brought forth ſuch fruit, iudging all other countries in reſpect of that, to be but wild & barren. It is ſaid, that the firſt man which brought wine vnto them, and that did procure them to paſſe into ITALY, was a nobleman of THVSCAN called Arron, and otherwiſe of no ill diſpoſed nature: howbeit he was ſubiect to this misfortune following. He was tutor to an orphan child, the richeſt that was at that time in all the countrey of THVSCAN, and of complexion was wonderfull faire: he was called Lucumo. This orphan was brought vp in Arrons houſe of a child, and though he was growne to mans ſtate, yet he would not go from him, faining he was well, and to his liking. But indeed the cauſe was, that he loued his miſtreſſe (Arrons wife) whom ſecretly he had enioyed a long time, and ſhe him, that made him like his continuance there. Howbeit in the end, loue hauing ſo poſſeſſed them both, that neither party could withdraw from other, much leſſe conceale it: the yong man ſtole her away from him, and kept her ſtill by force. Arron put him in ſuite, but he preuailed not: for Lucumo ouerweyed him with friends, money gifts, and charges. But he tooke it ſo grieuouſly, that he left his countrey: and hauing heard talke of the GAVLES, he went vnto them, and was their guide to bring them into ITALY. So they conquered at their firſt comming all that country which the THVSCANES held in old time, beginning at the foote of the mountaines, & ſtretched out in length from the one ſea vnto the other, which enuironeth ITALY, as ỹ names themſelues do witneſſe. For they call yet that ſea which looketh vnto the North, the Adriatick ſea: by reaſon of a city built ſometime by the THVSCANES which was called Adria. The other, which lieth directly ouer againſt the South, is called the THVSCANE ſea: All that country is well planted with trees, and hath goodly pleaſant paſtures for beaſts & cattell to feed in, & is notably watered with goodly running riuers. There was alſo at that time eighteene faire great cities in that country, all of them very ſtrong and well ſeated, as well for to enrich the inhabitants thereof by trafficke, as to make them liue delicately for pleaſure. All theſe cities the GAVLES had won, and had expulſed the THVSCANES, but this was done long time before. Now the GAVLES being further entred into THVSCAN, did beſiege the city of CLVSIVM. Therupon the CLVSIANS ſeeking aid of the ROMAINES, beſought them they would ſend letters & ambaſſadors vnto theſe barbarous people in their fauour. They ſent vnto them three of the beſt & moſt honorable perſons of the city, all three of the houſe of the Fabians. The GAVLES receiued them very courteouſly, becauſe of the name of ROME: and leauing to aſſault the city, they gaue them audience. The ROMAINE ambaſſadours did aſk them, what iniury the CLVSIANS had done vnto them, that they came to make warres with them. Brennus king of the GAVLES, hearing this queſtion, ſmiled and anſwered them thus: The CLVSIANS doe vs wrong in this: they being but few people together, and not able to occupy much land, do notwithſtanding poſſeſſe much, and will let vs haue no part with them, that are ſtrangers, and out of our country, and ſtand in need of ſeat and habitation. The like wrong was offered vnto you ROMAINES in old time, by thoſe of ALBA, by the FIDENATES, and the ARDEATES: and not long ſithens, by the VEIANS, and the CAPENATES: and partly by the FALISCES and the VOLSCES: againſt whom ye haue taken, and do take armes at all times: and as oft as they will let you haue no part of their goods, ye impriſon their perſons, rob and ſpoile their goods, and deſtroy their cities: and in doing this, ye do them no wrong at all, but follow the oldeſt law that is in the world, which euer leaueth vnto the ſtronger, that which the weaker cannot keepe and enioy: beginning with the gods, and ending with beaſts: the which haue this property in nature, that the bigger and ſtronger haue euer the vantage of the weaker and leſſer. Therefore, leaue your pity to ſee the CLVSIANS beſieged, leſt you teach vs GAVLES to take compaſſion alſo of thoſe you haue oppreſſed. By this anſwer the ROMAINES knew very well, there was no way to make peace with king Brennus. Wherfore they entred into the city of CLVSIVM, and incouraged the inhabitants to ſallie out with them vpon theſe barbarous people: either becauſe they had a deſire to proue the valiantneſſe of the GAVLES, or elſe to ſhew their own courage and manhood. So the citizens went out, and skirmiſhed with them hard by the wals: in the which one of the Fabians, called Quintus Fabius Ambuſtus, being excellently well horſed, and putting ſpurs to him, did ſet vpon a goodly bigge perſonage of the GAVLES, that had aduanced himſelfe farre before all the troupe of his companions.

Fabius Ambuſtus a Romaine breaketh the common law of all nations.

He was not knowne at the firſt encounter, aſwell for the ſudden meeting and skirmiſhing together, as for that his gliſtering armour dimmed the eyes of the enemies. But after he had ſlaine the Gavles, and came to ſtrip him, Brennus then knew him, and proteſted againſt him, calling the gods to witneſſe, how he had broken the law of armes, that coming as an ambaſſadour, he had taken vpon him the forme of an enemy. Hereupon Brennus forthwith left skirmiſhing, and raiſing the ſiege from Clvsivm, marched with his army vnto Rome gates. And to the end the Romaines might know, that the Gavles were not well pleaſed for the iniury they had receiued: to haue an honeſt colour to begin wars with the Romaines, he ſent an Herald before to Rome, to demand liuerie of the man that had offended him, that he might puniſh him accordingly. In the meane time, he himſelfe came marching after, by ſmall iourneys to receiue their anſwer. The Senate hereupon aſſembled, and many of the Senatours blamed the raſhneſſe of the Fabians: but moſt of all, the prieſts called Fæciáles. For they followed it very earneſtly, as a matter that concerned religion, and the honour of the gods: declaring how the Senate, in diſcharge of all the reſidue of the city of the offence committed, ſhould lay the whole weight and burthen of it vpon him alone, that onely had done the fact. Numa Pompilius, the iuſteſt and moſt peaceable of al the Kings of Rome that had bene, was he that firſt erected the Colledge of theſe Fæciales, and did ordaine that they ſhould be the keepers of peace, and the iudges to heare and allow all the cauſes, for the which they ſhould iuſtly begin any warres. Neuertheleſſe, the Senate in the end turned ouer the ordering of the matter, vnto the will and iudgement of the whole people, before whom the prieſts Fæciales did alſo accuſe Fabius Ambuſtus. The people made ſo litle account of their propounded religion, and honour of the gods in that caſe: that in ſtead of deliuering of this Fabius vnto the enemy, they did chuſe him for one of the Tribunes of the ſouldiers with his brothers. The Gavles vnderſtanding this, were ſo furious & angry thereat, that they would no longer linger their iournies, but marched with al ſpeed vnto Rome. The people that dwelt by the high waies where they ſhould paſſe by, were maruellouſly affraid to ſee the multitude of them, and their braue and vniuerſall furniture: and beginning to doubt the fury of their rage, they imagined firſt of all that they would deſtroy all the champion countrey before them, & afterwards would take all the ſtrong cities. They contrariwiſe did take nothing at al out of the fields, neither did any hurt or diſpleaſure vnto any body: but paſſing by their cities, cried out they went to Rome, and would haue no wars but with the Romaines, and how otherwiſe they deſired to be frieds with al the world. Theſe barbarous people marching on in this wiſe towards Rome, the Tribunes of the ſouldiers brought their army to the field to encounter them. They were no leſſe in number then the Gavles, for they were 40000. footmen: howbeit moſt part of them were raw ſoldiers, that had neuer ſerued in the wars before. They were very careleſs of the gods, and diſſolute in matters of religion: for they paſſed neither for good ſignes in their ſacrifices, neither to aske counſell of their ſoothſayers, which the Romaines were religiouſly wont to do, before they gaue any battel. To make the matter worſe, the number of the captaines hauing power & authority alike, did as much (or more then the reſt) diſorder & confound their doings. For oft times before, in farre leſſer matters and dangers then theſe, they did vſe to chuſe ſpeciall officers that had ſole & ſoueraigne authority, which they called Dictators: knowing very well of how great importance it is, in dangerous times to haue but one head & general, to command all, and to haue ſupreme authority of iuſtice in his hands, and not to be bound to deliuer account of his doings to any. The iniury alſo which they had too vngratefully done to Camillus, brought great miſchiefe & inconuenience then vpon them. For the captaines after him, durſt no more command the people roughly, but euer after did flatter them much. When their army was now brought into the field, they encāped thēſelues by a litle riuer called Allia, about the eleuēth ſtone from Rome, and not far from the place where the ſame riuer falleth into Tyber. Thither came the barbarous army to them, who ouerthrew them in battell, by their diſorder & lack of gouernment. For the left point or wing of their battel was broke off at the firſt by the Gavles, who charged them ſo furiouſly, that they draue them headlong into the riuer. The right wing then retiring out of the plaine, before they had any charge giuen, & hauing gotten certaine hils hard by them: they had litle hurt, & moſt of them ſauing themſelues, did recouer Rome againe. The reſt that eſcaped after the enemies were wearie of killing, fled by night vnto the citie of Veies, thinking Rome had bene loſt, and all the city put to the ſword. This ouerthrow was on the longeſt day in Sommer, the Moone being at the full: and the day before fortuned the great great ſlaughter of the Fabians, of the which were ſlaine by the THVSCANES in one day 300. all of a name. The very day it ſelf was afterwards called Alliade, of the name of the litle riuer, by the which the ſecond ouerthrow was giuen. But for the difference of daies, that ſome of them are naturally vnfortunate, or that Heraclitus the Philoſopher had reaſon to reproue the Poet Heſiodus, for making ſome daies good & ſome daies ill, as though he vnderſtood they were not all of one nature: we haue written and declared our opinion thereof in other places. Yet, becauſe the matter deliuereth preſent occaſion to ſpeake of the ſame, peraduenture it wil not be amiſſe to alledge a few examples of it onely. It fortuned the BOEOTIANS on a time to win two honorable victories, on the firſt day of the moneth they call Hippodromus (& which the ATHENIANS call Hecatombæon) that is now the moneth of Iune, by either of the which they did ſtill reſtore the GRECIANS to their liberty. One was the battell of LEVCTRES: the other was the battell of GERASTE, which was 200. yeares before, when they ouercame Lattamias, and the THESSALIANS in battell. The PERSIANS contrarily were ouercome in battell by the GRECIANS the 6. day of Auguſt, at the iorney of MARATHON; the third day, at the battell of PLATEES: and on the ſelfe ſame day, neere vnto MYCALA. On the fiue and twentieth day, at the fight of ARBELES, the ATHENIANS wan the battel by ſea, neere vnto the Ile of NAXOS, vnder the charge & gouernmēt of Chabrias, about the full of the Moone, in the moneth of Auguſt. And on the twentieth of the ſame moneth, they wan the battell of SALAMINA: as we haue written more amply in our hiſtory of difference of daies. The moneth of April alſo brought to the barbarous people many notable loſſes. For Alexander the great, ouercame the general of the king of PERSIA, at the field of GRANICA, in the ſaid moneth. The CARTHAGINIANS alſo were vanquiſhed in CICILE by Timoleon, on the ſeuen and twentieth day thereof. On which day alſo it is thought the city of TROY was taken: as Ephorus, Caliſthenes, Damaſtes, and Phylarchus, haue written in their hiſtories. Now contrariwiſe: the moneth of Iuly, which thē BOEOTIANS call Panemus, hath not bene gracious to the GRECIANS. For on the ſeuenth day of the ſame, they were ouerthrowne by Antipater at the battell of CRANON, which was their vtter deſtruction. They had before alſo loſt a battell the ſame moneth, neere vnto the city of CHÆRONEA, by king Philip. On the ſame day alſo, and in the very ſelfe moneth & yeare, thoſe which came into ITALY with king Archidamus were ſlaine euery one of them, by the barbarous people of the country. The CARTHAGINIANS alſo feare the 27. day of the ſame moneth, as ỹ day which had before time brought them into many great & ſorowfull calamities. Contrarily alſo, I know very well, how about the feaſt of myſteries, the city of THEBES was deſtroyed by Alexander, and that the ATHENIANS were compelled to receiue a gariſō of ſouldiers into their citie, about the 20. day of Auguſt, at which time they made the holy proceſſion of the myſteries of Iacchus. And on the ſelf day the ROMAINES loſt their army, and their Generall Capio, who was ſlaine by the CIMBRES. And how afterwards vnder the leading of Lucullus, they ouercame king Tigranes, & the ARMENIANS. And that Attalus, & Pompey alſo, died both on the ſelfe ſame day they were borne. To conclude, infinite examples of mē might be brought, vnto whom after like reuolutions of time, there happened notable chances of good or ill. But to returne againe vnto our hiſtorie. The day of this ouerthrow, is one of thoſe which the ROMAINES take for one of the vnfortunateſt daies that euer came vnto them. And by reaſon of that day, they reckon two other daies of euery moneth very vnfortunate, engendred through feare and ſuperſtition, which ſpreadeth farr (as commonly it doth) vpon ſuch ſiniſter misfortunes. But for this matter, we haue written it more largely and exquiſitely in the book we made, of the ceremonies & cuſtomes of the ROMAINS. Now after this battel loſt, if ỹ GAVLES had hotly purſued the chaſe of their flying enemies, nothing could haue ſaued ROME from being taken, and the inhabitants thereof from being put vnto the ſword: for the ROMAINES that fled from the battel, brought ſuch a feare vpon thoſe that receiued them, & filled the whole city of ROME with ſuch griefe & trembling, that they wiſt not what to do. The barbarous people againe, beleeuing litle their victory was ſo great as it was, fell to make good cheere for ſo great a ioy receiued, & deuided among thē the ſpoile of their enemies goods they found in the campe. So gaue they time & leiſure by this meanes, to the multitude of people that fled out of ROME, to ſeek them ſome place of ſafety: & to ſuch as remained ſtill, they left good hope to ſaue thē ſelues, and to make ſome prouiſion for defence. Thereupon they all fortified themſelues within mount Capitoll, & ſtoring it with al kind of victuall, armor, and munition, they wholly did forſake the reſt of the city. But the firſt worke they tooke in hand was this: They did bring into their fayd fort, part of their ſacred reliques: and the profeſſed Veſtals brought thither alſo their holy fire and al other their holy monuments. Some writers ſay, that they had nothing elſe in keeping, but the ſempiternall fire, and were ſo conſecrated by king Numa, who did firſt inſtitute, that the fire

ſhould be worſhipped, as the beginning of all things. For that it is the moſt motiue and quickeſt ſubſtance that is of all naturall things: notwithſtanding, that generatiō alſo is a mouing, or at the leaſt not done without motion. For we ſee, that all other ſubſtance which lacketh heate, remaineth idle, and without action, and ſtirreth not, no more then doth a dead thing, which craueth the force and heate of fire: as the ſoule it ſelfe recouering heate, beginneth ſomewhat to moue, and diſpoſeth it ſelfe to do, and ſuffer ſomething. Wherefore Numa being (as they ſay) a man of great learning and vnderſtanding, who for his wiſdome was reported to talke many times with the Muſes, did conſecrate the ſame as a moſt ſacred thing, and commanded that they neuer ſhould ſuffer that fire to go out, but to keepe it, as they would preſerue the liuely image of the eternall God, the onely King and maker of the world. Other ſay, that the fire burned continually there before the holy and ſacred things, ſignifying a kind and maner of purification; which opinion the GRECIANS hold alſo: howbeit behind the ſame fire, there were certaine hidden things, which in no caſe any might ſee, but thoſe holy Veſtall Nuns. Many alſo hold an opinion, that the Palladium of TROY (as much to ſay as Pallas image) is hidden alſo there, which was brought by Æneas into ITALIE. Other do report alſo, that Dardanus, at that time when he firſt began to build the city of TROY, brought thither the holy images of ỹ gods of SAMOTHRACIA, and he did offer them vp there: and how Æneas after the city was taken, did ſteale them away, and kept them vntill he came to dwell in ITALY. Some other alſo, that take vpon them to know more therein then the common ſort doe, hold opinion, that there are two pipes not very great, whereof the one is empty and ſtandeth open, the other is full and faſt locked vp, howbeit they are not to be ſeene but by theſe holy Nunnes. Other thinke alſo, that theſe imaginers inuented that they ſpake of their owne heads, becauſe the Veſtall Nuns did caſt all that they could put in at that time, into two pipes, which they buried after in the ground, within the temple of Quirinus: & therfore that very place carieth the ſurname at this day of pipes. Howbeit they caried about them the moſt precious things they had, and fled along the riuer. Where one Lucius Albinus (one of the common people) flying alſo, and hauing brought away his wife and litle children, & other houſhold ſtuffe he had in a cart, by chance he lighted vpon the Veſtall Nunnes in the way. But ſo ſoone as he perceiued theſe holy Nunnes (carying the bleſſed reliques and iewels in their armes, dedicated vnto the ſeruice of the gods) all alone, and that they were weary with going on foot: he cauſed his wife and his children to come out of the cart, and tooke downe all his goods alſo, and willed them to get vp, and flye into ſome citie or towne of GREECE. Thus, me thought, I could not wel paſſe ouer with ſilence, Albinus reuerence & deuotion he ſhewed vnto the gods, in ſo dangerous a time and pinch of extremity. Furthermore the prieſts of other gods, and the moſt honourableſt old men of the city of ROME (that had bene Conſuls before time, or had paſt the honour of triumph) had not the heart to forſake ROME: but putting on all their moſt holy robes & veſtments, did vow, and as it were willingly ſacrificed themſelues vnto the fortune that ſhould befall them for the ſafety of their country. And vſing certaine words and prayers which place, and did ſit them downe there, in chaires of iuory, expecting the goodwil & pleaſure of the gods what ſhould become of them. But within three daies after, Brennus came to ROME with his army: who finding the gates of the citie all open, and the wals without watch, he doubted ſome deuice in it, & feared ſome priuie ambuſh had bene layed, as one hardly beleeuing to haue found the ROMAINES of ſo baſe a mind, as to forſake their city. After being enformed of the troth, he entred into ROME by the gate Collina, and tooke the ſame little more then 360. yeares after it was firſt builded: if it be true at the leaſt that there hath remained any certaine chronicles of thoſe things vnto this preſent day, conſidering the trouble & confuſion of that time hath made many things more certaine then that, doubtfull vnto vs. But ſo it was, that the rumour ran to GREECE incontinently how ROME was taken, but yet withall ſomewhat doubtfully and vncertainly. For Heraclides Ponticus (who was about that time) ſaith in a certaine booke he wrote of the ſoule, that there was newes come from the Weſt part, that an army which came from the HYPERBORIANS had taken a city of GREECE called ROME, ſituated in that country neare the great ſea. But I wonder not that Heraclides (who hath written ſo many other fables and lyes) did amplifie amplifie the true newes of the taking of ROME, with adding too of his owne deuice, of the HYPERBORIANS, and by the great sea. It is a most true tale, that Aristotle the Philosopher had certaine knowledge it was taken by the GAVLES: howbeit he saith also it was recouered againe afterwards by one called Lucius: where indeed it was, by Marcus Camillus, and not by Lucius. But all this in manner is spoken by coniecture. Moreouer Brennus being entred ROME, did appoint part of his souldiers to besiege those which were gotten into mount Capitol. And he with the residue of his army, marched on towards the market place, where when he saw the ancient Senators set so gravely in their chaires, and spake neuer a word, nor offered once to rise, though they saw their enemies come armed against them, neither changed countenance nor colour at all, but leaned softly on their staues they had in their hands, seeming to be nothing afraid nor abashed, but looked one vpon another, he maruellously wondred at it. This their so strange maner at the first did so dampe the GAVLES, that for a space they stood still, and were in doubt to come neare to touch them, fearing lest they had bene some gods: vntill such time as one of them went boldly vnto Marcus Papyrius, & laid his hand faire and softly vpon his long beard. But Papyrius gaue him such a rap on his pate with his staffe, that he made ý bloud run about his ears. This barbarous beast was in such a rage with the blow, that he drew out his sword and slue him. The other souldiers also killed all the rest afterwards: and so the GAVLES continued many day spoiling and sacking all things they found in the houses, and in the end did set them all on fire, & destroyed them euery one, for despite of those that kept the fort of the Capitoll, and would not yeeld vpon their summons, but valiantly repulsed them whē they scaled the wals. For this cause they razed the whole city, and put all to the sword that came in their hands, yong and old, man, woman and child. Now this siege continuing long, and the ROMAINES holding them out very stoutly, victuals began to grow scant in the campe of the GAVLES, insomuch as they were driuen of force to seeke it abroad without the city. Hereupon they deuided themselues, whereof some remained still with the King at the siege of the Capitoll: and the rest went a forraging and spoiling all the champion countrie and villages thereabouts, scattered as it were by bands and companies, some here some there, fearing nothing, nor passing vpon watch or ward, they liued in such security of their victory. Howbeit the greatest company amongst them, went by fortune towards the city of ARDEA where Camillus dwelt, liuing like a priuate man, medling with no matters of state from the time of his exile, vntill that present time. But then he began not to bethink himselfe as a man that was in safetie, and might haue escaped the hands of his enemies, but rather sought to deuise and find out all the meanes he could to subdue them if occasion were so offered. Whereupon, considering that the inhabitants of ARDEA were enough in number to set vpon them, although faint hearted and cowardly, by reason of the slouth and negligence of their gouernours and captaines, who had no manner of experience in the wars: he began to cast out these words among the yong men: That they should not thinke the ROMAINES misfortune fell vpon them, through the valiantnesse of the GAVLES, nor that their calamity (who had refused good counsell) had hapned vnto them by any work or act of the GAVLES, hauing done nothing for their part to make them carry away ý victory: but that they should think it was no other thing, but Fortune alone, that would needs shew her power. Therefore, that it were now a notable and honourable enterprise (although somewhat dangerous) to driue these strangers and barbarous people out of their country: considering that the only end of their victory was, but to destroy and consume as fire, al that fell into their hands. Wherfore if they would but only take a good lusty heart and courage vnto them, he would with opportunity and space, assure them the victory without any danger. The yong men were pleased with these words of life and comfort. Whereupon Camillus went to breake the matter also vnto the magistrates and counsellers: and hauing drawne them by perswasion vnto this enterpise, he armed all that were of age to cary armour, and would not suffer a man to go out of the city, for feare lest the enemies (which were not farre off) should haue intelligence of the same. Now after the GAVLES had run ouer al the champion country, & were loden with al sorts of spoiles, they did encampe themselues negligently in open fields, and neuer charged watch nor ward: but hauing their full cariage of wine laid them down to sleepe, & made no noise at all in their campe. Camillus being aduertised therof by his seueral skouts, caused the ARDEANS with as litle noise as might be, forthwith to go out into the fields: and hauing marched somewhat roundly the distance betweene the city and the campe of the GAVLES, they came thither much about midnight. Then he made his souldiers make great ſhouts and cries, and the trumpets to be ſounded on euery ſide, to put a feare in their enemies, who yet with all the loud noiſe they made, could hardly be made to wake: they were ſo deadly drunk. Yet there were ſome notwithſtanding, that for feare to be taken tardy, did buſtle vp at this ſudden noiſe: and coming to themſelues, fell to their weapons to reſiſt Camillus, which were ſlaine by and by. The reſt and the greateſt number of them lay here and there ſcattered in the midſt of the field without any weapon dead aſleepe, ſtarke drunk with wine, and were put to the ſword and neuer ſtrake ſtroke. Thoſe that fled out of the campe that night (which were but few in number) were ouerthrowne alſo the next day, by the horſemen that followed and killed them, as they tooke them ſtragling here and there in the fields. The bruite of this victory was blowne abroad incontinently through all the towns & villages therabouts, which cauſed many yong men to come and ioyne themſelues to Camillus: but ſpecially the Romaines deſired the fame, that had ſaued themſelues in the city of Veies, after the battell loſt at Allia, who made their mones among themſelues there, ſaying: O gods, what a Captaine hath Fortune taken from the city of Rome? What honour hath the city of Ardea by the valiantneſſe & worthy deeds of Camillus: and in the meane ſeaſon his naturall city that brought him forth, is now loſt and vtterly deſtroyed? We, for lack of a captaine to leade vs, are ſhut vp here within others wals, & do nothing but ſuffer Italy in the meane ſpace to go to ruine and vtter deſtruction before our eyes. Why then do we not ſend to the Ardeans for our Captaine? or why do we not arme our ſelues to go vnto him? For he is now no more a baniſhed man, nor we poore citizens: ſince our city is poſſeſſed with the foraine power of our hatefull enemies. So they all agreed to this counſel, & ſent vnto Camillus to beſeech him to be their captaine & leade them. But he made anſwer, he would in no caſe conſent vnto it, vnleſſe they that were beſieged in the Capitoll had lawfully firſt confirmed it by their voices. For thoſe (ſaid he) ſo long as they remaine within the city, do repreſent the ſtate & body therof. Therfore if they cõmanded him to take this charge vpõ him, he would moſt willingly obey thẽ: if otherwiſe they miſliked of it, that then he would not meddle againſt their goodwils & commandement. They hauing receiued this anſwer, there was not a Romaine amongſt thẽ, but greatly honoured & extolled the wiſedome & iuſtice of Camillus. But now they knew not how to make them priuy vnto it, that were beſieged in the Capitoll: for they ſaw no poſſibility to conuey a meſſenger to thẽ: conſidering the enemies were lords of the city, and laid ſiege to it. Howbeit there was one Pontius Cominius among the yong men (a man of a meane houſe, but yet deſirous of honor and glory) that offered himſelf very willingly to venter to get in if he could. So he took no letters to cary to them that were beſieged, for feare leſt they might be intercepted, and ſo they ſhould diſcouer Camillus intention: but putting on an ill fauored gown vpon him, he conueyed certain peeces of corke vnder it and trauelling at noone daies kept on his way without feare vntill he came to Rome, bringing darke night with him. And becauſe he could not paſſe by the bridge, for that ẏ barbarous people kept watch vpõ it, he wrapped ſuch clothes as he had about his necke (which were not many nor heauy) & tooke the riuer, & ſwimming with theſe corkes he had brought, at the length he got ouer to the other ſide where the city ſtood. Thẽ taking vp thoſe lanes alwaies where he thought the enemies were not, ſeeing fire, & hearing noiſe in other places, he went to the gate Carmẽtal, where he found more ſilence then in other places: on the which ſide alſo, the hil of the Capitol was more ſteepe & vpright, by reaſon of the great rocks that were hard to clime vp vpon. But he digged and crept vp ſo long amongſt thẽ, that he got vp with great pain vnto the wal of the fortres, on the which ſide alſo the enemy kept no watch: and ſaluting the watch of the Capitol, he told them what he was. So they plucked him vp vnto them, & brought him to the magiſtrats that ruled then: who cauſed the Senate to aſſemble preſently, to whom he told the newes of Camillus victory, which they had not heard of before: & therwith alſo he did declare vnto thẽ, ẏ determinatiõ of the Romaine ſouldiers that were abroad, which was, to make Camillus their captain & generall, and did perſwade them alſo to grant him the charge, for that he was the only man abroad whom the citizẽs gaue their conſents to obey. When they heard this, all that were within the Capitol, conſulted thereupon amongſt themſelues, and ſo did chuſe Camillus Dictator, & returned the meſſenger Pontius Cominius backe againe the ſelfe ſame way he came vnto them. His fortune in returning backe was like vnto his coming thither: for the enemies neuer ſaw him. And ſo he brought report to them that were abroad, of the Senates decree & conſent, wherof they were al maruellous glad. Thus came Camillus to take this charge of generall vpon him, & found there were twenty thouſand ſand good fighting men abroad, and well armed. Then got he further aide alſo of their allies & confederates, and prepared daily to go and ſet vpon the enemies. So was Camillus choſen now Dictator the ſecond time, and went into the city of VEIES where he ſpake with the ROMAINE ſouldier that were there, and leauied a great number of the allies beſides, to go fight with the enemies as ſoone as he could. But whileſt Camillus was thus a preparing, certaine of the barbarous people in ROME, walking out by chance on that ſide of the Capitoll where Pontius Cominius had gotten vp the night before: ſpied in diuers places the prints of his feete and hands, as he had griped and gotten hold, ſtill digging to get vp, and ſaw the weeds and herbes alſo growing vpon the rockes, and the earth in like maner flat troden downe. Whereupon they went preſently vnto the king to let him vnderſtand the ſame: who forthwith came to view the place. And hauing conſidered it well, he did nothing at that time: but when darke night was come, he called a company of the lighteſt GAVLES together, and that vſed moſt to dig in mountaines, and ſaid vnto them: Our enemies themſelues do ſhew vs the way how to take them, which we could not haue found out but by themſelues. For they hauing gone vp before vs, do giue vs eaſily to vnderſtand it is no impoſſible thing for vs to clime vp alſo. Wherefore we were vtterly ſhamed, hauing already begun well, if we ſhould faile alſo to end well: and to leaue this place as vnuincible. For if it were eaſie for one man alone, by digging to clime vp to the height thereof, much leſſe is it hard for many to get vp one after another, ſo that one do helpe another. Therfore Sirs, I aſſure you, thoſe that do take paines to get vp, ſhall be honourably rewarded, according to their iuſt deſert. When the King had ſpoken theſe words vnto the GAVLES, they fell to it luſtily euery man to get vp: and about midnight, they began many of them to dig, and make ſteps vp to the rocke one after another, as ſoftly as could poſſibly, with catching hold the beſt they could, by the hanging of the rocke, which they found very ſteepe, but neuertheleſſe eaſier to clime, then they tooke it at the beginning. So that the formoſt of them being come to the top of the rock, were now ready to take the wall, and to ſet vpon the watch that ſlept: for there was neither man nor dog that heard thē. It chanced then there were holy geeſe kept in the temple of Iuno, which at other times were wont to be fed till their crops were full: but victuals being very ſtraight and ſcant at that time euen to find the men, the poore geeſe were ſo hard handled and ſo litle regarded, that they were in maner ſtarued for lacke of meate. This fowle indeed naturally is very quick of hearing, and ſo is ſhe alſo very fearful by nature: and being in maner famiſhed with their hard allowance they were ſo much the more waking and eaſier to be afraid. Vpon this occaſion therefore, they heard the coming of the GAVLES, and alſo began to run vp and downe and cry for feare: with which noiſe they did wake thoſe that were within the caſtle. The GAVLES being bewrayed by theſe fooliſh geeſe, left their ſtealing vpon them, and came in with all the open noiſe & terrour they could. The ROMAINES hearing this larum, euery man tooke ſuch weapon as came firſt to his hand, and they ran ſuddenly to reſcue that place from whence they vnderſtood the noiſe: among thoſe, the formoſt man of all, was Marcus Manlius, a man that had bene Conſul, who had a luſty body, and as ſtout a heart. His hap being to meet with two of the GAVLES together, as one of them was lifting vp his axe to knock him on the head, he preuented him, & ſtrake off his hand with his ſword, and clapt his target on the others face ſo fiercely, that he threw him backeward downe the rocke: and coming afterwards vnto the wall with others that ran thither with him, he repulſed the reſt of the GAVLES that were gotten vp, who were not many in number, neither did any great act. Thus the ROMAINES hauing eſcaped this danger, the next morning they threw the captaine downe the rocks from the caſtle, who had charge of the watch the night before: and gaue Manlius in recompence of the good ſeruice he had done, a more honourable then profitable reward, which was this: Euery man of them gaue him halfe a pound of the countrey wheat, which they call Far, and the fourth part of the meaſure of wine, which the GRECIANS call Cotile: and this might be about a quart, being the ordinary allowance of euery man by the day. After this repulſe, the GAVLES began to be diſcouraged, partly for that their victuals failed them, and durſt no more forage abroad in the fields for feare of Camillus: and partly alſo for that the plague came amongſt them, being lodged amongſt heapes of dead bodies, lying in euery place aboue ground without burial, and amongſt burnt houſes deſtroyed, where the aſhes being blowne very high by the wind and vehemency of heat, did giue a drie piercing aire, that did maruellouſly poyſon their bodies when they came to draw in the breath of it. But the greateſt cauſe of all their miſchiefe was, the change of their wonted diet. Who coming out of a freſh country, where there were excellent pleaſant places to retire vnto, to auoid the diſcommodity of the parching heat of the ſommer, were now in a naughty plaine country for them to remaine in, in the latter ſeaſon of the yere. All theſe things together did heape diſeaſes vpon thē, beſides the long continuance of the ſiege about the Capitoll (for it was then about the ſeuenth moneth) by reaſon wherof there grew a maruellous death in their campe, through the great numbers of thē that died daily, and lay vnburied. But notwithſtanding al the death and trouble of the GAVLES, the poore beſieged ROMAINS were nothing holpen the more, the famine did ſtill grow ſo faſt vpon them. And becauſe they could heare nothing of Camillus, they were growne almoſt vnto a deſpaire: and ſend vnto him they could not, the GAVLES kept ſo ſtraight watch vpon them in the city. Whereupō both parties finding themſelues in hard ſtate, firſt the watch of either ſide began to caſt out words of peace amongſt themſelues: and afterwards by conſent of the heads, Sulpitius, Tribune of the ſouldiers, came to parle with Brennus. In which parle it was articled: that the ROMAINES ſhould pay a thouſand pound weight of gold, and that the GAVLES ſhould incontinently after the receipt of the ſame, depart out of their city, & all their territories. This decree being paſſed by oath from both, the gold was brought. And when it came to be weyed, the GAVLES at the firſt priuily began to deale falſly with them: but afterwards they openly ſtayed the ballance, and would not let them wey no more, whereat the ROMAINES began to be angry with them. Then Brennus, in ſcorne and mockerie to deſpite them more, pluckt off his ſword, girdle and all, and put it into the ballance where the gold was weyed. Sulpitius ſeeing that, asked him what he meant by it. Brennus anſwered him: What can it ſignifie elſe, but ſorrow to the vanquiſhed? This word euer after ran as a common prouerbe in the peoples mouths. Some of the ROMAINES tooke this vile part of theirs in ſuch ſcorn, that they wold needs take the gold from them againe by force, and ſo returne into their hold, to abide the ſiege ſtill, as they had done before. Other were of opinion to the contrary, and thought it beſt with patience to put vp this ſcorne of theirs, and not to thinke it was a ſhame to pay more then they had promiſed: but onely to pay it by compulſion as they did, by misfortune of time, was to think it rather neceſſary, then honourable. And as they were debating the matter thus, aſwell amongſt themſelues, as with the GAVLES, Camillus came to ROME gates with his army, and vnderſtanding all what had paſſed betweene them, he commanded the reſt of the army to march faire and ſoftly after him in good order, and he in the meane ſeaſon with the beſt choiſe men he had, went before with all ſpeed. Aſſoone as the other ROMAINES within the city had ſpied him, they ſhouted out for ioy, and receiued him euery one with great reuerence, without any more words, as their ſoueraigne captaine and prince, who had power ouer them all. And Camillus taking the gold out of the ſcales, gaue it vnto his men, and commanded the GAVLES preſently to take vp their ſcales, and to get them going: for, ſaith he, It is not the ROMAINES maner to keepe their countrey with gold, but with the ſword. Then Brennus began to be hot, and told him, it was not honourably done of him, to breake the accord that had paſſed betweene them before by oath. Whereupon Camillus ſtoutly anſwered him againe, that accord was of no validity: for he being created Dictator before, all other officers & magiſtrates whatſoeuer, and their acts, by his election were made of no authority. And ſeeing therefore they had dealt with men that had no power of themſelues to accord to any matter, they were to ſpeake to him, if they required ought: for he alone had abſolute authority to pardon them if they repented, and would aske it: or elſe to puniſh them, and make their bodies anſwer the dammages and loſſe his country had by them ſuſtained. Theſe words made Brennus mad as a march hare, that out went his blade. Then they drew their ſwords of all ſides, and laid luſtily one at another as they could, within the houſes, and in open ſtreets, where they could ſet no battel in order. But Brennus ſuddenly remembring himſelf, that it was no euen match for him, retired with his men about him into his campe, before he had loſt many of his people. The next night following, he departed out of ROME with all his army, and went to encampe himſelf about a threeſcore furlongs from thence, in the high way that goeth towards the city of the GABIANS. Camillus with his whole army well appointed, went after him immediatly, and ſhewed at his camp by the breake of day. The ROMAINES hauing taken heart againe vnto them, did luſtily giue them battell: the ſame continued long, very cruell and doubtfull, vntill the GAVLES at the length were ouerthrown, & their campe taken with great ſlaughter. As for thoſe that did eſcape the fury of the battell, they were killed, ſome by the ROMAINES ſelues, who hotly followed the chaſe after the battell broken: the reſidue of them, and the greateſt part, were were ſlaine by thoſe of the cities & villages nere abouts, that did ſet vpon them as they fled ſcatteringly here and there in the fields. And thus was the city of ROME ſtrangely againe recouered that was before ſtrangely won and loſt, after it had continued ſeuen moneths in the hands of the barbarous people. For they entred ROME about the fifteenth day of Iuly: and they were driuen out againe, about the thirteenth day of February following. So Camillus triumphed as beſeemed him, and as one that had ſaued and deliuered his country out of the hands of their enemies, and ſet ROME againe at liberty. Thoſe that had bene abroad all ỹ time of this ſiege, came into ROME againe, following his triumphing chariot: and thoſe that had bene beſieged within the Capitoll (looking for no other but to haue died by famine) went and preſented themſelues before him, and each one embraced other, in weeping wiſe for ioy. The prieſts & miniſters of the temples alſo, preſented their holy iewels, whole and vndefaced, which ſome of them had buried in the ground within the city ſelfe: and other ſome had carried away with them, when they fled out of ROME. All theſe the people did as gladly ſee, as if the gods themſelues had returned home again into their city. After they had ſacrificed vnto the gods, and rendred them moſt humble thankes, and had purged their city, as they had bene taught by men experienced in thoſe matters for ſatisfaction of the gods, Camillus began againe to build vp the temples that were there before, hard by the which he built another new one alſo to the god Aius Locutius, in that very place where Marcus Cæditius heard the voice warne him of the coming of the GAVLES. So by Camillus good diligence, and the prieſts great paine and trauell, the ſituations of theſe temples were with much ado found out againe. But when they were to build againe all the reſt of the city, that was wholly burnt and deſtroyed to the ground, the people had no mind to it, but euer ſhrinked backe to put any hand to the worke, for that they lacked all things neceſſarie to begin the ſame. Furthermore, weighing their late and long ſuſtained trouble and miſeries, they were fitter to take their eaſe and reſt, then to begin new labour and toyle, to kill their hearts and bodies altogether. For neither were their bodies able to performe it, nor yet their goods to reach to the charge of it. Wherefore diſpoſing their minds to dwell in the city of VEIES, which remained whole, vntouched, and furniſhed of all things to receiue them, they deliuered to the pratling Orators (whoſe tongues did neuer ceaſſe to ſpeake placentia to the people) trim occaſion to ſet this matter abroach. So they gaue good eare, and were willing to heare certaine ſeditious words ſpoken againſt Camillus, which were theſe: That for his priuate ambition he would depriue them of a city well furniſhed already, and would againſt their willes compell them to lodge in their owne houſes, wholly burnt and pulled downe. And moreouer, that he would make them to raiſe vp againe the great ruine the fire had made, to the end the people might call him, not onely Captaine and Generall of the ROMAINES, but the founder of ROME alſo, and ſo drowne Romulus honourable title thereof. The Senate conſidering of this matter, and fearing ſome tumult among the people, they would not ſuffer Camillus to leaue the Dictatorſhip before the end of the yeare, notwithſtanding no man euer enioyed that office aboue ſixe moneths. Then Camillus for his part did much indeuour himſelfe, to comfort and appeaſe the people, praying them all he could to tarie: and further pointed with his finger vnto the graues of their auncеſtours, and put them in mind alſo of the holy places dedicated to the gods, and ſanctified by King Numa, or by Romulus, or by other Kings. But amongſt many other tokens drawne out of holy and diuine things, he forgat not to bring for example, the head of a man found new and freſh, in making the foundations of the Capitoll, as if that place by fatall deſtinie had bene once choſen to be the head and chiefe of all ITALY. And moreouer, that the holy fire of the goddeſſe Veſta (which ſince the wars had bin kindled againe by the holy Veſtal Nuns) would againe come to be put out by them, if they did forſake their naturall city: beſides the great ſhame and diſhonor it would be vnto them, to ſee it inhabited in time to come by vnknowne ſtrangers, or elſe to be left a common field and paſture, for beaſts and cattell to graze in: Such ſorrowfull examples and griefes, the honeſt naturall borne citizens, did euer blow into the peoples eares, aſwell priuatly as openly. The people againe to the contrary, did make their hearts to yerne for pitie, when they laid before their eyes their penury & pouerty they ſuſtained: and beſought them alſo not to enforce them to gather and ioyne together againe the broken peeces of a ſpoiled city (as of a ſhipwrack that had caſt them naked into the ſea, hauing only ſaued bare life & perſons) ſince that they had another city neare at hand and readie to receiue them. So Camillus counſell was, that the Senate ſhould conſult vpon this matter, & deliuer their abſolute opinion herein: which was done. And in this counſell, he himſelfe brought forth many probable reaſons, why they ſhould not leaue in any caſe, the place of their naturall birth and countrey: and ſo did many other Senatours in like caſe, fauouring that opinion. Laſt of all, after theſe perſwaſions, he commanded Lucius Lucretius (whoſe manner was to ſpeake firſt in ſuch aſſemblies) that he ſhould ſtand vp and deliuer his opinion, and that the reſt alſo in order as they ſate, ſhould ſay their minds. So euery man keeping ſilence, as Lucretius was readie to ſpeake, at the preſent time there paſſed by their councell houſe, a captaine with his band that warded that day, who ſpake aloud to his enſigne bearer that went formoſt, to ſtay, and ſet downe his enſigne there: for, ſaid he, here is a very good place for vs to dwell in. Theſe words being heard vp into the Senate houſe, euen as they ſtood all in a doubt & maze what would be the reſolution of this matter, Lucretius began to ſay, that he moſt humbly thanked the gods; and allowed of the captaines iudgement, and ſo euery one of the reſt in their order, ſaid as much. Moreouer there was a wonderfull change and alteration of mind ſodainly among the common people: for euery man did perſwade and encourage his fellow liuely to put his hand to this work. Inſomuch as tarying for no diuiſion or appointing out of ſtreets, nor ſetting out euery man his place he ſhould build in, they fell to work of all hands, euery one chuſing that place he liked beſt, & was moſt commodious for their building, without any other order or diuiſion amongſt them. Wherupon, they running to this building on a head, the ſtreets were confuſed on heaps together, and their houſes all built out of order & vniformity. For the report goeth, that the whole city (aſwell common as priuate buildings) was built vp new againe in a yeare. But the ſurueiors, to whom Camillus had giuen charge to find out all the holy places where the temples had bene ouerthrowne, as they went about mount Palatine, they came by chance to the place, where the chappel of Mars had ſtood, which the Gavles had wholy burnt and deſtroyed, as they had done all the reſt. They making cleane the place, and ſurueying euery corner, did find by chance Romulus augures crooked ſtaffe hidden vnder a great mount of aſhes. This ſtaffe is crooked at one of the ends, & they call it Litus, which ſoothſayers do vſe to quarter out the regions of the element, when they will behold the flying of birds to tell of things to come. Romulus that was very skilfull in this art, did vſe this ſtaffe: and after he was taken away from all mens ſights, the prieſts took it, and kept it as a holy relique, ſuffering no creature to lay hands on it. Now when they found this ſtaffe whole & vnbroke, where al things elſe were cõſumed and periſhed by fire, they were in a maruellous ioy thereat: for they interpreted this to be a ſigne of the euerlaſting continuance of the city of Rome. But before they could make an end of all their building, there grew a new war againe vpon them. For at one very inſtant, all the Æqves, the Volsces, and the Latines, entred with all their might & maine into the territories of the Romaines. The Thvscanes alſo went then and beſieged Svtrivm, that was in league and amity with the Romains. The Tribuni militares got them ſtraight to the field with their army, & encamped about mount Martian. The Latines beſieged them ſo ſtraightly, that their army ſtood in great danger to be ouerthrowne, & they were driuen to ſend to Rome for a new ſupply. Therupon the Romaines did chooſe Camillus Dictator againe the third time. The occaſion of this war is reported two maner of waies: whereof I will declare the firſt, which I do conceiue to be but a tale. They ſay the Latines ſent vnto the Romaines, to demand ſome of their free maides in mariage: which they did either to make a quarrell of war, or elſe as deſirous indeed to ioyne both the peoples againe by new mariages. The Romaines were amazed very much at this, and ſore troubled, as not knowing how to anſwer them, they were ſo afraid of wars. For they were yet ſcant new ſetled at home, and dreaded much leſt this demand of their daughters, was but a ſummons made to giue them hoſtages, which they finely cloaked vnder the name of alliãce in mariage. Some ſay that there was at that time a bond maid called Tutola, or as ſome ſay, Philotis, that went vnto the Senat, & counſelled them they ſhould ſend her away with ſome other faire maide ſlaues, dreſſed vp like gentlewomen, and then let her alone. The Senate liked very well of this deuice, and choſe ſuch a number of bond maids as ſhe deſired to haue, and trimming them vp in fine apparell, begawded with chaines of gold and iewels, they ſent them forth to the Latines, who were encamped not far from the city. When night was come, the other maids hid their enemies ſwords. But this Tutola, or Philotis (call her as you wil) did clime vp to the top of a wild figtree, from which ſhe ſhewed a burning torch vnto the Romains, hauing made ſhift to hang ſomwhat behind her, to keepe the light from ſight of the enemies. For this ſignall the Senate of Rome had ſecretly appointed her to ſet vp, which was the cauſe that the iſſuing issuing out of the souldiers, being commanded to go out in the night, was full of trouble and tumult. For being pressed by their captains, they called one another, & there was great ado to put thē in order of battel. Thus they went to take their enemies sleeping, who nothing mistrusting the same, were slaine the most part of them within their campe. This was done on the fift day of the moneth called then Quintilis, and now is named Iuly: at which time they do yet celebrate a certain feast in remembrance of that act. For first of al, going out of ý city, they cal aloud many of their fellowes names which are most common: as Caius, Marcus, and Lucius, shewing thereby how one of them called another after that sort, as they went in great haste out of the city. Afterwards all the maid-seruants of the city being trimly apparelled, goe playing vp and downe the towne, pleasantly iesting with those they meet: and in the end they make as though they fought together, in token that they did helpe the Romaines at that time to destroy ý Latines. Then they are feasted, sitting vnder bowers made with wild figtree boughes: and this feast is called None Capratinæ, by reason of the wild figge tree (as some thinke) from the top whereof, the bond maid shewed to the Romaines the burning torch. For the Romains call the wild figge tree, Caprificus. Other say, that all these things are done and spoken in remembrance of the mischance that happened vnto Romulus, whē he was taken out of their sight, the same day without the gates of the city, at which time there arose a sodain mist & dark cloud. Or as some other say, that then was the eclipse of the Sun: and they hold opinion that the day was named None Capratinæ, because Capra in the Romaine tongue, signifieth a goate. Romulus vanished out of mens sights, as he was making an oration vnto his people, neare vnto the place which is called goat marsh, as we haue mentioned more at large in his life. The second occasion and beginning of this war (according to the opinion of most writers) was, that Camillus being chosen Dictator the third time, and knowing that the Trib. militares with their army were straightly besieged by the Latines and Volsces, he was enforced to arme all the old men, who for very age were priuiledged from further seruice in wars. And hauing fetched a great compasse about mount Martian, because he would not be seen of his enemies, he came to lodge his camp behind them, where he raised fires, to make the Romaines know that were besieged, that he was come: which as soone as they perceiued, they tooke to them courage againe, and determined to fight. But the Latines and Volsces, kept within their camp, & did intrench & fortifie themselues with a wall of wood, which they laid acrosse, because they saw they were beset both before and behind: and determined to tarie the reliefe of a new supply, aswell of their own, as of some further aide besides from the Thvscans: which thing Camillus perceiuing, and fearing lest they should serue him, as he had already handled them, by compassing of him againe behind, he thought it necessarie to preuent this. So considering the inclosure and fortification of their camp was all of wood, and that euery morning commonly, there came a great wind from the side of the mountaines, he made prouision of a number of fire brands. And leading out his army into the fields by breake of day, he appointed one part of them to giue charge vpon the enemies on the one side, with great noise and shouting: and he with the other part determined to raise fire on the contrary side, from whence the wind should come, looking for oportunity to do the same. When he saw the Sunne vp, and the wind beginning to whistle, blowing a good gale from the side of the hils, & that the skirmish was begun on the other side: then he gaue a signall vnto the company he led with him, to set vpon the enemies, and made them throw into the inclosure of their campe, diuerse pots and darts with fire, so that the flame finding matter to catch hold of, in this inclosure of wood, and trees laid ouerthwart, did raise straight an exceeding great flame in the aire, and still got way inwards into the Latines campe. Whereupon the Latines being vnprouided of present remedy to quench the flame, and seeing their camp a fire al about their eares, they gathered themselues together at the first in a very small roome. Neuertheless, they were enforced in the end to get them into the field, and there they found their enemies ready armed, and in battell ray. So as few of those escaped that came into the field, and their fellowes that remained within their campe, were burnt to death with fire, vntill the Romaines themselues came to quench it for greedinesse of their spoile & goods. When all this was done, Camillus left his son in the camp, to keepe the prisoners and spoiles: & he himself, with the rest of the armie, went to inuade his enemies country, where he took the city of Æqvvs. Then after he had ouercome the Volsces, he led his army presently from thence vnto the city of Svtrivm. For he had not yet heard of their misfortūe. Therfore he hasted himself to aid thē, because he thought they were yet besieged by the THVSCANS. But ſuch was their hard fortune, that they had already yeelded vp their city by compoſition, and ſaued no part of their goods, but the very clothes they had on their backes. So being turned out of all they had, they met Camillus by the way as they were wandring abroad, lamenting their miſery with their wiues and litle yong children: whoſe miſery went to the very heart of Camillus, when he beheld their lamentable ſtate. Furthermore, when he ſaw the ROMAINES weepe for pitie alſo, to ſee the mone that theſe vnfortunate people made vnto him, & that it grieued them heartily to behold their great miſchance: he determined with himſelfe not to deferre reuenge, but preſently to go the ſelfe ſame day before the city of SVTRIVM, imagining that he ſhould find the THVSCANS out of order, without keeping watch, and attending nothing but making good cheere, becauſe they had newly taken a wealthy rich city, where they had left neuer an enemy in the ſame to hurt them, neither feared any abroade to come neare to aſſaulte them. And in deed it fell out rightly as he geſſed. For he had not only paſſed through the territories of the citie, without any intelligence giuen to the enemies within the ſame: but he was come to the very gates, and had taken the walles before they heard any thing of his coming, by reaſon they neither kept watch nor ward, but were diſperſed abroad in the city, in euery houſe, caring and drinking drunke together. Inſomuch as when they knew their enemies were already within the city, they were ſo full fraught with meate and wine, that the moſt of their wits ſerued them not ſo much as to flie, but taried vntill they were ſlaine or taken, like beaſts in the houſes.

Camillus wanes the city of Sutrium.

Thus was the city of SVTRIVM twiſe taken in one day. And it chanced that thoſe which had won it, loſt it: and thoſe which had loſt it, recouered it againe by Camillus meanes; who deſerued both the honour and entrie of triumph into ROME: the which wan him no leſſe good will and glory, then the two firſt before had done praiſe, and gotten fame. For euen his greateſt enemies that moſt ſpited and enuied his former noble acts, aſcribing them rather to fortune that fauoured him, then to his valiantneſſe or worthines, were forced now by this deed of his to confeſſe, that his wiſdome and valiantneſſe deſerued praiſe and commendation to the skies. Camillus of all his enemies had one moſt bitter to him, which was Marcus Manlius, that was the firſt man that gaue the GAVLES the repulſe that night they had entred the walles of the Capitoll, and had thought to haue taken it: whereupon they gaue him the ſurname of Capitolinus. He aſpiring to be the chiefe of the city, and finding no direct way to exceed the glory of Camillus, took the broad high way of them that practiſe tyranny. For he began to flatter the common people, and ſpecially thoſe that were indebted: he tooke vpon him to defend their cauſes, and pleaded their caſe at the barre againſt their creditours. Sometimes he tooke the debters out of the creditours hands, and caried them away by force, that for lacke of ability to pay were by rigour of the law condemned to be bondſlaues. But by this practiſe, in ſhort time he got him a maruellous number of ſuch needie followers, and poore men, that the noble men and honeſt citizens were afraid of the inſolent parts they played, and of the continuall troubles & tumults they daily ſtirred vp in the market place. Therefore ſuſpecting the worſt in this caſe, they did chuſe Quintus Capitolinus Dictator: who cauſed the ſaid Manlius immediatly to be apprehended, and committed him to priſon. Whereupon the people began to change their apparell: which they were neuer wont to do, but in great and common calamities. But the Senate fearing leſt ſome commotion would riſe hereupon, they did ſet him at liberty againe. He being thus out of priſon, was no whit the better, nor wiſer thereby, but did ſtill ſtirre vp the commons, more boldly and ſeditiouſly then before. Then was Camillus choſen againe Tribunus militaris, and Manlius was accuſed in his time of office. But when the matter came to pleading, the ſight of the Capitoll troubled his accuſers much. For the very place it ſelfe where Manlius had repulſed the GAVLES by night, and defended the Capitoll, was eaſily ſeene from the market place, where the matter was a hearing: and he himſelfe pointing with his hand, ſhewed the place vnto the gods, and weeping tenderly, he laid before them the remembrance of the hazard of his life, in fight for their ſafetie. This did moue the iudges hearts to pitie, ſo as they knew not what to do, but many times they did put ouer the hearing of his caſe vnto another day, and neither would they giue iudgement, knowing he was conuicted by manifeſt proofes: neither could they vſe the ſeuerity of the law vpon him, becauſe the place of his ſo notable good ſeruice was euer ſtill before their eyes. Wherefore Camillus finding the cauſe of delay of iuſtice, did make the place of iudgement to be remoued without the city, into a place called the wood Petelian, from whence they could not ſee the Capitoll. And there the accuſers gaue apparent euidence againſt him: and the iudges conſidering considering all his wicked practises, conceiued a iust cause to punish him, as he had deserued. So they gaue sentence of death against him: that he should be caried to the mount Capitol, & there to be throwne downe headlong the rockes thereof. Thus, one and the selfe place was a memory both of his notable good seruice, and also of his miserable and vnfortunate end. Besides all this, they razed his house, and built in the same place a temple to the goddesse they call Moneta: and made a law also, that no Patrician from thenceforth should dwell any more in the mount Capitol. Camillus after this, being called again to take the office of tribunus militaris the sixt time, he thought to excuse himself, aswel for that he saw he was wel stept in yeares, as also for that he feared Fortunes spite, or some mishap after he had obtained such glory for his noble actes and seruice. Howbeit the most apparent cause of his excuse, was his sickenesse, which troubled him much at that time. But the people would allow no excuse by any meanes, but cried out, they did not desire he should fight on foote nor on horseback, but that he should only giue counsell, and command: and therefore they compelled him to take the charge, and to leade the armie with one of his companions named Lucius Furius, against their enemies the PRÆNESTINES, & the VOLSCES, who ioyning together, did inuade the confines of the ROMAINES friends. So he led his army out immediatly to the field, and camped as neere the enemie as he could: being minded for his part to draw the wars out in length, that he might fight afterwards (if need required) whē he had recouered strength. But Furius cōtrarily coueting glory, was wholy bent to hazard the battell, what soeuer perill came of it: and to this end he stirred vp and incouraged the Captaines of euery priuat band. Wherfore Camillus fearing lest they should think, for ill wil he bare the yong men, that he went about to hinder and take away the meane to win their honor, and to do some noble act: suffered Furius against his will to put his men in order of battel, and he in the meane season by reason of his sickenesse, remained with a few about him in the campe. So went Lucius vpon a head to present battell to the enemie, and so was he as headily also ouerthrowne. But Camillus hearing the ROMAINES were ouerthrowne, sick as he was vpon his bed, got vp, & taking his houshold seruants with him, he went in haste to the gates of the campe, and passed through those that fled, vntill he came to meete with the enemies that had them in chase. The ROMAINES seeing this that were already entred into the campe, they followed him at the heeles forthwith: and those that fled also without, when they saw him, they gathered together and put themselues againe in array before him, and perswaded one another not to forsake their Captain. So their enemies hereupon stayed their chasing, and would pursue no further that day. But the next morning, Camillus leading his army into the field, gaue them battell, and wanne the field of them by plaine force: and following the victory hard, he entred amongst them that fled into their camp pelmell, or hand ouer head, and slue the most part of them euen there. After this victory, he was aduertised how the THVSCANS had taken the city of SVTRIVM, and had put to the sword all the inhabitants of the same, which were ROMAINE citizens. Whereupon he sent to ROME the greatest part of his army, and keeping with him the lightest and lustiest men, went & gaue assault vnto the THVSCANES, that now were harbored in the city of SVTRIVM. Which when he had won again, he slue part of them, & the other saued themselues by flight. After this, he returned to ROME with an exceeding spoile, confirming by experience, the wisedome of the ROMAINS, who did not feare the age nor sickenesse of a good captaine that was expert and valiant, but had chosen him against his will, though he was both old and sicke: and preferred him far before the yonger and lustier that made sure to haue the charge. Newes being brought vnto the Senate, that the THVSCVLANIANS were reuolted, they sent Camillus thither again, willing him of fiue other companions to take out one he liked best, euery of the which desired to be chosen, and made their sute vnto him for the same. But he refusing al other, did chuse againe Lucius Furius beyond all expectation of men, seeing not long before he needes would against his will hazard battell, in which he was ouerthrowne. Howbeit Camillus, hauing a desire (as I thinke) to hide his fault and shame he had receiued, did of courtesie preferre him before all other. Now the THVSCVLANIANS hearing of Camillus coming against them, subtilly sought to colour the fault they had already committed. Wherefore they put out a great number of people into the fields, some to plough, other to keepe the beasts, as if they had bene in best peace: and did set the gates of the city wide open, sent their children openly to schoole, their artificers wrought their occupations in their shops, the men of behauiour and honest citizens walked in the market place in their long gownes, and the officers and gouernours of the city went vp and downe to euery houſe, commanding them to prepare lodgings for the Romains, as if they had ſtood in no feare at al, and as though they had committed no fault. Howbeit al theſe fine fetches could not make Camillus beleeue, but that they had intent to rebell againſt the Romaines: yet they made Camillus pitie them, ſeeing they repented them of that they had determined to do. So he commanded them to go to Rome to the Senate, to craue pardon for their fault: and he himſelfe did helpe them, not only to purge their city of any intent of rebellion, but alſo to get them the priuiledge and freedome of Rome. And theſe be the chiefeſt acts Camillus did in the ſixt time of his Tribuneſhip. After this, one Licinius Stolo moued great ſedition in the city, betweene the common people and the Senate. For he would in any caſe that of the two Conſuls, which were choſen yearely, the one of them ſhould be a commoner, and not that both of them ſhould be of the ancient noble families, called Patricians. The Tribunes of the people were choſen, but the election of the Conſuls, the people ſtaied: ſo that the common-wealth went to decay, and declined to greater troubles, then euer it did before, for lacke of gouernement. But to ſuppreſſe this, the Senate created Camillus the fourth time Dictator: but this was ſore againſt his will, becauſe it miſliked the people much. Furthermore, he would not complaine of the people, for that they hauing ſerued him in many wars and battels, might boldly and truly ſay vnto him: that he had done more notable acts by them in the warres, then he had done by the Patricians in peace. Yet was he created Dictator in deſpite, to rule the people, and of enuie in the noble men towards them. This neceſſity did vrge him, either by force to ſuppreſſe the people, if he were the ſtronger in this diſſention: or elſe that he himſelfe ſhould be ſuppreſſed, if he became the weaker. Camillus notwithſtanding, preparing to preuent this miſchiefe, and knowing the day the Tribunes had determined, to preferre the paſſing of their law by voices of the people: he gaue warning by proclamations ſet vpon poſts, that the ſame very day he would muſter the people: & all was but to draw them from the market place into the field of Mars, & did ſet great penalties vpon thoſe that ſhould be lacking at the muſters, and would preſume to diſobey. The Tribunes of the people on the contrary part, did withſtand his threats, & ſware they would condemne Camillus ſelf in fiftie thouſand Drachmas of ſiluer, if he did not let the people alone, but would goe about to diſturb thē forgiuing their voices to ſuch a law as they liked of. Camillus perceiuing this, & fearing to be condemned and baniſhed once againe, which would fall out very ill for him, being now an old man, & one that had done ſo many great & notable acts, or els for that he thought himſelf not ſtrong enough to withſtand the force of the people: he kept his houſe that day, fayning himſelfe to be ſick, and certaine other dayes following, and in the end he gaue vp his office. Thereupon the Senate choſe in his place another Dictator, who named the ſame Licinius Stolo Generall of the horſemen, that was the author and furtherer of all this ſedition: and beſides did ſuffer him to preferre another law, and to paſſe it by voices of the people, that aboue all other lawes, did moſt trouble the Patricians. Which law did forbid any citizen of Rome, to haue, or occupy aboue fiue hundred iugera, which amount to 330. acres & a halfe, 12. pole, and 121. parts of a pole. Then was this Stolo aloft, and of great eſtimation at that time: for that he had in deſpite of the Senat eſtabliſhed this law. Howbeit ſhortly after it was found out, that himſelf had more number of acres then his owne law permitted: by reaſon whereof, he receiued the iuſt puniſhment of his own deuiſed forfeiture. Yet the moſt weighty matter of al this diſſention that began firſt, & moſt of all troubled the Senate, touching the election of the Conſuls, remained ſtill vndetermined. But while theſe matters were thus in talk, the Romaines had certaine intelligence, how the Gavles were departed once againe from the Adriaticke ſea, and were coming with a great power ſtraight vnto Rome: vpō report of which news, the wars followed immediatly. For the Gavles deſtroyed the champion countrey as they went: and the poore country men that could not recouer Rome, were ſcattered here and there amongſt the mountaines. The feare of this did ſomewhat appeaſe the diſſention. The people then aſſembling with the Senate, and the baſer ſort with the noble, did all with one voice and aſſent chuſe Camillus Dictator the fift time. He was now a very old man, lacking litle of foureſcore yeares: but neuertheleſſe, conſidering the neceſſity and preſent danger, without framing any excuſe, or ſtarting as he had before, he vndertooke the charge. Now that he had taken it vpon him, he preſently leauied men, & prepared his army. And knowing very well how the fierceneſſe of theſe barbarous Gavles conſiſted in downe right blowes with their ſwords, with which they would ſtrike off heads and ſhoulders of men at a blow, mangling them like butchers, without any art or skill of fight: hee cauſed yron ſallets,& morians to be made for the moſt of his men,as ſmoothly wrought on the outſide as could be,that their ſwords lighting on them,ſhould either ſlide off, or breake.Moreouer,he cauſed their ſhields to haue barres made about them of copper,becauſe the wood ſelfe was not able to abide their blowes.Furthermore,he did teach his ſouldiers to cary long Iauelins or punchion ſtaues,wherewith they might wound their enemies lifting vp their ſwords to ſtrike them.Now when the GAVLES were come neare ROME, hauing pitched their campe vpon the riuer of Anian,and being full loden and ſtuffed with all kinds of ſpoile and booties: then Camillus brought his army alſo into the field, and went to lodge on a little hill which was eaſie to get vpon, where there were many little caues, ſo that the moſt of his army was all hidden and couered,and thoſe that were ſeene,ſeemed to be retired thither into thoſe high places for an aduantage,and of feare. Camillus to increaſe this opinion more in his enemies, and to make them the bolder,did ſuffer them to come and ſpoile euen to the foot of the hill where he was lodged, and ſtirred not once out to trouble them,but kept himſelf quiet in his campe and well fortified: vntill ſuch time as he ſpied occaſion of aduantage,that the beſt part of their army were ſcattered here and there,a forraging all about the fields: and thoſe which remained in their campe, fell to eating and drinking as they vſed careleſly at al houres.Then Camillus ſent very early before day, his lighteſt armed men, to vexe and trouble the barbarous people in coming out of their camp, and to let them in any caſe from putting their men in order of battell:and he in the break of day came downe into the plaine, and did ſet his other men being well armed, in good array, which were a great number, and luſty fellowes,and were not as the barbarous people thought,few,& fearefull. This at the very firſt diſcouraged the hearts of the GAVLES maruellouſly, becauſe they thought themſelues diſhonoured, that the ROMAINES ſhould charge them firſt. Afterwards alſo Camillus vaunt-guard did ſet vpon the GAVLES, and that on a ſodaine, before they had leiſure to put themſelues in battel,or to order their troupes: compelling them to fight without order, as they met out of order by chance. In the end alſo, Camillus came vpon the neckes of them, with all his whole force and army together: againſt whom they ranne notwithſtanding, holding vp their naked ſwords aloft in their hands. But the ROMAINES thruſting with their armed Iauelins,receiued their enemies blowes vpon them, and thereby ſo rebated the edges of their ſwords (their blades being very ſharpe and thinne ground,and of ſo ſoft a temper) that they bowed againe,and ſtood crooked vnreaſonably:and furthermore,hauing pierced their ſhields through with their punching ſtaues,the GAVLES armes were ſo clogd and wearied with them,the ROMAINES plucking them backe to them againe,that they threw away their ſwords and ſhields, and flying in, cloſed with the ROMAINES and caught hold of their iauelins, thinking by plaine force to haue wreſted them out of their hands. Howbeit they perceiuing then the GAVLES were naked, fell ſtraight to their ſwords: and ſo was the ſlaughter of their firſt ranks very great.The other fled ſcatteringly here and there, all about the plaine:becauſe Camillus had cauſed all the hilles and mountaines about them to be occupied and poſſeſſed. Neither did they retire towards their camp,for that it was vnfortified,& alſo knew well inough it would be eaſily taken.This battel(as they ſay)was thirteene yeares after their taking of ROME before. But after that field, the ROMAINES courages were good enough againſt theſe barbarous GAVLES,whom they ſtood in feare of before: thinking the firſt time they came,that they had not ouercome them by force, but by reaſon of the plague that fell amongſt them, or through ſome other ſtrange chance. For they did ſo feare them at that time, that they made a law, that their prieſts ſhould be exempted from warres,ſo it were not againſt the GAVLES. This ouerthrow was ẏ laſt martiall act Camillus did in the wars. For,the taking of the city of VELITRES, was an accident depending vpon this iourney: becauſe they yeelded ſtraight vnto him,without ſtriking any ſtroke. But the ſeditiouſneſſe of the people of ROME about gouernement, and the chuſing of the yeare Conſuls, was the hardeſt matter he euer had in hand. For they returning home to ROME ſtrong and of great power, by their late obtained victory, would in any caſe haue one of the Conſuls to be choſen of a commoner, which was directly againſt their ancient cuſtome.But the Senate ſtoutly withſtood it,and would not ſuffer Camillus to be put out of office: hoping the better by meanes of his authority,which was great then,that they ſhould maintaine and continue their ancient dignity, and prerogatiue of their nobilitie. But as Camillus was ſet in his chaire in the market place,where he heard and diſpatched cauſes,there came a Sergeant to him, ſent from the Tribunes of the people, who commanded him to follow him, and therewithal layd violent hands vpon him, as he would haue caried him away by force. This made such a terrible tumult and vprore, that the like was neuer seene before in the market place. For Camillus friends draue the sergeant backe behind the chaire. The common people cried out againe to the sergeant from beneath, Pull him out of his chaire. This so amazed Camillus, that he knew not well what to say to the matter. Notwithstanding, he would not resigne vp his office, but taking those Senators he had about him, he went vnto the place where the Senate was wont to be kept: and there, before he would go into it, he returned backe againe vnto the Capitoll, and made his prayer vnto the gods, that it would please them to bring his troubles againe to a quiet, and so made a solemne vow and promise (if these tumults and troubles might be pacified) that he would build a temple of Concord. When this matter came to debating before the Senate, there fell great contention and diuersitie of opinions among them: yet in the end, the easiest way did carrie it, and that was, to grant the common peoples desire, that a commoner should be chosen Consull with a noble man. The Dictator hauing openly published to the people the Senates decree, confirming their desire: the common people were so ioyfull, that at that present they let fall all their malice against the Nobility and Senate, and brought Camillus home to his house, with great shouts of ioy and clapping of hands. The next morning all the people being assembled together in the market place, it was there decreed: that the temple of Concord should be built at the common-wealths charge (according to the vow Camillus had made) in such a place, as it might be seene from the market place self, where all the assemblies for matters of counsell were made. And further, it was ordered that one day more should be added to the feasts of the LATINES: and that from thenceforth they should solemnize foure festiuall daies, and should presently make great sacrifices vnto the gods, in euery temple of the city, to giue them thanks: and in token of ioy they should al weare garlands vpon their heads for this reconciliation. So Camillus proceeding to election, there were chosen two Consuls, Marcus Æmilius of the noble Patricians, and Lucius Sextus of the Plebeians or cõmoners. And this was the last act that euer Camillus did. For the next yeare after the plague was in ROME, and tooke away an infinite number of the people that died, besides many Magistrates and Officers of the city that departed: among whom, Camillus also left his life. Who notwithstanding he had liued a long time, and had ended a reasonable course of life, and was ripe for death: yet the ROMAINES made more mone and lamentation for his death alone, then for all the rest the plague had alreadie consumed.

THE LIFE OF Pericles.

CÆSAR ſeeing in Rome one day certaine rich and wealthy ſtrangers, hauing litle dogs and monkies in their armes, and that they made maruellous much of them, he asked thē if the women in their country had no children: wiſely reprouing them by this queſtion, for that they beſtowed their naturall loue and affection vpon brute beaſts, which they ſhould with all kindneſſe and loue beſtow vpon men. Nature in like caſe alſo, hauing planted in our minds a naturall deſire to learne & vnderſtand, we are in reaſon to reproue thoſe that vainly abuſe this good deſire, fondly diſpoſing it to learne things vaine and vnprofitable: and to caſt behind them in the meane ſeaſon things honeſt and neceſſary to be learned. For as touching our outward ſenſe, which with paſſion receiueth impreſſion of the thing it ſeeth, peraduenture it will be neceſſary to conſider indifferently the thing ſeene, whether it will fall out beneficiall or hurtfull vnto him: but ſo fareth it not with our vnderſtanding, for euery man may at his pleaſure turne and diſpoſe that to the thing he taketh delight in; the reaſon whereof we muſt alwayes employ to the beſt part, and that not only to conſider and look vpon the thing, but alſo to reape the benefit & commodity of the thing we ſee. For like as the eye is moſt delighted with the lighteſt and freſheſt colors: euen ſo we muſt giue our minds vnto thoſe ſights, which by looking vpon them do draw profit and pleaſure vnto vs. For ſuch effects doth vertue bring, that either to heare or reade them, they do print in our hearts an earneſt loue & deſire to follow them. But this followeth not in all other things we eſteeme, neither are we alwaies diſpoſed to deſire to do ỹ things we ſee wel done: but contrarily oftentimes, whē we like the work, we miſlike the workman, as commonly in making theſe perfumes and purple colours. For both the one and the other do pleaſe vs well: but yet we take perfumers & dyers to be men of a meane occupation. Therfore Antiſthenes anſwered one very wiſely, that told him Iſmenias was an excellent player of the flute: But yet he is a naughty man, ſaid he: otherwiſe he could not be ſo cūning at the flute as he is. Euen ſo did Philip king of Macedon ſay to his ſonne Alexander the Great on a time: that at a certaine feaſt had ſung paſſing ſweetly, and like a maſter of muſicke: Art thou not aſhamed ſon to ſing ſo well? It is enough for a king to beſtow his leaſure ſometimes to heare muſitians ſing, & he doth much honor to the Muſes to heare the maſters of the ſcience otherwhile, when one of them ſingeth to excell another. But he that perſonally ſhall beſtow his time, exercising any meane science, bringeth his paines he hath taken in matters vnprofitable, a witnesse against himselfe, to prooue that he hath bene negligent to learne things honest and profitable. And there was neuer any yong gentleman nobly borne, that seeing the image of Iupiter (which is in the city of PISA) desired to become Phidias: nor Polycletus, for seeing of Iuno in the city of ARGOS: nor that desired to be Anacreon, or Philemon, or Archilochus, for that they tooke pleasure sometime to reade their works. For it followeth not of necessity, that though the work delight, the workman must needs be praised. So in like case, such things do not profit those which behold them, because they do not moue affection in the harts of ỹ beholders to follow them, neither do stir vp affection to resemble them, and much lesse to conforme our selues vnto them. But vertue hath this singular property in all her actions, that she maketh the man that knoweth her, to affect her so, that straight he liketh all her doings, and desireth to follow those that are vertuous. For, as for riches, we only desire to haue them in possession: but of vertue, we chiefly loue the deeds. Wherfore we are contented to haue goods from other men: but good deeds we wold other should haue frō vs. For vertue is of this power, that she alloureth a mans mind presently to vse her, that wisely considereth of her, and maketh him very desirous in his heart to follow her: and doth not frame his manners that beholdeth her by any imitation, but by the only vnderstāding and knowledge of vertuous deeds, which suddenly bringeth vnto him a resolute desire to do the like. And this is the reason, why me thought I should continue still to write on the liues of noble men, and why I made also this tenth booke: in the which are contained the liues of Pericles, and Fabius Maximus, who maintained wars against Hannibal. For they were both men very like together in many sundry vertues, and specially in curtesie and iustice: and for that they could patiently beare the follies of their people, and companions that were in charge of gouernment with them, they were maruellous profitable members for their country. But if we haue sorted them well together, comparing the one with the other: you shall easily iudge that reade our writings of their liues. Pericles was of the tribe of the Acamantides, of the town of CHOLARGVS, and one of the best and most ancient families of the city of ATHENS, both by his father & mother. For Xantippus his father (who ouercame in battell the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA in the iourny of MYCALA) maried Agariste that came of Clisthenes, he who draue out of ATHENS Pysistratus of-spring, & valiantly ouerthrew their tyranny. Afterwards he established lawes, & ordained a very graue forme of gouernment, to maintaine his citizens in peace and concord together. This Agariste dreamed one night that she was brought to bed of a Lion: and very shortly after she was deliuered of Pericles, who was so well proportioned in all the parts of his body, that nothing could be mended, sauing that his head was somewhat too long and out of proportion to the rest of his body. And this is the only cause why all the statues and images of him almost, are made with a helmet on his head: because the workmen as it should seeme (and so it is most likely) were willing to hide the blemish of his deformity. But the ATTICAN Poets did call him Schinocephalos, as much to say as, headed like an onion. For those of ATTICA do sometime name that which is called in the vulgar tongue Scilla, that is to say, an onion of Barbarie, Schinos. And Cratinus the comicall Poet in his Comedy he intituled Chirones, said:

The power of vertue.

Pericles stocke.

Pericles mothers dreame.

Pericles had a long head.

Old Saturne he, and dreadfull dire Debate,
Begotten haue betweene them carnally,
This tyrant here, this heauy iolting pate,
In court of gods so termed worthily.

And againe also in that which he nameth Nemesis, speaking of him, he saith:

Come Iupiter, come Iupiter,
Come iolt head, and come inkeeper.

And Teleclides mocking him also, saith in a place:

Sometimes he stands amaz'd when he perceiues,
That hard it were sufficiently to know,
In what estate his gouernment he leaues,
And then will he be seldome seene below,
Such heauie heapes within his braines do grow.
But yet sometimes out of that monstrous pate,
He thundreth fast, and threatneth euery state.

And Eupolis in a Comedy which he intituled Demi: being very inquisitiue, and asking particularly larly of euery one of the Oratours (whom he fained were returned out of hell) when they named Pericles the laſt man vnto him, he ſaid:

Truly thou haſt now brought vnto vs here that dwell,
The chiefe of all the captaines that come from darkſome hell.

Pericles ſtudies & teachers.

And as for muſick, the moſt authors write, that Damon did teach him muſicke, of whoſe name (as men ſay) they ſhould pronounce the firſt ſillable ſhort. Howbeit Ariſtotle ſaith, that he was taught muſick by Pythoclides. Howſoeuer it was, it is certain that this Damon was a man of deepe vnderſtanding, and ſubtill in matters of gouernement: for, to hide from the people his ſufficiencie therein, he gaue it out he was a muſitian, and did reſort vnto Pericles as a maſter wreſtler or fencer: but he taught him how he ſhould deale in matters of ſtate. Notwithſtanding, in the end he could not ſo cunningly conuey this matter, but the people ſaw his harping and muſicke was only a vizard to his other practiſe: wherefore they did baniſh him ATHENS forfiue yeares, as a man that buſily tooke vpon him to change the ſtate of things, and that fauoured tyranny. And this gaue the comicall Poets matter to play vpon him finely, among which Plato in a Comedy of his, bringeth in a man that asketh him:

O Chiron, tell me firſt: art thou indeed the man,
Which did inſtruct Pericles thus? make anſwer if thou can.

Zenon Eleã

He was ſometime alſo ſcholer to the Philoſopher Zenon, who was borne in the city of ELEA, and taught naturall Philoſophie, as Parmenides did: but his profeſſion was to thwart and contrarie all men, and to alledge a world of obiections in his diſputation, which were ſo intricate, that his aduerſary replying againſt him, knew not how to anſwer him, nor to conclude his argument. The which Timon Phliaſius witneſſeth in theſe words:

Zenon was ſubtill ſure, and very eloquent,
And craftily could wind a man by way of argument,
If ſo he were diſpoſed, his cunning to deſcrie,
Or ſhew the ſharpneſſe of his wit to practiſe policie.

But Anaxagoras Clazomenian was he that was moſt familiar and conuerſant with him, and did put in him the maieſty and grauity he ſhewed in all his ſayings, and doings, who did farre excell the common courſe of ordinarie Orators that pleaded before the people: and to be ſhort, he it was that did faſhion his manners, altogether to carie that graue countenance which he did. For they called Anaxagoras in his time, Nus, as much to ſay; as vnderſtanding. Either becauſe they had his ſingular wit and capacity in ſuch great admiration, being growne to ſearch out the cauſe of naturall things: or that he was the firſt man, who did aſcribe the diſpoſition and gouernement of this world, not vnto Fortune or fatall neceſſitie, but vnto a pure, ſimple, and vnderſtanding mind, which doth ſeparate as the firſt mouing cauſe, the ſubſtance of ſuch like parts as are medled and compounded of diuerſe ſubſtances, in all other bodies through the world. Pericles made maruellous much of Anaxagoras, who had fully inſtructed him in the knowledge of naturall things, and of thoſe ſpecially that worke aboue in the aire and firmament. For he grew not only to haue a great mind and an eloquent tongue, without any affectation, or groſſe countrey termes: but to a certaine modeſt countenance that ſcantly ſmiled, very ſober in his gate, hauing a kind of ſound in his voice that he neuer loſt nor altered, and was of very honeſt behauiour, neuer troubled in his talke for any thing that croſſed him, and many other ſuch like things, as all that ſaw them in him, and conſidered them, could but wonder at him. But for proofe hereof, the report goeth, there was a naughtie buſie fellow on a time, that a whole day together did nothing but raile vpon Pericles in the market place, and reuile him to his face, with all the villanous words he could vſe. But Pericles put all vp quietly, and gaue him not a word againe, diſpatching in the meane time matters of importance he had in hand, vntill night came, that he went ſoftly home to his houſe, ſhewing no alteration nor ſemblance of trouble at al, though this lewd varlet followed him at ẏ heeles, with words of open defamation. And as he was ready to enter in at his own dores being dark night, he commanded one of his men to take a torch, and to bring this man home to his houſe. Yet the Poet Ion ſaith, that Pericles was a very proud man, and a ſtately, and that with his grauity and noble mind, there was mingled a certaine ſcorne and contempt of other: and contrarily, he greatly praiſeth the ciuility, humanity and courteſie of Cimon, becauſe he could faſhion himſelfe to all companies. But letting paſſe that which the Poet Ion ſaid: who would that vertue ſhould be full of tragicall diſcipline, bringing in with it, a certaine ſatyricall diſcourſe to moue laughter. Now Zenon contrariwiſe did counſel all thoſe that ſaid Pericles grauity was a preſumption, and arrogancie: that they ſhould alſo follow him in his preſumption. For to counterfeit in that ſort things honeſt and vertuous, doth ſecretly with time breed an affection and deſire to loue them, and afterwards with cuſtome euen effectually to vſe and follow them. So Pericles by keeping Anaxagoras companie, did not onely profite himſelfe in theſe things, but he learned beſides to put away all ſuperſtitious feare of celeſtiall ſignes and impreſſions ſeene in the ayre. For to thoſe that are ignorant of the cauſes thereof, ſuch ſights are terrible, and to the godly alſo fearefull, as if they were vtterly vndone: and all is, becauſe they haue no certaine knowledge of the reaſon that naturall Philoſophie yeeldeth, which in ſtead of a fearefull ſuperſtition, would bring a true religion accompanied with aſſured hope of goodneſſe, ſome ſay a man brought Pericles one day from his farme out of the countrey, a Rammes head that had but one horne, and that the Prognoſticator Lampon conſidering this head, that had but one ſtrong horne in the middeſt of his forehead, interpreted, that this was the ſignification thereof; That being two tribes and ſeuerall factions in the city of Athens touching gouernement, the one of Pericles, and the other of Thucydides: the power of both ſhould be brought into one, and ſpecially into his part, in whoſe houſe this ſigne did happen. Further, it is ſaid that Anaxagoras being preſent, did cauſe the Rammes head to be clouen in two peeces, and ſhewed vnto them that ſtood by, that the braine of this Ramme did not fill the pan of his natural place, but incloſed it ſelfe in all parts, being narrow like the point of an egge, in that part where the horne tooke his firſt roote of budding out. So Anaxagoras was maruellouſly eſteemed at that preſent by all thoſe that ſtood by: but ſo was Lampon, ſoone after that Thucydides was driuen away, and that the gouernment of the whole common-weale fell into the hands of Pericles alone. And it is not to be wondred at (in my opinion) that the naturall Philoſopher and the Prognoſticator did rightly meete together in troth: the one directly telling the cauſe, and the other the end of the euent as it fell out. For the profeſſion of the one, is to know how it commeth: and of the other, wherefore it commeth, and to fortell what it betokeneth. For where ſome ſay, that to ſhew the cauſe, is to take away the ſignification of the ſigne: they do not conſider that in ſeeking to aboliſh by this reaſon the wonderfull tokens and ſignes in the ayre, they do take away thoſe alſo which are done by art; as the noiſe of baſons, the lights of fire by the ſea ſide, and the ſhadowes of needles or points of dyals in the Sunne: all which things are done by ſome cauſe and handy-worke, to be a ſigne and token of ſome thing. But this argument peraduenture may ſerue better in another booke. And now againe to Pericles. Whileſt he was yet but a yong man the people ſtood in aw of him, becauſe he ſomewhat reſembled Pyſiſtratus in his countenance: and the ancienteſt men of the city alſo were much afeard of his ſoft voice, his eloquent tongue, and ready vtterance, becauſe in thoſe he was Pyſiſtratus vp and downe. Moreouer he was very rich and wealthy, and of one of the nobleſt families of the city, and thoſe were his friends alſo that caried the only ſway and authority in the ſtate: whereupon, fearing leſt they would baniſh him with the baniſhment of Oſtraciſmon, he would not meddle with gouernement in any caſe, although otherwiſe he ſhewed himſelfe in wars very valiant and forward, and feared not to venter his perſon. But after that Ariſtides was dead, that Themiſtocles was driuen away, and that Cimon being euer in ſeruice in the wars as Generall in forraine countries, was along time out of Greece: then he came to leane to the tribe of the poore people, preferring the multitude of the poore communaltie, aboue the ſmall number of Nobility and rich men, the which was directly againſt his nature. For of himſelfe he was not popular, nor meanely giuen: but he did it (as it ſhould ſeeme) to auoid ſuſpition, that he ſhould pretend to make himſelfe King. And becauſe he ſaw Cimon was inclined alſo to take part with the Nobility, and that he was ſingularly beloued and liked of all the honeſter ſort: he to the contrary inclined to the common people, purchaſing by this meanes ſafety to himſelfe, and authority againſt Cimon. So hee preſently beganne a new courſe of life, ſince he had taken vpon him to deale in matters of ſtate: for they neuer ſawe him afterwards at any time go into the city, but to the market place, or to the Senate houſe. He gaue vp going to all feaſts where he was bidden, and left the entertainement of his friends, their companie and familiarity. So that in all this time wherein he gouerned the common-weale, which was a long time, he neuer went out to ſupper to any of his friends, vnleſſe it were that he was once at a feaſt at his nephew Euryptolemus mariage: and then he taried there no longer, but while the ceremony was a doing, when they offer wine to the gods, and ſo hee roſe roſe from the table. For theſe friendly meetings at ſuch feaſts, do much abaſe any counterfeit maieſty or ſet countenance: and he ſhall haue much ado to keepe grauity and reputation, ſhewing familiarity to euery knowne friend in ſuch open places. For in perfect vertue, thoſe things truely are euer moſt excellent, which be moſt common: and in good and vertuous men there is nothing more admirable vnto ſtrangers, then their daily conuerſation is to their friends. Pericles now to preuent that the people ſhould not be glutted with ſeeing him too oft, nor that they ſhould come much to him: they did ſee him but at ſome times, and then he would not talke in euery matter, neither came much abroad among them, but reſerued himſelfe (as Critolaus ſaid they kept the SALAMINIAN galley at ATHENS) for matters of great importance. And in the meane ſeaſon, in other matters of ſmall moment, he dealt by meanes of certaine Oratours his familiar friends, amongſt whom Ephialtes (as they ſay) was one: he who tooke away the authority and power from the court of Areopagus, and did giue too much liberty to the people, as Plato ſaid. Vpon which occaſion, as the Comicall Poets ſay, he became ſo ſtout and head-ſtrong, that they could no more hold him backe, then a yong vnbridled colt: and tooke ſuch a courage vpon him, that he would obey no more, but inuaded the Iſle of EVBOEA, and ſet vpon the other Ilands. Pericles alſo becauſe he would faſhion a phraſe of ſpeech, with a kind of ſtile altogether agreeable to the manner of life and grauity he had taken vpon him: he gaue himſelf to all matters which he had learned of Anaxagoras, ſhadowing his reaſons of natural Philoſophie, with artificiall Rhetorick. For hauing obtained a deepe vnderſtanding by ſtudying of Philoſophie, and a ready way effectually to end any matter he vndertooke to prooue, (beſides that nature had endued him with an excellent wit and capacity, as the diuine Plato doth write, to bring any thing to ſerue his purpoſe) he did ſo artificially compaſſe it with eloquence, that he farre paſſed all the Orators in his time. And for this cauſe was he (as they ſay) ſurnamed Olympius, as much to ſay, as heauenly or diuine. But ſome are of opinion hee had that ſurname, by reaſon of the common buildings and ſtately workes he raiſed vp in the city of ATHENS, that did much ſet forth the ſame. Other thinke it was giuen him for his great authority and power he had in gouernement, as wel in wars as in peace. But it is no maruell that his glory was giuen him, conſidering the many other qualities and vertues that were in him. Howbeit the Comedies the Poets cauſed to be played in thoſe times (in which there were many words ſpoken of him, ſome in earneſt, ſome in ſport and ieaſt) do witneſſe that he had that ſurname giuen him, chiefly for his eloquence. For it is reported, that he thundered and lightned in his orations to the people, and that his tong was a terrible lightning. And touching this matter, they tell of an anſwer Thucydides, Mileſius ſon, ſhould pleaſantly make concerning the force of Pericles eloquence. Thucydides was a noble man, and had long time contended againſt Pericles in matters of the common-weale. Archidamus, king of LACEDÆMON, asked Thucydides on a time: whether he or Pericles wreſtled beſt. Thucydides made him anſwer: When I haue giuen him an open fall before the face of the world, he can ſo excellently denie it, that he maketh the people beleeue he had no fall at all, and perſwadeth them the contrarie of that they ſaw. Notwithſtanding hee was euer very graue and wiſe in ſpeaking. For euer when he went vp into the pulpit for orations to ſpeake to the people, he made his prayers vnto the gods, that nothing might eſcape his mouth, but that he might conſider before, whether it would ſerue the purpoſe of his matter he treated on: yet are there none of his workes extant in writing, vnleſſe it be ſome few lawes he made, and but very few of his notable ſayings are brought to light, ſaue onely theſe. He ſaid on a time, that they muſt take away the city of ÆGINA, becauſe it was a ſtraw lying in the eye of the hauen PIRÆA. And another time, he ſaid that he ſaw the warres afarre off, comming from PELOPONNESVS. Another time, as he tooke ſhippe with Sophocles (his companion in commiſſion with him as Generall of the army) who commended a faire young boy they met as they came to the hauen: Sophocles, ſaid he, a gouernour muſt not onely haue his hands, but alſo his eyes cleane. And Steſimbrotus writeth, that in a funerall oration he made in the praiſe of thoſe that were ſlaine in the warre of SAMOS, he ſaid they were immortall as the gods. For we do not ſee the gods (ſaid hee) as they bee, but for the honour that is done to them, and the great happineſſe they enioy, we do coniecture they are immortall: and the ſame things are in thoſe that dye in ſeruice and defence of their country. Now where Thucydides doth write the gouernement of the common-weale vnder Pericles to be as a gouernment of Nobility, and yet had apparence of a popular ſtate: it is true that in effect it was a Kingdome, becauſe one alone did rule and gouerne the whole ſtate. And many other ſay alſo, he was the firſt that brought in the cuſtome to deuide the enemies lands wonne by conqueſt among the people, and of the common mony to make the people ſee playes and paſtimes, and that appointed them reward for all things. But this cuſtome was ill brought vp. For the common people that before were contented with litle, and got their liuing painefully with ſweat of their browes, became now to be very vaine, ſumptuous, and riotous, by reaſon of theſe things brought vp then. The cauſe of the alteration doth eaſily appeare by thoſe things. For Pericles at his firſt comming, ſought to winne the fauour of the people, as we haue ſaid before, onely to get like reputation that Cimon had won. But comming farre ſhort of his wealth and ability, to carie out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poore, keeping open houſe to all commers, clothing poore old people, breaking open beſides all incloſures and pales through all his lands, that euery one might with more liberty come in, and take the fruits thereof at their pleaſure: and ſeeing himſelfe by theſe great meanes out-gone farre in goodwill with the common people, by Demonides counſell and procurement (who was borne in the Iſle of Ios) he brought in this diſtribution of the common money, as Ariſtotle writeth. And hauing wonne in a ſhort time the fauour and goodwill of the common people, by diſtribution of the common treaſure, which he cauſed to be deuided among them, aſwell to haue place to ſee theſe playes, as for that they had reward to be preſent at the iudgements, and by other ſuch like corruptions: he with the peoples helpe, did inueigh againſt the court of the Arcopagites, whereof he neuer was any member. For it neuer came to be his happe to be yearely gouernour, nor keeper of the lawes, nor King of the ſacrifices, nor maſter of the warres: all which were offices choſen in ancient time by lot. And further, thoſe on whom the lot fell, if they had behaued themſelues wel in their office, they were called forwards, and raiſed to be of the body of this court of the Areopagites. Pericles now by theſe meanes hauing obtained great credit and authority amongſt the people, he troubled the Senate of the Arcopagites in ſuch ſort, that he pluckt many matters from their hearing, by Ephialtes helpe: and in time made Cimon to be baniſhed ATHENS, as one that fauoured the LACEDÆMONIANS, and contraried the common wealth and authority of the people. Notwithſtanding he was the nobleſt and richeſt perſon of all the citie, and one that had won ſo many glorious victories, and had ſo repleniſhed ATHENS with the conquered ſpoiles of their enemies, as we haue declared in his life: ſo great was the authority of Pericles amongſt the people. Now the baniſhment wherewith he was puniſhed (which they called Oſtraciſmon) was limited by the law for ten yeares. In which ſpace the LACEDÆMONIANS being come downe with a great army into the country of TANAGRA, the ATHENIANS ſent out their power preſently againſt them. There Cimon willing to ſhew the ATHENIANS by his deeds, that they had falſly accuſed him for fauouring the LACEDÆMONIANS: did arme himſelfe, & went on his countrey mens ſide, to fight in the company of his tribe. But Pericles friends gathered together, and forced Cimon to depart thence as a baniſhed man. And this was the cauſe that Pericles fought that day more valiantly then euer he did, and he wanne the honour and name to haue done more in the perſon of himſelfe that day, then any other of all the armie. At that battell alſo, all Cimons friends, whom Pericles had burdened likewiſe to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS doings, died euery man of them that day. Then the ATHENIANS repented them much that they had driuen Cimon away, and wiſhed he were reſtored, after they had loſt this battell vpon the confines of the countrey of ATTICA: becauſe they feared ſharpe wars would come vpon them againe at the next ſpring. Which thing when Pericles perceiued, he ſought alſo to further that the common people deſired: wherefore he ſtraight cauſed a decree to be made, that Cimon ſhould be called home againe, which was done accordingly. Now when Cimon was returned, he aduiſed that peace ſhould be made betweene both cities: for the LACEDÆMONIANS did loue Cimon very wel, and contrarily they hated Pericles, and all other gouernours. Some notwithſtanding doe write, that Pericles did neuer paſſe his conſent to call him home againe, before ſuch time as they had made a ſecret agreement amongſt themſelues (by meanes of Elpinice, Cimons ſiſter) that Cimon ſhould be ſent out with an army of two hundred galleys, to make warres in the king of PERSIA his dominions, and that Pericles ſhould remaine at home with the authority of gouernement within the city. Thus Elpinice (Cimons ſiſter) had once before intreated Pericles for her brother, at ſuch time as he was accuſed before the Iudge of treaſon. For Pericles was one of the committies, to whom this accuſation was referred by the people. Elpinice went vnto him, and beſought him him not to do his worſt vnto her brother. Pericles anſwered her merily: Thou art too old Elpinice, thou art too old to go through with theſe matters. Yet when this matter came to iudgement, and that his cauſe was pleaded, he roſe but once to ſpeake againſt him (for his owne diſcharge as it were) and went his way when he had ſaid, doing leſſe hurt to Cimon then any other of his accuſers. How is Idomeneus to be credited now, who accuſeth Pericles that he had cauſed the orator Ephialtes to be ſlaine by treaſon (that was his friend, and did alwaies counſell him, and take his part in all kind of gouernement of the cõmon weale) only for the ielouſie and enuy he did beare to his glory? I can but muſe why Idomeneus ſhould ſpeake ſo ſlanderouſly againſt Pericles, vnleſſe it were that his melancholy humor procured ſuch violent ſpeech: who though peraduenture he was not altogether blameleſſe, yet he was euer nobly minded, and had a natural deſire of honor, in which kind of men ſuch furious cruel paſſions are ſeldom ſeene to breed. But this orator Ephialtes being cruell to thoſe that took part with the Nobility, becauſe he would ſpare or pardon no man for any offence whatſoeuer committed againſt the peoples authority, but did follow and perſecute them with all rigour to the vttermoſt: his enemies laid waite for him by meanes of one Ariſtodicus Tanagrian, and they killed him by treaſon, as Ariſtole writeth. In the meane Cimon died in the Ile of Cyprvs, being Generall of the army of the Athenians by ſea. Wherefore thoſe that tooke part with the Nobility, ſeeing Pericles was now growne very great, and that he went before all other citizens of Athens, thinking it good to haue ſome one to ſticke on their ſide againſt him, and to leſſen thereby ſomewhat his authority, that he might not come to rule all as he would: they raiſed vp againſt him, one Thucydides, of the towne of Alopecia, a graue wiſe man, and father in law to Cimon. This Thucydides had leſſe skill of wars then Cimon, but vnderſtood more in ciuill gouernement then he, for that he remained moſt part of his time within the city: where continually inueighing againſt Pericles in his pulpit for orations to the people, in ſhort time he had ſtirred vp a like companie againſt the faction of Pericles. For he kept the gentlemen and richer ſort (which they call Nobility) from mingling with the common people as they were before, when through the multitude of the commons their eſtate and dignity was obſcured, and trodẽ vnder foot. Moreouer he did ſeparate them from the people, and did aſſemble them all as it were into one body, who came to be of equall power with the other faction, and did put (as a man will ſay) a counterpoiſe into the ballance. For at the beginning there was but a little ſecret grudge only betweene theſe two factions, as an artificial flower ſet in the blade of a ſword, which made thoſe ſhew a little, that did leane vnto the people: and the other alſo ſomwhat that fauoured the Nobility. But the contention betweene theſe two perſons, was as a deep cut, which deuided the city into two factions: of which the one was called the Nobility, and the other the communalty. Therefore Pericles giuing the more liberty vnto the people, did all things that might be to pleaſe them, ordaining continuall playes and games in the city, many feaſts, bankets, and open paſtimes to entertaine the commons with ſuch honeſt pleaſures and deuices: and beſides all this, he ſent yerely an army of threeſcore gallies vnto the wars, into the which he put a great number of poore citizens that tooke pay of the ſtate for nine moneths of the yere, and therby they did learne together, and practiſe to be good ſea men. Furthermore he ſent into the countrey of Cherronesvs, a thouſand free men of the citie to dwell there, and to deuide the lands amongſt them: fiue hundred alſo into the Ile of Naxos: into the Ile of Andros, two hundred and fiftie: into Thracia, a thouſand to dwell with the Bisaltes: and other alſo into Italy, when the city of Sybaris was built againe, which afterwards was ſurnamed the city of the Thvrians. All this he did to rid the city of a nũber of idle people, who through idleneſſe began to be curious, and to deſire change of things, as alſo to prouide for the neceſſity of the poore townes-men that had nothing. For, placing the naturall citizens of Athens neere vnto their ſubiects and friends, they ſerued as a garriſon to keepe them vnder, and did ſuppreſſe them alſo from attempting any alteration or change. But that which delighteth moſt, and is the greateſt ornament vnto the city of Athens, which maketh ſtrangers moſt to wonder, and which alone doth bring ſufficient teſtimonie, to confirme that which is reported of the ancient power, riches, and great wealth of Greece, to be true and not falſe: are the ſtately and ſumptuous buildings, which Pericles made to be built in the city of Athens. For it is the only act of all other Pericles did, and which made his enemies moſt to ſpite him, and which they moſt accuſed him for, crying out vpon him in all Councels and aſſemblies: that the people of Athens were openly defamed, for carying away the ready mony of al

Grece, which was left in the Ile of Delos to be ſafely kept there. And although they could with good honeſtie haue excuſed this fact, ſaying, that Pericles had taken it from thē, for feare of the barbarous people, to the end to lay it vp in a more ſtrong place, where it ſhould be in better ſafety: yet was this too ouer great an iniury offered vnto all the reſt of Grece, and too manifeſt a token of tyranny alſo, to behold before their eyes, how we do employ the mony, which they were enforced to gather for the maintenance of the wars againſt the barbarous people, in gilding, building, and ſetting forth our city, like a glorious woman, all to begawded with gold and precious ſtones, and how we do make images, and build vp temples of wonderfull and infinite charge. Pericles replied to the contrary, and declared vnto the Athenians, that they were not bound to make any account of this money vnto their friends and allies, conſidering that they fought for their ſafety, and that they kept the barbarous people far from Grece without troubling them to ſet out any one man, horſe or ſhip of theirs, the mony only excepted, which is no more theirs that paid it, thē theirs that receiued it, ſo they beſtow it to that vſe they receiued it for. And their city being already well furniſhed, and prouided of all things neceſſary for the wars, it was good reaſon they ſhould employ & beſtow the ſurplus of the treaſure in things, which in time to come (and being throughly finiſhed) would make their fame eternall. Moreouer he ſaid that whilſt they continue building, they ſhould be preſently rich, by reaſon of the diuerſity of works of all ſorts, & other things which they ſhould haue need of: and to compaſſe theſe things the better, and to ſet them in hand, all maner of artificers & workmē (that would labour) ſhould be ſet awork. So ſhould all the townſmen and inhabitants of the city, receiue pay and wages of the common treaſure: and the city by this meanes ſhould be greatly beautified, and much more able to maintaine it ſelfe. For ſuch as were ſtrong and able men of body, and of yeares to cary weapon, had pay and entertainment of the common wealth, which were ſent abroad vnto the warres: and other that were not meete for warres, as crafts-men, and labourers, hee would alſo they ſhould haue part of the common treaſure, but not without they earned it, and by doing ſomewhat. And this was his reaſon, and the cauſe that made him occupie the common people with great buildings, and deuices of workes of diuerſe occupations, which could not be finiſhed of long time: to the end that the citizens remaining at home, might haue a meane and way to take part of the common treaſure, & enrich themſelues, as well as thoſe that went to the wars, & ſerued on ŷ ſea, or els that lay in gariſon to keepe any place or fort. For ſome gained by bringing ſtuffe: as ſtones, braſſe, iuory, gold, ebany, and cypres. Other got, to work & faſhion it: as carpēters, grauers, foūders, caſters of images, maſons, hewers of ſtone, diers, goldſmiths, ioyners working in iuory, painters, mē that ſet in ſundry colours of peeces of ſtone or wood, & turners. Other gained to bring ſtuffe, and to furniſh them, as merchants, mariners, and ſhipmaſters, for things they brought them by ſea. And by land other got alſo: as cart-makers, cariers, carters, cord-makers, ſadlers, coller-makers, and pyoners to make waies plaine, and miners, & ſuch like. Furthermore euery ſcience & craft, as a captain hauing ſouldiers, had alſo their army of ŷ workmen that ſerued them, labouring truly for their liuing, who ſerued as aprentiſes and iourneymen vnder the workmaſters: ſo the worke by this meanes did diſperſe abroad a common gaine to all ſorts of people and ages, what occupation or trade ſoeuer they had. And thus came the buildings to riſe in greatneſſe and ſumptuouſneſſe, being of excellent workmanſhip, and for grace and beauty not comparable: becauſe euery workman in his ſcience did ſtriue what he could to excell others, to make his worke appeare greateſt in ſight, and to be moſt workemanly done in ſhew. But the greateſt thing to be wondred at, was their ſpeed and diligence. For where euery man thought thoſe workes were not likely to be finiſhed in many mens liues and ages, and from man to man: they were all done and finiſhed, whileſt one onely gouernement continued ſtill in credit and authority. And yet they ſay, that in the ſame time, as one Agatarchus boaſted himſelfe, that he had quickly painted certaine beaſts, Zeuxis another painter hearing him, anſwered: And I contrarily do reioyce, that I am a long time in drawing of them. For commonly ſlight and ſodaine drawing of any thing, cannot take deepe colours, nor giue perfect beauty to the worke: but length of time, adding to the painters diligence and labour in making of the worke, maketh the colours to continue for euer. For this cauſe therefore the workes of Pericles made, are more wonderfull: becauſe they were perfectly made in ſo ſhort a time, and haue continued ſo long a ſeaſon. For euery one of thoſe which were finiſhed vp at that time, ſeemed then to bee very ancient touching the beauty thereof: and yet for the grace and continuance of the ſame, it it looketh at this day as if it were but newly done & finiſhed, there is ſuch a certain kind of flouriſhing freſhneſſe in it, which letteth that the iniury of time cannot impaire the ſight therof. As if euery of thoſe foreſaid works, had ſome liuing ſpirit in it, to make it ſeeme yong and freſh: and a ſoule that liued euer, which kept them in their good continuing ſtate. Now the chiefe ſurueyour general of al theſe works, was Phidias, albeit that there were many other excellent workmaſters in euery ſcience and occupation. For the temple of Pallas, which is called Parthénon (as a man would ſay, the temple of the virgine, and is ſurnamed Hecatómpedon, for that it is a hundred foote euery way) was built by Ictinus and Callicrates: and the chappell of Eleuſin (where the ſecret ceremonies of the myſteries were made) was firſt founded by Corœbus, who raiſed vp the firſt pillars in order, ſtanding beneath on the ground, and did ſet them vp vnto the maſter chaptrels. But after he was dead, Metagenes, borne in the towne of XYPETA, turned the arches ouer, and then did ſet the pillars in order alſo which are aboue: and Xenocles of the towne of CHOLARGEA, was he that made the lanterne or top of the ſteeple which couereth the ſanctuarie: but the long wall which Socrates heard Pericles himſelf giue order for the building of it, was done by Callicrates, who vndertooke the worke. Cratinus the Poet, in a comedie he made, laugheth at this work, to ſee how ſlowly it went forward, and how long it was a doing, ſaying:

Pericles long ago, did end this worke begunne,
And build it high, with glorious words, if ſo it had bene done.
But as for deeds (indeede) he built nothing all,
But let it ſtand: as yet it ſtands, much liker for to fall.

And as for the Theater or place appointed for muſicke, where they heare all muſitions play, and is called Odeon: it is very well made within with diuerſe ſeates and degrees, and many ranges of pillars, but the top of the roofe is altogether round, which is ſomewhat hanging downeward round about of it ſelfe, coming together into one point. And it is ſaid that this was made after the patterne and faſhion of King Xerxes royall pauilion, and that Pericles was the firſt deuiſer & maker of it. Wherfore Cratinus in another place of his comedie he maketh of the THRACIANS, doth play very pretily vpon him, ſaying: The Odeon.

Pericles here doth come, Dan Iupiter ſurnamed,
(And onions head) which hath in his great noddle finely framed
The plot of Odeon, when he deliuered was
From baniſhment, and dangers deepe, wherein he long did paſſe.

Pericles was the firſt that made maruellous earneſt labour to the people that they would make an order, that on the day of the feaſt called Panathenæa, they would ſet vp games for muſicke. And he himſelfe being choſen ruler of thoſe games, as iudge to reward the beſt deſeruer, ordained the manner the muſition ſhould euer after keepe in their ſinging, playing on their flutes, or vpon the citherne, or other inſtruments of muſick. So the firſt games that euer were for muſick, were kept within the Odeon: and ſo were the other after them alſo, euer celebrated there. The gate and entring into the caſtle was made and finiſhed within the ſpace of fiue yeares, vnder the charge of Meneſicles, that was maſter of the workes, and whileſt theſe gates were a building, there happened a wonderfull chance, which declared very well that the goddeſſe Minerua did not miſlike the building, but that it pleaſed her maruellouſly. For one of the moſt painefulleſt workmen that wrought there, fell by miſchance from the height of the caſtle to the ground, which fall did ſo ſore bruiſe him, & he was ſo ſicke withall, that the phyſitions and ſurgeons had no hope of his life. Pericles being very ſory for his miſchance, the goddeſſe appeared to him in his ſleepe in the night, and taught him a medicine, with the which he did eaſily heale the poore bruſed man, and that in ſhort time. And this was the occaſion why he cauſed the image of the goddeſſe Minerua (otherwiſe called of health) to be caſt in braſſe, and ſet vp within the temple of the caſtle, neare vnto the altar which was there before, as they ſay. But the golden image of Minerua was made by Phidias, and grauen round about the baſe: who had the charge in manner of all other workes, and by reaſon of the good will Pericles bare him, he commanded all the other workmen. And this made the one to be greatly enuied, and the other to be very ill ſpoken of. For their enemies gaue it out abroad, that Phidias receiued the gentlewomen of the city into his houſe, vnder colour to go ſee his works, and did conuey them to Pericles. Vpon this bruite, the Comicall poets taking occaſion, did caſt out many ſlaunderous ſpeeches againſt Pericles, accuſing him that he kept one Menippus wife, who was his friend and Lieuetenant in the wars: Pericles erected games for muſicke. The Poets raiſe vp ſlanders againſt Pericles.

and burdened him further, that Pyrilampes, one of his familiar friends also, brought vp fowle, and specially peacockes, which he secretly sent vnto the women that Pericles kept. But we must not wonder at those Satyres, that make profession to speake slanderously against all the world, as it were to sacrifice the iniuries and wrongs they cast vpon honourable & good men, to the spite & enuie of the people, as vnto wicked spirits: considering that Stesimbrotus THASIAN durst falsly accuse Pericles of detestable incest, and of abusing his owne sons wife. And this is the reason, in my opinion, why it is so hard a matter to come to the perfect knowledge of the truth of ancient things, by the monuments of historiographers: considering long processe of time, doth vtterly obscure the truth of matters, done in former times. For euery written historie speaking of men that are aliue, and of the time of things, whereof it maketh mention: sometime for hate & enuy, sometime for fauour or flatterie, doth disguise and corrupt the truth, But Pericles perceiuing that the orators of Thucydides faction, in their common orations did still cry out vpō him, that he did vainely waste and consume the common treasure, and that he bestowed vpon the workes, al the whole reuenue of the city: one day when the people were assembled together, before them al he asked them, if they thought that the cost bestowed were too much. The people answered him: a great deale too much. Well, said he then, the charges shall be mine (if you think good) and none of yours: prouided that no mans name be written vpon the workes, but mine onely. When Pericles had said so, the people cried out aloud, they would none of that (either because that they wondred at the greatnesse of his mind, or else for that they would not giue him the only honour and praise to haue done so sumptuous and stately works) but willed him that he should see them ended at the common charges, without sparing for any cost. But in the end, falling out openly with Thucydides, and putting it to an aduenture which of them should banish other, with the banishment of Ostracismon: Pericles got the vpper hand, and banished Thucydides out of the city, and therewithal also ouerthrew the contrary faction against him. Now when he had rooted out all factions, and brought the city againe to vnity and concord, he found then the whole power of ATHENS in his hands, and all the ATHENIANS matters at his disposing. And hauing all the treasure, armour, galleys, Iles, and the sea, and a maruellous seigniorie and kingdome (that did enlarge it selfe partly ouer the GRECIANS, and partly ouer the barbarous people) so well fortified and strengthened with the obedience of nations subiect vnto them, with the friendship of Kings, and with the alliance of diuers other Princes and mighty Lords: then from that time forward he beganne to change his manners towards the people, and not so easily to giue place and frame himselfe to the peoples wils and desires, no more then as it were to contrary winds. Furthermore he altered his ouer gentle and popular manner of gouernement which he vsed vntill that time, as too delicate and too effeminate an harmony of musicke, and did conuert it vnto an imperious gouernement, or rather to a kingly authority: but yet held still a direct course, and kept himselfe euer vpright without fault, as one that did, said, and counselled that, which was most expedient for the common-weale. He many times brought on the people by perswasions and reasons, to be willing to grant that he preferred vnto them: but many times also, he draue them to it by force, & made them against their wils do that, which was best for them. Folowing therein the deuice of a wise physition: who in a long and changeable disease, doth grant his patient sometime to take his pleasure of a thing he liketh, but yet after a moderate sort: & another time also, he doth giue him a sharpe or bitter medicine that doth vexe him, though it heale him. For (as it falleth out commonly vnto people that enioy so great an empire) many times misfortunes did chance, that filled thē full of sundry passions, ẏ which Pericles alone could finely steere and gouerne with two principall rudders, feare, and hope: brideling with the one, the fierce and insolent rashnesse of the common people in prosperitie, and with the other comforting their griefe and discouragement in aduersitie. Wherein he manifestly proued, that Rhetorick and Eloquence (as Plato saith) is an art which quickneth mens spirits at her pleasure, & her chiefest skil is, to know how to moue passions and affections throughly, which are as stops and sounds of the soule, that would be plaied vpon with a fine fingered hand of a cunning master. All which, not the force of eloquence only brought to passe, as Thucydides witnesseth: but the reputation of his life, and the opinion & confidence they had of his great worthinesse, because he would not any way be corrupted with gifts, neither had he any couetousnes in him. For, when he had brought his city not only to be great, but exceeding great and wealthy, and had in power and authority exceeded many Kings and tyrants, yea euen those which by their willes and testaments might haue haue left great poſſeſſions to their children: he neuer for all that increaſed his fathers goods and patrimony left him, the value of a groate in ſiluer. And yet the hiſtoriographer Thucydides doth ſet forth plainely inough, the greatneſſe of his power. And the Comicall poets alſo of that time do report it maliciouſly vnder couert words, calling his familiar frieds, the new Pyſiſtratides, ſaying, that they muſt make him ſweare and proteſt he would neuer be King: giuing vs thereby to vnderſtand, that his authority was too exceeding great for a popular gouernement. And Telecli-des (amongſt other) ſaith, that the ATHENIANS had put into his hands the reuenue of the towns and cities vnder their obedience, and the towns themſelues, to bind the one, and looſe the other, and to pull downe their wals, or to build them againe at his pleaſure. They gaue him power, to make peace and alliance: they gaue all their force, treaſure & authority, and all their goods wholy into his hands. But this was not for a little while, nor in a geere of fauour, that ſhould cõtinue for a time: but this held out forty years together, he being alwaies the chiefe of his city amongſt the Ephialtes, the Leocrates, the Mironides, the Cimons, the Tolmides, and the Thucydides. For after he had preuailed againſt Thucydides, and had baniſhed him, he yet remained chiefe aboue all other, the ſpace of fifteene yeares. Thus hauing attained a regall dignity to command all, which continued as aforeſaid, where no other captaines authority endured but one yeare: he euer kept himſelfe vpright from bribes and mony, though otherwiſe he was no ill husband, & could warily look to his own. As for his lands and goods left him by his parents, that they miſcaried not by negligence, nor that they ſhould trouble him much, in buſying himſelf to reduce thẽ to a valuche did ſo husband them, as he thought was his beſt and eaſieſt way. For he ſold in groſſe euer the whole yeares profit & cõmodity of his lands, & afterwards ſent to the market daily to buy the cates, and other ordinary prouiſion of houſhold. This did not like his ſonnes that were men growne, neither were his women contented with it, who would haue had him more liberall in his houſe: for they complained of his ouerhard and ſtraight ordinary, becauſe in ſo noble and great a houſe as his, there was neuer any great remaine left of meate, but all things receiued into the houſe, ranne vnder accompt, and were deliuered out by proportion. All this good husbandry of his, was kept vpright in this good order, by one Euangelus, ſteward of his houſe, a man very honeſt and skilfull in al his houſhold prouiſion: and whether Pericles had brought him vp to it, or that he had it by nature, it was not knowne, But theſe thing were farre contrary to Anaxagoras wiſedome. For he deſpiſing the world, and caſting his affection on heauenly things: did willingly forſake his houſe, and ſuffered all his land to run to layes & to paſture. But (in my opinion) great is the diuerſity betweene a contemplatiue life, and a ciuil life. For the one employeth all his time vpon ſpeculation of good and honeſt things: and to attaine to that, he thinketh he hath no need of any exteriour helpe or inſtrument. The other applying al his time vpon vertue, to the common profit and benefit of men, he thinketh that he needeth riches, as an inſtrument not only neceſſary but alſo honeſt. As, look vpon the example of Pericles, who did releeue many poore people, and Anaxagoras ſpecially among other: of whom it is reported, that Pericles being occupied about matters of ſtate at that time, hauing no leiſure to think vpon Anaxagoras, he ſeeing himſelfe old and forſaken of the world, laid him downe, and couered his head cloſe, determining to ſtarue himſelf to death with hunger. Pericles vnderſtanding this, ran preſently to him as a man halfe caſt away, & prayed him as earneſtly as he could, that he would diſpoſe himſelfe to liue, being not onely ſory for him, but for himſelfe alſo, that he ſhould loſe ſo faithfull and wiſe a counſeller, in matters of ſtate and gouernement. Then Anaxagoras ſhewed his face, and told him: O Pericles, thoſe that will ſee by the light of a lampe, muſt put oyle to it, to make the light burne. Now began the LACEDÆMONIANS to grow iealous of the greatneſſe of the ATHENIANS; wherfore Pericles to make the ATHENIANS hearts greater, and ſo draw their minds to great enterpriſes, ſet downe an order they ſhould ſend ambaſſadors to perſwade al the GRECIANS (in what part ſoeuer they dwelt in EVROPE, or ASIA, as well the litle as the great cities) to ſend their deputies vnto ATHENS, to the general aſſembly that ſhould be holden there to take order for the temples of the gods which the barbarous people had burnt, and touching the ſacrifices they had vowed for the preſeruation of GRECE, when they gaue battel vpon thẽ; and touching ſea matters alſo, that euery man might ſaile in ſafety where he would, and that all might liue together in good peace and loue one with another. To performe this commiſſion, twenty perſons were ſent of this ambaſſiate, euery one of them being fifty yeares of age and vpward. Wherof fiue of them went to the DORIANS, dwelling in ASIA, and to the inhabitants of the Iles, euē vnto the Iles of Lesbos & of the Rhodes. Fiue other went through all ŷ country of Hellespont, & of Thracia, vnto the city of Bizantivm. Other fiue were commanded to go into Boeotia, into Phocides, and through al Peloponnesvs, & from thence by the coūtry of the Locrians, into the vpland country ioyning to it, vntil they came into the country of Acarnania, and of Ambracia. And the other fiue went first into the Ile of Evboea, and from thence vnto the Oetæians, and through all the gulfe of Malea, vnto Phtiotes, vnto the Achaians, and the Thessalians: declaring to all the people where they came, the Athenians commission, perswading them to send vnto Athens, to be present at the councell which should be holden there, for the pacification and vnion of all Grece. But when all came to all, nothing was done, and the said cities of Grece did not assemble, by practise of the Lacedæmonians (as it is reported) who were altogether the let: for the first refusall that was made of their summons, was at Peloponnesvs. This haue I writtē to make Pericles noble courage to be knowne, and how profound a wise man he shewed himselfe vnto the world. Furthermore, when he was chosen General in the wars, he was much esteemed, because he euer took great regard to the safety of his souldiers. For by his good will he would neuer hazard battell, which he saw might fall out doubtfull, or in any thing dangerous: and moreouer, he neuer praised them for good Generals, neither would he follow thē that had obtained great victories by hazard, howsoeuer other did esteeme or commend them. For he was wont to say, that if none but himselfe did leade them to the shambles, as much as lay in him, they should be immortall. And when he saw Tolmides, the sonne of Tolmæus (trusting to his former victories, and the praise and commendation of his good seruice) did prepare vpon no occasion, and to no purpose, to enter into the country of Boeotia, and had procured also a thousand of the lustiest and most valiant men of the citie, to be contented to goe with him in that iourney, ouer and aboue the rest of the army he had leuied: he went about to turne him from his purpose, and to keepe him at home, by many perswasions he vsed to him before the peoples face, and spake certaine words at that time, that were remembred long after, and these they were: That if he would not beleeue Pericles counsel, yet that he would tary time at the least, which is the wisest counseller of men. These words were pretily liked at that present time. But within few daies after, when news was brought that Tolmides self was slaine in a battel he had lost, neare vnto the city of Coronea, wherein also perished many other honest and valiant men of Athens: his words spoken before, did then greatly increase Pericles reputation and goodwil with the common people, because he was taken for a wise man, and one that loued his citizens. But of all his iourneys he made, being Generall ouer the army of the Athenians, the iourney of Cherronesvs was best thought and esteemed, because it fell out to the great benefit and preseruation of all the Grecians inhabiting in that country. For besides that he brought thither a thousand citizens of Athens to dwell there (in which doing he strengthened the cities with so many good men) he did fortifie the barre also, which did let it from being of an Ile, with a fortification he drew from one sea to another: so that he defended the country against all the inuasions and piracies of the Thracians inhabiting thereabouts, and deliuered it of extreme war, with the which it was plagued before, by the barbarous people their neighbours, or dwelling amongst them who only liued vpon piracie and robbing on the seas. So was he likewise much honored and esteemed of strangers, when he did enuiron all Peloponnesvs, departing out of the hauen of Peges, on the coast of Megara, with a fleet of a hundred gallies. For he did not only spoyle the towns all along the sea side, as Tolmides had done before him: but going vp further into the maine land, farre from the sea, with his souldiers he had in the gallies, he draue some of them to retire within their walles, he made them so afraid of him: and in the country of Nemea, he ouercame the Sicyonians in battel, that taried him in the field, & did erect a pillar for a notable mark of his victory. And imbarking in his ships a new supply of souldiers which he took vp in Achaia, being friends with the Athenians at that time, he passed ouer to the firme land that lay directly against it. And pointing beyond the mouth of the riuer of Achelous, he inuaded the country of Acarnania, where he shut vp the Oeneades within their walles. And after he had laid waste and destroyed all the champion country, he returned home againe to Athens: hauing shewed himselfe in this iourney, a dreadfull Captaine to his enemies, and very carefull for the safety of his souldiers. For there fell out no manner of misfortune all this iourney (by chance or otherwise) vnto the souldiers vnder his charge. And afterwards, going with a great great nauy maruellous well appointed vnto the Realme of PONTVS, he did there gently vse and intreate the cities of GREECE, and granted them all that they required of him, making the barbarous people inhabiting thereabouts, and the Kings and Princes of the same also, to know the great force and power of the ATHENIANS, who sailed without feare all about where they thought good, keeping all the coasts of the sea vnder their obedience. Furthermore, he left with the SINOPIANS thirteene gallies, with certaine number of souldiers vnder captaine Lamachus, to defend them against the tyrant Timesilens, who being expulsed and driuen away with those of his faction, Pericles caused proclamation to be made at ATHENS, that fixe hundred free men of the citie, that had any desire to go, without compulsion, might go dwel at SINOPA, where they should haue deuided among them the goods and lands of the tyrant and his followers. But he did not follow the foolish vaine humors of his citizens, nor would not yeeld to their vnsatiable couetousnesse, who being set on a iolitie to see themselues so strong and of such a power, and besides, to haue good lucke, would needs once againe attempt to conquer ÆGYPT, and to reuolt all the countries vpon the sea coasts, from the empire of the king of PERSIA: for there were many of thē whose mindes were maruellously bent to attempt the vnfortunate enterprise of entring SICILIA, which Alcibiades afterwards did much pricke forward. And some of them dreamed besides, of the conquest of THVSCAN, and the empire of CARTHAGE. But this was not altogether without some likelihood, nor without occasion of hope, considering the large bounds of their kingdome, and the fortunat estate of their affaires, which fell out according to their own desire. But Pericles did hinder their going out, & cut off altogether their curious desire, employing the most part of their power and force, to keepe that they had already got: esteeming it no small matter to keepe downe the LACEDÆMONIANS frō growing greater. For he was alwaies an enemie to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he shewed himselfe in many things, but specially in the warre he made, called the holy warre. For the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing put the PHOCIANS from the charge of the temple, of Apollo, in the city, of DELPHES, which they had vsurped, and hauing restored the DELPHIANS again vnto the same, so soone as they were gone thence, Pericles went also with another army, and restored the PHOCIANS in againe. And whereas the LACEDÆMONIANS had caused to be grauen in the forehead of a Wolfe of brasse, the priuiledge the DELPHIANS had grāted thē, to be the first that should make their demands of the oracle: he hauing attained the like priuiledge of the PHOCIANS, made his image also to be grauen on the right side of the same image, of the brasen Wolfe. Now how wisely Pericles did gouern GREECE by the power of the ATHENIANS, his deeds do plainly shew. For first of all, the country of EVBOEA did rebell, against whom he brought the army of the ATHENIANS. And suddenly in the necke of that, came newes from another coast, that the MEGARIANS also were in armes against them, and how they were already entred into the country of ATTICA with a great army, led by Plistonax King of LACEDÆMON. This occasion drew him homeward againe, and so he marched backe with speed into his country, to make preparation to encounter his enemies, that were already entred into the teritories of ATTICA. He durst not offer them battell, being so great a number of valiant soldiers: but hearing that king Plistonax was yet but a yong man, and was ruled altogether by Cleandrides counsell and direction (whom the Ephores had placed about him to counsell and direct him) he sought priuily to corrupt Cleandrides. When he had won him soone with his money, he perswaded him to draw backe the PELOPONNESIANS out of their country of ATTICA: and so he did. But when the LACEDÆMONIANS saw their army cassed, and that the people were gone their way, euery man to his own city or town, they were so mad at it, that the king was cōdemned in a great som. The king being vnable to answer his fine, which was so extreme great, he was driuen to absent himselfe from LACEDÆMON. Cleandrides on the other side, if he had not fled in time, euen for spite had bene cōdemned to death. This Cleandrides was Gylippus father, that afterwards ouercame the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, in whom it seemed nature bred couetousnes, as a disease inheritable by succession from the father to the son. For he being shamefully conuicted also, for certain vile parts he had plaid, was likewise banished from SPARTA: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lysander. And Pericles deliuering vp the account of his charge, and setting downe an article of the expence of tenne talents he had employed, or should imploy in needfull causes: the people allowed them him, neuer asking question how, nor which way, nor whether it was true that they were bestowed. Now there are certaine writers (amongst whom the Philosopher Theophrastus is one) who write that Pericles sent yearely vnto SPARTA ten talents, with the which he entertained those that were in authoritie there, because they should make no wars with them: not to buy peace of them, but time, that he might in the meane season, with better commodity, and that leysure, prouide to maintaine the wars. After that, as the army of the PELOPONNESIANS were out of the country of ATTICA, he returned against the rebels, and passed into the Ile EVBOEA with fifty saile, and fiue thousand footmen well armed: and there he ouercame all the cities that had taken armes against him, and draue away the Hyppobotes, who were the most famous men of all the CHALCIDIANS, as well for their riches, as for their valiantnes. He draue away also all the HESTIÆIANS, whom he chased cleane out of all the country, and placed in their city, only the citizens of ATHENS. And the cause why he dealt so rigorously with them was, because they hauing taken a galley of the ATHENIANS prisoner, had put all the men to death that were in her. And peace being cõcluded afterwards betweene the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS for thirty yeares: he proclaimed open wars against those of the Ile of SAMOS, burthening them, that they being commanded by the ATHENIANS, to pacifie the quarrels which they had against the MILESIANS, they would not obey. But because some hold opinion, that he tooke vpon him this warre against SAMOS, for the loue of Aspasia, it shall be no great digression of our story, to tell you by the way, what manner of woman she was, and what a maruellous gift and power she had, that she could entangle with her loue the chiefest rulers and gouernors at that time of the common weale, and that the Philosophers themselues did so largely speake and write of her. First of all, it is certaine that she was borne in the city of MILETVM, and was the daughter of one Axiochus: she following the steps & example of an old curtisan of IONIA, called Thargelia, gaue her selfe only to entertaine the greatest persons and chiefest rulers in her time. For this Thargelia being passing faire, and carying a comely grace with her, hauing a sharpe wit & pleasant tong, she had the acquaintance and friendship of the greatest of all GREECE, and wanne all those that did haunt her company, to be at the king of Persiaes commandement. So that she sowed through all the cities of GREECE, great beginnings of the faction of the MEDES: for they were the greatest men of power and authority of euery city that were acquainted with her. But as for Aspasia, some say that Pericles resorted vnto her, because she was a wise woman, and had great vnderstanding in matters of state and gouernement. For Socrates himselfe went to see her sometimes with his friends: and those that vsed her company also, brought their wiues many times with them to heare her talke: though her traine were, to entertaine such as would warme them by her fire. Æschines writeth, that Lysicles a grasier, being before but a meane man, and of a clubbish nature, came to be the chiefe man of ATHENS, by frequenting the company of Aspasia, after the death of Pericles. And to Platoes booke intituled Menexenus, although the beginning of it be but pleasantly written, yet in that, this story is written truly: that this Aspasia was repaired vnto by diuers of the AHENIANS, to learne the art of rhetoricke of her. Yet notwithstanding it seemeth most likely that the affection Pericles did beare her, grew rather of loue, then of any other cause. For he was maried vnto a kinswoman of his own, and that before was Hipponicus wife, by whom she had Callias, surnamed the rich: and had afterwards by Pericles, Xantippus and Paralus. But not liking her company, he gaue her with her owne good will and consent vnto another, and maried Aspasia whom he dearely loued. For euer when he went abroad, and came home againe, he saluted her with a kisse. Whereupon in the ancient Comedies, she is called in many places, the new Omphale, and sometimes Deianira, and sometimes Iuno. But Cratinus plainly calleth her whore in these verses:

Pericles wise policie in forraine entertainment.

Pericles affis in Eubœa.

Pericles maketh warre with the Samians.

Aspasia a passing wise woman.

The description of Aspasia. Thargelia.

Callias the rich.

Pericles maried Aspasia the famous curtisan.

His Iuno she him brought, Aspasia by name,
Which was indeed an open whore, and past all kind of shame.

And it seemed that he had a bastard: for Eupolis in a Comedie of his called Demosij, bringeth him in, asking Pironides thus:

I pray thee is my bastard sonne yet aliue?

And then Pironides answered him:

A perfect man long since, he surely had bene found,
If that this lewd and naughty whore, his vertue had not drownd.

To conclude, this Aspasia was so famous, that Cyrus (he that fought against king Artaxerxes his brother, for the empire of PERSIA) called Aspasia his best beloued of all his concubines, which before was called Milito, and was borne in PHOCIDES, being Hermotimus daughter. And

Cyrus

Cyrus being ſlaine in the field, Aſpaſia was caried to the King his brother, with whom afterwards ſhe was in great fauour. As I was writing this life, this ſtory came in my mind: and me thought I ſhould haue dealt hardly, if I ſhould haue left it vnwritten. But to our matter againe. Pericles was charged that he made warres againſt the SAMIANS, on the behalfe of the MILESIANS, at the requeſt of Aſpaſia: for theſe two cities were at wars together, for the citie of PRIENA, but the SAMIANS were the ſtronger. Now the ATHENIANS commanded them to lay aſide their armes, and to come and plead their matter before thē, that the right might be decided: but they refuſed it vtterly. Wherefore Pericles went thither and tooke away the gouernment of the ſmall number of Nobility, taking for hoſtages, fifty of the chiefeſt men of the city, and ſo many children beſides, which he left to be kept in the Ile of LEMNOS. Some ſay euery one of theſe hoſtages offered to giue him a talant: and beſides thoſe, many other offered him the like ſuch as wold not haue the ſoueraigne authoritie put into the hands of the people. Moreouer Piſſuthnes the PERSIAN, lieutenant to the king of PERSIA, for the good wil he bore thoſe of SAMOS, did ſend Pericles ten thouſand crownes to releaſe the hoſtages. But Pericles neuer tooke penny: and hauing done that he determined at SAMOS, and eſtabliſhed a popular gouernement, he returned againe to ATHENS. Notwithſtanding, the SAMIANS rebelled immediatly after, hauing recouered their hoſtages againe by meanes of this Piſſuthnes that ſtole them away, and did furniſh them alſo with all their munition of warre. Whereupon Pericles returning againſt them once more, he found them not idle, nor amazed at his coming, but reſolutely determined to receiue him, and to fight for the ſeigniory by ſea. So there was a great battell fought between them, neare the Ile of THRACIA. And Pericles wan the battell: hauing with 44. ſaile only nobly ouercome his enemies, which were three-ſcore & ten in number, whereof twenty of them were ſhips of war. And ſo following his victory forthwith, he wan alſo the port of SAMOS, and kept the SAMIANS beſieged within their owne city: where they were yet ſo bold, as they would make ſallies out many times, and fight before the wals of the city. But when there arriued a new ſupply of ſhippes bringing a greater aide vnto Pericles, then were they ſhut vp on all ſides. Pericles then taking three-ſcore galleyes with him, lanched out into the ſea, with intent (as ſome ſay) to go meete certaine ſhips of the PHOENICIANS (that came to aide the SAMIANS) as far from SAMOS as he could: or as Steſimbrotus ſaith, to go into CYPRVS, which me thinketh is not true. But whatſoeuer was his intent, he committed a foule fault. For Meliſſus (the ſon af Ithagenes, a great Philoſopher) being at that time generall of the SAMIANS, perceiuing that few ſhips were left behind at the ſiege of the city, and that the captaines alſo that had the charge of them were not very expert men of war, perſwaded his citizens to make a ſallie vpon them. Wherupon they fought a battel, and the SAMIANS ouercame: the ATHENIANS were taken priſoners, and they ſunke many of their ſhips. Now they being lords againe of the ſea, did furniſh their city with all manner of munition for wars, whereof before they had great want. Yet Ariſtotle writeth, that Pericles ſelfe was once ouercome in a battell at ſea by Meliſſus. Furthermore the SAMIANS, to be euen with the ATHENIANS for the iniury they had receiued of them before, did brand them in the forehead with the ſtampe of an owle, the owle being then the ſtampe of their coine at ATHENS, euen as the ATHENIANS had branded the SAMIAN priſoners before with the ſtampe of Samena. This Samena is a kinde of ſhip amongſt the SAMIANS, low afore, and well laid out in the mid-ſhip, ſo that it is excellent good to riſe with the waues of the ſea, and is very ſwift vnder ſaile: and it was ſo called, becauſe the firſt ſhip that was made of this faſhion, was made in the Ile of SAMOS, by the tyrant Polycrates. It is ſaid that the Poet Ariſtophanes, couertly conueying the ſtampe of the SAMIANS, ſpeaking merily in a place of his Comedies, ſaith:

Piſſuthnes the Perſian. A good proofe that Pericles was not couetous.

The Samians are great learned men.

Pericles being aduertiſed of the ouerthrow of his army, returned preſently to the reſcue. Meliſſus went to meete him, and gaue him battell: but he was ouerthrowne, and driuen back into his city, where Pericles walled them in round about the citie, deſiring victorie rather by time and charge, then by danger, and loſſe of his ſouldiers. But when he ſaw that they were wearie with tract of time, and that they would bring it to hazard of battell, and that he could by no meanes withhold them: he then deuided his army into eight companies, whom he made to draw lots, and that company that lighted vpon the white beane, they ſhould be quiet, and make good cheere, while the other ſeuen fought. And they ſay that from thence it came, that when any haue made good cheere, & taken pleaſure abroad, they do yet cal it a white day, becauſe of the white

beane. Ephorus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that it was there, where firſt of all they begun to vſe engines of warre to plucke downe great wals, and that Pericles vſed firſt this wonderfull inuention: and that Artemon an enginer was the firſt deuiſer of them. He was caried vp and downe in a chaire, to ſet forward theſe workes, becauſe he had a lame legge: and for this cauſe he was called Periphoretos. But Aeraclides Ponticus confuteth Ephorus therein, by the verſes of Anacreon, in the which Artemon is called Periphoretos, many yeares before this warre of Samos began: and ſaith, this Periphoretos was a maruellous tender man, and ſo fooliſhly afeard of his owne ſhadow, that the moſt part of his time he ſtirred not out of his houſe, and did ſit alwaies hauing two of his men by him, that held a copper target ouer his head, for feare leaſt any thing ſhould fall vpon him. And if vpon any occaſion he were driuen to go abroad out of his houſe: he would be caried in a litle bed hanging neare the ground, and for this cauſe he was ſurnamed Periphoretos. At the laſt, at nine moneths end, the Samians were compelled to yeeld. So Pericles tooke the city & raſed their wals to the ground: he brought their ſhips away, and made thē pay a maruellous great tribute, whereof part he receiued in hand, and the reſt payable at a certaine time, taking hoſtages with him for aſſurance of payment. But Duris the Samian dilateth theſe matters maruellous pittifully, burthening the Athenians, and Pericles ſelfe with vnnaturall cruelty: whereof neither Thucydides, nor Ephorus, nor Ariſtotle himſelfe maketh mention. And ſure I cannot beleeue it is true that is written: That he brought the captaines of the gallies, and the ſouldiers thēſelues of Samia, into the market place of the citie of Miletvm, where he made them to be bound faſt vnto boords for the ſpace of tenne dayes, and at the end of the ſame, the poore men halfe dead, were beaten downe with clubbes, and their heads paſhed in peeces: and afterwards they threw out their bodies to the crowes, and would not burie them. So Duris being accuſtomed to ouerreach, and to lye many times in things nothing touching him, ſeemeth in this place out of all reaſon to aggrauate the calamities of his countrey, onely to accuſe the Athenians, and to make them odious to the world. Pericles hauing won the city of Samos, he returned againe to Athens, where he did honourably burie the bones of his ſlaine citizens in this warre: and himſelfe (according to their manner and cuſtome) made the funerall oration, for the which he was maruellouſly eſteemed. In ſuch ſort, that after he came downe from the pulpit where he made his oration, the ladies and gentlewomen of the citie came to ſalute him, and brought him garlands to put vpon his head, as they do to noble conquerers when they returne from games, where they haue wonne the prize. But Elpinicé coming to him, ſaid: Surely Pericles, thy good ſeruice done, deſerueth garlands of triumph: for thou haſt loſt vs many a good and valiant citizen, not fighting with the Medes, the Phoenicians, and with the barbarous people, as my brother Cimon did, but for deſtroying a citie of our owne nation and kindred. Pericles to theſe words, ſoftly anſwered Elpinicé, with Archilochus verſe, ſmiling:

When thou art old, paint not thy ſelfe.

But Ion writeth, that he greatly gloried, and ſtood mute in his owne conceit, after he had ſubdued the Samians, ſaying: Agamemnon was ten yeeres taking of a city of the barbarous people: and he in nine months only had won the ſtrongeſt city of the whole nation of Ionia. Indeed he had good cauſe to glory in his victories: for truely (if Thucydides report be true) his conqueſt was no leſſe doubtfull, then he found it dangerous. For the Samians had almoſt bene lords of the ſea, and taken the ſeignorie thereof from the Athenians. After this, the wars of Peloponnesvs being hote againe, the Corinthians inuading the Ilanders of Corphv: Pericles did perſwade the Athenians to ſend aide vnto the Corphians, and to ioyne in league with that Iland, which were of great power by ſea, ſaying: that the Peloponnesians (before it were long) would haue war with them. The Athenians conſented to his motion, to aide thoſe of Corphv. Whereupon they ſent thither Lacedamonius (Cimons ſon) with ten gallies only for a mockerie: for all Cimons familie and friends, were wholly at the Lacedæmonians deuotion. Therefore did Pericles cauſe Lacedamonius to haue ſo few ſhips deliuered him, and further, ſent him thither againſt his will, to the end that if he did no notable exploit in this ſeruice, that they might then the more iuſtly ſuſpect his goodwill to the Lacedæmonians. Moreouer whileſt he liued, he did euer what he could to keepe Cimons children backe from riſing: becauſe that by their names they were no naturall borne Athenians, but ſtrangers. For the one was called Lacedamonius, the other Theſſalus, and the third Ælius: and the mother to all them three, was an Arcadian woman borne. But Pericles being blamed for that he ſent ſent but ten galleys only, which was but a ſlender aide for thoſe that had requeſted them, and a great matter to them that ſpake ill of him: he ſent thither afterwards a great number of other galleys, which came when the battell was fought. But the CORINTHIANS were maruellous angry, and went and complained to the councell of the LACEDÆMONIANS, where they laid open many grieuous complaints and accuſations againſt the ATHENIANS, and ſo did the MEGARIANS alſo: alledging that the ATHENIANS had forbidden them their hauens, their ſtaples and all trafficke of merchandiſe in the territories vnder their obedience, which was directly againſt the common lawes and articles of peace, agreed vpon by oath among all the GRECIANS. Moreouer, the ÆGINETES finding themſelues very ill and cruelly handled, did ſend ſecretly to make their mone and complaints to the LACEDÆMONIANS, being afraid openly to complaine of the ATHENIANS. While theſe things were a doing, the city of POTIDÆA, ſubiect at that time vnto the ATHENIANS (and was built in old time by the CORINTHIANS) did rebell, and was beſieged by the ATHENIANS, which did haſten on the warres. Notwithſtanding this, ambaſſadors were firſt ſent vnto ATHENS vpon theſe complaints: and Archidamus king of the LACEDÆMONIANS did all that he could to pacifie the moſt part of theſe quarrels and complaints, intreating their friends and allies. So as the ATHENIANS had had no wars at all, for any other matters, wherewith they were burthened, if they would haue granted to haue reuoked the decree they had made againſt the MEGARIANS. Whereupon Pericles, that aboue all other ſtood moſt againſt the reuocation of that decree, and that did ſtir vp the people and made them ſtand to that they had once decreed and ordered againſt the MEGARIANS: was thought the originall cauſe and author of the PELOPONNESIAN warres. For it is ſaid that the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent ambaſſadors vnto ATHENS for that matter only. And when Pericles alledged a law that did forbid them to take away the table whereupon before time had bene written any common law or edict: Poliarces, one of LACEDÆMON ambaſſadors, ſaid vnto him: Well ſaid he, take it not away then, but turne the table onely: your law I am ſure forbiddeth not that. This was pleaſantly ſpoken of the ambaſſadour, but Pericles could neuer be brought to it for all that. And therefore it ſeemeth he had ſome ſecret occaſion of grudge againſt the MEGARIANS: yet as one that would finely conuey it vnder the common cauſe and cloke, he tooke from them the holy lands they were breaking vp. And to bring this to paſſe, he made an order, that they ſhould ſend an herauld to ſummon the MEGARIANS to let the land alone, and that the ſame herauld ſhould go alſo vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS to accuſe the MEGARIANS vnto them. It is true that this ordinance was made by Pericles meanes, as alſo it was moſt iuſt and reaſonable: but it fortuned ſo, that the meſſenger they ſent thither died, and not without ſuſpition that the MEGARIANS made him away. Wherfore Charinus made a law preſently againſt the MEGARIANS: that they ſhould be proclaimed mortal enemies to the ATHENIANS for euer, without any hope of after reconciliation. And alſo if any MEGARIAN ſhould once put his foote within the territories of ATTICA, that he ſhould ſuffer the paines of death. And moreouer, that their captaines taking yearely their ordinary oath, ſhould ſweare among other articles, that twiſe in the yeare they ſhould go with their power, and deſtroy ſome part of the MEGARIANS land. And laſtly, that the herauld Anthemocritus ſhould be buried by the place called then the gates Thriaſienes, and now called Dipylon. But the MEGARIANS ſtoutly denying, that they were any cauſe of the death of this Anthemocritus, did altogether burthen Aſpaſia and Pericles with the ſame, alleadging for proofe thereof, Ariſtophanes verſes the Poet, in his Comedie he intituled the Archarnes, which are ſo common, as euery boy hath them at his tongues end.

The yong men of our land (to drunken bibbing bent)
Ran out one day vnrulily, and towards Megara went:
From whence in their outrage, by force they tooke away,
Simetha noble curtiſan, as ſhe did ſport and play.
Wherewith enraged all (with pepper in the noſe)
The proud Megarians came to vs, as to their mortall foes,
And tooke by ſtealth away of harlots eke a paire,
Attending on Aſpaſia, which were both young and faire.

But in very deed, to tell the originall cauſe of this warre, and to deliuer the troth thereof, it is very hard. But all the hiſtoriographers together agree, that Pericles was the chiefeſt author of the warre: becauſe the decree made againſt the MEGARIANS, was not reuoked backe againe.

Pericles author of the warres againſt Peloponneſus.

Pericles malice againſt the Megarians.

Yet ſome hold opinion, that Pericles did it of a noble mind and iudgement, to be conſtant in that he thought moſt expedient. For he iudged that this commandement of the LACEDÆMONIANS was but a triall, to proue if the ATHENIANS would grant them: and if they yeelded to them in that, then they manifeſtly ſhewed that they were the weaker. Other contrarily ſay, that it was done of a ſelfe-will and arrogancie, to ſhew his authoritie and power, and how he did deſpiſe the LACEDÆMONIANS. But the ſhrewdeſt proofe of all, that bringeth beſt authoritie with it, is reported after this ſort. Phideas the image-maker (as we haue told you before) had vndertaken to make the image of Pallas: and being Pericles friend, was in great eſtimation about him: but that procured him many ill willers. Then they being deſirous to heare by him what the people would iudge of Pericles, they inticed Menon, one of the workmen that wrought vnder Phidias, and made him come into the market place to pray aſſurance of the people that he might openly accuſe Phidias, for a fault he had committed about Pallas image. The people receiued his obedience, and his accuſation was heard openly in the market place, but no mention was made of any theft at all, becauſe that Phidias (through Pericles counſell and deuice) had from the beginning ſo laid on the gold vpon the image, that it might be taken off and weyed euery whit. Whereupon Pericles openly ſaid vnto his accuſers, take of the gold and wey it. The glory of his works did purchaſe him this enuy. For he hauing grauen vpon the ſcutchion of the goddeſſe, the battell of the AMAZONS, had cut out the portraiture of himſelfe maruellous liuely, vnder the perſō of an old bald man, lifting vp a great ſtone with both his hands. Further, he had cut out Pericles image excellently wrought and artificially, ſeeming in manner to be Pericles ſelfe, fighting with an AMAZON in this ſort: the AMAZONS hand being lift vp high, holdeth a dart before Pericles face, ſo paſſing cunningly wrought, as it ſeemed to ſhadow the likeneſſe and reſemblance of Pericles: and yet notwithſtanding appeareth plainely to be Pericles ſelfe on either ſide of the portraiture. So Phidias was clapt vp in priſon, and there died of a ſickneſs, or els of poiſon (as ſome ſay) which his enemies had prepared for him: and all to bring Pericles into further ſuſpition, and to giue them the more cauſe to accuſe him. But howſoeuer it was, the people gaue Menon his freedome, and ſet him free from paiment of all ſubſidies, following the order Glycon made, and gaue the captaines charge they ſhould ſee him ſafely kept, and that he tooke no hurt.

Phidias the image maker.

Aſpaſia accuſed.

And about the ſame time alſo Aſpaſia was accuſed, that ſhe did not beleeue in the gods: and her accuſer was Hermippus, maker of the Comedies. He burdened her further, that ſhe was a bawd to Pericles, and receiued citizens wiues into her houſe, which Pericles kept. And Diophites at the ſame time made a decree, that they ſhould make ſearch and enquirie for heritikes that did not beleeue in the gods, and that taught certaine new doctrine and opinion touching the operations of things aboue in the element, turning the ſuſpition vpon Pericles becauſe of Anaxagoras. The people did receiue and confirme this inquiſition: and it was moued alſo then by Dracondites, that Pericles ſhould deliuer an account of the mony he had ſpent, vnto the hands of the Prytanes, who were treaſurers of the common fines and reuenues; and that the Iudges deputed to giue iudgement, ſhould giue ſentence within the citie vpon the altar. But Agnon put that word out of the decree, and placed in ſtead thereof, that the cauſe ſhould be iudged by the 1500. Iudges, as they thought good, if any man brought his action for theft, for battery, or for iniuſtice. As for Aſpaſia, he ſaued her, euen for the very pity & cōpaſſion the iudges took of him, for the teares he ſhed in making his humble ſuit for her, all the time he pleaded her caſe: as Æſchines writeth. But for Anaxagoras, fearing that he could not do ſo much for him, he ſent him out of the city, & himſelfe did accompany him. And furthermore, ſeeing he had incurred the ill will of the people for Phidias fact, and for this cauſe fearing the iſſue of the iudgment: he ſet the wars a fire againe, that alwaies went backward, and did but ſmoke a litle, hoping by this means to weare out the accuſations againſt him, & to root out the malice ſome did beare him. For the people hauing weighty matters in hand and very dangerous alſo, he knew they wold put all into his hands alone, he hauing won already ſuch great authority & reputation among them. And theſe be the cauſes why he would not (as it is ſaid) ſuffer the ATHENIANS to yeeld vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing: howbeit the truth cannot certainely be knowne. But the LACEDÆMONIANS knowing well, that if they could weed out Pericles, and ouerthrow him, they might then deale as they would with the ATHENIANS: they commanded them they ſhould purge their city of Cylons rebellion, becauſe they knew well inough that Pericles kin by the mothers ſide were to be touched withall, as Thucydides declareth. But this practiſe fel out contrary to their hope and expectation, that were ſent to ATHENS for this purpoſe. For, weening to haue brought Pericles into further ſuſpition, & diſpleaſure, the citizens honored him the more, and had a better affiance in him then before, becauſe they ſaw his enemies did ſo much feare and hate him. Wherefore, before King Archidamus entred with the army of the PELOPONNESIANS into the country of ATTICA, he told the ATHENIANS, that if King Archidamus fortuned to waſt and deſtroy all the country about, and ſhould ſpare his lands and goods for the old loue and familiaritie that was betweene them, or rather to giue his enemies occaſion falſly to accuſe him: that from thence forth, he gaue all the lands and tenements he had in the country, vnto the common wealth. So it fortuned that the LACEDÆMONIANS with all their friends and confederates, brought a maruellous army into the country of ATTICA, vnder the leading of King Archidamus: who burning and ſpoiling all the country he came along, they came vnto the towne of ACHARNES, where they encamped, ſuppoſing the ATHENIANS would neuer ſuffer them to approch ſo neere, but that they would giue them battell for the honour and defence of their countrey, and to ſhew that they were no cowards. But Pericles wiſely conſidered how the danger was too great to hazard battell, where the loſſe of the citie of ATHENS ſtood in perill, ſeeing they were threeſcore thouſand footmen of the PELOPONNESIANS, and of the BOEOTIANS together: for ſo many was their number in the firſt voyage they made againſt the ATHENIANS. And as for thoſe that were very deſirous to fight, and to put themſelues to any hazard, being mad to ſee their country thus waſted & deſtroyed before their eies, Pericles did comfort & pacifie them with theſe words: That trees being cut and hewne downe, did ſpring againe in ſhort time: but men being once dead, by no poſſibilitie could be brought again. Therefore he neuer durſt aſſemble the people in councell, fearing leſt he ſhould be enforced by the multitude, to do ſomething ſtill againſt his will. But as a wiſe Pilote, when he ſeeth a ſtorme coming on the ſea, doth ſtraight giue order to make all things ſafe in the ſhippe, preparing euery thing ready to defend the ſtorme, according to his art and skill, not hearkening to the paſſengers fearefull cries and pitifull teares, who thinke themſelues caſt away: euen ſo did Pericles rule all things according to his wiſdome, hauing walled the city ſubſtantially about, and ſet good watch in euery corner: and paſſed not for thoſe that were angry and offended with him, neither would he be perſwaded by his friends earneſt requeſts & intreaties, neither cared for his enemies threats nor accuſations againſt him, nor yet reckoned of all their fooliſh ſcoffing ſongs they ſung of him in the city to the ſhame and reproch of his gouernment, ſaying that he was a cowardly captaine, and that for daſtardlineſſe he let the enemies take all, and ſpoile what t' ey would. Of which number Cleon was one that moſt defamed him, and began to enter into ſome pretie credite and fauour with the common people, for that they were angry, and miſliked with Pericles: as appeareth by theſe ſlanderous verſes of Hirmippus, which were then abroade:

The Lacedæmonians inuade Attica.

An excellent compariſon to ſtay the ſouldiers deſire to fight.

Cleon accuſeth Pericles.

O King of Satyres thou, who with ſuch manly ſpeech,
Of bloudy warres and doughty deeds, doſt dayly to vs preach:
Why art thou now afraid to take thy lance in hand,
Or with thy pike againſt thy foes, couragiouſly to ſtand?
Since Cleon ſtout and fierce, doth dayly thee prouoke,
With biting words, with trenchant blades, and deadly daunting ſtroke.

All this notwithſtanding, Pericles was neuer mooued any thing, but with ſilence did patiently beare all iniuries and ſcoffings of his enemies, and did ſend for all that a nauy of a hundred ſaile vnto PELOPONNESVS, whither he would not go in perſon, but kept himſelfe at home, to keepe the people in quiet, vntill ſuch time as the enemies had raiſed their campe, and were gone away. And to entertaine the common people that were offended and angry at this war, he comforted the poore people againe, with cauſing a certaine diſtribution to be made amongſt them of the common treaſure, and diuiſion alſo of the lands that were got by conqueſt. For after he had driuen all the ÆGINETES out of their countrey, he cauſed the whole Ile of ÆGINA to be deuided by lot amongſt the citizens of ATHENS. And then it was a great comfort to them in this aduerſity, to heare of their enemies hurt and loſſe in ſuch manner as it did fall out. For their army that was ſent by ſea vnto PELOPONNESVS, had waſted and deſtroyed a great part of the champion country there, and had ſacked beſides many ſmall cities and townes. Pericles ſelfe alſo entring into the MEGARIANS country by land, did waſte the whole country all afore him. So the PELOPONNESIANS receiuing by ſea as much hurt and loſſe at the ATHENIANS hands, as they before had done by land vnto the ATHENIANS: they had not holden out warres ſo long with the ATHENIANS, but would ſoone haue giuen ouer (as Pericles had told them before) had not the gods aboue ſecretly hindred mans reaſon & policie. For firſt of all there came ſuch a ſore plague among the ATHENIANS, that it tooke away the flower of ATHENS youth, and weakened the force of the whole city beſides. Furthermore the bodies of them that were left aliue being infected with this diſeaſe, their hearts alſo were ſo ſharpely bent againſt Pericles, that the ſickneſſe hauing troubled their braines, they fell to flat rebellion againſt him, as the patient againſt his phyſitian, or children againſt their father, euen to the hurting of him, at the prouocation of his enemies: who bruited abroade, that the plague came of no cauſe elſe, but of the great multitude of the country men that came into the city on heapes, one vpon anothers necke in the heate of the ſummer, where they were cõpelled to lie many together, ſmothered vp in litle tents and cabines, remaining there all day long, cowring downewards, and doing nothing, where before they liued in the countrey in a freſh open ayre, and at liberty And of all this (ſay they) Pericles is the only cauſe, who procuring this war, hath pent and ſhrouded the country men together within the wals of a city, employing them to no manner of vſe nor ſeruice, but keeping them like ſheep in a pinfold, maketh one to poiſon another with the infectiõ of their plague ſores running vpon them, and giuing them no leaue to change aire, that they might ſo much as take breath abroad. Pericles to remedy this, and to do their enemies a litle miſchief, armed a hundred & fifty ſhips, and ſhipped into them a great number of armed footmen and horſemen alſo. Hereby he put the citizens in good hope, and the enemies in great feare, ſeeing ſo great a power. But when he had ſhipped all his men, and was himſelfe alſo in the admirall ready to hoiſe ſayle: ſodainely there was a great eclips of the Sunne, and the day was very dark, that all the army was ſtricken with a maruellous feare, as of ſome dangerous and very ill token towards them. Pericles ſeeing the maſter of his gally in a maze withall, not knowing what to do, caſt his cloak ouer the maſters face, and hid his eyes, asking him whether he thought that any harme or no. The maſter anſwered him, he thought it none. Then ſaid Pericles againe to him: There is no difference betweene this and that, ſauing that the body which maketh the darkneſſe is greater, then my cloke which hideth thy eies. Theſe things are thus diſputed of in the ſchooles of the Philoſophers. But Pericles hoiſing ſaile notwithſtanding, did no notable nor ſpeciall ſeruice, anſwerable to ſo great an army and preparation. For he laying ſiege vnto the holy city of EPIDAVRVM, when euery man looked they ſhould haue taken it, was compelled to raiſe his ſiege for the plague that was ſo vehement: that it did not only kill the ATHENIANS themſelues, but all other alſo (were they neuer ſo few) that came to them or neere the campe. Wherefore perceiuing the ATHENIANS were maruellouſly offended with him, he did what he could to comfort them, and put them in heart againe: but all was in vaine, he could not pacifie them: for by the moſt part of voices, they depriued him of his charge of Generall, and condemned him in a maruellous great fine and ſumme of money, the which thoſe that tell the leaſt, do write, that it was the ſumme of fifteene talents: and thoſe that ſay more, ſpeake of fiftie talents. The accuſer ſubſcribed in this condemnation, was Cleon, as Idomeneus, or Simmias ſay, or as Theophraſtus writeth: yet Heraclides Ponticus ſaith, one Lacratidas. Now his common griefes were ſoone blown ouer: for the people did eaſily let fall their diſpleaſures towards him, as the waſpe leaueth her ſting behind her with them ſhe had ſtung. But his owne priuate affaires and houſhold cauſes were in very ill caſe: both for that the plague had taken away many of his friends and kinſmen from him, as alſo for that he and his houſe had continued a long time in diſgrace. For Xantippus (Pericles ſonne and heire) being a man of a very ill diſpoſition and nature, and hauing maried a young woman very prodigall and lauiſh of expence, the daughter of Iſander, ſonne of Epylichus, he grudged much at his fathers hardneſſe, who ſcantly gaue him mony and but a litle at a time. Whereupon he ſent on a time to one of his fathers friends in Pericles name, to pray him to lend him ſome money, who ſent it vnto him. But afterwards when he came to demand it againe, Pericles did not onely refuſe to pay it him, but further alſo he put him in ſuite. But this made the young man Xantippus ſo angrie with his father, that he ſpake very ill of him in euery place where he came: and reported in way of mockery, how his father ſpent his time when he was at home, and what talke he had with the Sophiſters, and the maſter Rhetoricians. For a miſchance fortuning on a time, at the game of the throwing of the dart, who ſhould throw beſt, that he that threw, did vnfortunately kill one Epitimeus a THESSALIAN: Xantippus went pratling vp and downe the towne, that his father father Pericles was a whole day diſputing with Protagoras the Rhetorician, to know which of the three by law and reaſon ſhould be condemned for this murther. The dart: the that threw the dart: or the deuiſer of the game. Moreouer Steſimbrotus writeth, that the bruite that ranne thorough the citie, that Pericles did keepe his wife, was ſowne abroade by Xantippus himſelfe. But ſo it is, this quarrell and hate betwixt the father and the ſonne continued without reconciliation vnto the death. For Xantippus died in the great plague, and Pericles owne ſiſter alſo: moreouer he loſt at that time by the plague, the more part of his friends and kinsfolkes, and thoſe ſpecially that did him greateſt pleaſure in gouerning of the ſtate. But all this did neuer pul down his countenance, nor any thing abate the greatneſſe of his mind, what misfortune ſoeuer he had ſuſtained. Neither ſaw they him weep at any time, nor mourne at the funerals of any of his kinſmen or friends, but at the death of Paralus, his yongeſt and lawfull begotten ſonne: for, the loſſe of him alone did onely melt his heart. Yet he did ſtriue to ſhew his naturall conſtancie, and to keepe his accuſtomed modeſtie. But as he would haue put a garland of flowers vpon his head, ſorrow did ſo pierce his heart when he ſaw his face, that then he burſt out in teares and cried amaine: which they neuer ſaw him do before all the dayes of his life. Furthermore the people hauing proued other Captaines and gouernours, and finding by experience that there was no one of them of iudgement & authority ſufficient, for ſo great a charge: in the end, of themſelues they called him againe to the pulpit for orations to heare their counſels, and to the ſtate of a captaine alſo to take charge of the ſtate. But at that time he kept himſelfe cloſe in his houſe, as one bewailing his late grieuous loſſe and ſorrow. Howbeit Alcibiades, and other his familiar friends, perſwaded him to ſhew himſelf vnto the people: who did excuſe thẽſelues vnto him, for their ingratitude towards him. Pericles then taking the gouernement againe vpon him, the firſt matter he entred into, was: that he prayed them to reuoke the ſtatute he had made for baſe borne children, fearing leſt his lawful heires would faile, and ſo his houſe and name ſhould fal to the ground. But as for the law, thus it ſtood. Pericles when he was in his beſt authoritie, cauſed a law to be made, that they onely ſhould be counted citizens of ATHENS, which were natural ATHENIANS borne by father and mother. Not long time after, it fortuned that the king of ÆGYPT hauing ſent a gift vnto the people of ATHENS, of 40 thouſand buſhels of corne, to be diſtributed among the citizens there: many by occaſion of this law were accuſed to be baſe borne, and ſpecially men of the baſer ſort of people, which were not knowne before, or at the leaſt had no reckoning made of them, and ſo ſome of them were falſly and wrongfully condemned. Whereupon ſo it fell out, that there were no leſſe then fiue thouſand of them conuicted and ſold for ſlaues: and thoſe that remained as free men, and were iudged to be naturall citizens, amounted to the number of fourteene thouſand, and fortie perſons. Now this was much miſliked of the people, that a law enacted, and that had bene of ſuch force, ſhould by the ſelfe ſame maker and deuiſer of the ſame be againe reuoked and called in. Howbeit Pericles late calamitie that fortuned to his houſe, did break the peoples hardened hearts againſt him: who thinking theſe ſorrowes ſmart, to be puniſhment enough vnto him for his former pride, and iudging that by Gods diuine iuſtice and permiſſion this plague and loſſe fell vpon him, and that his requeſt alſo was tollerable: they ſuffered him to enrole his baſe borne ſonne in the regiſter of the lawfull citizens of his family, giuing him his owne name, Pericles. It is the ſelfe ſame Pericles, who after he had ouercome the PELOPONNESIANS in a great battell by ſea, neere vnto the Iles of ARGINVSES, was put to death by ſentence of the people, with other captaines his companions. Now was Pericles at that time infected with the plague, but not ſo vehemently as other were, but more temperatly: which by long ſpace of time, with many alterations and changes, did by little and little decay and conſume the ſtrength of his body, and ouercame his ſenſes and noble mind. Therefore Theophraſtus in his Moralls declareth, in a place where he diſputeth, whether mens manners doe change with their misfortunes, and whether corporall troubles and afflictions do ſo alter men, that they forget vertue, and abandon reaſon: that Pericles in his ſickeneſſe ſhewed a friend of his that came to ſee him, I cannot tell what a preſeruing charme, that the women had tied (as a carkanet) about his necke, to let him vnderſtand he was very ill, ſince he ſuffered them to apply ſuch a fooliſh bable to him. In the end Pericles drawing faſt vnto his death, the Nobilitie of the citie, and ſuch his friends as were left aliue, ſtanding about his bed, beganne to ſpeake of his vertue, and of the great authoritie he had borne, conſidering the greatneſſe of his noble acts, and counting the number of his victories he had wonne (for he had wonne nine foughten battels being generall of the ATHENIANS, and had set vp so many tokens and triumphs in honour of his countrey) they reckened vp among themselues all these matters, as if he had not vnderstood them, imagining his senses had bene gone. But he contrarily being yet of perfect memorie, heard all what they had said, and thus he began to speake vnto them: That he maruelled why they had so highly praised that in him, which was common to many other captaines, and wherin fortune dealt with thē in equalitie alike, & all this while they had forgotten to speak of the best & most notable thing that was in him, which was, that no ATHENIAN had euer worne blacke gowne through his occasion, And sure so was he a noble and worthy person. For he did not onely shew himselfe mercifull and courteous, euen in most weightie matters of gouernment among so enuious people and hatefull enemies: but he had this iudgement also to think, that the most noble acts he did were these, that he neuer gaue himselfe to hatred, enuy, nor choler, to be reuenged of his most mortal enemy, without mercy shewed towards him, though he had cōmitted vnto him such absolute power & sole gouernment among them. And this made his surname be Olympius (as to say diuine or celestiall) which otherwise for him had bene too proud and arrogant a name, because he was of so good and gentle a nature, and for that in so great libertie he had kept cleane hands and vndefiled: euen as we esteeme the gods authors of all good, and causers of no euill, and so worthy to gouerne and rule the whole monarchy of the world. And not as Poets say, which do confound our wits by their follies, and fond fainings, and are also contrary to themselues, considering that they call heauen (which containeth the gods) the euerlasting seate, which trembleth not, and is not driuen nor moued with winds, neither is darkned with clouds, but is alwayes bright and cleare, and at all times shining equally with a pure bright light, as being the onely habitation and mansion place of the eternall God, only happie and immortall: and afterwards they describe it themselues, full of dissentions, and enmities, of anger, and passions, which do nothing become wise and learned men. But this discourse peraduenture would be better spoken of in some other booke. Now the troubles the ATHENIANS felt immediatly after Pericles death, made them then lament the losse of so noble a member. For those who vnpatiently did brooke his great authority while he liued, because it drowned their owne: when they came after his death to proue other speakers and gouernours, they were compelled then to confesse, that no mans nature liuing could be more moderate nor graue, with lenitie and mercy, then was his. And that most hated power, which in his life time they called monarchie, did then most plainely appeare vnto them, to haue bene the manifest rampire and bulwarke of the safety of their whole state and common weale: such corruption and vice in gouernment of the state did then spring vp immediatly after his death, which when he was aliue, he did euer suppresse and keepe vnder, in such sort, that either it did not appeare at all, or at the least it came not to that head and libertie that such faults were committed, as were vnpossible to be remedied.

THE LIFE OF Fabius Maximus.

HAVING already declared vnto you ſuch things worthy memory as we could collect and gather of the life of Pericles: it is now good time we ſhould proceed to write alſo of the life of Fabius Maximus. It is ſaid the firſt Fabius, from whom the houſe and family of the Fabians did deſcend, (being the greateſt and nobleſt houſe of all other in ROME) was begotten by Hercules, whom he got of a Nymph or (as other ſay) a woman of the country by the riuer of Tyber. And ſome ſay, that the firſt of this houſe, were called at the beginning Fodians, becauſe they did hunt wild beaſts, with pitfals and ditches. For vnto this preſent the ROMAINES cal ditches, Foſſe: and to dig Fodere. Since that time, the two ſecond letters haue bene changed and they haue called them Fabians. But howſoeuer it was, this is certaine, that many noble men haue come out of that houſe: and among other, there was one of that houſe called Fabius Rullus, whom the ROMAINES for his noble acts did ſurname Maximus, very great. After him Fabius Maximus, whoſe life we haue now in hand, was the fourth lineally deſcended of the ſame line, and he was ſurnamed Verrucoſus, becauſe of a certaine birth-marke he had vpon one of his lips, like a litle wart. And he was alſo ſurnamed Quicula, a litle lambe, for his ſoftneſſe, ſlownes, and grauity of his doings whileſt he was a child. But becauſe of nature he was dull, ſtil, and very ſilent, and that he was ſeldome ſeene to play at any paſtime among the boyes, and for that they ſaw he was but of ſlow capacitie, and hard to learne and conceiue, and withall that the boyes might do to him what they would, he was ſo lowly to his fellowes: this made men iudge that looked not into him, that he would proue a very foole and idiot. Yet other were in contrary opinion of him: who conſidering more deeply the man, perceiued in his nature a certaine ſecret conſtancie and the maieſtie of a lion. But Fabius ſelfe when he was called to ſerue the common-weale, did quickly ſhew to the world, that which they tooke for dulneſſe in him, was his grauity, which neuer altered for no cauſe or reſpect: and that which other iudged fearefulneſſe in him, was very wiſedome. And where he ſhewed himſelf not haſtie nor ſodaine in any thing, it was found in him an aſſured and ſetled conſtancy. Wherefore when he came to conſider the great ſouereaignty of their common-weale, and the continuall warres it was in, he did vſe his body to all hardnes, and brought vp himſelf therewithall, that he might be the better able to ſerue in the field: and he gaue himſelfe much to eloquence alſo, as a neceſſary inſtrument to perſwade ſouldiers vnto reaſon. His tongue likewiſe did agree with his conditions, and manner of life. For he had no manner of affectation, nor counterfeite finenes in his ſpeech, but his words were euer very graue and profound, and his ſentences euen grafted in him by nature, and (as ſome ſay) were much like Thucydides ſayings. As appeareth in a funerall oration he made before the people in the praiſe of his ſonne, who died when he came out of his Conſulſhip, which is yet extant to be ſeene. Now as for him, hauing bene fiue times choſen Conſull, in his firſt yeare of his Conſulſhip, he triumphed ouer the LIGVRIANS (which be people of the mountaines, and vpon the coaſt of GENVA) who being ouerthrowne by him in a great battell, where they had loſt many men, they were compelled to go their way, and to take the ALPES for their ſuccour, and durſt no more appeare vpon the borders of ITALY, whereupon they did confine. Hannibal entring ITALY afterwards with a great army, and hauing wonne the firſt battell neere vnto the riuer of TREBIA: he paſſed further, and went through THVSCAN, waſting and deſtroying all the country as he paſſed by. This made ROME quake for feare. Beſides they ſaw many ſignes and tokens, ſome common vnto them, as thundring, lightning and ſuch other like: but other alſo more ſtrange, neuer ſeene nor heard of before. For it was reported that certain targets were waxen all bloudy of themſelues, and that about the city of ANTIVM they found wheate eares, which were all bloudy when they were reaped: that there fell from heauen burning ſtones, all in a flame of fire: and in the countrey of the PHALERIANS how the element ſeemed to open, and many litle written ſcroles fell downe vpon the ground, in one of the which were written theſe words, word for word: Mars doth now handle his weapons. But all theſe ſignes and wonders did nothing appalle nor daunt the boldneſſe of Caius Flaminius, Conſull then: who beſides the naturall great courage, and aſpiring mind he had to honour, yet was it beyond all reaſon increaſed in him, by the wonderfull good ſucceſſe he had before. For, notwithſtanding the Senate called him home againe, and that his fellow Conſull ſtood againſt his intent: he for all that did giue battell to the GAVLES, in deſpight of them all, and wanne the victory. Likewiſe, though all theſe ſignes and wonders in the ayre, did greatly trouble & amaze multitudes of people: yet did they nothing trouble Fabius, for he ſaw no apparant cauſe to be troubled withall. But he vnderſtanding the ſmall number of his enemies, and lacke of mony that was among them: gaue counſell, & was of opinion that they ſhould patiently forbeare a litle, and not to hazard battell againſt a man, whoſe army had bene long trained in wars, and by many foughten fields was grown valiant and expert. Moreouer, he thought good they ſhould ſend aide to their ſubiects, and other their allies and confederates, as need required, to keep their cities ſtill vnder their obedience: & in the meane ſeaſon by tract of time, to weare out Hannibals force and power, which was like ſtraw ſet on fire, that ſtraight giueth forth a blaſe, and yet hath no ſubſtance to hold fire long. When Fabius had thus ſaid inough to perſwade Flaminius, yet it would not ſinke into Flaminius head: for ſaid he, I will not tarie vntill the wars come to ROME gates, neither will I be brought to fight vpon the walles of the city to defend it, as Camillus did, that fought within the city himſelfe in old time. Wherupon he commanded his captaines to ſet out their bands to the field, and he himſelfe tooke his horſe-backe: which vpon the ſuddaine, without any cauſe was ſo afeard, and tooke ſo on with himſelfe, that he caſt the Conſull to the ground with his head forward. For all this fall he would not change his mind, but held on his iourney toward Hannibal, and preſented him battell in THVSCAN, by the lake called Thraſimena, which is the lake of PERVSIA. This battell was ſo fiercely fought on both ſides, that notwithſtanding there was ſuch a terrible earthquake therewhile, that ſome cities were ouerthrowne and turned topſie turuie, ſome riuers had their ſtreames turned againſt their courſe, and the foote of the mountaines were torne in ſunder & broken open: yet not one of them that were fighting, heard any ſuch thing at all. Flaminius the Conſul ſelfe was ſlaine at that battel, after he had in his own perſon done many valiant acts, and many of the worthieſt gentlemen and valiant ſouldiers of his army lay dead about him: the reſidue being fled, the ſlaughter was great, for the bodies ſlaine were fifteene thouſand, and ſo many priſoners left aliue. After this ouerthrow, Hannibal made all the ſearch he could poſſibly to find the body of Flaminius, to bury him honourably, becauſe of his valiantneſſe: but he could neuer be found amongſt the dead bodies, neither was it euer heard what became of it. Now as touching the firſt ouerthrow at TREBIA, neither the General that wrote it, nor the poſt that brought the firſt newes to ROME, told the troth of it as it was, but fained that the end was doubtfull, and that they could not tell who had the beſt. But of this battel, ſo ſoone as the Prætor Pomponius had receiued the newes, he called all the people to counſell, where without diſguiſing or diſſembling at all, he plainly ſaid thus vnto them: My Lords, we haue loſt the battel, our army is ouerthrown and

and the Consull himselfe is slaine in the field: wherefore, consider what you haue to do, and prouide for your safety. These words spoken to the people, as it had bene a boysterous storme of weather that had fallen on them from the sea to put them in danger, did so terrifie the multitude, and trouble the whole citie for feare, that they were all in a maze, and knew not what to determine. Yet in the end they all agreed that it stood them vpon to haue a chiefe magistrate, called in Latine Dictator, that should be a man of courage, and could stoutly vse it without sparing or fearing any person. And for this, Fabius Maximus was thought the onely man meete to be chosen, as he, whose noble courage and graue behauiour was answerable, to the dignitie and soueraignetie of the office: and moreouer, that to his grauitie and wisedome there was ioyned (by reasonable age) strength of body, and valiantnesse with experience. This counsell being confirmed by them all, Fabius was chosen Dictator, who named Lucius Minutius Generall of the horsemen. Then he first required the Senate, that they would grant him he might haue his horse in the warres: the which was not lawfull for the Dictator, but expressely forbidden by an ancient order. Either because they thought the chiefest force of their armie did consist in their footemen, which caused the making of this law: whereby the Generall should be amongst them in the day of the battell, and in no wise should forsake them. Or els because the authority of this magistrate in all other things was so great, that it was in manner after the state of a King: Yet all this notwithstanding, they were willing thereunto, and that the Dictator should haue absolute power ouer the people. Fabius at his first coming, because he would shew the maiestie and dignitie of his office, that euery man should be the more obedient and ready at his commandement: when he went abroade, he had foure and twenty sergeants before him, carying the bundels of rods, and axes. And when one of the Consuls came to him, he sent a sergeant to command his bundell of rods that were caried before him, to be put downe, and all other tokens of dignitie to be layd aside: and that he should come and speake with him, as a priuate man. And first to make a good foundation, and to begin with the seruice of the gods, he declared vnto the people, that the losse they had receiued, came through the rashnesse and willfull negligence of their captaine, who made no reckning of the gods nor religion: and not through any default and cowardlinesse of the souldiers. And for this cause he did perswade them not to be affraid of their enemies, but to appease the wrath of the gods, and to serue and honour them. Not that he made them hereby superstitious, but did confirme their valiancie with true religion and godlinesse: and besides did vtterly take away and asswage their feare of their enemies, by giuing them certaine hope and assurance of the aide of the gods. Then were the holy bookes of the Sibylles prophesies perused, which were kept very secret, and therein they found certaine ancient prophesies and oracles, which spake of the present misfortunes of the time. But what was contained therein, it is not lawfull to be vttered to any person. Afterwards the Dictator, before the open assembly of the people, made a solemne vow vnto the gods, that he would sacrifice all the profits & fruits that should fall the next yeare, of sheep, of sowes, of milch-kine, and of goats in all the mountaines, champion countrey, riuers or medowes of ITALIE. And he would celebrate playes of musicke, and shew other sights in the honour of the gods, and would bestow vpon the same the summe of three hundreth three and thirtie Sestercians, and three hundreth three and thirtie ROMAINE pence, and a third part ouer. All which sum reduced into GRECIAN mony, amounteth to foure score & three thousand, fiue hundreth, and foure score and three siluer drachmaes, and two oboles. Now it were a hard thing to tell the reason why he doth mention this summe so precisely, and why he did deuide it by three, vnlesse it were to extoll the power of the number of three: because it is a perfect number by the nature, and is the first of the odde numbers, which is the beginning of diuers numbers, and containeth in it selfe the first differences, and the first elements and principles of all the numbers vnited and ioyned together. So Fabius hauing brought the people to hope and trust to haue the ayde and fauour of the gods, made them in the end the better disposed to liue well afterwards. Then Fabius hoping after victorie, and that the gods would send good lucke and prosperity vnto men through their valiantnesse and wisdome: did straight set forwards vnto Hanibal, not as minded to fight with him, but fully resolued to weare out his strength and power, by delayes and tract of time: and to increase his pouertie by the long spending of his owne money, and to consume the small number of his people, with the great number of his souldiers. Fabius camped alwaies in the strong and high places of the mountaines, out of all danger of his enemies horsemen, and coasted still after the enemie: so that when Hannibal stayed in any place, Fabius also stayed: if Hannibal remoued, he followed him straight, and would be alwayes neere him, but neuer forsooke the hils, neither would he come so neere him; as that he should be enforced to fight against his will. Yet alwayes he followed the enemy at his taile, and made him euer afeard of him, thinking still that he sought to get the vantage, to giue the charge vpon him. Thus by delaying, and prolonging the time in this sort, he became disliked of euery body: for euery man both in his owne campe, and abroad, spake very ill of him openly: and as for his enemies, they tooke him for no better then a rancke coward, Hannibal onely excepted. But he perceiuing his great reach and policy, and foreseeing his manner of fight, saw there was no remedy, but by plaine force or slight to bring him to the fight: for otherwise his delay would ouerthrow the CARTHAGINIANS, when they should not come to handy strokes with him, wherein onely consisted all their hope and strength, and in the meane time his souldiers should fall away and dye, and his money wax scant, and himselfe should grow the weaker. Thereupon Hannibal began to bethinke him, and deuise all the stratagemes and policies of warre he could imagine: and like a cunning wrestler, to seeke out all the trickes he could to giue his aduersarie the fall. For suddenly he would go and giue alarum to his campe: by and by againe he would retire, Another time he would remoue his campe from one place to another, and giue him some aduantage, to see if he could plucke his lingring deuice out of his head, and yet to hazard nothing. But as for Fabius, he continued still resolute in the first determination: that delay of fight was the best way so to ouerthrow him. Howbeit Minutius, Generall of his horsemen, did trouble him much: for he being earnestly bent to fight without discretion, and brauing of a lustie courage, crept into opinion with the souldiers, by his hote fury and desire to fight. Which wrought much in them, and so stirred vp their courages, that they mocked Fabius altogether: and called him Hannibals schoole-master: and contrariwise they commended Minutius, for a valiant captaine, and worthy ROMAINE. This made Minutius looke high, and haue a proud opinion of himselfe, mocking Fabius because he euer lodged on the hils, with saying the Dictator would make them goodly sports, to see their enemies waste and burne ITALIE before their faces. Moreouer he asked Fabius friends, whether he would in the end lodge his campe in the skie, that he did climbe vp so high vpon mountaines, mistrusting the earth: or else that he was so affraide, his enemies would find him out, that he went to hide himselfe in the cloudes. Fabius friends made report of these iests, and aduised him rather to hazard battell, then to beare such reproachfull words as were spoken of him. But Fabius answered them: If I should yeeld to that you counsell me, I should shew my selfe a greater coward then I am taken for now: by leauing my determination, for feare of their mockes and spightfull words. For it is no shame for a man to stand fearefull and iealous of the welfare and safety of his countrey: but otherwise to be afeard of the wagging of euery straw, or to regard euery common prating, it is not the part of a worthy man of courage, but rather of a base minded person, to seeke to please those whom he ought to command and gouerne, because they are but fooles. After this, Hannibal chanced to fall into a great errour: for intending to leaue Fabius to bring his armie into the plaines, where there was plenty of victuals, and store of pasture to feede his horse and cattell: he commanded his guides to bring him straight after supper, into the plaine of CASINVM. They mistaking his words, and not vnderstanding well what he said, because his ITALIAN tongue was but meane, tooke one thing for another, and so brought him and his army to the end of a field neere the citie of CASILINVM, through the middest of the which runneth a riuer, the ROMAINES call Vulturnus. Now the countrey lying by it, was a valley compassed in with mountaines round about, sauing that the riuer went to the sea: where leauing his owne bankes, it spreadeth abroad into the marrishes, and bankes of sand very deepe, and in the end fell into that part of the sea which is most dangerous, and where was neither succour nor couert. Hannibal being now fallen as it were into the bottome of a sacke, Fabius that knew the countrey, and was very perfect in all the wayes thereabouts, followed him steppe by steppe, and stopped his passage, where they should haue come out of the valley, with foure thousand footemen, which he planted there to keepe the straight, and disposed the rest of his army vpon the hangings of the hilles, in the most apt and fit places all about. Then with his light horsemen he gaue a charge vpon the rereward of his enemies battell: which put all Hannibals army by and by out of order, and so there were slaine ſlaine eight hundreth of his men. Whreupon Hannibal would haue remooued his campe thence immediatly: and knowing then the fault his guides had made, taking one place for another, and the danger wherein they had brought him, he roundly truſſed them vp, and hung them by the neckes. Now to force his enemies to come downe from the tops of the hils, and to win them from their ſtrength, he ſaw it was impoſſible, and out of all hope. Wherfore perceiuing his ſouldiers both affraid and diſcouraged, for that they ſaw themſelues hemmed in on all ſides, without any order to eſcape, Hanibal determined to deceiue Fabius by a deuice. He cauſed ſtraight two thouſand oxen to be choſen out of the heard, which they had taken before in their ſpoiles, and tied to their hornes light bundels of reedes, and ſallow faggots, or bunches of the dead cuttings of vines: and commanded the drouers that had the charge of them, that when they ſaw any ſignall or token lift vp in the aire in the night, they ſhould then ſtraight ſet fire on thoſe bundels and bunches, and driue vp the beaſts to the hils, towards the waies where the enemies lay. Whileſt theſe things were a preparing, he on the other ſide ranged his army in order of battell, and when night came, cauſed them to march faire and ſoftly. Now theſe beaſts, whileſt the fire was but little that burnt vpon their hornes, went but faire and ſoftly vp the hill from the foote of the mountaines from whence they were driuen: in ſo much as the heardmen that were on the top of the mountaines, wondered maruellouſly to ſee ſuch flames of fire about the hornes of ſo many beaſts, as if it had beene an army marching in order of battell with lights and torches. But when their hornes came to be burnt to the ſtumpes, and that the force of the fire did frie their very fleſh, then beganne the oxen to fight together, and to ſhake their heads, whereby they did ſet one another on fire. Then left they their ſoft pace, and went no more in order as they did before, but for the extreme paine they felt, began to runne here and there in the mountaines, carying fire ſtill about their hornes, and in their tailes, and ſet fire of all the boughes and coppeſies they paſſed by. This was a ſtrange ſight to look vpon, and did much amaze the Romaines that kept the paſſages of the mountaines, for they thought they had beene men that ranne here and there with torches in their hands. Whereupon they were in a maruellous feare and trouble, ſuppoſing they had bene their enemies that ranne thus towards them, to enuiron them on all ſides, ſo as they durſt no more keepe the paſſages which they were commanded, but forſaking their ſtraights, began to flie towards their maine and great campe. Thereupon Hannibals light horſemen immediatly poſſeſſed the ſtraights that were kept: by reaſon whereof, all the reſt of his army marched out at their eaſe and leiſure, without feare or danger, notwithſtanding that they were loden and troubled with maruellous great ſpoiles, and of all kind of ſorts. Fabius then perceiued very well the ſame nigh, that it was but a ſleight of Hannibal; for ſome of the oxen that fled here and there fell vpon his army. Whereupon fearing to fall vpon ſome ambuſh by reaſon of the darke night, he kept his men in battell ray, without ſtirring, or making any noyſe. The next morning by breake of day, he began to follow his enemies by the tracke, and fell vpon the taile of the rereward, with whom he skirmiſhed within the ſtraights of the mountaines, and ſo did diſtreſſe ſomewhat Hannibals army. Hannibal thereupon ſent out of his vauntgard a certaine number of Spaniards (very luſty and nimble fellows that were vſed to the mountaines, and acquainted with climing vp vpon them) who coming downe, and ſetting vpon the Romaines that were heauie armed, ſlue a great number of them, and made Fabius to retire. Thereupon they deſpiſed Fabius the more, and thought worſe of him then they did before, becauſe his pretence and determination was, not to be brought to fight with Hannibal, but by wiſedome and policie to ouerthrow him, whereas he himſelfe by Hannibal was firſt finely handled and deceiued. Hannbial then to bring Fabius further in diſliking and ſuſpition with the Romaines, commanded his ſouldiers when they came neare any of Fabius lands, that they ſhould burne and deſtroy all round about them, but gaue them in charge in no wiſe to medle with Fabius lands, nor any thing of his, and did purpoſely appoint a gariſon to ſee that nothing of Fabius ſhould miſcary, nor yet take hurt. This was ſtraight caried to Rome, which did therby the more incenſe the people againſt him. And to help it forward, the Tribunes neuer ceaſed crying out vpon him in their orations to the people, and all by Metellus ſpeciall procurement and perſwaſion: who of himſelfe had no cauſe to miſlike with Fabius, but onely becauſe he was Minutius kinſmen (generall of the horſeman) and thought that the ill opinion they beare to Fabius, would turne to the praiſe and aduancement of Minutius. The Senate alſo were much offended with Fabius, for the compoſition he made with Hannibal, touching the prisoners taking of either side. For it was articled betweene them, that they should change prisoners, deliuering man for man, or else two hundreth and fiftie siluers drachmas for a man, if the one chanced to haue moe prisoners then the other. When exchange was made betweene them, it appeared that Hannibal had left in his hands of ROMAINE prisoners, two hundred and fortie moe then Fabius had to exchange of his. The Senate commanded there should be no money sent to redeeme them, and greatly found fault with Fabius for making this accord: because it was neither honourable, nor profitable for the common-weale, to redeeme men that cowardly suffered themselues to be taken prisoners of their enemies. Fabius vnderstanding it, did patiently beare this displeasure conceiued against him by the Senate. Howbeit hauing no mony, and meaning to keep his word, & not to leaue the poore citizens prisoners behind him: he sent his son to ROME, with commission to sell his lands, and to bring him money immediatly. The yong man went his way to ROME, and sold his fathers farmes, and brought him money forthwith to the campe: Fabius therewith redeemed the prisoners, and sent their ransome vnto Hannibal. Many of the prisoners whom he had redeemed, offered to repay him their ransome: but he would neuer take any thing againe, and gaue them all their ransome freely. Afterwards being called to ROME by the priests to do certain solemne sacrifices, he left the army in charge with Minutius to gouerne the same in his absence, with condition not to set vpon the enemy, nor to fight with him at all: the which not only by his authoritie he did expressely forbid him, but also as his very friend, he did warne and intreat him in no wise to attempt. Howbeit Minutius litle regarding his commandements or requests, so soone as Fabius backe was turned, began to be somewhat lustie, and doing with his enemies. So one day amongst the rest, Minutius perceiuing Hannibal had sent a great part of his army abroade to forrage and get victuals, came and set vpon them that remained behind, and draue them into their campe, with great slaughter, and did put them in a maruellous feare that were saued, as men that looked for no lesse, but to haue bin besieged in their campe. Afterwards also, when their whole army came together againe, he retired backe in spight of them all, and lost not a man. This exploit set Minutius in a pride, and brought the souldiers to be more rash then they were before. The newes of this ouerthrow went with speed to ROME, and there they made it a great deale more then it was. Fabius hearing of it, said: he was more afeard of Minutius prosperity, then of his owne aduersitie. But the common people reioyced maruellously, and made great shew of ioy vp and downe the market place. Whereupon Metellus one of the Tribunes going vp into the pulpit, made an oration vnto the people, in the which he highly magnified Minutius, and commended his courage: and contrarily charged Fabius no more of cowardlinesse, but with flat treason. Furthermore, he did accuse the Nobility and greatest men of ROME, saying: that from the first beginning they had laid a plot to draw these warres out at length, onely to destroy the peoples power and authority, hauing brought the whole common weale to the state of a monarchie, and into the hands of a priuate person: who by his remissenesse and delayes, would giue Hannibal leysure to plant himselfe in ITALY, and by time giue open passage to the CARTHAGINIANS, at their pleasure to send Hannibal a second aide and armie, to make a full conquest of all ITALIE. Fabius hearing these words, rose vp straight, and spake to the people, and taried not about the answering of the accusations the Tribune had burthened him withall, but prayed them they would dispatch these sacrifices and ceremonies of the gods, that he might speedily returne againe to the campe, to punish Minutius, for breaking his commandement, in fighting with the enemy. He had no sooner spoken these words, but there arose a maruellous tumult and hurley burley presently among the people, for the danger Minutius stood in then, because the Dictator had absolute power and authoritie to imprison and put to death whom he thought good, without ordinarie course of law or araignement. Moreouer, they did iudge, since Fabius had of late left his accustomed mildnesse and affabilitie, that he would grow to such seueritie in his anger, that it would be a hard thing to appease him. Wherefore euery man held their peace for feare, sauing only Metellus the Tribune: he hauing authority by vertue of his office, to say what he thought good, and who only of all other kept still his place and authority, when any Dictator was chosen. Then all the officers that were put down, instantly besought the people not to forsake Minutius, nor to suffer the like to be done to him, as Manlius Torquatus did of late to his sonne, who strook off his head, after he had valiantly fought with his enemies and ouercome them, for breaking his commandement. And began to perswade them further, further, to take this tyrannicall power of the Dictatorship from Fabius: and to put their affaires into the hands of him, that would and could tell how to bring them safely to passe. The people were tickled maruellously with these seditious words, but yet they durst not force Fabius to resigne his Dictatorship, though they bare him great grudge, and were angry with him in their hearts. Howbeit they ordained that Minutius thenceforth should haue equall power and authority with the Dictator in the warres; a thing that was neuer seene nor heard of before, and yet the very same done in that sort againe, after the battell of CANNES. For Marcus Iunius being at that time Dictator in the campe, they did chuse another Dictator at ROME, which was Fabius Buteo, to name and create new Senators in the place of those that were slaine in the battell. But after he had named them, and restored the full number againe of the counsell of the Senate, he discharged the selfe same day the sergeants that caried the axes before him, and sent away the train that waited vpon him, and did so put himselfe in prease of the people in the market place, and followed his own peculiar businesse as a priuate person. Now the ROMAINES imagined, that when Fabius should see how they had made Minutius equall in authoritie with him, it would grieue him to the heart for very anger: but they came short to iudge of his nature, for he did not thinke that their folly should hurt or dishonour him at all. But as wise Diogenes answered one that said vnto him, looke, they mocke thee: tush (said he) they mocke not me. Meaning thereby that he tooke them to be mocked, that were offended with their mockes. Thus Fabius took euery thing quietly, that the people offered him, and did comfort himselfe with the Philosophers rules and examples: who did maintaine, that an honest and wise man, can no way be iniured nor dishonored. For all the displeasure he receiued by the peoples folly, was in respect of the commonwealth: because they had put a sword into a mad mans hand, in giuing Minutius authoritie to follow his rash humor, and fond ambition in the wars. Wherefore, fearing lest he being blinded with vaine glory, and presumptuous opinion of himselfe, should rashly (and vpon a head) hasten to do some great hurt before he came to the campe, he departed suddenly out of ROME without any mans knowledge, to returne againe to the campe, where he found Minutius so proud and stout, that he was not to be dealt with. For he would needs haue the authority to command the whole army when it came to his turne. But Fabius would not consent to that, but deuided the one halfe of the army betweene them: thinking it better he should alone command the one half, then the whole army by turnes. So he chose for himselfe, the first and third legion: and gaue vnto him, the second and fourth, and deuided also betweene them the aide of their friends. And when Minutius made his boast, that the maiesty of the highest magistrate was brought lower for his sake, Fabius told him that he might thinke, if he were wise, he had not to fight with him, but with Hannibal: and if he would needes contend against his companion, yet he should haue a speciall regard and consideration, that hauing wonne now the citizens good wils, by whom he was so much honored, he should haue no lesse care of their health and safety, then he had, who was now troden vnder foote, and ill intreated by them. Minutius tooke his lesson for a counterfeit mock, after old mens maners and fashion: and so taking the one half of the army vnto him, went and lodged alone by himselfe. Hannibal hearing of their iarre and squaring together, sought straight oportunity to make their discord finely to serue his turne. Now there was a hil betweene both their campes not very hard to be won, & it was an excellent place to lodge a campe safely in, and was very fit and commodious for all things. The fields that were about it, did seeme afar off to be very plaine and euen ground, because they had no couert of wood to shadow them, yet were there many ditches and little vallies in them: wherefore Hannibal though he might easily haue taken it at his pleasure if he had listed, did let it alone in the middest betweene them, for a baite to draw out his enemies to battell. Now when Hannibal saw Fabius and Minutius lodged asunder, he placed certaine bands in the night among those ditches and vallies. Afterwards the next morning by breake of day, he sent a small number of men openly to winne this hill: hoping by this policy to traine Minutius out to the field, as it fell out indeed. For first Minutius sent thither his light horsemen, & afterwards all his men at armes: and lastly perceiuing that Hannibal himselfe came to releeue his men that were vpon the hill, he himselfe marched forward also with all the rest of his army in order of battell, and gaue a hot charge vpon them that defended the hill, to driue them thence. The fight continued equall a good space betweene them both, vntill such time as Hannibal saw his enemie come directly within his danger, and shewed the rereward of his battell naked vnto his men, whom before he had laid in ambush: he straight raised the signall he had giuen them. They vpon that discouered all together, and with great cries did set vpon the rereward of the Romaines, & slue a great number of them at the first charge: and did put the rest in such a feare and disorder, as it is vnpossible to expresse it. Then was Minutius rash brauery and fond boasts much cooled, when he looked first vpon one captaine, then vpon another, and saw in none of them any courage to tary by it, but rather that they were all ready to run away. Which if they had done, they had bene cast away euery man: for the Nvmidians finding they were the stronger, did disperse thẽselues all about the plaine, killing all straglers that fled. Minutius souldiers being brought to this danger and distresse, which Fabius foresaw they would fall into; and hauing vpon this occasion his army ready ranged in order of battel, to see what would become of Minutius, not by report of messengers, but with his own eyes: he got him to a litle hill before his campe, where when he saw Minutius & all his men compassed about on euery side, and euen staggering & ready to flie, and heard besides their cries not like men that had harts to fight, but as men scared, & ready to flie for feare to saue thẽselues: he clapped his hand on his thigh, and fetched a great sigh, saying to those that were about him: O gods, how Minutius is gone to cast himselfe away, sooner then I looked for, and later then he desired? But in speaking these words, he made his ensignes march on in haste, crying out aloud: O my friends, we must dispatch with speed to succour Minutius: for he is a valiant man of person, and one that loueth the honour of his country. And though with ouermuch hardinesse he hath ventured too farre, and made a fault, thinking to haue put the enemies to flight: time serueth not now to accuse him, we will tell him of it hereafter. So he presently brake the Nvmides, and dispersed them, that lay waiting in the fields for the Romaines, which they thought would haue fled. Afterwards he went further, & did set vpon them that had giuen charge vpon the rereward of Minutius battel, where he slue them that made head against him. The residue, fearing lest they should fal into the danger they had brought the Romaines vnto: before they were enuironed in of all sides, did turne taile straight to Fabius. Now Hannibal seeing this charge, and considering how Fabius in person, with more courage then his age required, did make a lane in the middest of those that fought against the side of the hill, to come to the place where Minutius was: he made the battell to ceasse, and commanded to sound the retreate, & so drew backe his men again into his campe, the Romaines being very glad also they might retire with safety. They say Hannibal in his retiring, said merrily to his friends: Haue not I told you (Sirs) many a time and oft, of the hanging cloud we saw on the top of the mountaines, how it wold breake out in the end with a tempest that would fall vpon vs? After this battell, Fabius hauing stript those that were left dead in the field, retired againe to his owne campe, and spake not an ill word of Minutius his companion. Minutius then being come to his campe, assembled his souldiers, and spake thus to them: My friends, not to erre at all, enterprising great matters, it is a thing passing mans nature: but to take warning hereafter, by faults that are past and done, it is the part of a wise & valiant man. For my selfe, I acknowledge I haue no lesse occasion to praise fortune, then I haue also cause to complaine of her. For that which long time could neuer teach me, I haue learned by experience in one litle peece of a day: and that is this; That I am not able to command, but am my selfe fitter to be gouerned and commanded by another: and that I am but a foole to stand in mine own conceipt, thinking to ouercome those, of whom it is more honour for me to confesse my selfe to be ouercome. Therefore I tell you, that the Dictator Fabius henceforth shall be he, who alone shall command you in all things. And to let him know that we do all acknowledge the fauour which we haue presently receiued at his hands, I will leade you to giue him thanks, and will my selfe be the first man to offer to obey him in all that he shall cõmand me. These words being spoken, he commanded his ensigne-bearers to follow him, & he himself marched formost towards Fabius campe. When he came thither, he went directly to the Dictators tent: whereat euery man wondered, not knowing his intent. Fabius came out to meete him, Minutius after he had set down his ensignes at his feete, said with a loud voice; ô father: and his souldiers vnto Fabius souldiers; ô masters: which name the bondmen that are infranchised, do vse to them that haue manumissed them. Afterwards euery man being silent, Minutius began aloud to say vnto him: My lord Dictator, this day you haue won two victories: the one of Hannibal, whom valiantly you haue ouercome: the second, of my selfe your companion, whom also your wisdome and goodnesse hath vanquished. By the one, you haue saued our liues: and by the other, you haue wisely taught vs. So haue we also bene ouercome in two sorts: the one by Hannibal to our shame, and the other by your your ſelfe, to our honor and preſeruation. And therefore do I now call you my father, finding no other name more honorable to call you by, wherewith I might honor you: acknowledging my ſelfe more bound vnto you for the preſent grace and fauour I haue receiued of you, then vnto my naturall father that begot me. For by him only I was begotten: but by you, mine, and all theſe honeſt citizens liues haue bene ſaued. And hauing ſpoken theſe words, he embraced Fabius: and ſo did the ſouldiers alſo, heartily embrace together, and kiſſe one another. Thus the ioy was great through the whole campe, and one was ſo glad of another, that the teares trickled downe their cheekes for ioy. Now when Fabius was afterwards put out of his office of Dictatorſhip, there were new Conſuls choſen again: the two firſt followed directly Fabius former order he had begun: for they kept themſelues from giuing Hannibal any battell, and did alwayes ſend aid to their ſubiects & friends, to keep them from rebellion, vntill that Terentius Varro (a man of meane birth, and known to be very bold and raſh) by flattering of the people, wan credit among them to be made Conſull. Then they thought that he by his raſhneſſe and lacke of experience, would incontinently hazard battel, becauſe he had cried out in al the aſſemblies before, that this war would be euerlaſting, ſo long as the people did chuſe any of the Fabians to be their generals: and vanted himſelfe openly, that the firſt day he came to ſee his enemies, he would ouerthrow thē. In giuing out theſe braue words, he aſſembled ſuch a power that the Romaines neuer ſaw ſo great a number together againſt any enemy that they euer had: for he put into one campe 88000 fighting men. This made Fabius and the other Romaines, men of great wiſedome and iudgement, greatly affraid: becauſe they ſaw no hope for Rome to riſe againe, if it fortuned that they ſhould loſe ſo great a number of goodly youth. Therefore Fabius talked with the other Conſul, called Paulus Æmilius, a man very skilfull & expert in wars, but ill beloued of the common people, whoſe fury he yet feared, for that they had condemned him a litle before to pay a great fine to the treaſury: and after he had ſomewhat comforted him, he began to perſwade and encourage him to reſiſt the fond raſhneſſe of his companion, telling him, that he ſhould haue aſmuch to do with Terentius Varro for the preſeruation and ſafety of his country, as to fight with Hannibal for defence of the ſame. For they were both Martiall men, and had a like deſire to fight, the one becauſe he knew not wherein the vantage of his ſtrength conſiſted, and the other becauſe he knew very well his weaknes. You ſhall haue reaſon to beleeue me better, for matters touching Hannibal, then Terentius Varro: for I dare warrant you, if you keepe Hannibal from battell, but this yeare, he ſhall of neceſſity, if he tarry, conſume himſelfe, or elſe for ſhame be driuen to flie with his army. And the rather, becauſe hitherto (though he ſeeme to be lord of the field) neuer one yet of his enemies came to take his part: and moreouer becauſe there remaines at this day in his campe not the third part of his army, he brought with him out of his countrey. Vnto theſe perſwaſions, the Conſull (as it is reported) anſwered thus: When I looke into my ſelfe, my lord Fabius, me thinks my beſt way were rather to fall vpon the enemies pikes, then once again to light into the hands & voices of our citizens. Therfore, ſith the eſtate of the common wealth ſo requireth it, that it behoueth a man to do as you haue ſaid, I will do my beſt endeuor to ſhew my ſelfe a wiſe captain, for your ſake only, rather then for all other that ſhould aduiſe me to the contrary. And ſo Paulus departed from Rome with this mind. But Terentius his cōpanion would in any caſe they ſhould command the whole army by turnes, each his day by himſelfe: and went to encampe hard by Hannibal, by the riuer of Avfide, neere vnto the village called Cannes. Now when it came to his day to cōmand by turnes, early in the morning he cauſed the ſignall of battel to be ſet out, which was a coate-armour of ſkarlet in graine, that they did lay out vpon the pauiliō of the generall: ſo that the enemies at the firſt ſight, began to be affraid, to ſee the luſtines of this new come generall, and the great number of ſouldiers he had alſo in his hoaſt, in compariſon of them that were not halfe ſo many. Yet Hannibal of a good courage, commanded euery man to arme, and to put themſelues in order of battell: and himſelfe in the meane time taking his horſe backe, followed with a few, gallopped vp to the top of a litle hill not very ſteep, from whence he might plainly diſcerne all the Romaines campe, and ſaw how they did range their men in order of battell. Now one Giſcon (a man of like ſtate and nobility as himſelfe) being with him at that time, told him, that the enemies ſeemed afarre off to be a maruellous number. But Hannibal rubbing his forehead, anſwered him: Yea ſaid he, but there is another thing more to be wondred at then you thinke of. Giſcon. Giſcon ſtraight asked him: What? Marry ſaith he, this: that of all the great number of ſouldiers you ſee yonder, there is not a man of them called Giſcon as you are. This merry answer deliuered contrary to their expectation that were with him, looking for some great weighty matter, made them all laugh a good. So down the hill they came laughing aloud, and told this prety iest to all they met as they rode, which straight from one to another ran ouer all the campe, in so much as Hannibal himselfe could not hold from laughing. The CARTHAGINIAN souldiers perceiuing this, began to be of a good courage, imagining that their Generall would not be so merily disposed as to fall a laughing, being so neere danger, if he had not perceiued himselfe a great deale to be the stronger, and that he had good cause also to make no reckoning of his enemies. Furthermore, he shewed two policies of a skilfull Captaine in the battel. The first was, the situation of the place, where he put his men in order of battell, so as they had the wind on their backes: which raging like a burning lightning, raised a sharpe dust out of the open sandy vally, and passing ouer the CARTHAGINIANS squadron, blew full in the ROMAINES faces, with such a violence, that they were compelled to turne their faces, & to trouble their owne rankes. The second policy was, the forme and order of his battell. For he placed on either side of his wings, the best and valianteſt souldiers he had in all his army: and did fill vp the middest of his battell with the worst of his men, which he made like a point, and was farther out by a great deale, then the two wings of the front of his battell. So he commanded those of the wings, that when the ROMAINES had broken his first front, and followed those that gaue backe, whereby the middest of his battell should leaue an hollow place, and the enemies should come in still increasing within the compasse of his two wings: that then they should set vpon them on both sides, and charge their flankes immediatly, and so inclose them in behind. And this was cause of greater slaughter. For when the middle battell began to giue backe, and to receiue the ROMAINES within it, who pursued the other very hotly, Hannibals battell changed her forme: and where at the beginning it was like a point, it became now in the middest like a cressant or half Moone. Then the captaines of the chosen bands that lay out in both the wings, made their men to turn, some on their left hand, & some on the right, & charged the ROMAINES on the flanks, and behind, where they were all naked: so they killed all those that could not saue themselues by flying before they were enuironed. They say also, that there fel out another mischiefe by misfortune vnto the horsemen of the ROMAINES, and by this occasion. The horse of Paulus Æmilius the Consull being hurt, did throw his maister on the ground: whereupon those that were next him, did light from their horse backs to helpe him. The residue of the horsemen that were a great way behind him, seeing them light, thought they had bene all commanded to light: hereupon euery man forsooke their horse, and fought it out on foote. Hannibal when he saw that, said: yea mary, I had rather haue them so, then deliuered me bound hand and foote. But for these matters the historiographers do dilate more at large. Furthermore, of the two Consuls, Varro saued himselfe by his horse, with a few following him, within the city of VENVSA. Paulus being in the middest of the throng of all the army, his body full of arrowes that stucke fast in his wounds, and his heart sore loden with grieuous sorrow and anguish, to see the ouerthrow of his men: was set downe by a rocke, looking for some of his enemies, to come and rid him out of his paine. But few could know him, his head and face was on such a gore bloud: insomuch as his friends & seruants also passed by him & knew him not. And there was but one yong gentleman of a noble house of the Patricians, called Cornelius Lentulus, that knew him, who did his best endeuour to saue him. For he lighted on foot presently, and brought him his horse, praying him to get vp vpon him, to proue if he could saue himselfe for the necessity of his country, which now more then euer had need of a good and wise captaine. But he refused the gentlemans offer & his intreatie, & compelled him to take his horse back againe, though the teares ran down his cheeks for pity: and raising himselfe vp to take him by the hand, he said vnto him: I pray you tell Fabius Maximus from me, & witnesse with me, that Paulus Æmilius euen to his last houre hath followed his counsell, and did neuer swarue from the promise he made him: but that first he was forced to it by Varro, and afterwards by Hannibal. When he had deliuered these words, he bad Lentulus farewell: and running againe into the fury of the slaughter, there he died among his slaine companies. It is thought there were slaine at this battell, 50000 ROMAINES, and 4000 taken prisoners: and other 10000 that were taken prisoners in two campes after the battell. When this noble victory was gotten, Hannibals friends gaue him counsell to follow his good fortune, and to enter ROME after the scattered number that fled thither: so as within few dayes following he might sup in their Capitoll. A man cannot easily gesse what was the cause that stayed him, that he

he went not, vnleſſe it was (as I thinke) ſome good fortune, or fauourable God toward the Romaines that withſtood him, and made him afeard and glad to retire. Whereupon they ſay, that one Barca a Carthaginian, in his anger ſaid to Hannibal: Sir, you haue the way to ouercome, but you cannot vſe victory. Notwithſtanding, this victory made a maruellous change for him: for hereupon, all Italy in maner came in to ſubmit themſelues to him, where before he had no town at commandement, nor any ſtorehouſe or port through all Italy: yea he did maruellous hardly, and with much ado victuall his army with that he could daily rob and ſpoile, hauing no certaine place to retire vnto, nor grounded hope to entertaine theſe wars, but kept the field with his army, remouing frō place to place, as they had bin a great number of murtherers & theeues together. For the moſt part of the coūtry did yeeld immediatly vnto him: as the city of Capua being the chiefeſt and greateſt city of all Italy but Rome, and did receiue Hannibal, and were at his deuotion. Thus we may plainly ſee, that as the poet Euripides ſaith: It is a great miſchiefe not onely to be driuen to make triall of friends, but proofe alſo of captaines wiſdome. For that which before they accounted cowardlineſſe and faint heart in Fabius, immediatly after the battell, they thought it more then mans reaſon, and rather an heauenly wiſdome & influence, that ſo long foreſaw the things to come, which the parties ſelues that afterwards felt thē gaue litle credit vnto before. Vpon this occaſion, Rome repoſed incontinently all their hope and truſt in Fabius, & they repaired to him for counſel, as they would haue ran vnto ſome tēple or altar for ſanctuary. So as the firſt and chiefeſt cauſe of ſtaying the people together from diſperſing themſelues abroad, as they did when Rome was taken by the Gaules, was the only opinion & confidence they had in Fabius wiſdome. For where before he ſeemed to be a coward and timerous, when there was no danger nor misfortune happened: then when euery man wept and cried out for ſorow, which could not helpe, & that all the world was ſo troubled that there was no order taken for any thing, he contrarily went alone vp and downe the city very modeſtly, with a bold cōſtant countenance, ſpeaking courteouſly to euery one, & did appeaſe their womaniſh cries & lamentations, & did forbid the common aſſemblies and fond ceremonies, of lamenting the dead corſe at their burials. Then he perſwaded the Senate to aſſemble in counſell, & did comfort vp thoſe that were magiſtrates, and he alone was the only force & power of the city: for there was not a man that bare any office, but did caſt his eye vpon Fabius, to know what he ſhould do. He it was that cauſed the gates of the city ſtraight to be warded, & to keepe thoſe in for going their way, that would haue forſaken the city. He moreouer did appoint the time & place of mourning, and did command whoſoeuer was diſpoſed to mourne, that he ſhould do it priuately in his own houſe, and to continue only but 30 daies. Then he willed all mourning to be left off, & that the city might be cleane from ſuch vncleane things. So the feaſt of Ceres falling about that time, he thought it better to leaue off the ſacrifices and proceſſion they were wont to keepe on Ceres day: then by their ſmall number that were left, and ſorow of thoſe that remained, to let their enemies vnderſtand their exceeding great loſſe. For the gods delight to be ſerued with glad & reioycing hearts, and with thoſe that are in proſperity. But all this notwithſtanding, whatſoeuer the prieſts wold haue done, either to pacifie the wrath of the gods, or to turne away the threatnings of theſe ſiniſter ſignes, it was forthwith done For they did ſend to the oracle of Apollo, in the city of Delphes, one of Fabius kinſmen ſurnamed Pictor. And two of the Veſtall Nuns being defloured, the one was buried aliue according to the law and cuſtome, and the other made her ſelfe away. But herin the great courage and noble clemency of the Romaines, is maruellouſly to be noted and regarded. For the Conſull Terentius Varro returning backe to Rome, with the ſhame of his extreme misfortune & ouerthrow, that he durſt not looke vpon any man: the Senate notwithſtanding, and all the people following them, went to the gates of the city to meete him, & did honorably receiue him. Nay furthermore, thoſe that were the chiefe magiſtrates & Senators, among whom Fabius was one, when ſilence was made, they commended Varro much becauſe he did not diſpaire of the preſeruation of the common-weale after ſo great calamity, but did return again to the city, to helpe to reduce things to order, in vſing the authority of the law, & the ſeruice of the citizens, as not being altogether vnder foot, but ſtanding yet in reaſonable termes of good recouery. But when they vnderſtood that Hannibal after the battell was gone into other parts of Italy, then they began to be of good cheere again, & ſent a new army and generals to the field, among which the two chiefe generals were Fabius Maximus, and Claudius Marcellus, both which by contrary means in maner, wan alike glory and reputation For Marcellus (as we haue declared in his life) was a man of ſpeedy executiõ, of a quick hand, of a valiant nature, and a right martiall man, as Homer calleth them that valiantly put themſelues in any danger: by reaſon whereof, hauing to deale with another captaine alike venturous and valiant as himſelfe, in all ſeruice and execution, he ſhewed the ſelfe boldneſſe and courage that Hannibal did. But Fabius perſiſting ſtill vpon his firſt determination, did hope that though he did not fight with Hannibal, nor ſtirre him at all, yet continuall warres would conſume him and his army in the end, and bring them both to nought, as a common wreſtler that forceth his body aboue his naturall ſtrength, doth in the end become a lame and bruſed man. Hereupon Poſſidonius writeth, that the one was called the ROMAINES ſword, and the other their target. And that Fabius conſtancy and reſolutenes in wars to fight with ſecurity, and to commit nothing to hazard and danger, being mingled with Marcellus heate and fury, was that only which preſerued the ROMAINES empire. For Hannibal meeting alwaies in his way the one that was furious as a ſtrong running ſtreame, found that his army was continually turmoyled & ouerharried; and the other that was ſlow as a litle prety riuer, he found that his army ran ſoftly vnder him without any noiſe, but yet cõtinually by litle & litle it did ſtil conſume & diminiſh him, vntil he ſaw himſelf at the laſt brought to that paſſe, that he was weary of fighting with Marcellus, and affraid of Fabius, becauſe he fought not. For during all the time of theſe wars, he had euer theſe two captaines almoſt againſt him, which were made either Prætors, Conſuls or Proconſuls, for either of them both had bene fiue times before choſen Conſul. Yet as for Marcellus, Hannibal had laid in ambuſh for him in the fifth & laſt yeare of his Conſulſhip, where he ſet vpon him on a ſudden, and ſlew him. But as for Fabius, he layd many baites for him, and did what he could by all the skill and reach he had, by ambuſhes, and other warlike policies to entrap him, but he could neuer draw him within his danger. Howbeit at one time he put him to a litle trouble, and was in good hope then to haue made him fall vpon his ambuſh he had laid for him, and by this policy. He had counterfeited letters written & ſent vnto him from the city of METAPONT, to pray him to come to them, and they would deliuer their city into his hands: and withall, that ſuch as were priuy to the contents of the ſame, deſired no other thing but his repaire thither. Theſe letters pretily quickned Fabius, inſomuch as he was determined one night to haue taken part of his army, & to haue gone to them. But becauſe the ſignes of the birds did promiſe him no good ſucceſſe, he left off his purpoſe. Soone after he vnderſtood they were counterfeit letters, made by Hannibals fine deuice to haue drawn him out, and to haue entrapped him, for whom himſelfe lay in perſon in ambuſh neare the city, looking and waiting for his coming: but the gods who would haue him ſaued, were onely to be thanked for his happy ſcape. Furthermore concerning the reuolt of the cities that were ſubiect vnto him, & the riſing of their allies and friends againſt them: Fabius thought it farre better to intreat them curteouſly, making them aſhamed without occaſion to rebell againſt them, rather than openly to ſuſpect them, and to deale ſtraightly with thoſe that were ſo to be ſuſpected. Now for this matter, it is reported that Fabius had a ſouldier in his campe that was a MARSIAN borne by nation a valiant man of his perſon, & alſo of as noble a houſe, as any that were of all the allies of the ROMAINES: who had practiſed with other his fellowes of the band he ſerued in, to go ſerue the enemy. Fabius hearing of this practiſe he went about, gaue him no ill countenance for it, but calling him to him, he ſaid: I muſt confeſſe there is no reckoning made of you, as your good ſeruice doth deſerue, wherefore for this time (ſaith he) I blame the pety captaines only, which in ſuch ſort do beſtow their goodwill and fauour at aduenture, and not by deſert. But henceforth it ſhall be your owne fault if you do not declare your minde vnto me, and betweene you and me make me priuy of your lacke and neceſſity. When he had ſpoken theſe words to him, he gaue him a very good horſe for ſeruice, and did reward him with other honourable gifts, as men of good ſeruice and deſert haue commonly beſtowed on them. And this did ſo incourage his ſouldiers thenceforth, that he became a very faithfull and ſeruiceable ſouldier to the ROMAINES. For Fabius thought it more fit, that hunters, riders of horſes, and ſuch like as take vpon them to tame bruit beaſts, ſhould ſooner make them leaue their ſauage and churliſh nature by gentle vſage and manning of them, then by beating, & ſhackling of them. And ſo a gouernour of men, ſhould rather correct his ſouldiers by patience, gentleneſſe, & clemency, then by rigor, violence, or ſeuerity. Otherwiſe he ſhould handle them more rudely and ſharpely then husbandmen doth fig-trees, oliue-trees, and wilde pomegarnats: who by diligent pruning and good handling of them, do alter their hard and wild nature, and cauſe them in the end to bring forth good figs, oliues and pomegarners. Another time certaine captaines captaines of his brought him word, that there was one of their ſouldiers which would euer go out of the campe, and leaue his enſigne. He asked them, what manner of man he was. They answered him all together, that he was a very good ſouldier, & that they could hardly find out ſuch another in all their bands as he: and therewithall they told him of ſome notable ſeruice they had ſeene him do in perſon. Wherupon Fabius made a diligent enquirie to know what the cauſe was that made him go ſo oft out of the campe: in the end he found he was in loue with a young woman, and that to go ſee her was the cauſe he did ſo oft leaue his enſigne, and did put his life in ſo great danger, for that ſhe was ſo farre off. When Fabius vnderſtood this, he ſent certain ſouldiers (vnknowing to the ſouldier) to bring the woman away he loued, and willed them to hide her in his tent, and then called he the ſouldier to him, that was a LVCANIAN borne, & taking him aſide, ſaid vnto him thus: My friend, it hath bene told me, that thou haſt lyen many nights out of the campe, againſt the law of armes, and order of the ROMAINES, but therwithall I vnderſtand alſo that otherwiſe thou art an honeſt man, and therefore I pardon thy faults paſt, in conſideration of thy good ſeruice: but from henceforth I will giue thee in cuſtody to ſuch a one, as ſhall make me accompt of thee. The ſouldier was blanke when he heard theſe words. Fabius with that, cauſed the woman he was in loue with to be brought forth, and deliuered her into his hands, ſaying vnto him: This woman hereafter ſhall anſwer me thy body to be forth coming in the campe amongſt vs: and from henceforth thy deeds ſhall witneſſe for the reſt, that thy loue vnto this woman, may be no cloke of thy departing out of the campe for any wicked practiſe or intent. Thus much we find written concerning this matter. Moreouer, Fabius after ſuch a ſort, recouered againe the city of TARENTVM, & brought it to the obedience of the ROMAINES, which they had loſt by treaſon. It fortuned there was a yong man in his campe, a TARENTINE borne, that had a ſiſter within TARENTVM, which was very faithfull to him, and loued him maruellous dearely: now there was a captain, a BRVTIAN borne, that fell in loue with her, & was one of thoſe to whō Hannibal had committed the charge of the city of TARENTVM. This gaue the yong ſouldier the TARENTINE, very good hope and way, to bring his enterpriſe to good effect: wherupon he reuealed his intent to Fabius, and with his priuity fled from his campe, and got into the city of TARENTVM, giuing it out in the city, that he would altogether dwell with his ſiſter. Now for a few daies at his firſt coming the BRVTIAN captaine lay alone by himſelfe, at the requeſt of the maid his ſiſter, who thought her brother had not known of her loue: & ſhortly after the yong fellow took his ſiſter aſide, and ſaid vnto her: My good ſiſter, there was a great ſpeech in the ROMAINS campe, that thou wert kept by one of the chiefeſt captaines of the gariſon: I pray thee if it be ſo, let me know what he is: for ſo he be a good fellow, and an honeſt man (as they ſay he is) I care not: for wars that turneth all things topſi-turuey, regardeth not of what place or calling he is of, and ſtill maketh vertue of neceſſity, without reſpect of ſhame. And it is a ſpecial good fortune, at ſuch time as neither right nor reaſon rules, to happen yet into the hands of a good and gracious Lord. His ſiſter hearing him ſpeake theſe words, ſent for the BRVTIAN captaine to bring him acquainted with her brother, who liked well of both their loues, and indeuored himſelfe to frame his ſiſters loue in better ſort towards him, then it was before: by reaſon wherof, the captaine alſo began to truſt him very much. So this yong TARENTINE ſaw it was very eaſie to win and turne the mind of this amorous and mercinary man, with hope of great gifts that were promiſed him, and Fabius ſhould performe. Thus do the moſt part of writers ſet downe this ſtory. Howbeit ſome writers ſay, that this woman who wan the BRVTIAN captain, was not a TARENTINE, but a BRVTIAN borne, whom Fabius it is ſaid, kept afterwards for his concubine, and that ſhe vnderſtanding the captain of the BRVTIANS (who lay in gariſon within the city of TARENTVM) was alſo a BRVTIAN borne, and of her own natiue country, made Fabius priuy to her intent, and with his conſent, ſhe coming to the walles of the city, ſpake with this BRVTIAN captaine, whom ſhe handled in ſuch ſort, that ſhe wan him. But whileſt this geare was a brewing, Fabius, becauſe he would traine Hannibal out of thoſe quarters, wrote vnto the ſouldiers of RHEGIO, which belonged to the ROMAINES, that they ſhould enter the borders of the BRVTIANS, and lay ſiege to the city of CAVLONIA, and raze it to the groũd. Theſe RHEGIAN ſouldiers were about the nũber of 8000, and the moſt of them traitors, and runagates from one campe to another: and the worſt ſort of them and moſt defamed of life, were thoſe that Marcellus brought thither out of SICILE, ſo that in loſing them all, the loſſe were nothing to the common-wealth, & the ſorrow much leſſe. So Fabius thought, that putting theſe fellowes out for a prey to Hannibal (as a ſtale to draw him from thoſe quarters) he ſhould plucke him by this meanes from TARENTVM: and ſo it came to paſſe. For Hannibal incontinently went thence with his army to intrap them: and in the meane time Fabius went to lay ſiege to TERENTVM, where he had not lien ſixe daies before it, but the yong man (who together with his ſiſter had drawn the BRVTIAN captain to this treaſon) ſtole out one night to Fabius, to enforme him of all, hauing taken very good markes of that ſide of the wall the BRVTIAN captaine had taken charge of, who had promiſed him to keep it ſecret, and to ſuffer them to enter, that came to aſſault that ſide. Yet Fabius would not ground his hope altogether vpon the BRVTIANS executing this treaſon, but went himſelf in perſon to view the place appointed, howbeit without attempting any thing for that time: and in the meane ſeaſon, he gaue a general aſſault to all parts of the city (as well by ſea as by land) with great ſhouts & cries. Then the BRVTIAN captain ſeeing all the citizens and gariſons run to that part where they perceiued the noiſe to be greateſt, made a ſignall vnto Fabius, that now was the time. Who then cauſed ſealing ladders to be brought apace, wherupon himſelfe with his cõpany ſcaled the walls, and ſo wan the city. But it appeared here, that ambition ouercame him: for firſt he commanded they ſhould kill all the BRVTIANS, becauſe it ſhould not be knowne he had won the city by treaſon. But this bloudy policy failed him: for he miſſed not only of the glory he looked for, but moſt deſeruedly he had the reproch of cruelty and falſhood. At the taking of this city, a maruellous number of the TARENTINES were ſlaine, beſides there were ſold 30000 of the chiefeſt of them, and all the city was ſacked: and of the ſpoile thereof was caried to the common ſtore treaſure at ROME, 3000 talents. It is reported alſo, that when they did ſpoile and cary away all other ſpoiles left behind, the recorder of the city asked Fabius, what his pleaſure was to do with the gods, meaning the tables, and their images: and to that Fabius anſwered him: Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their gods that be angrie with them. This notwithſtanding, he caried from thence Hercules ſtatue, that was of a monſtrous bigneſſe, and cauſed it to be ſet vp in the Capitoll, and withall did ſet vp his owne image in braſſe on horſebacke by him. But in that act he ſhewed himſelfe farre harder hearted then Marcellus had done, or to ſay more truly, thereby he made the world know how much Marcellus curteſie, clemency, and bounty was to be wondred at: as we haue written in his life. Newes being brought to Hannibal, that TARENTVM was beſieged, he marched preſently with all ſpeed poſſible to raiſe the ſiege: and they ſay he had almoſt come in time, for he was within fortie furlongs of the city when he vnderſtood the troth of the taking of it. Then ſaid he out aloud, Sure the ROMAINES haue their Hannibal too: for as we wan TARENTVM, ſo haue we loſt it. But after that, to his friends he ſaid plainely (and that was the firſt time they euer heard him ſpeake it) that he ſaw long before, and now appeared plainly, that they could not poſſibly with this ſmall power keepe ITALY. Fabius made his triumph and entry into ROME the ſecond time, by reaſon of taking this city: & his ſecond triumph was much more honourable then the firſt, as of a valiant captaine that held out ſtill with Hannibal, and eaſily met with all his fine policies, much like the ſlight trickes of a cunning wreſtler, which caried not now the former roughneſſe and ſtrength any more, becauſe that his army was giuen to take their eaſe, and growne to delicacie, partly through the great riches they had gotten, and partly alſo for that it was ſore waſted and diminiſhed, through the ſundry foughten battels and blowes they had bene at. Now there was one Marcus Liuius a ROMAINE, that was gouernor of TARENTVM at that time when Hannibal tooke it, and neuertheleſſe kept the caſtell ſtill out of Hannibals hands, and ſo held it vntill the city came againe into the hands of the ROMAINES. This Liuius ſpited to ſee ſuch honour done to Fabius, ſo that one day in open Senate, being drowned with enuy and ambition, he burſt out and ſaid: that it was himſelfe, not Fabius, that was cauſe of taking of the citie of TARENTVM again. Fabius ſmiling to heare him, anſwered him openly: indeed thou ſaieſt true, for if thou hadſt not loſt it, I had neuer won it again. But the ROMAINES in all other reſpects did greatly honor Fabius, and ſpecially for that they choſe his ſon Conſull. He hauing already taken poſſeſſion of his office, as he was diſpatching certaine cauſes touching the wars, his father (whether it was for debility of his age, or to proue his ſon) tooke his horſe to come to him, and rode through the preaſe of the people that thronged about him, hauing buſines with him. But his ſon ſeeing him coming a farre off, would not ſuffer it, but ſent an officer of his vnto him, to cõmand him to light off his horſe, and to come on foot if he had any thing to do with the Conſull. This commandement miſliked the people that heard it, and they all looked vpon Fabius, but ſaid not a word: thinking with themſelues, that the Conſull did great wrong to his fathers greatneſſe. So he

he lighted straight, and went a good round pace to embrace his sonne, and said vnto him: You haue reason sonne, and do well to shew ouer whom you command, vnderstanding the authority of a Consull, which place you haue receiued. For it is the direct course, by the which we & our ancesters haue increased the Romaine empire: preferring euer the honor and state of our countrey, aboue father, mother, or children. And truly they say, that Fabius great grandfather being the greatest and most noble person of Rome in his time, hauing fiue times bin Consull, and had obtained many triumphs, for diuers honourable and sundry victories he had won: was contented after all these, to be his sonnes lieutenant, and to go to the warres with him, he being chosen Consull. And last of all, the Consull his sonne returning home to Rome a conquerour, in his triumphing chariot drawne with foure horses, he followed him on horsebacke also, in troope with the rest: thinking it honor to him, that hauing authority ouer his son in the right of a father, and being also the noblest man of all the citizens, so taken & reputed, neuertheless he willingly submitted himselfe to the law and magistrate, who had authority of him. Yet besides all this, he had far more excellent vertues to be had in admiration, then those already spoken of. But it fortuned that this son of Fabius died before him, whose death he tooke patiently, like a wise man, and a good father. Now the custome being at that time, that at the death of a noble man, their neerest kinsman should make a funerall oration in his praise at their obsequies: he himselfe made the same oration in honor of his son, & did openly speake it in the market place, and moreouer wrot it, and deliuered it out abroad. About this time, Cornelius Scipio was sent into Spaine, who draue out the Carthaginians from thence, after he had ouerthrowne them in many battels, and had conquered many great cities, and greatly aduanced the honor and estimation of the state of Rome: for the which at his returne, he was as much, or rather more honored, beloued and esteemed, then any other that was in the city of Rome. Hereupon Scipio being made Consull, considered that the people of Rome looked for some great matter at his hands, aboue all other. Therefore he thought, to take vpon him to fight against Hannibal in Italy, he should but folow the old maner, and tread too much in the steps of the old man: whereupon he resolued immediatly to make wars in Africke, and to burne and destroy the country euen vnto Carthage gates, and so to transferre the wars out of Italy into Libya, procuring by all possible deuice he could, to put it into the peoples heads, & to make thē like of it. But Fabius contrarily, perswading himself that the enterprise this yong rash youth tooke in hand, was vtterly to ouerthrow the cō-mon-weale, or to put the state of Rome in great danger: deuised to put Rome in the greatest feare he could possible, without sparing speech or deed he thought might serue for his purpose, to make the people change from that minde. Now he could so cunningly worke his purpose, what with speaking and doing, that he had drawne all the Senate to his opinion. But the people iudged, it was the secret enuie he bare to Scipioes glory, that drew him to encounter this deuice, only to blemish Scipioes noble fortune, fearing, lest if he shold happen to do some honorable seruice (as to make an end altogether of this warre, or otherwise to draw Hannibal out of Italy) that then it would appeare to the world, he had bin too soft, or too negligent, to draw this war out to such a length. For my part, me thinkes the only matter that moued Fabius from the beginning to be against Scipio, was the great care he had of the safety of the common-weale, by reason of the great danger depending vpon such a resolution. And yet I do thinke also, that afterwards he went further then he should, contending too sore against him (whether it were through ambition or obstinacie) seeking to hinder and suppresse the greatnesse of Scipio: considering also he did his best to perswade Crassus, Scipioes companion in the Consulship, that he should not grant vnto him the leading of the army, but if he thought good to go into Africke, to make wars vpon the Carthaginians, that he should rather go himself. And moreouer, he was the let that they gaue him no mony for maintenance of these wars. Scipio hereupon being turned ouer to his owne credit, to furnish himselfe as he could, he leuied great sums of mony in the cities of Thvscan, who for the great loue they bare him, made contributiō towards his iourny. And Crassus remained at home, both because he was a soft and no ambitious nor contentious man of nature: as also, because he was the chiefest prelate and high bishop, who by the law of their religion, was constrained to keepe Rome. Fabius seeing his labour lost that way, tooke againe another course to crosse Scipio, deuising to stay the yong men at home, that had great desire to go this iourney with him. For he cried out with open mouth, in all assemblies of the Senate and people, that Scipio was not contented onely to flie Hannibal, but that he would carie with him besides the whole force of ITALY that remained: alluring the youth with sweete baites of vaine hope, and perswading them to leaue their wiues, their fathers, mothers, and their country, euen now when their enemy knocked at ROME gates, who did euer conquer, & was yet neuer conquered. These words of Fabius did so dampe the ROMAINES, that they appointed Scipio should furnish his iourney onely with the army that was in SICILIA, sauing that he might supply to them if he would, 300 of the best soldiers that had serued him faithfully in SPAINE. And so it doth appeare euen to this present, that Fabius both did and said all things, according to his wonted maner, and naturall disposition. Now Scipio was no sooner arriued in AFRICKE, but newes were brought to ROME incontinently, of wonderfull exploits, and noble seruice done beyond measure: and of great spoiles taken by him, which argued the troth of the newes. As the king of the NVMIDIANI taken prisoner, two campes of the enemies burnt and destroyed at a time, with losse of a great number of people, armor, & houses, that were consumed in the same: letters & posts for life running in the necke one of another from CARTHAGE to call Hannibal home, and to pray him to hunt no longer after vaine hope that would neuer haue end, hasting himselfe with all speed possible to come to the rescue of his country. These wonderfull great fortunes of Scipio, made him of such renowne and fame within ROME, that there was no talke but of Scipio. Fabius notwithstanding desisted not to make a new request, being of opinion they should send him a successor, alledging no other cause nor reason, but a common speech of euery body: that it was a dangerous thing to commit to the fortune of one man alone, so great exceeding prosperity and good successe, because it is a rare matter to see one man happy in all things. These words did so much mislike the people, that they thought him an enuious troublesome man, or else they thought his age had made him fearefull: and that his courage failed with his strength, fearing Hannibal more doubtfully then he needed. For now though Hannibal was forced to leaue ITALIE, and to returne into AFRICKE, yet Fabius would not grant, that the peoples ioy & security they thought they were in, was altogether cleere, and without feare and mistrust: but gaue it out, that then they were in greatest danger, and that the common-weale was breeding more mischiefe now then before. For when Hannibal (said he) shall returne home into AFRICKE, and come before CARTHAGE wals, the ROMAINES shall be lesse able to abide him there, then they haue bene before: and Scipio moreouer, shall meete with an army yet warme, and embrued with the bloud of so many Prætors, Dictators, and Consuls of ROME, which they haue ouercome, and put to the sword in ITALY, with these vncomfortable speeches, he still troubled and disquieted the whole city, perswading them that notwithstanding the warre was transferred out of ITALY into AFRICKE, yet that the occasion of feare was no lesse neere vnto ROME, then it was euer before. But within short space after, Scipio hauing ouercome Hannibal in plaine battell in the field, and troden vnder foote the glory and pride of CARTHAGE, he brought a greater ioy to ROME, then they euer looked for: and by this noble victory of his, he raised vp againe the declining state of the empire of ROME, which a litle before was falling downe right. Howbeit Fabius liued not to the end of this warre, nor neuer heard whiles he liued the ioyfull newes of Hannibals happy ouerthrow, neither was his yeeres prolonged to see the happy assured prosperitie of his country: for about that time that Hannibal departed out of ITALY, a sickenesse tooke him, whereof he died. The stories declare that, the THEBANES buried Epaminondas, at the common charges of the people, because he died in so great pouerty, that when he was dead, they found nothing in the house but a little iron spit. Now the ROMAINES buried not Fabius so, at the common charge of the city, but euery man of beneuolence gaue towards his funerall charge, a peece of coine that caried the lest value of their currant money: not for that he lacked ability to bring him to the ground, but only to honor his memory: in making his obsequies at their charges, as of one that had bene their common father. So had his vertuous life, an honourable end and buriall.

THE COMPARISON OF Pericles with Fabius.

HERE haue you heard what is written of theſe two great perſons. And for as much as they haue both left behind them many notable examples of vertue, aſwell in martiall matters, as in ciuill gouernement, let vs begin to compare them together. Firſt of all, Pericles began to gouerne the commonweale, at what time the people of Athens were in their chiefeſt proſperity, & of greater power and wealth, then euer they had bene of before or ſince. The which might ſeeme to be a cauſe of the continuall maintenance of the ſame in ſecurity without danger of falling not ſo much for their worthineſſe, as for their common power and felicity: where contrariwiſe Fabius acts fell out in the moſt diſhonourable and vnfortunate time, that euer hapned to his countrey, in the which he did not onely keepe the city in good ſtate from declining, but raiſed it vp, and deliuered it from calamity, and brought it to be better then he found it. Furthermore, Cimons great good fortune and ſucceſſe, the victories and triumphs of Myronides, and of Leocrates, and many notable valiant deeds at armes of Tolmides, gaue good cauſe to Pericles, to entertaine his city in feaſts, and playes, whileſt he did gouerne the ſame: and he did not find it in ſuch ill caſe and diſtreſſe, that he was driuen to defend it by force of armes, or to conquer that againe which before was loſt. But Fabius in contrary manner, when he ſaw before him many ouerthrowes, great flying away, much murder, great ſlaughters of the Generals of the Romaine armies, the lakes, the plaines, the woods filled with ſcattered men, the people ouercome, the flouds & riuers running all agore-bloud (by reaſon of the great ſlaughter) and the ſtreame carying downe the dead bodies to the maine ſea: did take in hand the gouernment of his country, and by a courſe farre contrary to all other, he did ſo vnderprop and beare vp the ſame, that he kept it from falling flat to the ground, amongſt thoſe ruines and ouerthrowes other had brought it to before him. Yet a man may ſay alſo, that it is no matter of ſo great difficulty to rule a city already brought low by aduerſity, & which compelled by neceſſity, is contented to be gouerned by a wiſe man: as it is to bridle and keepe vnder the inſolency of a people, puft vp with pride, and preſumption of long proſperity, as Pericles found it amongſt the Athenians. The great multitude alſo of ſo many grieuous calamities, as lighted on the Romaines necks at that time, did plainely ſhew Fabius to be a graue and conſtant man, which would neuer giue way vnto the importunate cries of the common people, nor could euer be remoued from that he had at the firſt determined. The winning and recouering againe of Tarentvm, may well be compared to the taking of Samos, which Pericles wan by force: and the cities of Campania, vnto the Ile of Evboea: excepting the city of Capva, which the Conſuls Fulvius and Appius recouered againe. But it ſeemeth that Fabius neuer wan battel, ſaue that onely for which he triumphed the firſt time: where Pericles ſet vp nine triumphs, of battels and victories he had won, aſwell by ſea as by land. And ſo alſo, they cannot alledge ſuch an act done by

by Pericles as Fabius did, when he rescued Minutius out of the hands of Hannibal, and saued a whole army of the ROMAINES: which doubtlesse was a famous act and proceeded of a noble mind, great wisdome, and an honorable heart. But Pericles againe did neuer commit so grosse an error as Fabius did, when he was out-reached and deceiued by Hannibals fine stratageme of his oxen: who hauing found his enemy by chance to haue shut himselfe vp in the straight of a vally, did suffer him to escape in the night by a subtilty, & in the day by plaine force: for he was preuẽted by ouermuch delay, and fought withall by him he kept inclosed. Now if it be requisite, a good Captaine do not only vse well that he hath in his hands, but that he wisely iudge also what will follow after, then the warres of the ATHENIANS fell out in such sort, as Pericles said they would come to passe: for with ambition to imbrace too much, they ouerthrew their estate. But the ROMAINES cõtrariwise, hauing sent Scipio into AFRICK to make wars with the CARTHAGINIANS, wan all that they tooke in hand: where their General did not ouercome the enemy by fortune, but by valiantnesse. So that the wisdome of the one is witnessed, by the ruine of his coũtry: and the error of the other testified, by the happy euent of that he would haue let. Now the fault is alike in a General, to fal into danger, for lacke of forecast: as for cowardlinesse to let slip a fit oportunity offered, to do any notable peece of seruice. For like default & lacke of experiẽce, maketh the one too hardy, and the other too fearefull. And thus much touching the wars. Now for ciuil gouernment: it was a foule blot to Pericles, to be the author of wars. For it is thought, that he alone was the cause of the same, for that he wold not haue them yeeld to the LACEDÆMONIANS in any respect. And yet me thinks Fabius Maximus also wold no more giue place vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, but stood firme and bold in all danger, to maintaine the empire of his country against them. But the goodnesse & clemency Fabius shewed vnto Minutius, doth much commend Pericles accusations and practises, against Cimon and Thucydides: both of them being noble and good men, and taking part with the Nobility, whõ he expulsed out of ATHENS, and banished for a time. So was Pericles power & authority in the commonweale greater: by reason wherof he did euer foresee, that no Generall in all his time did rashly attempt any thing hurtfull vnto the commonweale, except Tolmides only: who fled from him, and in despite of him went to fight with the BOEOTIANS, where he was slain. As for all other Generals, they wholly put themselues into his hands, and did obey him for the greatnesse of his authority. But Fabius, although for his part he neuer committed any fault, and that he went orderly to worke in all gouernment: yet becausse he was not of power to keepe other from doing ill, it seemeth in this respect he was defectiue. For if Fabius had caried lik authority in ROME, as Pericles did in ATHENS the ROMAINES had not fallen into so great misery as they did. And for liberality, the one shewed it, in refusing the mony offered him: & the other, in giuing vnto those that needed, & redeeming his poore captiue country men. And yet Fabius might dispend no great reuenue, for his whole receipts came only to sixe talents. But for Pericles, it is hard to say how rich he was, who had coming in to him, great presents by his authority, as well of the subiect, as of the friends and allies of the ATHENIANS, as also of Kings and strange Princes: yet he neuer tooke bribe for all that, of any person liuing. And to conclude, as for the sumptuous building of temples, the stately workes and common buildings: put all the ornaments together that euer were in ROME, before the times of the Cæsars, they are not to be compared with those, wherewith Pericles did beautifie and adorne the city of ATHENS. For neither in quality nor quantity was there any proportion or like comparison, betweene the exceeding sumptuousnesse of the one, and of the other.

ALCIBIADES by his fathers ſide, was anciently deſcended of Euryſaces that was the ſonne of Aiax, and by his mothers ſide of Alcmæon: for his mother Dinomacha, was the daughter of Megacles. His father Clinias hauing armed & ſet forth a galley at his owne proper coſts & charges, did win great honour in the battell by ſea, that was fought along the coaſt of ARTEMISIVM, and he was ſlain afterward in another battell fought at CORONEA, againſt the BOEOTIANS. His ſonne Alcibiades tutors, were Pericles and Ariphron, Xantippus ſonnes: who were alſo his neere kinſmen. They ſay, and truly, that Socrates good will and friendſhip did greatly further Alcibiades honor. For it appeareth not, neither was it euer written, what were the names of the mothers of Nicias, of Demoſthenes, of Lamachus, of Phormion, of Thraſibulus, and of Theramenes: all which were notable famous men in their time. And to the contrary we find the nource of Alcibiades, that ſhe was a LACEDÆMONIAN borne, and was called Amicla, and that this ſchoolemaſter was called Zophyrus: of the which, Antiſthenes mentioneth the one, and Plato the other. Now for Alcibiades beauty, it made no matter if we ſpake not of it, yet I will alitle touch it by the way: for he was wonderfull faire, being a child, a boy, and a man, and that at all times, which made him maruellous amiable, and beloued of euery man. For where Euripides ſaith, that of all the faire times of the yeare, the Autume or later ſeaſon is the faireſt: that commonly falleth not out true. And yet it proued true in Alcibiades, though in few other: for he was paſſing faire euen to his later time, and of good temperature of body. They write of him alſo, that his tongue was ſomewhat fat, and it did not become him ill, but gaue a certaine naturall pleaſant grace in his talke: which Ariſtophanes mentioneth, mocking one Theorus that did counterfeit a liſping grace with his tongue:

This Alcibiades, with his fat liſping tongue,
Into mine eares, this truſty tale, and ſong full often ſung:
Looke vpon Theolus (quoth he) lo there he bowes,
Behold his comely crow-bright face with fat and flatling blowes.*
The ſonne of Clinias, would liſpe it thus ſomewhiles,
And ſure he liſped neuer a lye, but rightly hit his wiles.

And Archippus another Poet alſo, mocking the ſonne of Alcibiades, ſaith thus:

Alcibiades ſtocke Alcibiades tutors.
The mothers of famous men neuer knowne what they were Alcibiades beauty.
Alcibiades liſped by nature
* The equiuocation of theſe two Greeke words Καμὰ & Καὶα is hard to be expreſſed in Engliſh, in ſtead whereof I haue ſet flatling blowes, for flattering browes obſeruing the grace of liſping as neere as I could, like to the Latine and French trãſlation, flatissa, likewiſe Theolus for Theorus.

Becauſe he would be like his father euery way,
In his long trailing gowne he would go ietting day by day.
And counterfeit his ſpeech, his countenance and face:
As though dame nature had him giuen therein a perfect grace;
To liſpe and looke aſide, and hold his head awry,
Euen as his father lookt and liſpt, ſo would he prate and pry.

For his manners they altered and changed very oft with time, which is not to be wondered at, ſeeing his maruellous great proſperity, as alſo aduerſitie that followed him afterwards. But of all the great deſires he had, and that by nature he was moſt inclined to, was ambition, ſeeking to haue the vpper hand in all things, and to be taken for the beſt perſon: as appeareth by certaine of his deeds, and notable ſayings in his youth, extant in writing. One day wreſtling with a compa-nion of his, that handled him hardly, and thereby was likely to haue giuen him the fall, he got his fellowes arme in his mouth, and bit ſo hard, as he would haue eaten it off. The other feeling him bite ſo hard, let go his hold ſtraight, and ſaid vnto him: what Alcibiades biteſt thou like a wo-man! No mary do I not (quoth he) but like a lyon. Another time being but a litle boy, he played at skailes in the middeſt of the ſtreet with other of his cõpanions, & when his turne came about to throw, there came a cart ladẽ by chance that way: Alcibiades prayed the carter to ſtay a while, vntill he had played out his game, becauſe the skailes were ſet right in the high way where the cart ſhould paſſe ouer. The carter was a ſtubburne knaue, and would not ſtay for any requeſt the boy could make, but draue his horſe on ſtill, in ſo much as other boyes gaue backe to let him go on: but Alcibiades fell flat to the ground before the cart, and bad the carter driue ouer and he durſt. The carter being affraid, plucked backe his horſe to ſtay them: the neighbours frighted to ſee the danger, ran to the boy in all haſt crying out. Afterwards when he was put to ſchoole to learn, he was very obedient to all his maſters that taught him any thing, ſauing that he diſdained to learne to play on the flute or recorder: ſaying, that it was no gentlemanly quality. For, ſaid he, to play on the violl with a ſticke, doth not alter mans fauour, nor diſgrace any gentleman: but otherwiſe, to play on the flute, his countenance altereth and changeth ſo oft, that his familiar friends can ſcan: know him. Moreouer the harpe or violl doth not let him that playeth on them, from ſpeaking, or ſinging as he playeth: where he that playeth on the flute, holdeth his mouth ſo hard to it, that it taketh not onely his words from him, but his voyce. Therefore ſaid he, let the children of the THEBANS play on the flute, that cannot tell how to ſpeake: as for the ATHE-NIANS, we haue (as our forefathers tell vs) for protectors & patrones of our countrey, the god-deſſe Pallas, and the god Apollo: of the which the one in old time (as it is ſaid) brake the flute, & the other pulled his skinne ouer his eares, that played vpon a flute. Thus Alcibiades alledging theſe reaſons, partly in ſport, and partly in good earneſt, did not only himſelf leaue to learne to play on the flute, but he turned his companions minds alſo quite from it. For theſe words of Al-cibiades, ran from boy to boy incontinently: that Alcibiades had reaſon to deſpiſe playing on the flute, & that he mocked all thoſe that learned to play on it. So afterwards, it fel out at ATHENS, that teaching to play on the flute, was put out of the number of honeſt and liberall exerciſes, and the flute it ſelfe was thought a vile inſtrument, and of no reputation. Furthermore, in the accuſa-tions Antiphon wrote againſt Alcibiades, it is declared: that when he was a boy, he fled out of his tutors houſe, into the houſe of Democrates one of his louers, and how Ariphron one of his tutors thought to haue made a beadle cry him through the city: but Pericles wold not ſuffer him, ſaying: that if he were dead, they ſhould know it but one day ſooner by crying of him: and if he were a-liue, that it would be ſuch a ſhame to him while he liued, that he had bin better he had neuer bin heard of againe. The ſame Antiphon accuſeth him further, that he had killed a ſeruant of his that attended on him, in the wreſtling place of Sybertius, with a blow of a ſtaffe. But there is no reaſon to credit his writing, who confeſſeth he ſpeaketh all the ill he can of him, for the ill will he did beare him. Now ſtraight there were many great and rich men that made much of Alcibiades, and were glad to get his good will. But Socrates loue vnto him had another end and cauſe, which witneſſed that Alcibiades had a naturall inclination to vertue. Who perceiuing that vertue did appeare in him, and was ioyned with the other beauty of his face, and body, and fearing the cor-ruption of riches, dignity and authority, and the great number of his companions, as well of the chiefeſt of the city, as of ſtrangers, ſeeking to intice him by flattery, & by many other pleaſures: he tooke vpon him to protect him from them all, and not to ſuffer ſo goodly an ympe to loſe

the hope of the good fruit of his youth. For fortune doth neuer ſo intãgle nor ſnare a man without, with that which they cõmonly call riches, as to let & hinder him ſo, that phyloſophy ſhould not take hold on him with her free, ſeuere, & quicke reaſons. So Alcibiades was at the beginning, aſſaied with all delights, & ſhut vp as it were in their company that feaſted him with all pleaſures only to turn him that he ſhould not hearken to Socrates words, who ſought to bring him vp at his charge, and to teach him. But Alcibiades notwithſtanding hauing a good naturall wit, knew what Socrates was, and went to him, refuſing the company of all his rich friends and their flatteries, and fell in a kind of familiar friendſhip with Socrates. Whom when he had heard ſpeake, he noted his words very well, that they were no perſwaſions of a man ſeeking his diſhoneſty, but one that gaue him good counſell, and went about to reforme his faults and imperfections, and to plucke downe the pride and preſumption that was in him: then, as the common prouerbe ſaith,

Like to the crauen cocke, he drooped downe his wings,
Which cowardly doth runne away, or from the pit out flings.

And did thinke with himſelf, that all Socrates loue and following of yong men, was indeed a thing ſent from the gods, and ordained aboue for them, whom they would haue preſerued, and put into the pathway of honour. Therefore he began to deſpiſe himſelfe, and greatly to reuerence Socrates, taking pleaſure in his good vſing of him, and much imbraced his vertue: ſo as he had (he wiſt not how) an image of loue grauen in his heart, or rather (as Plato ſaith) a mutuall loue, to wit, an holy and honeſt affection towards Socrates. Inſomuch as all the world wondered at Alcibiades, to ſee him commonly at Socrates boord, to play, to wreſtle, & to lodge in the wars with Socrates: and contrarily to chide his other welwillers, who could not ſo much as haue a good looke at his hands, and beſides became dangerous to ſome, as it is ſaid he was vnto Anytus, the ſon of Anthemion, being one of thoſe that loued him well. Anytus making good cheere to certaine ſtrangers his friends that were come to ſee him, went and prayed Alcibiades to come and make merie with them: but he refuſed to go. For he went to make mery with certaine of his companions at his owne houſe, and after he had well taken in his cups, he went to Anytus houſe to counterfeit the foole amongſt them; & ſtaying at the hall doore, and ſeeing Anytus table & cubboord full of plate of ſiluer and gold, he commanded his ſeruants to take away halfe of it, and cary it home to his houſe. But when he had thus taken his pleaſure, he would come no neerer into the houſe, but went his way home. Anytus friends and gueſts miſliking this ſtrange part of Alcibiades, ſaid it was ſhamefully and boldly done to abuſe Anytus. Nay, gently done of him, ſaid Anytus: for he hath left vs ſom, where he might haue taken all. All other alſo that made much of him, he ſerued after that ſort, ſauing a ſtranger that came to dwell in Athens: who being but a poore man as the voice went, ſold all that he had, wherof he made about a hũdred ſtaters which he brought vnto Alcibiades and prayed him to take it at his hands. Alcibiades began to be mery, and being very glad to vnderſtand his good will towards him, took his honeſt offer, & praied him to come to ſupper to him: ſo he welcomed him very heartily, and made him good cheere. When ſupper was done, he gaue him his mony againe, and commanded him not to faile the next morning to meete him where the farmes and lands of the city are wont to be let out to thoſe that bid moſt, & charged him he ſhould outbid all. The poore man would faine haue excuſed himſelfe, ſaying the farmes were too great for him to hire: But Alcibiades threatned to whip him, if he would not do it. For beſides the deſire he had to pleaſure him, he bare a priuate grudge againſt the ordinary farmers of the city. The next morning the ſtranger was ready in the market place, where they did cry out the letting of their farmes, & he raiſed one to a talent more then all other did offer. The other farmers were as mad with him as could be, that they all did ſet vpon him, crying out: Let him put in ſecurity ſtraight, ſuppoſing he could haue found none. The ſtranger was maruellous blanke thereat, and began to ſhrinke backe. Then cried Alcibiades out aloud to the officers that ſate there to take the beſt offers: I wil be his ſurety, ſaith he, put me in the booke, for he is a friend of mine. The farmers hearing him ſay ſo, were at their wits end, and wiſt not what to do. For they being alwayes accuſtomed to pay their yearly rent as it went before, by the helpe of the reſt of the yeares that followed after: perceiuing now that they ſhould not be able to pay the arrerages of the rent due to the common-wealth, and ſeeing no other remedy, they prayed him to take a peece of money, and to leaue the bargaine. Then Alcibiades would in no wiſe he ſhould take leſſe then a talent, which they gaue him willingly. So Alcibiades ſuffered the ſtranger then to depart, and made him gaine by his deuice. Now Socrates loue which he bare him, thought it had many mighty and great aduerſaries, yet it did ſtay much Alcibiades, ſometime by gentle nature, ſometime by his graue counſell & aduice: ſo as the reaſon thereof tooke ſo deepe roote in him, and did ſo pierce his heart, that many times the teares ranne downe his cheekes. Another time alſo being caried away with the enticement of flatterers, that held vp his humour with all pleaſure and delights, he ſtole away from Socrates, and made him run after him to fetch him againe, as if he had bene a ſlaue that had runne away from his maſters houſe: for Alcibiades ſtood in awe of no man but Socrates onely, and indeed he did reuerence him, and did diſpiſe all other. And therefore Cleantes was wont to ſay, that Alcibiades was held of Socrates by the eares: but that he gaue his other louers hold, which Socrates neuer ſought for, for to ſay truly, Alcibiades was much giuen ouer to luſt and pleaſure. And peraduenture it was that Thucydides meant of him, when he wrote that he was incontinent of body, and diſſolute of life. Thoſe that marred Alcibiades quite, did ſtill pricke forward his ambition and deſire of honour, and did put him in the head to thruſt himſelf into great matters betimes, making him beleeue that if he did but once begin to ſhew himſelfe to deale in matters of ſtate, he would not only blemiſh and deface all other gouernours, but farre excell Pericles, in authority and power among the GRECIANS. For like as iron by fire is made ſoft, to be wrought in any forme, and by cold alſo is ſhut and hardened againe: euen ſo Alcibiades being puffed vp with vanity and opinion of himſelfe, as oft as Socrates tooke him in hand, was made faſt and firme againe by his good perſwaſions, in ſo much that when he ſaw his owne fault and folly, and how far wide he had ſtrayed from vertue, he became ſuddenly very humble and lowly againe. Now on a time when he was growne to mans ſtate, he went into a grammer ſchoole, and asked the ſchoolemaſter for one of Homers bookes. The ſchoolemaſter anſwered him, He had none of them: Alcibiades vp with his fiſt and gaue him a good boxe on the eare, and went his way. Annother grammarian told him on a time he had Homer which he had corrected. Alcibiades replied, Why, what meaneſt thou, to ſtand teaching litle children their abce, when thou art able to correct Homer, and to teach yong men not boyes? Another time he came and knocked at Pericles gate, deſirous to ſpeake with him: anſwer was made him, He was not at leyſure now; for that he was buſily occupied by himſelfe, thinking on his reckonings he had to make with the ATHENIANS. Why, ſaid he, going his way it were better he were occupied, thinking how to make no account at all. Moreouer, being but a young boy, he was at the iourney of POTIDÆA, where he lay ſtill with Socrates, who would neuer let him be from him in all battels and skirmiſhes he was in: among which there was one very hote and bloudy, where they both fought valiantly, and Alcibiades was hurt. But Socrates ſtepped before him, and did defend him ſo valiantly before them all, that he ſaued him and his weapon out of the enemies hand, So the honor of this fight out of doubt, in equity and reaſon, was due vnto Socrates: but yet the captaines would faine haue iudged it on Alcibiades ſide, becauſe he was of a noble houſe. But Socrates becauſe he would increaſe his deſire of honour, and would pricke him forward to honeſt and commendable things, was the very firſt that witneſſed Alcibiades had deſerued it: and therefore prayed the captaines to iudge him the crowne and compleate armor. Afterwards, in the battel of DELION, the ATHENIANS hauing receiued the ouerthrow, Socrates retired with a few other on foot. Alcibiades being on horſe back, and ouertaking him, would not go from him, but kept him company, and defended him againſt a troupe of his enemies that followed him, and ſlew many of his company. But that was a prety while after, and before he gaue a box on the eare vnto Hipponicus, Callias father: who was one of the greateſt men of power in the city, being a noble man borne, & of great poſſeſſions; which was done vpon a brauery & certain luſtineſſe, as hauing laid a wager with his companions he would do it, and for no malice or quarrell that he bare the man. This light part was ſtraight ouer al the city, and euery one that heard it, ſaid it was lewdly done. But Alcibiades the next morning went to his houſe, and knocking at his gate was let in: ſo he ſtripping himſelfe before him, deliuered him his body to be whipped, and puniſhed at his pleaſure. Hipponicus pardoned him, and was friends with him, and gaue him his daughter Hipparete afterwards in mariage. Howbeit ſome ſay, it was not Hipponicus that gaue her to him, but Callias ſonne with ten talents of gold with her. Afterwards at the birth of the firſt child he had by her, he asked ten talents more, ſaying: they were promiſed him vpon the contract, if his wife had children. But Callias fearing leſt this was an occaſion ſought of him to lye in waite to kill him for his goods: declared openly to the people, that he made him his heire generall, if he died without heires ſpeciall of his body. This gentlewoman Hipparete being an honeſt honeſt true wife to Alcibiades, miſliking her husband did ſo much miſuſe her, as to entertaine cõmon light ſtrumpets, aſwel citizens or ſtrãgers: ſhe went abroad one day to her brothers houſe, & told him of it. Alcibiades paſſed not for it, & made no further reckoning of the matter: but only bade his wife, if ſhe would, preſent her cauſe of diuorce before the Iudge. So ſhe went thither her ſelfe, to ſue the diuorce between them, according to the law: but Alcibiades being there alſo, tooke her by the hand, & caried her through the market place home to his houſe, & no man durſt meddle between them, to take her from him. And ſo ſhe continued with him all the dayes of her life, which was not long after: for ſhe died, when Alcibiades was in his iourny he made to EPHESVS. This force Alcibiades vſed, was not thought altogether vnlawfull, nor vnciuil, becauſe it ſeemeth that the law was grounded vpon this cauſe: that the wife which would be diuorced from her husband, ſhold go her ſelfe openly before the Iudge to put vp her complaint, to the end, that by this meanes, the husband might come to ſpeake with his wife, and ſeeke to ſtay her if he could. Alcibiades had a maruellous faire great dog, that coſt him threeſcore and ten minas, and he cut off his taile that was his chiefe beauty. When his friends reproued him, and told him how euery man blamed him for it: he fell a laughing, and told them he had that he ſought. For, ſaith he, I would haue the ATHENIANS rather prate vpon that, then they ſhould ſay worſe of me. Moreouer, it is ſaid, the firſt time that Alcibiades ſpake openly in the common weale, and began to deale in matters, was vpõ a gift of mony he gaue vnto the people, and not of any pretence or former purpoſe he had to do it. One day as he came through the market place, hearing the people very loud, he asked what the matter was: they told him it was about mony certain men had giuen to the people. Then Alcibiades went to them, and gaue them mony out of his owne purſe. The people were ſo glad at that, as they fell to ſhouting & clapping of their hands, in token of thankfulneſſe: and himſefe was ſo glad for company, that he forgat a quaile he had vnder his gown, which was ſo afeard of the noiſe, that ſhe tooke her flight away. The people ſeeing the quaile, made a greater noiſe then before, and many roſe out of their places to run after her. ſo that in the end, it was taken vp by a maſter of a ſhip called Antiochus, who brought him the quaile again, & for that cauſe Alcibiades did loue him euer after. Now albeit the nobility of his houſe, his goods, his worthines and the great number of his kinſmen and friends, made his way open to take vpon him gouernment in the cõmonweale: yet the only way he deſired to win the fauor of the cõmon people by, was the grace of his eloquence. To proue he was eloquent, all the comical poets do teſtifie it: & beſides thẽ Demoſthenes the prince of orators alſo doth ſay, in an oratiõ he made againſt Medias, that Alcibiades aboue all other qualities he had, was moſt eloquent. And if we may beleeue Theophraſtus, the greateſt ſearcher of antiquities, and beſt hiſtoriographer aboue any other philoſopher: he hath written, that Alcibiades had as good a wit to deuiſe & conſider what he would ſay, as any man that was in his time. Howbeit ſometimes ſtudying what he ſhould ſay, as alſo to deliuer good words, not hauing them very ready at his tongs end, he many times tooke breath by the way, and pauſed in the middeſt of his tale, not ſpeaking a word, vntil he had called it to mind that he would ſay. His charge was great, & much ſpoken of alſo, for keeping of running horſes at games: not only becauſe they were the beſt and ſwifteſt, but for the number of coaches he had beſides. For neuer priuate perſon, no nor any Prince, did euer ſend ſeauen ſo well appointed coaches, in all furniture vnto the games Olympicall, as he did: nor that at one courſe hath borne away the firſt, the ſecond, and the fourth priſe, as Thucydides ſaith: or as Euripides reporteth, the third. For in that game, he excelled all men in honour and name, that euer ſtriued for victorie therein. For Euripides pronounced his praiſe, in a ſong he made of him; as followeth:

Hipparete ſueth to be diuorced from Alcibiades.

Alcibiades great dog.

Alcibiades largeſſe.

Alcibiades coming into the common wealth.

Alcibiades maruellous eloquent.

Alcibiades wit and imperfection.

Alcibiades victory at the games Olympicall.

O ſonne of Clinias, I will reſound thy praiſe:
For thou art bold in martiall deeds, and ouercom'ſt alwayes.
Thy victories therewith, do farre exceed the reſt,
That euer were in Greece ygot, therefore I count them beſt.
For at th'Olympicke games, thou haſt with chariots wonne
The firſt priſe, ſecond, third and all, which there in race were runne.
With praiſe and little paine, thy head hath twiſe bene crownd,
With oliue boughs for victory, and twiſe by trumpets ſound,
The Heraulds haue proclaim'd thee victor by thy name:
Aboue all thoſe which ranne with thee, in hope to get the game.

Howbeit the good affectiõ diuers cities did beare him, cõtending which ſhold gratifie him beſt, did much increaſe his fame & honor. For the EPHESIANS did ſet vp a tent for him, very ſumptuouſly and richly furniſhed. Thoſe of the city of CHIO, furniſhed him with prouender for his horſe, & gaue him muttons beſides, & other beaſts to ſacrifice withal. They of LESBOS alſo ſent him in wine & other prouiſion of victuals, to helpe him to defray the great charges he was at in keeping open houſe, & feeding ſuch a number of mouths daily. Yet the ſpite they did beare him or rather his breach of promiſe which he often made, with this magnificence & ſtate he ſhewed, gaue the people more cauſe to ſpeak of him then before. For they ſay, there was one Diomedes at ATHENS a friend of Alcibiades, and no ill man, who deſired once in his life to win a game at the playes olympical. This mã being enformed that the ARGIVES had a coach excellẽtly furniſhed, belõging to the cõmonweale, & knowing that Alcibiades could do very much in the city of ARGOS, becauſe he had many friends in the ſame: he came to intreat Alcibiades to buy this coach for him. Alcibiades therupon bought it, but kept it to himſelf, not regarding Diomedes requeſt he had made. Diomedes ſeeing that, fel ſtarke mad for anger, and called the gods & men to witneſſe, that Alcibiades did him open wrong: and it ſeemeth, that there fell out ſute in law vpon the ſame. For Iſocrates wrote an oration, and drew a plea in defence of Alcibiades, being yet but a child, touching a couple of horſes: yet in this plea his aduerſary was called Tiſias, & not Diomedes. Furthermore, Alcibiades being yet but a yong man, when he came to practiſe and pleade publickly, he put all other orators to ſilence, but only two that were euer againſt him: the one was Phæax the ſon of Eraſiſtratus, & the other Nicias the ſon of Niceratus. Of theſe two, Nicias was a man growne, and had won the name and repuration of a good captaine. And Phæax began alſo to come forward as he did, being of a good and honourable houſe: but he lacked many things, and among other, eloquence ſpecially. For, he could more properly talke & diſcourſe among his friends priuatly, thẽ he had any good grace to open a matter openly before the people. For he had, as Eupolis ſaith:

Alcibiades a breaker of promiſe.

Alcibiades aduerſaries in the commonweal th when hee came to pleade.

Phæax lacked eloquence.

Words enow, but no eloquence.

There is a certaine oration extant in writing againſt Alcibiades & Phæax: where among other accuſatiõs is brought in, how Alcibiades was ordinarily ſerued in his houſe, with gold & ſiluer plate that belongeth to the cõmonweale, and which were vſed to be borne for ſtate & magnificence, in ſolemne proceſſions before them, and how he vſed them as boldly, as if they had bin his own. Now there was one Hiperbolus in ATHENS at that time, borne in the village of PERITHOIDE: of whom Thucydides maketh mention, as of a naughty wicked man, ſeruing as a fit ſubiect and matter to all the taunts and mockes of the comical poets of that time: but he was ſo impudent a perſon, and cared ſo litle what men ſaid of him, that he paſſed not though he were defamed, neither did any thing grieue him, whatſoeuer they reported of him: which ſome do call boldnes and courage, being no better indeed then plaine impudency, extreme madneſſe, and deſperate folly. He would neuer pleaſe any man: and if the common people had any grudge to any noble man or magiſtrate, whom they would any way accuſe, Hyperbolus wicked tongue was their inſtrument to vtter their ſpite. Now the people (by Hyperbolus procurement) being aſſembled, were ready to proceed to the baniſhmẽt of Oſtraciſmon by moſt voices. The maner and cuſtome of this kinde of baniſhment was for a time to baniſh out of their city ſuch a one, as ſeemed to haue too great authority and credit in the city: and that was, rather to ſatisfie their enuy, then for to remedy their feare. And becauſe it was manifeſt it would fall out to one of them three to be baniſhed (to wit Alcibiades, Nicias, or Phæax) Alcibiades found meanes to ioyne all their three factions in one, becoming friends one to another: and hauing conferred with Nicias about it, he made Hyperbolus ſelfe to be baniſhed, who was the chiefe inſtrument to prepare the way of their baniſhment. Howbeit others ſay, he ſpake not with Nicias about it, but with Phæax, and ioyning his part with Phæax, he cauſed Hyperbolus to be baniſhed, who fearing nothing leſſe: for it was neuer ſeene before, that a man of meane countenance, and of ſmall authority, fell into the hap of this baniſhment: as Plato the comicall poet teſtifieth, ſpeaking of Hyperbolus:

The maner of the puniſhment by the Oſtraciſmon.

Hyperbolus baniſhed for tenne yeares.

Although for his deſert, this paine to him is due,
Or greater puniſhment prepar'd, the which might make him rue:
Yet ſince he was by birth, a perſon meane and baſe,
Such puniſhment therefore did ſeeme (for him) too great of grace.
Since Oſtraciſmon was, not made at firſt to be,
Nor yet deuiſd as puniſhment, for ſuch meane folke as he.

But of this matter we haue ſpoken more at large before: and now to returne again to Alcibiades.

Nicias

Nicias had great reputation among ſtrangers, and his enemies grieued at it no leſſe ; then at the honour the citizens ſelues did vnto him. For his houſe was the common Inne for all LACEDÆMONIANS when they came to ATHENS, and they euer lay with him: moreouer he had very well entertained the LACEDÆMON priſoners that were taken at the fort of PYLE. And afterwards when peace was concluded betweene LACEDÆMON and ATHENS, and their priſoners deliuered home again by Nicias meanes only and procurement, they loued him more then euer they did before. This was blown abroad through GREECE, that Pericles had kindled the wars amongſt them, and Nicias had quenched it: ſo ſome called this peace Nicium, as one would ſay, Nicias worke. But Alcibiades ſtomaking this, and enuying Nicias glory, determined to breake the peace whatſoeuer came of it. Wherfore to cõpaſſe this matter, knowing firſt of all that the ARGIVES had no liking to the LACEDÆMONIANS, but were their mortall enemies, and that they did but ſeeke matter to fall out with them: he ſecretly put them in hope of peace and league with the ATHENIANS. Moreouer he did perſwade them to it, both by letters and words of mouth, ſpeaking with the magiſtrates, and ſuch as had greateſt authority and credit among the people: declaring vnto them, that they ſhould not feare the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yeeld to thẽ at all, but to ſticke to the ATHENIANS, who would ſoone repent them of the peace they had made, and break it with thẽ. Afterwards when the LACEDÆMONIANS had made league with the BOEOTIANS, and had redeliuered the city of PANACTVM to the ATHENIANS, all defaced and ſpoyled, contrary to the league: Alcibiades perceiuing how the people were much offended thereat, made them more earneſt againſt them, and therewithall brought Nicias in diſgrace with the people & charged him with many matters of great likelihood, as at that time when he was General: that he would neuer take any of the LACEDÆMONIANS, when they were ſhut vp within the Ile of SPHACTERIA, and much leſſe diſtreſſe them when he might: and moreouer when other had taken them priſoners by force, that he had found the meanes to deliuer them, & ſend them home againe, to gratifie the LACEDÆMONIANS. Furthermore, that being their friend, he did not his duty to diſſwade the people from making of league offenſiue and defenſiue with the BOEOTIANS and the CORINTHIANS: and again alſo, if there were any people of GREECE that had a deſire to become friends & allies with the ATHENIANS, that he did the beſt he could to let them, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had no liking of the matter. Now as Nicias was thus in diſgrace with the people, for the cauſes aboueſaid: in the middeſt of this ſtir, ambaſſadours came by chance from LACEDÆMON to ATHENS, who at their coming gaue very good words, ſaying they had full power & commiſſion to compound all controuerſies, vnder reaſonable and equal conditions. The Senate heard them, and receiued them curteouſly, & the people the next day ſhould aſſemble in counſell to giue them audience: which Alcibiades fearing much, he went to labor the ambaſſadors, & ſpake with them apart in this ſort. What meane you, my Lords of SPARTA: do ye not know that the Senate hath alwaies accuſtomed to be gracious and fauourable vnto thoſe that ſue vnto them for any matter, and that the people contrarily are of a proud nature, and deſirous to imbrace all great matters? If therfore at the firſt ſight, ye do giue them to vnderſtand that you are come hither with full power, to treat freely with them in all maner of cauſes: do you not thinke that they will make you ſtretch your authority, to grant them all that they will demand? Therefore, my Lords ambaſſadors, if you look for indifferency at the ATHENIANS hands, and that they ſhall not preaſe you too farre againſt your wils, to grant them any thing of aduantage: I would wiſh you a litle to couer your full commiſſion, and in open maner to propound certain articles, and reaſonable capitulations of peace, not acquainting them otherwiſe with your full power to agree in all things: and for my part, I will aſſure you of my goodwill in fauour of the LACEDÆMONIANS. When he had told them this tale, he gaue them his faithfull promiſe, and vowed as it were to performe his word. Hereupon Alcibiades turned the ambaſſadors from the truſt they repoſed in Nicias, and wanne them on his ſide: in ſo much as they gaue credit to no man but to him, wondering much at his great wiſdome and ready wit, and they thought him a rare and notable man. The next morning the people were aſſembled to giue the ambaſſadors audience. They were ſent for, and brought into the market place. There Alcibiades gently asked them, what was the cauſe of their coming. They anſwered: that they were come to treate of peace, but they had no power to determine any thing. Then began Alcibiades to be angry with them, as if they had done him wrong, and not he any to them: calling them vnfaithful, vnconſtant, and fickle men, that were come neither to do, nor ſay any thing worth the hearing.

Nicias peace.

Alcibiades breaketh the peace of the Grecians.

Alcibiades beguileth the Lacedæmonians.

The Senate alſo were offended with them, and the people rated them very roughly: whereat Nicias was ſo aſhamed and amazed withall, that he could not tell what to ſay, to ſee ſo ſudden a change, knowing nothing of Alcibiades malice and ſubtell practiſe with the ambaſſadors. So the ambaſſadors of LACEDÆMON were diſpatched without any thing done, and Alcibiades choſen General: who preſently brought the ARGIVES, the ELIANS, & the MANTINEANS in league with the ATHENIANS. Though no man did commend this practiſe of his, in working it after this ſort: yea it was a maruellous thing of him to deuiſe to put all PELOPONNESVS in armes, and to procure ſuch a number of ſouldiers againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he did before the city of MANTINEA, and to ſhift off the miſeries of war and hazard of battel ſo farre from ATHENS. Which if the LACEDÆMONIANS did win, could not profite them much: and if they loſt it, they could hardly ſaue their city of SPARTA. After this battell of MANTINEA, the thouſand men whom the city by an ancient order did keepe continually in pay, aſwell in peace as in war, within the city of ARGOS, thinking now oportunity ſerued them very trimly: attempted to take the ſoueraigne authority from the common people, and to make themſelues Lords of the city. And to bring this to paſſe, the LACEDÆMONIANS coming in the meane time, did aide them in their purpoſe, and ſo did put downe the gouernment of the people: notwithſtanding immediatly after the people tooke armes againe, and became the ſtronger. Alcibiades coming thither euen at that time, did warrant them the victorie, and to ſet vp againe the authority of the people. Then he perſwaded them to make their wals longer to ioyne the city to the ſea, to the end they might more eaſily be aided by ſea, by the ATHENIANS. He brought them alſo from ATHENS, many carpenters, maſons, ſtone-hewers, & other workmen: and to conclude, he ſhewed them by all the meanes and waies he could, that he did beare goodwill vnto them, and thereby wan himſelfe no leſſe fauour particularly among them, then generally he did good vnto his country. He did perſwade alſo his citizens of PATRAS to ioyne their towne to the ſea, by making long wals, which they built out euen to the cliffes of the ſea. And when one ſaid vnto them, alas, poore people of PATRAS, what do you meane? the ATHENIANS will eat you out: Alcibiades anſwered him, it may wel be, but it ſhal be by litle & litle, beginning firſt at the feet: but the LACEDÆMONIANS will deuoure you all at once, & begin at the head. Now although Alcibiades did make the city of ATHENS ſtrong by ſea, yet he did not leaue to perſwade the ATHENIANS alſo to make themſelues ſtrong by land. For he did put the young men oftentimes in mind of the oath they were made to ſweare in AGRAVLOS, and did aduiſe them to accompliſh it indeed. Which was, that they ſhould take all corne-fields, vines, & oliue-trees, to be the borders & confines of ATTICA, whereby they were taught to reckon all land theirs, that was manured and did bring forth fruit. Yet with all theſe goodly deeds and faire words of Alcibiades, and with this great courage and quicknes of vnderſtanding, he had many great faults & imperfections. For he was too dainty in his fare, wanton only giuen vnto light women, riotous in banquets, vaine & womaniſh in apparell: he ware euer a long purple gown that ſwept the market place as he walked vp and down, it had ſuch a traine, and was too rich and coſtly for him to weare. And following theſe vaine pleaſures and delights, when he was in his galley, he cauſed the planks of the poope thereof to be cut and broken vp, that he might lie the ſofter: for his bed was not laid vpon the ouerlop, but laid vpon girthes ſtrained ouer the hole, cut out and faſtened to the ſides, and he caried to the warres with him a gilded ſcutchion, wherein he had no cognizance, nor ordinary deuice of the ATHENIANS, but only had the image of Cupid in it, holding lightning in his hand. The noblemen, and beſt citizens of ATHENS perceiuing this, they hated his faſhions and conditions, & were much offended at him, and were afraid withall of his raſhneſſe and inſolency: he did ſo contemne the lawes and cuſtomes of their country, being manifeſt tokens of a man that aſpired to be king, & would ſubuert and turne all ouer-hand. And as for the goodwill of the common people towards him, the Poet Ariſtophanes doth plainely expreſſe it in theſe words:

Alcibiades choſen generall.

The walles brought to the ſea by the Argiues

Alcibiades eye.

The people moſt deſire, what moſt they hate to haue:
And what their minds abhorres, euen that they ſeeme to craue.

And in another place he ſaid alſo, aggrauating the ſuſpition they had of him:

For ſtate or common weale, much better ſhould it be,
To keepe within the country, none ſuch lyons lookes as he:
But if they needs will keepe, a lyon to their coſt,
Then muſt they needs obey his will, for he will rule the roſt.

For

For to ſay truly: his courteſies, his liberalities, and noble expences to ſhew the people ſo great pleaſure and paſtime as nothing cou'd be more: the glorious memory of his auncеſtors, the grace of his eloquence, the beauty of his perſon, the ſtrength and valiantneſſe of his body, ioyned together with his wiſdome and experience in martiall affaires: were the very cauſes that made them to beare with him in all things, and that the ATHENIANS did patiently endure all his light parts, and did couer his faults, with the beſt words and termes they could, calling them youthfull, & gentlemens ſports. As when he kept Agartharcus the painter priſoner in his houſe by force, vntill he had painted all his wals within: and when he had done, did let him go, and rewarded him very honeſtly for his paines. Againe, when he gaue a boxe on the eare to Taureas, who did pay the whole charges of a company of common players, in ſpite of him, to carie away the honour of the games. Alſo when he tooke away a yong woman of MELIA by his authority that was taken among certaine priſoners in the warres, and kept her for his concubine: by whom he had a child, which he cauſed to be brought vp: which they called a worke of charitie, albeit afterwards they burthened him, that he was the only cauſe of murdering of the poore MELIANS, ſauing the litle children, becauſe he had fauoured and perſwaded that vnnaturall and wicked decree, which another had propounded. Likewiſe where one Ariſtophon a painter, had painted a curtiſan named Nemea, holding Alcibiades in her armes, and ſitting in her lap, which all the people ranne to ſee, and tooke great pleaſure to behold it: the graue and ancient men were angry at theſe fooliſh parts, accounting them impudent things, and done againſt all ciuill modeſtie and temperancy. Wherefore it ſeemed Archeſtratus words was ſpoken to good purpoſe, when he ſaid: that GREECE could not abide two Alcibiades at once. And on a day as he came from the councell and aſſembly of the city, where he had made an excellent oration, to the great good liking and acceptation of all the hearers, and by means therof had obtained the thing he deſired, and was accompanied with a great traine that followed him to his honour: Timon ſurnamed Miſantropos (as who would ſay, Loup-garou, or the man-hater) meeting Alcibiades thus accompanied, did not paſſe by him, nor gaue him way (as he was wont to do all other men) but went ſtraight to him, and tooke him by the hand, and ſaid: O, thou doſt well my ſonne, I can thee thanke, that thou goeſt on, and climeſt vp ſtill: for if euer thou be in authority, wo be vnto thoſe that follow thee, for they are vtterly vndone. When they heard theſe words, thoſe that ſtood by fell a laughing: other reuiled Timon, other againe marked well his words, and thought of them many a time after: ſuch ſundry opinions they had of him for the vnconſtancy of his life, and waiwardneſſe of his nature and conditions. Now for the taking of SICILE, the ATHENIANS did maruellouſly couet it in Pericles life, but yet they did not meddle withall, vntill after his death: and then they did it at the firſt vnder colour of friendſhip, as ayding thoſe cities which were oppreſſed and ſpoiled by the SYRACVSANS. This was in manner a plaine bridge made, to paſſe afterwards a greater power and army thither. Howbeit the only procurer of the ATHENIANS, and perſwader of them, to ſend ſmall companies thither no more, but to enter with a great army at once to conquer all the countrey together, was Alcibiades, who had ſo allured the people with his pleaſant tongue, that vpon his perſwaſiō, they built caſtles in the aire, and thought to do greater wonders by winning onely of SICILIA. For where other did ſet their minds vpon the conqueſt of SICILE, being that they onely hoped after: it was to Alcibiades, but a beginning of further enterpriſes. And where Nicias commonly in all his perſwaſions, did turne the ATHENIANS from their purpoſe to make warres againſt the SYRACVSANS, as being too great a matter for them to take the city of SYRACVSA: Alcibiades againe had a further reach in his head, to go conquer LYBIA, and CARTHAGE, and that being conquered, to paſſe from thence into ITALY, and ſo to PELOPONNESVS: ſo that SICILIA ſhould ſerue but to furniſh them with victuals, and to pay the ſouldiers for their conqueſts which he had imagined. Thus the yong men were incontinently caried away with a maruellous hope and opiniō of this iourny, and gaue good eare to old mens tales that told them wonders of the countries: inſomuch as there was no other paſtime nor exerciſe among the youth in their meetings, but companies of men to ſit round together, draw plats of SICILE, and deſcribe the ſituation of LYBIA & CARTHAGE. And yet they ſay, that neither Socrates the Phyloſopher, nor Meton the Aſtronomer did euer hope to ſee any good ſucceſſe of this iourny. For the one by the reuealing of his familiar ſpirit, who told him al things to come, as was thought, had no great opinion of it: and Meton, whether it was for feare of the ſucceſſe of the iourney he had by reaſon, or that he knew by diui-nation of his art what would follow, he counterfeited the mad man, & holding a burning torch in his hand, made as though he would haue set his house on fire. Other say, that he did not counterfeit, but like a mad man indeed did set his house on fire one night, & that the next morning betimes he went into the market place to pray the people, that in consideration of his great losse & his grieuous calamity so late happened him, it would please them to discharge his son from going this voyage. So by this mad deuice, he obtained his request of the people for his son, whom he abused much. But Nicias against his will was chosen captaine, to take charge of men in these wars: who misliked this iourney, aswell for his companion and associate in the charge of these wars, as for other misfortunes he foresaw therein. Howbeit the ATHENIANS thought the war would fall out well, if they did not commit it wholly to Alcibiades rashnesse and hardinesse, but did ioyne with him the wisdome of Nicias: and appointed Lamachus also for their third captaine, who they sent thither, though he were waxen now somewhat old, as one that had shewed himselfe no lesse venterous and hardy in some battels, then Alcibiades himselfe. Now when they came to resolue of the number of souldiers, the furniture and order of these wars Nicias sought crookedly to thwart this iourney, and to breake it off altogether: but Alcibiades withstood him, and got the better hand of him. There was an orator called Demostratus, who moued the people also that the captaines whom they had chosen for these wars, might haue full power and authority to leauie men at their discretion, and to make such preparation as they thought good: whereunto the people condiscended, and did authorise them. But when they were euen ready to go their way, many signes of ill successe lighted in the necke one of another: and amongst the rest this was one; That they were commanded to take ship on the day of the celebration of the feast of Adonis, on the which the custome is, that women do set vp in diuerse places of the city, in the midst of the streets, images like to dead corses which they cary to burial, and they represent the mourning and lamentations made at the funerals of the dead, with blubbering and beating themselues, in token of the sorrow the goddesse Venus made, for the death of her friend Adonis.

Images hewne and mangled at Athens

Moreouer, the Hermes (which are the images of Mercury, and were wont to be set vp in euery lane and streete) were found in a night all hacked and hewed, and mangled, specially in their faces: which put diuerse in great feare and trouble, yea euen those that made no account of such toyes. Wherupon it was alleadged, that it might be the CORINTHIANS that did it, or procured that leud act to be done, fauouring the SYRACVSANS, who were their neere kinsemen, and had bin the first founders of them; imagining vpon this ill token, it might be a cause to breake off the enterprise, and to make the people repent them, that they had taken this warre in hand. Neuertheless, the people would not allow this excuse, neither hearken to their words that said, they should not reckon of any such signes or tokens, & that they were but some light brained youths, that being tipled, had played this shamefull part in their brauery, or for sport. But for all these reasons, they took these signes very grieuously, & were indeed not a litle afeard, as thinking vndoubtedly that no man durst haue bene so bold to haue done such an abhominable fact, but that there was some conspiracy in the matter. Hereupon they looked vpon euery suspition and coniecture that might be (how litle or vnlikely soeuer it were) and that very seuerely: and both Senate and people also met in councell vpon it, very oft in few dayes. Now whilest they were busily searching out the matter, Androcles a common counseller, and Oratour in the commonwealth, brought before the councell certaine slaues and strangers that dwelt in ATHENS: who deposed, that Alcibiades, and other of his friends and companions, had hacked and mangled other images after that sort, and in a mockery had counterfeited also in a banket that he made, the ceremonies of the holy mysteries; declaring these matters particularly: How one Theodorus counterfeited the herald, that was wont to make the proclamations: Polytion the torch-bearer, and Alcibiades the priest, who sheweth the holy signes and mysteries: and that his other companions were the assistants, as those that make suit to be receiued into their religion and order, and into the brotherhood of their holy mysteries, whom for this cause they call Mystes. These very words are written in the accusation Thessalus (Cimons son) made against Alcibiades, charging him that he had wickedly mocked the two goddesses, Ceres and Proserpina. Whereat the people being maruellously moued and offended, and the Oratour Androcles his mortall enemy, aggrauating and stirring them vp the more against him: Alcibiades a litle at the first beganne to be amazed at it. But afterwards, hearing that the mariners which were prepared for the voyage of SICILIA, and the souldiers also that were gathered, did beare him great goodwill and specially cially how the aide, that came frō ARGOS, and MANTINEA (being a thousand footmen well armed and appointed) did say openly, how it was for Alcibiades sake they did take vpon them so long a voyage beyond sea, and that if they went about to do him any hurt or wrong, they would presently returne home againe frō whence they came: he began to be of a good courage again, and determined with this good fauourable oportunitie of time, to come before the councell, to answer to all such articles and accusations as should be laid against him. Thereupon his enemies were a litle cooled, fearing lest the people in this iudgement would haue shewed him more fauour, becausе they stood in need of him. Wherefore to preuent this danger, they had fed other Orators, who set a good face on the matter, as they had bene Alcibiades friends, and yet they wished him no lesse euill, then the rankest enemies he had. These fine fellowes rose vp in open assembly and said: it was no reason, that he that was now chosen one of the Generals of so mighty and puissant an army (being ready to hoise saile, and the aide also of their allies and friends) should be driuen to stay now, and to lose time and occasion of well doing, whilest they should go about to choose Iudges, and appoint him his houres and time of answer. Therefore they said, it was fit he should take his iourney betimes, and when warres were done, that he should present himselfe to require iustice, and to purge himselfe of such matters as should be obiected against him. But Alcibiades smelling straight their fetch, and perceiuing the practise of his stay, stept vp, and declared how they did him great wrong, to make him depart with the charge of a Generall of so great an army, his mind being troubled with continuall feare of so grieuous curses, as he should leaue vpon him: and that he deserued death, if he could not purge and iustifie himselfe of all the vniust and surmized accusations against him. And if he had once cleared himself of all things, and had published his innocency, he should then haue nothing in his head to trouble him, nor to thinke vpon, but to go on lustily to fight with his enemies, and to cast behind him the danger of all his slanderous detractors. But all this could not perswade them. And so he was presently commanded in the behalfe of the people, to imbarke and ship away his men. Thus he was compelled to take the seas with his other companions, hauing in their nauie about a hundred and forty galleyes, all hauing three owers to a banck: and fiue thousand one hundred footmen, very well armed and appointed, and throwers with slings, archers, and other light armed men to the number of thirteene hundred, sufficiently furnished of all warlike and necessary munition. Now after they were ariued on the coast of ITALY, they landed in the city of RHEGIO: where, holding councel in what sort they should direct these wars, it was resolued in the end that they should straight go vnto SICILIA. This opinion was followed, although Nicias did contrarie it, when Lamachus gaue his consent thereunto, and at his first coming, he was the occasion of winning the city of CATHANA. But he neuer after did any exploite, for he was called home immediatly by the ATHENIANS, to come and answer certaine accusations laid to his charge. For as we told you before, there was at the beginning certaine light suspitions and accusations put vp against him, by some slaues and strangers. But afterwards when he was gone, his enemies enforced them, and burthened him more cruelly, adding to his former fault, that he had broken the images of Mercury: and had committed sacriledge, in counterfeiting in ieast & mockery the holy ceremonies of the mysteries: and blew into the eares of the people, that both the one and the other proceeded of one set conspiracy, to change and alter the gouernement of the state of the city. Vpon these informations, the people tooke it in so ill part, that they cōmitted all to prison, that were in any sort accused or suspected thereof, and would neuer let them come to their answer: and moreouer did much repent them that they had not condemned Alcibiades, vpon so great complaints and informations as were exhibited against him, while his offence was in question before them, and the furie and hatred of the people was such towards him, that if any of Alcibiades friends and acquaintance came within their danger, they were the worse handled for his sake. Thucydides did not name his accusers, but some other do name Dioclides and Teucer: amongst whom Phrynicus the comicall poet is one, who discouereth it in his verses, by bringing in one that speaketh to the image of Mercury:

The craft of Alcibiades enemies.

Alcibiades iourney into Sicile.

Phrynicus the Comicall Poet.

My good friend Mercury, I pray thee take good heed,
That thou fall not and breake thy necke: for so thou mightst me breed Both danger and distrust, and though I guiltlesse be,
Some Diocles falsely might accuse and trouble me.

Mercury answereth:

Take thou no thought for me, my ſelfe I ſhall well ſaue:
And will foreſee full well therewith, that Teucer (that falſe knaue)
Shall not the money get, which he by law hath wonne,
For his promoters bribing part and accuſation.

And yet for all this, theſe tokens do ſhew no certaintie of any thing. For one of them being asked, how he could know them by their faces in the night, that had broken and defaced theſe images? he anſwered, that he knew them well enough by the brightneſſe of the Moone. And hereby it appeareth plainely that he was periured, becauſe that the ſame night, on the which this fact was committed, there was a coniunction of the Moon. This did a litle trouble and ſtay men of iudgement: howbeit the common ſort of people this notwithſtanding, did not leaue to be as ſharpe ſet, to receiue all accuſations and informations that were brought in againſt him, as euer they were before. Now there was among the priſoners whoſe cauſe was hanging before them, the Orator Andocides (whom Hellanicus the hiſtoriographer deſcribeth to deſcend of the race of Viſſes) whom they tooke to be a man that hated the gouernment of the common people, & bent altogether to fauor the ſmall number of the nobility. But one of the chiefeſt occaſions why he was ſuſpected to be one of them that had broken the images, was: for that hard by his houſe there was a faire great image ſet vp in old time by the family or tribe of the Ægides, and that alone amongſt all the reſt of ſo many famous images, was left whole and vnbroken: wherupon it is called at this day, the Mercury of Andocides, and is ſo called generally of euery body, albeit the inſcription ſheweth the contrary. Andocides being in priſon, chanced to fall in acquaintance with one Timæus, with whom he was more familiar then with all the reſt, who was alſo priſoner with him for the ſelfe cauſe. This Timæus was a man not ſo well knowne as he, but beſides, a wiſe man, and very hardy. He perſwaded him, and put into his head, that he ſhould accuſe himſelfe, and certaine other with him: for taking the matter vpon him, and confeſſing it, he ſhould receiue grace and pardon, according to the courſe and promiſe of the law: where contrarily, if he ſhould ſtand vpon the courteſie of the Iudges ſentence, he might eaſily endanger himſelfe: becauſe iudgements in ſuch caſes are vncertaine to all people, and moſt to be doubted and feared toward the rich. And therefore he told him, it were his beſt way, if he looked into the matter wiſely, by lying to ſaue his life, rather then to ſuffer death with ſhame, and to be condemned vpon this falſe accuſation. Alſo he ſaid, if he would haue regard to the commonweal th, that it ſhould in like caſe be wiſely done of him, to put in danger a few of thoſe (which ſtood doubtfull whether in troth they were any of them or not) to ſaue from the furie of the people, and terrour of death, many honeſt men, who indeed were innocent of this lewd fact. Timæus words and perſwaſions wrought ſuch effect with Andocides, that they made him yeeld vnto them, and brought him to accuſe himſelfe, and certaine other with him: by meanes whereof Andocides according to the law had his pardon: but all ſuch as he named and accuſed, were euery man put to death, ſauing ſuch as ſaued themſelues by running away. Furthermore, to ſhadow his accuſation with ſome apparance of troth, Andocides among thoſe that were accuſed, did accuſe alſo certaine of his owne ſeruants. Now though the people had no more occaſion to occupie their buſie heads about the breakers of theſe images, yet was not their malice thus appeaſed againſt Alcibiades, vntill they ſent the galley called Salaminiana, commanding thoſe they ſent by a ſpeciall commiſſion to ſeeke him out, in no caſe to attempt to take him by force, nor to lay hold on him by violence: but to vſe him with all the good words and courteous maner that they poſſibly could, and to will him only to appeare in perſon before the people, to anſwer to certaine accuſations put vp againſt him. If otherwiſe they ſhould haue vſed force, they feared much leſt the army would haue mutined on his behalf within the country of their enemies, and that there would haue growne ſome ſedition amongſt their ſouldiers. This might Alcibiades haue eaſily done, if he had bene diſpoſed: for the ſouldiers were very ſory to ſee him depart, perceiuing that the warres ſhould be drawne out now in length, and be much prolonged vnder Nicias, ſeeing Alcibiades was taken from them, who was the only ſpurre that pricked Nicias forward to do any ſeruice: and that Lamachus alſo, though he were a valiant man of his hands, yet he lacked honour and authority in the army, becauſe he was but a meane man borne, and poore beſides. Now Alcibiades for a farewell, diſappointed the ATHENIANS of winning the city of MESSINA: for they hauing intelligence by certaine priuate perſons within the city, that it would yeeld vp into their hand, Alcibiades knowing them very well by their names, bewrayed them vnto thoſe that that were the SYRACVSANS friends: wherupon all this practise was broken vtterly. Afterwards when he came to the citie of THVRIES, so soone as he had landed, he went and hid himselfe incontinently in such sort, that such as sought for him, could not find him. Yet there was one that knew him where he was, and said: Why, how now Alcibiades, darest thou not trust the iustice of thy country? Yes very well (quoth he) and it were in another matter: but my life standing vpon it, I would not trust mine owne mother, fearing lest negligently she should put in the blacke beane, where she should cast in the white: for by the first, condemnation of death was signified: and by the other, pardon of life. But afterwards, hearing that the ATHENIANS for malice had condemned him to death: well, quoth he, they shall know I am yet aliue. Now the maner of his accusation and inditement framed against him, was found written in this sort: Thessalus the son of Cimon, of the village of LACIADES, hath accused, and doth accuse Alcibiades, the son of Clinias, of the village of SCAMBONIDES, to haue offended against the goddesses, Ceres and Proserpina, counterfeiting in mockery their holy mysteries, and shewing them to his familiar friends in his house, himselfe apparelled and arrayed in a long vestment or cope, like vnto the vestment the priest weareth when he sheweth these holy sacred mysteries: and naming himselfe the priest, Polytion the torch-bearer, and Theodorus of the village of PAYGEA the verger, and the other lookers on brethren, and fellow scorners with them, and all done in manifest contempt and derision of holy ceremonies and mysteries of the Eumolpides, the religious priests and ministers of the sacred temple of the city of ELEVSIN. So Alcibiades for his contempt and not appearing, was condemned, and his goods confiscate. Besides this condemnation, they decreed also, that all the religious priests and women should ban and accurse him, But herunto answered one of the Nuns called Theano, the daughter of Menon, of the village of AGRAVLA, saying that she was professed religious, to pray and to blesse, not to curse and ban. After this most grieuous sentence and condemnation passed against him, Alcibiades departed out of the citie of THVRIES, and went into the countrey of PELOPONNESVS, where he continued a good season in the city of ARGOS. But in the end fearing his enemies, and hauing no hope to returne againe to his owne countrey with any safety: he sent vnto SPARTA to haue safe conduct and licence of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that he might come & dwell in their country, promising them he would do to them more good being now their friend, then he euer did them hurt, while he was their enemie. The LACEDÆMONIANS granted his request, & receiued him very willingly into their city: where euen vpon his first coming, he did three things. The first was: that the LACEDÆMONIANS by his perswasion and procurement, did determine spedily to send aide to the SYRACVSANS whom they had long before delayed: and so they sent Gylippus their captaine to ouerthrow the ATHENIANS army, which they had sent thither. The second thing he did for them, was: that he made them of GREECE to begin war vpon the ATHENIANS. The third, and greatest matter of importance, was: that he did counsel them to fortifie the city of DECELEA, which was within the territories of ATTICA selfe: which consumed, and brought the power of the ATHENIANS lower then any other thing whatsoeuer he could haue done. And if he were welcome, and well esteemed in SPARTA, for the seruice he did to the commonwealth: much more he wan the loue and goodwils of priuate men, for that he liued after the LACONIAN maner. So as they that saw his skin scraped to the flesh, and saw him wash himselfe in cold water, and how he did eat browne bread, and sup of their blacke broth: would haue doubted (or to say better, neuer haue beleeued) that such a man had euer kept cooke in his house, nor that he euer had seene so much as a perfuming pan, or had touched cloth of tissue made at MILETVM. For among other qualities and properties he had (whereof he was full) this as they say was one whereby he most robbed mens harts: that he could frame altogether with their manners and fashions of life transforming himselfe more easily to all maner of shapes, then the Camelion. For it is reported, that the Camelion cannot take white colour: but Alcibiades could put vpon him any maners, customes or fashions, of what nation soeuer, and could follow, exercise, and counterfeit them when he would, as well the good as the bad. For in SPARTA, he was very painefull, and in continuall exercise: he liued sparingly with litle, and led a streight life. In IONIA, to the contrary, there he liued daintily and superfluously, and gaue himself to all mirth and pleasure. In THRASIA, he dranke euer, or was alwaies on horseback. If he came to Tisaphernes, lieutenant of the mighty king of PERSIA, he farre exceeded the magnificence of PERSIA in pompe and sumptuousnesse. And these things notwithstanding, neuer altered his naturall condition from one fashion to another, neither did his manners (to say truly) receiue all sorts of changes. But because peraduenture, if he had shewed his naturall disposition, he might in diuers places where he came, haue offended those whose company he kept, he did with such a vizard and cloke disguise himselfe, to fit their maners whom he companied with, by transforming himselfe into their naturall countenance, as he that had seene him when he was at SPARTA, to haue looked vpon the outward man, would haue said as the common Prouerbe saith:

It is not the sonne of Achilles, but Achilles selfe.

Euen so, it is euen he whom Lycurgus brought vp. But he that had inwardly seene his naturall doings, and good will indeed lye naked before him, would contrarily, haue vsed this common saying:

This woman is no changeling.

Alcibiades got Timea king Agis wife with child.

For he entertained Queene Timæa, king Agis wife of SPARTA, so well in his absence, he being abroad in the wars, that he got her with child, and she her selfe denyed it not. For she being brought to bed of a sonne, who was named Leotychides, openly to the world called him by that name: but when she was amongst her familiars and very friends, she called him softly Alcibiades, she was so farre in loue with him. And Alcibiades, iesting out the matter, said he had done it for no hurt, nor for any lust of flesh to satisfie his desire: but onely to leaue of his race, to reigne amongst the LACEDÆMONIANS. This matter was brought by diuerse vnto King Agis eares, who at the length beleeued it: but specially when he began to make a reckening of the time how long it was since he lay with his wife. For lying with his wife one night when there was a terrible earthquake, he ran out of his chamber for feare the house would fall on his head: so that it was ten moneths after ere he lay againe with her. Whereupon her son Leotychides being borne at the end of ten moneths, he said he was none of his: and this was the cause that Leotychides did not succeed afterwards in the Kingdome, because he was not of the bloud royall. After the vtter ouerthrow of the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, those of the Isles of CHIO and LESBOS, with the CYZICENIANS, did send altogether their ambassadours to SPARTA, to let the LACEDÆMONIANS vnderstand, they had good will to leaue the ATHENIANS, so they would send them aide to defend them. The BOEOTIANS fauoured those of LESBOS: Pharnabazus, the King of PERSIAES Lieutenant, fauoured the CYZICENIANS. This notwithstanding the LACEDÆMONIANS were better affected to helpe those of CHIO first, by the perswasion of Alcibiades, who tooke their matter in hand: and he tooke sea himselfe and went into ASIA, where he almost turned the countrey of IONIA against the ATHENIANS: and keeping alwaies with the Generals of the LACEDÆMONIAS, he did much hurt the ATHENIANS. Yet notwithstanding, king Agis did beare him ill will, partly for the iniurie he did him in dishonouring and defiling his wife, and partly also, for that he enuied his glorie: because the rumour ranne all about, that the most part of the goodly exploits of those warres did happen well by Alcibiades meanes. Other also of the greatest authority among the SPARTANS, that were most ambitious among them, began in their minds to be angry with Alcibiades, for the enuie they bare him: who were of so great power, that they procured their Gouernours to write letters to their Captaines in the field to kill him. Alcibiades hearing of this, did no whit desist to do all that he could for the benefite of the LACEDÆMONIANS: yet he had an eye behinde him, flying all occasions to fall into their hands. So in the end, for more surety of his person, he went vnto Tisaphernes one of the King of PERSIAES Lieutenants, with whom he wan incontinently such credite, that he was the first and chiefest person he had about him. For this barbarous man being no simple person, but rather malicious, and subtill of nature, and that loued fine and craftie men: did wonder how he could so easily turne from one manner of liuing to another, and also at his quick wit and vnderstanding. Moreouer, his company and manner to passe the time away, was commonly maruellous full of mirth and pleasure, and he had such pleasant comely deuices with him, that no man was of so sullen a nature, but he would make him merie, nor so churlish, but he would make him gentle. So that both those that feared him, & also they that enuied him, were yet glad to see him, and it did them good to be in his company, and vse talke with him. Insomuch as this Tisaphernes (that otherwise was a churlish man, and naturally hated the GRECIANS) did giue himselfe so much vnto Alcibiades flatteries, and they pleased him so well, that he himselfe did studie to flatter Alcibiades againe, and make much of him. For he called Alcibiades his faire house of pleasure, and goodly prospect: notwithstanding he had many goodly gardens, sweete springs, Alcibiades flying the Lacedæmonians goeth to Tisaphernes.

Alcibiades called a pleasant place, and goodly prospect.

ſprings, greene arbours, and pleaſant meadowes, and thoſe in all royall and magnificent manner. Alcibiades deſpairing vtterly to find any ſafetie or friendſhip among the SPARTANS, and fearing on the other ſide King Agis alſo: he began to ſpeake ill of them, and to diſgrace all that they did, to Tiſaphernes. By this practiſe he ſtayed Tiſaphernes from aiding them ſo friendly as he might; and that he did not vtterly deſtroy the ATHENIANS: for he perſwaded him that he ſhould furniſh the LACEDÆMONIANS but with litle money, to let them diminiſh and conſume by litle and litle, to the end that after one had troubled and weakened the other, they both at the length ſhould be the eaſier for the King to ouercome. This barbarous man did eaſily conſent to this deuice. All the world then ſaw he loued Alcibiades, and eſteemed of him very much: inſomuch as he was ſought to, and regarded of all hands of the GRECIANS. Then were the ATHENIANS ſorie, and repented them when they had receiued ſo great loſſe and hurt, for that they had decreed ſo ſeuerely againſt Alcibiades, who in like maner was very ſorrowfull, to ſee them brought to ſo hard termes, fearing, if the city of ATHENS came to deſtruction, that he himſelf ſhould fall in the end into the hands of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who maliced him to the death. Now about that time, all the power of the ATHENIANS was almoſt in the Ile of SAMOS, from whence with their army by ſea, they ſought to ſuppreſſe the rebels that were vp againſt them, and to keep all that which yet remained. For they were yet pretily ſtrong to reſiſt the enemies, at the leaſt by ſea: but they ſtood in feare of the power of Tiſaphernes, & of the hundred and fifty gallies which were reported to be coming out of their country of PHOENICIA to the aid of their enemies, which if they had come, the city of ATHENS had bin vtterly ſpoiled, and for euer without hope of recouery. The which Alcibiades vnderſtanding, ſent ſecretly vnto the chiefeſt men that were in the army of the ATHENIANS at SAMOS, to giue them hope he would make Tiſaphernes their friend: howbeit not of any deſire he had to gratifie the people, nor that he truſted to the cõmunalty of ATHENS, but onely to the honorable and honeſt citizens, and that conditionally, ſo as they had the heart and courage, to bridle a litle the ouer licenciouſnes and inſolency of the common people, and that they would take vpon them the authority to gouerne, and to redreſſe their ſtate, and to preſerue the city of ATHENS from final and vtter deſtruction. Vpon this aduertiſement, al the heads and chiefe men did giue very good eare vnto it: ſauing only Phrynichus, one of the captains, & of the town of DIRADES: who miſtruſting (that was true indeed) that Alcibiades cared not which end went forward, nor who had the chief gouernment of ATHENS, the nobility or the comunalty, & did but ſeek all the deuices & waies he could, to return againe if it might be poſſible, in any maner of ſort, and that he did but curry fauour with the nobility, blaming and accuſing the people: he ſtood altogether againſt the motion, wherupõ Alcibiades deuice was not followed. And hauing now ſhewed himſelfe open enemy to Alcibiades, he did ſecretly aduertiſe Aſtiochus then Admiral to the LACEDÆMONIANS, of Alcibiades practiſe, & warned him to take heed of him, & to lay him vp ſafe, as a double dealer, & one that had intelligẽce with both ſides: but he vnderſtood not how it was, one traitour to ſpeake to another. For this Aſtiochus was a folower of Tiſaphernes for his priuate commodity: and perceiuing Alcibiades in ſuch credit with him, he did diſcouer to Alcibiades all that Phrynicus had aduertiſed him. Alcibiades ſtraight ſent men of purpoſe to SAMOS, vnto the captains there, to accuſe Phrynichus of the treaſon he had reuealed againſt thẽ. Thoſe of the councel there, receiuing this intelligence, were highly offended with Phrynichus. So, he ſeeing no better way to ſaue himſelf for making of this fault, went about to make amends with committing a worſe fault. Therupon he ſent againe to Aſtiochus complaining much he had diſcloſed him: and yet neuertheleſſe he promiſed him, if he would keepe his counſel, that he would deliuer the whole fleet & army of the ATHENIANS into his hands. Howbeit this treaſon of Phrynichus did the ATHENIANS no hurt at all, by reaſõ of Aſtiochus countertreaſon: for he did let Alcibiades againe vnderſtand what offer Phrynicus had made him. Phrynichus looking to be charged with this againe the ſecond time before the councell, by means of Alcibiades, did firſt aduertiſe the chiefe of the army of the ATHENIANS: that their enemies would come and ſet vpon them, and where, and how, & gaue them warning to keepe neere their ſhips, to make a ſtrong watch, and to fortifie themſelues with all ſpeed, the which forthwith they did. And as they were about it, there came other letters from Alcibiades, by the which he did warne them againe to take heed of Phrynichus, becauſe he had practiſed againe with their enemies, to deliuer the whole army of ATHENS into their hands. But they gaue no credit to his ſecond letters: for they thought that he knowing the preparation and mines of the enemies, would ſerue his owne turne with the falſe accuſing of Phrynichus. Notwithſtanding this, there was ſome falſhood in felowſhip: for one Hermon, openly in the market place ſtabbed Phrynichus in with a dagger & killed him. The fact being pleaded in law, and throughly conſidered of, the dead body by the ſentence of the people was condemned for a traitour: and Hermon the murtherer and his felowes, were crowned in recompence of their fact they had done to kill a traitor to the common wealth. Wherfore thoſe that were Alcibiades friends, being at that time the ſtronger and greateſt men of the councel in the army of Samos: they ſent one Piſander to Athens, to attempt to alter the gouernment, and to encourage the noble men to take vpon them the authority, and to pluck it from the people: aſſuring them that Tiſaphernes would giue them aide to do it, by meanes of Alcibiades, who wold make him their friend. This was the colour & cloke wherwith they ſerued their turnes, that did change the gouernement of Athens, and that brought it into the hands of a ſmall number of Nobilitie: for they were in all but foure hundred, & yet they called themſelues fiue thouſand. But ſo ſoone as they felt themſelues ſtrong, and that they had the whole authority of gouernement, without contradiction in their hands, they made then no more reckoning of Alcibiades, and ſo they made wars more coldly and ſlackly then before. Partly becauſe they miſtruſted their citizens, who found the change of gouernment very ſtrange: and partly alſo becauſe they were of opinion that the Lacedæmonians (who at all times did moſt fauor the gouernement of Nobility) would be better inclined to make peace with them. Now the common people that remained ſtill in the city, ſtirred not, but were quiet againſt their wils, for feare of danger, becauſe there were many of them ſlain, that boldly took vpon them in open preſence to reſiſt theſe foure hundred. But thoſe that were in the camp in the Ile of Samos, hearing theſe newes, were ſo grieuouſly offended, that they reſolued to returne incontinently againe, vnto the hauen of Piræa. Firſt of all, they ſent for Alcibiades; whom they choſe their captaine, then they commanded him ſtraightly to lead them againſt theſe tyrants, who had vſurped the liberty of the people of Athens. But neuertheleſſe he did not herein, as another would haue done in this caſe, ſeeing himſelfe ſo ſodainely crept againe in fauor with the common people: for he did not thinke he ſhould incontinently pleaſe and gratifie them in all things, though they had made him now their generall ouer all their ſhips; & ſo great an army, being before but a baniſhed man, a vacabond, and a fugitiue. But to the contrary, as it became a generall worthy of ſuch a charge, he conſidered with himſelf, that it was his part wiſely to ſtay thoſe, who would in a rage & fury careleſly caſt themſelues away, and not ſuffer them to do it. And truly Alcibiades was the cauſe of the preſeruing of the city of Athens at that time from vtter deſtruction. For if they had ſodainely (according to their determination) departed from Samos to go to Athens: the enemies finding no man to let them, might eaſily haue won all the countrey of Ionia, of Helleſpont, and of all the other Iles without ſtroke ſtriking, whileſt the Athenians were buſie fighting one againſt another in ciuil wars, and within the compaſſe of their own wals. This Alcibiades alone, & no other, did preuent, not only by perſwading the whole army, & declaring the inconuenience thereof, which would fall out vpon their ſodain departure: but alſo by intreating ſome particularly apart, & keeping a number back by very force. To bring this about, one Thraſibulus of the towne of Stira, did helpe him much: who went through the army, and cried out vpon them that were bent to enterpriſe this iourney: for he had the biggeſt and loudeſt voice as they ſay, of any man that was in all the city of Athens. This was a notable act, and a great piece of ſeruice done by Alcibiades: that he promiſed the 5 hundred ſaile of the Phoenicians (which the Lacedæmonians aſſuredly looked for, in their aid from the King of Perſia) ſhould not come at all, or els if they came, it ſhould be in the fauor of the Athenians. For he departed immediatly, & went with great ſpeed to Tiſaphernes: whom he handled in ſuch ſort, that he brought not the ſhippes that lay at rode before the city of Aſpenda, and ſo he brake promiſe with the Lacedæmonians. Therefore Alcibiades was maruellouſly blamed and accuſed, both of the one and the other ſide, to haue altred Tiſaphernes mind, but chiefly the Lacedæmonians: who ſaid, that he had perſwaded this barbarous captaine, he ſhould neither aid the one nor the other, but rather to ſuffer themſelues to deuoure and deſtroy each other. For it had bin out of doubt, if this great fleet & nauy of the kings had come, to ioine their force with either party: that they had taken from the one of them, the ſegniory & domination of the ſea. Shortly after, the 4. hundred noble men that had vſurped the authority & gouernment of Athens, were vtterly driuen away and ouerthrowne, by meanes of the friendly aid and aſſiſtance that Alcibiades friends gaue thoſe that that tooke the peoples part. So the citizens were very well pleased with Alcibiades, insomuch as they sent for him to returne when he thought good. But he esteeming it no honour vnto him to return without some well deseruing, and before he had done some greater exploit, as only vpon the peoples fauour and good will: to the end that his returne might be glorious and triumphant; he departed first from Samos with a small number of gallies, and went sailing vp & downe the Iles of Cos & of Gnidos. There he was aduertised, that Mindarus, the Admiral of the Lacedæmonians, was gone with all his fleete vnto the straight of Hellespont, & that the captaines of the Athenians gaue chase vnto him. Therupon he went also and sailed thither with speed, to aide the Athenians: and by very good fortune came with 18 gallies, euen at the very instant when they were both in the midst of their fight, with al their ships before the city of Abydos. The battel was cruelly foughten between them frō morning til night, both the one and other hauing the better in one part of the battell, and the worst in another place. Now at the first discouery of Alcibiades coming, both parts had indeed contrary imaginations of him. For the ēnemies tooke heart vnto them: And the Athenians began to be afeard. But Alcibiades setting vp a flag in the top of his admirall gally, to shew what he was, he presently set vpon the Peloponnesians that had the better, and had certaine gallies of the Athenians in chase: whereupon the Peloponnesians gaue ouer their chase, and fled. But Alcibiades followed them so lustily, that he ran diuerse of them aground, and brake their ships, & slue a great number of men that leapt into the sea, in hope to saue thēselues by swimming aland: notwithstanding that Pharnabazus was come thither to aid the Lacedæmonians, and did his best endeuour to saue their gallies by the sea shore: yet the Athenians in the end wan 30 gallies of their enemies, & saued all their own, and so did set vp certaine flags of triumph and victory. Alcibiades hauing now happily gotten this glorious victory, would needs go shew himselfe in triumph vnto Tisaphernes. So hauing prepared to present him with goodly rich presents, and appointed also a conuenient train and number of saile meet for a General, he took his course directly to him. But he found not that entertainment he hoped for: for Tisaphernes standing in great hazard of displeasure, and feare of punishment at the Kings hands, hauing long time before bin defamed by the Lacedæmonians, who had complained of him, that he did not fulfill the Kings commandement, thought that Alcibiades was ariued in very happy houre: wherupō he kept him prisoner in the city of Sardis supposing the wrong he had done, would by this meanes easily discharge and purge him to the king. Yet at the end of 30. daies, Alcibiades by fortune got a horse, and stealing from his keepers, fled vnto the city of Clazomenes; & this did more increase the suspition they had of Tisaphernes, because they thought that vnderhand he had wrought his liberty. Alcibiades took then sea again, & went to seek out the army of the Athenians. Which when he had found, & heard news that Mindarus & Pharnabazus were together in the city of Cyzycvm, he made an oration to his souldiers, & declared vnto them how it was very requisite they shold fight with their enemies, both by sea and by land, and moreouer that they should assault them within their forts and castles, because otherwise they could haue no mony to defray their charges. His oration ended, he made them immediatly hoise saile, & so to go lie at anker in the Ile of Proconnesvs: where he took order that they should keep all the pinnaces & brigantines among the ships of war, that the enemy might haue no manner of intelligence of his coming. The great showres of raine also, with thunder and dark weather that fell out sodainly vpon it, did greatly further him in his attempt and enterprise: insomuch as not only his enemies, but the Athenians that were there before, knew nothing of his coming. So some made their reckoning, that they could do litle or nothing all that day: yet he made them sodainely imbarke, and hoise saile. They were no sooner in the maine sea, but they descried afarre off the gallies of their enemies, which lay at rode before the hauen of Cyzicvm. And fearing lest the great number of his fleet would make them fly, and take land before he could come to them: he commanded certaine captaines to stay behind, and to row softly after him, and himselfe with forty gallyes with him, went towards the enemies to prouoke them to fight. The enemies supposing there had bene no more ships then those that were in sight, did set out presently to fight with them. They were no sooner ioyned together, but Alcibiades ships that came behind, were also descried. The enemies were so afeard thereat, that they cast about and fled straight. Alcibiades leauing his fleete, followed the chase with twentie of the best gallies he had, and draue them aland. Thereupon he landed also, and pursued them so couragiously at their heeles, that he slue a great number of them on the maine land, who thought by flying to haue ſaued themſelues. Moreouer, Mindarus and Pharnabazus, being come out of the city to reſcue their people, were ouerthrown both. He ſlue Mindarus in the field, fighting valiantly: as for Pharnabazus, he cowardly fled away. So the ATHENIANS ſpoiled the dead bodies (which were a great number) of a great deale of armour & riches, and took beſides all their enemies ſhips. After they tooke the city of CIZYCVM, Pharnabazus hauing left it. Then the PELOPONNESIANS being ſlain, they had not only the poſſeſſion of the whole countrey of HELLESPONT, which they kept: but they draue their enemies by force out of al parts of the ſea. There were at that time certain letters intercepted, wherby a ſecretary gaue aduertiſement vnto the Ephori at SPARTA, of the ouerthrow in this ſort: All is loſt, Mindarus is ſlaine, our people die for hunger, and we know not what to do. Now the ſouldiers of ATHENS that had bene at this iourney and ouerthrow, grew to ſuch pride and reputation of themſelues, that they would not, and diſdained alſo to ſerue with other ſouldiers that had bene beaten many times, and went away with the worſe: where they to the contrary had neuer bin ouercome as a litle before happened, that the captaine Thraſyllus had bene ouerthrowne by the city of EPHESVS: and for this ouerthrow, the EPHESIANS had ſet vp a triumph, and token of braſſe, to the vtter ſhame and ignominy of the ATHENIANS. For the which Alcibiades ſouldiers did very much rebuke Thraſyllus men, and did exceedingly extoll their captaine and themſelues, and would neither encampe with them, neither haue to do with them, nor yet keepe them company: vntill ſuch time as Pharnabazus came with a great army againſt them, as well of footmen as horſemen, when they ranne a forraging vpon the ABYDENIANS: and then Alcibiades went to the reſcue of them, and gaue Pharnabazus battell, and ouerthrew him once againe, and did together with Thraſyllus chaſe him euen vntill dark night. Then both Alcibiades and Thraſyllus ſouldiers did company together, one reioycing with another: and ſo returned all with great ioy into one campe. The next morning Alcibiades ſet vp a triumph for the victory he had the day before, and then went to ſpoile and deſtroy Pharnabazus countrey where he was gouernour, and no man durſt once come out to meet him. In this rode there were taken priſoners, certaine Prieſts and Nuns of the country: but Alcibiades freely deliuered them afterwards without ranſome. And preparing to make wars againſt the CHALCEDONIANS, who were reuolted from the ATHENIANS, and had receiued a garriſon and gouernor of the LACEDÆMONIANS into their city, he was aduertiſed that they had brought all their goods and cattels out of their fields, and had deliuered them to the ſafe cuſtody of the BITHYNIANS, who were their neighbors & friends. Herupon he led his army into their borders, and ſent a herauld to ſummon the BYTHINIANS, to make amends for the wrong they had done the ATHENIANS. The BYTHINIANS fearing leſt Alcibiades would ſet vpon them, did ſtraight deliuer him their goods they had before in the cuſtody, and moreouer made a league with the ATHENIANS beſides. That done, he went and laid ſiege to the city of CHALCEDON, the which he enuironed all about from the one ſide of the ſea to the other. Pharnabazus came thither, thinking to haue raiſed the ſiege. And Hippocrates a captain of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that was gouernor of the city, aſſembled al the force he was able to make within the ſame, & made a ſally out alſo vpon the ATHENIANS at the very ſame time. Wherupon Alcibiades putting his men in order of battel, ſo as they might giue charge vpon the both at one inſtant, fought ſo valiantly, that he forced Pharnabazus to run his way with ſhame enough, & ſlew Hippocrates in the field, with a great number of his men. Then took he the ſeas again, to go towards the coūtry of HELLESPONT, to get ſome money, were on the ſodaine he did take the city of SELYBREA: becauſe he valiantly put himſelfe in hazard before the time appointed him. For certaine of his friends within, with whom he had ſecret practiſe, had giuen him a token, that when time ſerued, they would ſhew a burning torch in the aire at midnight: but they were compelled to ſhew this fire in the aire before they were ready, for feare leſt one of their confederacy would bewray the matter, who ſodainely repented him. Now this torch burning in the aire, was ſet before Alcibiades was ready with his company. But he perceiuing the ſigne ſet, tooke about thirty men with him in his company, and ranne with them to the wals of the city, hauing commanded the reſt of his army to follow him with all ſpeed poſſible. The gate was opened to him, and to his thirty men: beſides them there followed twenty other light armed men. Howbeit they were no ſooner entred the city, but they heard the citizens armed come againſt them: ſo that there was no hope to ſcape, if they did tary their coming. Neuertheleſſe, conſidering that vntill that preſent time, he was neuer ouercome in battel where he had takē charge, it grieued him very much to fly wherefore

wherfore it ſtraight came in his head to make ſilence by ſound of trumpet, & after ſilence made, he cauſed one of thē that were about him to make proclamatiō with a loud voice, that the SELYBRIANIANS ſhould not take armes againſt the ATHENIANS. This cooled thē a litle that would faine haue bene doing, becauſe they ſuppoſed that all the army of the ATHENIANS had beene already in the citie: the other on the contrary ſide, were very glad to talke of peace, without any further danger. And as they began to parle vpon compoſition, the reſt of Alcibiades army was come on. Now he thinking in deed (which was true) that the SELYBRIANIANS ſought nothing but peace, and fearing leſt the THRACIANS (which were many in number, and came with good will to ſerue him in that iourney) would ſacke and ſpoile the city, he made them all to go out againe: and ſo concluding peace with the chiefe of the SELYBRIANIANS, he did them no more hurt vpon their humble ſubmiſſion, but made them pay him a ſum of mony, & ſo leauing a garriſon of the ATHENIANS within the city, he departed thence. Whilſt Alcibiades was in treaty with the SELYBRIANIANS, the other ATHENIAN captaines that lay at the ſiege of CHALCEDON, made an agreement with Pharnabazus, that he ſhould giue them a ſum of mony, and giue vp the towne into the ATHENIANS hands, to enioy it as they did before. And with expreſſe condition alſo, that the ATHENIANS ſhould make no rodes into Pharnabazus dominions, to hurt or ſpoile any of his: and he likewiſe ſhould be bound to giue good ſafe conduct vnto the ambaſſadours of the ATHENIANS, to go and come ſafe from time to time, to the King of PERSIA. The other Captaines being ſworne to this peace, Pharnabazus conditioned alſo that Alcibiades at his returne ſhould likewiſe be ſworne to the peace and conditions thereof. But Alcibiades ſaid he would not be ſworne at all, vnleſſe Pharnabazus were firſt ſworne for his part. Thus when oathes were taken of either ſide, Alcibiades went alſo againſt thoſe of BYZANTIVM, who in like caſe had rebelled againſt the ATHENIANS. At his firſt coming thither, he enuironed the city round about with a wall. Afterwards he practiſed with two ſecret friends of his, Anaxilaus and Lysurgus, and certaine other within the city, who promiſed him to deliuer it into his hands, ſo they might be aſſured he would do them no hurt. To colour this practiſe, he gaue it out that he muſt needs leaue the ſiege, and depart with ſpeed, for certain news that were come out of IONIA: and therupō he imbarked preſently, and went out of the hauen at noone daies with all his ſhips, howbeit he returned againe the ſame night. And going aland with the choiſeſt and beſt armed men he had, he approched the wals of the city, without any manner of noiſe, and hauing left order with them that remained in the ſhips, that in the meane ſeaſon they ſhould row with al force into the hauen, with as great cries & ſhouts as might be, to feare and trouble the enemies: partly to feare the BYZANTINES the more with their ſodaine coming among them, and partly that his confederates within the city, might with better oportunity receiue him and his company, into the towne with the more aſſured ſafety, whilſt euery man ranne to the hauen, to reſiſt them that were vpon the gallies. Neuertheleſſe they went not away vnfought with. For thoſe that lay in garriſon within the city, ſome of them PELOPONNESIANS, other BOEOTIANS, & other MEGARIANS, did ſo valiantly repulſe them that came out of their gallies, that they draue them to retire aboord again. Afterwards hearing how the ATHENIANS were entred the city on the other ſide, they put thēſelues in battell ray, & went to meet thē. The battell was terrible of both parts: but Alcibiades in the end obtained victory, leading the right wing of his battel, & Theramenes the left. The victory being gotten, he took 300 of his enemies priſoners, who had eſcaped the fury of the battel. But after the battel, there was not a BYZANTINE put to death, neither baniſhed, nor his goods cōfiſcated: becauſe it was capitulated by Alcibiades with his cōfederats, that neither he nor his, ſhould hurt any of the BYZANTINES, either in perſon or goods, nor any way ſhould rifle them. And Anaxilaus being afterwards accuſed of treaſon in LACEDÆMON for this practiſe, he anſwered & iuſtified himſelf in ſuch ſort, that they could not find he had cōmitted the fault laid vnto his charge. For he ſaid that he was no LACEDÆMONIAN, but a BYZANTINE: and that he ſaw not LACEDÆMON in danger, but BYZANTIVM, which the enemies had compaſſed about with a wall they had built, that it was vnpoſſible to bring any thing into the city. Moreouer he alledged, that they hauing very ſmall ſtore of corne within the city (as was true indeed) the PELOPONNESIANS and BOEOTIANS that lay there in garriſon, did eat it vp, while the poore BYZANTINES themſelues, their wiues and children, died for very hunger. Therfore it could not be ſaid of him, that he had betraied his coūtry, but rather that he had deliuered it frō the miſeries & calamities the wars brought vpon it: wherin he had followed the example of the honeſteſt men of

LACEDÆMON, who did acknowledge nothing honeſt and iuſt, but that which was neceſſary and profitable for their country. The LACEDÆMONIANS hearing his reaſons alleadged for his purgation, were aſhamed to condemne him, and therefore they let him go. Now Alcibiades deſirous in the end to ſee his natiue countrey againe (to ſpeake more truly, that his country men ſhould ſee him) after he had ſo many times ouerthrowne their enemies in battell: he hoiſed ſaile and directed his courſe towards ATHENS, bringing with him all the gallies of the ATHENIANS richly furniſhed and decked all about with skutchines and targets, and other armour and weapon gotten amongſt the ſpoiles of his enemies. Moreouer, he brought with him many other ſhippes which he had won and broken in the warres, beſides many enſignes and other ornaments: all which being counted together one with the other, made vp the number of two hundred ſhips. Furthermore, where Duris SAMIAN writeth (who challengeth that he came of his houſe) that at his returne one Chryſogonus, an excellent player on the flute (that had won certaine of the Pythian games) did play ſuch an note, that at the ſound thereof the gally-ſlaues would keepe ſtroke with their owers, and that Callippides another excellent player of Tragedies, playing the part of a comedy, did ſtirre them to row, being in ſuch players garments as euery maſter of ſuch ſcience vſeth commonly to weare, preſenting himſelf in Theater or ſtage before the people to ſhew his art; and that the admirall galley wherein himſelfe was, entred the hauen with a purple ſaile, as if ſome maske had come into a mans houſe after ſome great banquet made: neither Ephorus, nor Theopompus nor Xenophon, make any mention of this at all. Furthermore, me thinks it ſhould not be true, that he (returning from exile after ſo long a baniſhment, and hauing paſſed ouer ſuch ſorrowes and calamities as he had ſuſtained) would ſo proudly and preſumptuouſly ſhew himſelfe vnto the ATHENIANS. But meerely contrary, it is moſt certaine, that he returned in great feare & doubt. For when he was arriued in the hauen of PIRÆA, he would not ſet foot a land, before he firſt ſaw his nephew Euryptolemus, and diuers other of his friends, from the hatches of his ſhip, ſtanding vpon the ſands in the hauens mouth: who were come thither to receiue and welcome him, and told him that he might be bold to land, without feare of any thing. He was no ſooner landed, but all the people ranne out of euery corner to ſee him, with ſo great loue and affection, that they tooke no heed of the other captaines that came with him, but cluſtred all to him onely, and cried out for ioy to ſee him. Thoſe that could come neere him, did welcome and imbrace him: but all the people wholly followed him. And ſome that came to him, put garlands of flowers vpon his head: and thoſe that could not come neere him, ſaw him afar off and the old folkes did point him out to the yonger ſort. But this common ioy was mingled notwithſtanding with teares and ſorrow, when they came to thinke vpon their former misfortunes and calamities, & to compare them with their preſent proſperity: waying with themſelues alſo how they had not loſt SICILIA, nor their hope in all things elſe had failed them, if they had deliuered themſelues & the charge of their army into Alcibiades hands, when they ſent for him to appeare in perſon before them. Conſidering alſo how he found the city of ATHENS in maner put from the ſegnioric and commandement of the ſea; and on the other ſide how their force by land was brought into ſuch extremity, that ATHENS ſcantly could defend her ſuburbs, the city ſelfe being ſo diuided and turmoiled with ciuill diſſention: yet he gathered together thoſe few, and ſmall force that remained, and had not only reſtored ATHENS to her former power and ſouereaignetie on the ſea, but had made her alſo conquerer by land. Now the decree for his repaire home againe, paſt before by the people, at the inſtant requeſt of Callias, the ſonne of Callaſchrus, who did preferre it: as he himſelfe did teſtifie in his Elegies, putting Alcibiades in remembrance of the good turne he had done him, ſaying:

Alcibiades honourable returne into his countrey.

I was the firſt that moued in open conference,
The peoples voice to call thee home, when thou wert baniſht hence,
So was I eke the firſt which thereto gaue conſent,
And therefore may I boldly ſay, by truth of ſuch intent:
I was the onely meane, to call thee home againe,
By ſuch requeſt ſo rightly made, to moue the peoples vaine.
And this may ſerue for pledge, what friendſhip I thee beare:
Faſt ſealed with a faithfull tongue, as plainely ſhall appeare.

But notwithſtanding, the people being aſſembled in councell, Alcibiades came before them, and made an oration: wherein he firſt lamented all his miſhaps, and found himſelf grieued a little with

with the wrongs they had offered him, yet he imputed all in the end to his curſed fortune, and ſome ſpitefull god that enuied his glory and proſperitie. Then he dilated at large the great hope their enemies had to haue aduantage of them: and therewithall perſwaded the people to be of good courage, and afeard of nothing that was to come. And to conclude, the people crowned him with crownes of gold, and choſe him Generall againe of ATHENS, with ſoueraigne power and authoritie both by land and by ſea. And at that very inſtant it was decreed by the people, that he ſhould be reſtored againe to his goods, and that the Prieſts Eumolpides ſhould abſolue him of all their curſes, and that the heralds ſhould with open proclamation reuoke the execrations and curſings they had thundered out againſt him before, by commandement of the people. Whereto they all agreed, and were very willing, ſauing Theodorus the Biſhop, who ſaid: I did neither excommunicate him, nor curſe him, if he hath done no hurt to the common wealth. Now Alcibiades flouriſhed in his chiefeſt proſperitie, yet were there ſome notwithſtanding that miſliking very much the time of his landing: ſaying, it was very vnluckie and vnfortunate. For the very day of his returne and arriuall, fell out by chance on the feaſt which they call Plynteria, as you would ſay, the waſhing day, which they celebrate in honour of Minerua: on the which day, the Prieſts that they call Praxiergides, to make certaine ſecret and hidden ſacrifices and ceremonies, being the fiue and twentieth day of the moneth of September, and do take from the image of this goddeſſe all her rayment and iewels, and keepe the image cloſe couered ouer. Hereupon the ATHENIANS do aſcribe that day for a moſt vnfortunate day, and are very circumſpect to do any matter of importance on it. Moreouer, it was commonly ſcanned abroade of euery body, that it ſeemed the goddeſſe was not content, nor glad of Alcibiades returne: and that ſhe did hide her ſelfe, becauſe ſhe would not ſee him, nor haue him come neere her. Notwithſtanding all theſe toyes and ceremonies, when Alcibiades found euery thing fell out well at his return, and as he would haue wiſhed it: he armed a hundred galleyes preſently, to returne againe to the warres: Howbeit he wiſely regarded the time and ſolemnitie of celebration of theſe myſteries, and conſiderately ſtayed vntill they had finiſhed all. And it fell out, that after the LACEDÆMONIANS had taken and fortified the citie of DECELIA, within the teritorie of ATTICA, and that the enemies being the ſtronger in the field, did keepe the way going from ATHENS to ELEVSIN, ſo as by no poſſible meanes they could make their ſolemne proceſſion by land, with ſuch honor & deuotion as they were before accuſtomed to do: and therby all the ſacrifices, daunces, and many other holy deuout ceremonies they were wont to do by the way, in ſinging the holy ſong of Iacchus, came of very neceſſitie to be left off and cleane laide aſide. Then Alcibiades thought he ſhould do a meritorious deed to the gods, and an acceptable to men, to bring the old ceremonies vp againe vpon the ſaid feaſt: and thereupon purpoſed to accompany the proceſſion, and defend it by power againſt all inuaſion and diſturbance of the enemies: as one that foreſaw one of theſe two things would come to paſſe: either that Agis king of the LACEDÆMONIANS would not ſtirre at all, and that he by this meanes ſhould ſo much imbaſe and diminiſh his reputation and glorie: or if he did come out into the field, that hee would make the battell very gratefull to the gods, conſidering it ſhould be in defence of their moſt holy feaſt and worſhip, and in the ſight of his countrey, where the people ſhould ſee and witneſſe both his valiantneſſe, and alſo his courage. Alcibiades being fully reſolued vpon this proceſſion, went and made the prieſts Eumolpides, their vergers, and other their miniſters and officers of theſe myſteries, priuie to his determination. Then he ſent out ſkoutes to watch on the ſide of the hilles thereabouts, and to view the way of their preambulation, The next morning very early he ſent out light horſemen alſo to ſcowre the countrey. Then he made the prieſts, the profeſſed, and all the miniſters of religion, go in proceſſion, together with thoſe that followed the ſame: and he himſelfe compaſſed them about with his armie on euery ſide, marching in battell ray, and very good order, and with great ſilence. This was an honourable and deuout leading of an army, and ſuch as if his greateſt enemies would confeſſe a troth, they could not but ſay, Alcibiades had as much ſhewed the office of a high biſhop, as of a noble ſouldier and good captaine. So he ended this proceſſion, returning to ATHENS in all ſafe order againe, and not an enemy that durſt once looke out into the field to ſet vpon them. Now this did more increaſe the greatneſſe of his mind, and therewith the peoples good opinion of his ſufficiencie, and wiſe conduction of an army: inſomuch as they thought him vnuincible, hauing the ſoueraigne power and authority of a Generall. Furthermore, he ſpake ſo faire to the poore people, and meaner ſort, that they chiefly wiſhed and deſired he would take vpon him like a King: yea, and many went to him to perſwade him in it, as though he ſhould thereby withſtand all enuie, and driue away the lawes and cuſtomes of trying of matters by the voyces of the people, and all ſuch fond deuices as did deſtroy the ſtate of the common-weale. And furthermore, they ſaid it was very needfull that he alone ſhould take vpon him the whole rule and gouernement of the citie, that he might diſpoſe all things according to his will, and not ſtand in feare of ſlanderous and wicked tongues. Now, whether Alcibiades euer had any mind to vſurpe the kingdome, the matter is ſomewhat doubtfull. But this is certain, the greateſt men of the city fearing leſt indeed he meant ſome ſuch thing, did haſten his departure as ſoone as they could poſſible, doing all other things according to his mind: and did aſſigne him ſuch aſſociates in his charge of Generall, as he himſelfe beſt liked. So in the end he departed with a fleet of a hundred galleyes, and firſt of all he fell with the Ile of ANDROS, where he ouercame by fight the inhabitants of the ſaid Iſle, and certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that were amongſt them: but he tooke not the citie, which was one of the firſt matters his enemies did accuſe him for. For if euer man was ouerthrowne and enuied for the eſtimation they had of his valour and ſufficiencie, truly Alcibiades was the man. For the notable and ſundry ſeruices he had done, wonne him ſuch eſtimation of wiſdome and valiantneſſe, that where he ſlacked in any ſeruice whatſoeuer, he was preſently ſuſpected, iudging the ill ſucceſſe not in that he could not, but for that he would not: and that where he vndertooke any enterpriſe, nothing could withſtand or lye in his way. Hereupon the people perſwading themſelues, that immediatly after his departure, they ſhold heare that the Ile of CHIO was taken, with all the country of IONIA, they were angry they could haue no newes ſo ſuddenly from him as they looked for. Moreouer, they did not conſider the lacke of mony he had, and ſpecially making war with ſuch enemies, as were euer relieued with the great King of PERSIAES aid, and that for neceſſities ſake he was ſundry times driuen to leaue his campe, to ſeeke mony where he could get it, to pay his ſouldiers, and to maintain his army. Now for teſtimony hereof, the laſt accuſation that was againſt him, was only for this matter. Lyſander being ſent by the LACEDÆMONIANS for admiral and generall of their army by ſea, vſed ſuch policy with Cyrus the king of PERSIAES brother, that he got into his hands a great ſum of money: by meanes whereof he gaue vnto his mariners foure oboles a day for their wages, where before they were wont to haue but three, and yet Alcibiades had much ado to furniſh his with three onely a day. For this cauſe, to get mony, Alcibiades ſailed into CHARIA. But in the meane time Antiochus whom Alcibiades had left his lieutenant behind him, and had giuen him charge of all the ſhips in his abſence, being a very skilfull ſea-man, but otherwiſe a haſty harebraynd foole, and of ſmall capacity: he being expreſly commanded by Alcibiades not to fight in any caſe, though the enemies offered him battell, was ſo fooliſh raſh, & made ſo litle reckoning of his ſtraight commandement, that he armed his own galley, whereof himſelf was captaine, and other beſides, and went to the city of EPHESVS, paſſing all along his enemies galleys, reuiling and offering villany to thoſe that ſtood vpon the hatches of their galleys. Lyſander being maruellouſly prouoked by theſe words, went and encountered him at the firſt with a few ſhips. The other captaines of the gallies of the ATHENIANS, ſeeing Antiochus in danger, went to aid him, one after another. Then Lyſander of his part alſo ſet out all his whole fleete againſt him, and in the end ouercame them: Antiochus ſelfe was killed in the conflict, and many gallies and men were taken priſoners: whereof Lyſander ſet vp ſhewes of triumph in token of victory. Alcibiades hearing this ill fauored newes, returned preſently with all poſſible ſpeede to SAMOS: and when he came thither, he went with all the reſt of his fleet to offer Lyſander battell. But Lyſander quietly contenting himſelf with his firſt victory, went not out againſt him. Now this victory was no ſooner wonne, but one Thraſybulus the ſon of Thraſon Alcibiades enemy, went incontinently from the campe, and got him to ATHENS to accuſe Alcibiades to the people: whom he informed how all went to wracke, & that he had loſt many ſhips, for that he regarded not his charge, careleſly putting mẽ in truſt, whom he gaue too great credit to, becauſe they were good fellowes, and would drinke drunke with him, and were full of mariners mockes and knauiſh ieaſtes, ſuch as they vſe commonly amongſt themſelues. And that he in the meane time tooke his pleaſure abroad, here and there, ſcraping money together where he could come by it, keeping good cheare, and feaſting of the ABYDENIAN and IONIAN curtiſans, when the enemies army was ſo neare theirs as it was. Moreouer, they laid to his charge, that he did fortifie a caſtle in the coũtry of THRACIA, neare neere vnto the city BISANTHE, for a place to retire himselfe vnto, either because he could not, or rather that he would not liue any longer in his owne country. Vpon those accusations, the ATHENIANS giuing credit to the report, did immediatly chuse new Captaines, and thereby declared their misliking. Alcibiades hearing of this, & fearing lest they would do him some worse harme, did leaue straight the ATHENIANS campe, and gathering a certaine number of strangers together, went of himselfe to make warre vpon certaine free people of the THRACIANS, who were subiect to no Prince nor state: where he got a maruellous masse of money together, by meanes whereof he did assure the GRECIANS inhabiting those marches, from all inuasion of forraine enemies. Now Tydeus, and Menander, and Adimanthus the ATHENIANS captaines, being afterwards in a place commonly called the goats riuer, with all the galleys the citie of ATHENS had at that time vpon the coast: vsed euery morning commonly to go to the sea, to offer battell to Lysander, who rode at anker before the citie of Lampsacus, with all the LACEDÆMONIANS armie by sea, and commonly returned againe to the place from whence they came, in very ill order, without either watch or ward, as men that were careless of their enemies. Alcibiades being on the land not far off, and finding their great fault and negligence, took his horse, and went to them, and told them that they lay on an ill shore, where there was no good rode, nor towne, and where they were driuen to seeke their victuals, as farre as to the city of SESTOS, and that they suffered their mariners to leaue their shippes, and go aland when they lay at anker, stragling vp and downe the countrey as they would themselues, without regard that there lay a great armie of their enemies before thē, ready to be set out at the Generals commandement: and therefore he aduised them to remoue thence, and to go to cast anker before the citie of SESTOS. Howbeit the captaines would not be aduised by him: and that which was worst of all, Tydeus, one of the captaines, stoutly commanded him to get him away, as one that had nothing to do with the matter, and that other had charge of the army. Whereupon Alcibiades fearing they would purpose some treason against him, did depart presently from them. And as he went his way, he said to some of his friends which accompanied him out of the campe at his returne: that if the captaines of the ATHENIANS had not bene so round with him, he would haue forced the LACEDÆMONIANS to haue come to battell in despight of their beardes, or else he would haue driuen them to forsake their shippes. Some tooke this for a glorious bragge: other thought he was like enough to haue done it, because he could haue brought from land a great number of THRACIANS, both archers and horsemen, with whom he might haue giuen a charge vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, and done great mischiefe vnto their campe. But now, how wisely Alcibiades did foresee the faults he told the ATHENIANS captaines of, their great misfortune and losse that followed incontinently, did too plainely witnesse it to the world. For Lysander came so fiercely vpon them on a sodaine, that of all the shippes that they had in their whole fleete, onely eight galleyes were saued, with whom Conon fled: and the other being not much lesse then two hundred in number, were euery one of them taken and caried away, with three thousand prisoners whom Lysander put to death. Shortly after, he tooke the city self of ATHENS, and razed their long wals euen to the ground. After this great and notable victorie, Alcibiades fearing sore the LACEDÆMONIANS, who then without let or interruption of any, were onely Lords and Princes by sea and by land: he went into the countrey of BYTHINIA, and caused great goods to be brought after him, and tooke a maruellous sum of mony with him, besides great riches he left also in the castles of THRACIA, where he did remaine before. Howbeit he lost much of his goods in BYTHINIA, which certain THRACIANS dwelling in that country, had robbed him of, and taken from him. So he determined to repaire forthwith vnto king Artaxerxes, hoping that when the king had once proued him, he shold find him a man of no lesse seruice, then he had found Themistocles before him: besides that the occasion of his going thither, should be much iuster then his was: for he did not go thither to make war against the city of ATHENS and his country, as Themistocles did: but of a contrary intent, to make intercession to the king, that it would please him to aid them: Now Alcibiades thinking he could vse no better mean then Pharnabazus helpe only, to see him safely conducted to the kings court: he tooke his iourney to him into the country of PHRYGIA, where he abode a certain time to attend vpon him, & was honorably entertained and receiued of Pharnabazus. All this while the ATHENIANS found themselues desolate, and in miserable state to see their empire lost: but then much more, when Lysander had taken away their liberties, & set thirty gouernours ouer their city. Now too late, after all was loſt (where they might haue recouered againe, if they had bene wiſe) they beganne together to bewaile and lament their miſeries and wretched ſtate, looking backe vpon all their wilfull faults and follies committed: among which, they did reckon their ſecond time of falling out with Alcibiades, was their greateſt fault: for they baniſhed him only of malice and diſpleaſure, not for any offence himſelfe in perſon had committed againſt them, ſauing that his lieutenant in his abſence had ſhamefully loſt a few of their ſhippes: and they themſelues more ſhamefully had driuen out of their city, the nobleſt ſouldier, and moſt skilfull captaine that they had. And yet they had ſome litle poore hope left, that they were not altogether caſt away, ſo long as Alcibiades liued and had his health. For before, when he was a forſaken man, and led a baniſhed life, yet he could not liue idlely, and do nothing: wherefore now much more, ſaid they to themſelues, if there be any helpe at all, he will not ſuffer out of doubt the inſolencie and pride of the LACEDÆMONIANS; nor yet abide the cruelties and outrages of theſe thirty tyrants. And ſurely the common people had ſome reaſon to haue theſe thoughts in their heads, conſidering that the thirty gouernors themſelues did what they could poſſibly to ſpie out Alcibiades doings, and what he went about. Inſomuch as Critias at the laſt, declared to Lyſander, that ſo long the LACEDÆMONIANS might reckon themſelues Lords ouer all GREECE, as they kept from the common people the rule and authority of the city of ATHENS. And further he added, that notwithſtanding the people of ATHENS could well away to liue like ſubiects vnder the gouernement of a few: yet Alcibiades whileſt he liued, would neuer ſuffer them ſo to be reigned ouer, but would attempt by all deuice he could, to bring a change and innouation among them. Yet Lyſander would not credite theſe perſwaſions, before ſpeciall commandement was ſent to him from the Senate of LACEDÆMON, vpon his allegiance, that he ſhould deuiſe to kill Alcibiades by all meanes he could procure: either becauſe in troth they feared the ſubtiltie of his wit, and the greatneſſe of his courage, to enterpriſe matters of great weight and danger, or elſe that they ſought to gratifie King Agis by it. Lyſander being thus ſtraightly commanded, did ſend and practiſe incontinently with Pharnabazus to execute the fact: who gaue his brother Magæus, and his vncle Suſamithres commiſſion to attempt the matter. Now was Alcibiades in a certaine village of PHRYGIA, with a cõcubine of his called Timandra. So he thought he dreamed one night that he had put on his concubines apparell, and how ſhe dandling him in her armes, had dreſſed his head, frizeled his haire, and painted his face, as he had bene a woman. Other ſay, that he thought Magæus ſtrake off his head, and made his body to be burnt: and the voice goeth this viſion was but a litle before his death. Thoſe that were ſent to kill him, durſt not enter the houſe where he was, but ſet it on fire round about. Alcibiades ſpying the fire, got ſuch apparell and hangings as he had, and threw it on the fire, thinking to haue put it out: and ſo caſting his cloke about his left arme, tooke his naked ſword in his other hand, and ranne out of the houſe, himſelf not once touched with fire, ſauing his clothes were a litle ſinged. Theſe murtherers ſo ſoone as they ſpied him drew backe, and ſtood aſunder, and durſt not one of them come neere him, to ſtand and fight with him: but a farre off, they beſtowed ſo many arrowes and darts on him, that they killed him there. Now when they had left him, Timandra went and tooke his body, which ſhe wrapped vp in the beſt linnen ſhe had, and buried him as honourably as ſhe could poſſible, with ſuch things as ſhe had, and could get together. Some hold opinion that Laïs, the only famous curtiſan, which they ſay was of CORINTH (though indeed ſhe was borne in a litle towne of SICILIA, called HICCARA, where ſhe was taken) was his daughter. Notwithſtanding, touching the death of Alcibiades, there are ſome that agree to all the reſt I haue written, ſauing that they ſay, it was neither Pharnabazus, nor Lyſander, nor the LACEDÆMONIANS, which cauſed him to be ſlaine, but that he keeping with a yong gentlewoman of a noble houſe, whom he had ſtolne away, and inticed to folly: her brethren to reuenge this iniury, went to ſet fire vpon the houſe where he was, and that they killed him as we haue told you, thinking to leape out of the fire.

THE LIFE OF CAIVS Martius Coriolanus.

THE houſe of the Martians at ROME was of the number of the Patricians, out of the which haue ſprung many noble perſonages, whereof Ancus Martius was one, King Numaes daughters ſonne, who was King of ROME after Tullus Hoſtilius. Of the ſame houſe were Publius and Quintus, who brought to ROME their beſt water they had by conduits. Cenſorinus alſo came of that family, that was ſo ſurnamed, becauſe the people had choſen him Cenſor twiſe. Through whoſe perſwaſion they made a law, that no man from thence forth might require, or enioy the Cenſorſhip twiſe. Caius Martius, whoſe life we intend now to write, being left an orphane by his father, was brought vp vnder his mother a widow, who taught vs by experience, that orphanage bringeth many diſcomodities to a child, but doth not hinder him to become an honeſt man, and to excell in vertue aboue the common ſort: as they that are meanely borne, wrongfully do complaine, that it is the occaſion of their caſting away, for that no man in their youth taketh any care of them to ſee them well brought vp, and taught that were meete. This man alſo is a good proofe to confirme ſome mens opinions: That a rare and excellent wit vntaught, doth bring forth many good and euill things together: as a fat ſoile that lyeth vnmanured bringeth foorth both hearbes and weeds. For this Martius naturall wit and great heart did marueilouſly ſtirre vp his courage to do and attempt notable acts. But on the other ſide for lacke of education, he was ſo cholericke and impatient, that he would yeeld to no liuing creature: which made him churliſh, vnciuill, and altogether vnfit for any mans conuerſation. Yet men marueilling much at his conſtancie, that he was neuer ouercome with pleaſure nor mony, & how he wold endure eaſily all maner of paines & trauels: therupon they well liked and commended his ſtoutneſſe and temperancy. But for all that they could not be acquainted with him, as one citizen vſeth to be with another in the city: his behauiour was ſo vnpleaſant to them by reaſon of a certaine inſolent and ſtern maner he had, which becauſe he was too Lordly, was diſliked. And to ſay truly, the greateſt benefite that learning bringeth vnto men, is this: that it teacheth men that be rude and rough of nature, by compaſſe and rule of reaſon, to be ciuill and courteous, and to like better the meane ſtate, then the higher. Now in thoſe daies, valiantnes was honored in Rome aboue all other vertues: which they call virtus, by the name of vertue it ſelfe, as including in that generall name, all other ſpeciall vertues beſides. So that virtus in the Latine, was as much as valiantneſſe. But Martius being more inclined to the warres, then any other gentleman of his time, beganne from his childhood to giue himſelfe to handle weapons, and daily did exerciſe himſelfe therein: and he eſteemed outward armour to no purpoſe, vnleſſe one were naturally armed within. Moreouer he did ſo exerciſe his body to hardneſſe and all kinde of actiuitie, that he was very ſwift in running, ſtrong in wreſtling, and mightie in griping, ſo that no man could euer caſt him. Inſomuch as thoſe that would try maſteries with him for ſtrength and nimbleneſſe, would ſay when they were ouercom: that all was by reaſon of his naturall ſtrength, and hardneſſe of ward, that neuer yeelded to any paine or toyle he tooke vpon him. The firſt time he went to the wars, being but a ſtripling, was when Tarquine ſurnamed the proud (that had bene king of Rome, and was driuen out for his pride, after many attemps made by ſundry battels to come in againe, wherein he was euer ouercome) did come to Rome with all the aide of the Latines, and many other people of Italy: euen as it were to ſet vp his whole reſt vpon a battel by them, who with a great and mighty army had vndertaken to put him into his kingdome againe, not ſo much to pleaſure him, as to ouerthrow the power of the Romaines, whoſe greatneſſe they both feared and enuied. In this battell, wherein are many hote and ſharpe encounters of either party, Martius valiantly fought in the ſight of the Dictator: and a Romaine ſouldier being throwne to the ground euen hard by him, Martius ſtraight beſtird him, and ſlue the enemie with his owne hands that had before ouerthrowne the Romaine. Hereupon after the battell was won, the Dictator did not forget ſo noble an act, and therefore firſt of all he crowned Martius with a garland of oaken boughes. For whoſoeuer ſaueth the life of a Romaine, it is a manner among them, to honour him with ſuch a garland. This was, either becauſe the law did this honour to the oke, in fauour of the Arcadians, who by the oracle of Apollo were in old time called eaters of akornes: or els becauſe the ſouldiers might eaſily in euery place come by oken boughs: or laſtly, becauſe they thought it very neceſſary, to giue him that had ſaued a citizens life, a crowne of this tree to honour him, being properly dedicated vnto Iupiter, the patron and protectour of cities, and thought amongſt other wild trees to bring forth a profitable fruit, and of plants to be the ſtrongeſt. Moreouer, men at the firſt beginning did vſe akornes for their bread, & hony for their drink: and further, the oke did feed their beaſts, and giue them birds, by taking glue from the okes, with the which they made bird-lime to catch ſilly birds. They ſay that Caſtor and Pollux, appeared in this battell, and that incontinently after the battell, men ſaw them in the market place at Rome, all their horſes being on a white foame: and they were the firſt that brought newes of the victorie, euen in the ſame place, where remaineth at this preſent a temple built in the honor of them, neere vnto the fountaine. And this is the cauſe, why the day of this victorie (which was the fifteenth of Iuly) is conſecrated yet to this day vnto Caſtor and Pollux. Moreouer it is daily ſeene, that honour and reputation lighting on young men before their time, & before they haue any great courage by nature, the deſire to win more dyeth ſtraight in them, which eaſily happeneth, the ſame hauing no deepe roote in them before. Where contrariwiſe, the firſt honour that valiant minds do come vnto, doth quicken vp their appetite, haſting them forward as with force of wind, to enterpriſe things of high deſeruing praiſe. For they eſteeme not to receiue reward for ſeruice done, but rather take it for a remembrance and encouragement, to make them do better in time to come: and be aſhamed alſo to caſt their honour at their heeles, not ſeeking to increaſe it ſtill by like deſert of worthie valiant deeds. This deſire being bred in Martius, he ſtrained ſtill to paſſe himſelfe in mantineſſe: and being deſirous to ſhew a daily increaſe of his valiantneſſe, his noble ſeruice did ſtill aduance his fame, bringing in ſpoiles vpon ſpoyles from the enemies. Whereupon, the Captaines that came afterwards (for enuie of them that went before) did contend who ſhould moſt honour him, and who ſhould beare moſt honourable teſtimony of his valiantneſſe. Inſomuch as the Romaines hauing many warres and battels in thoſe dayes, Coriolanus was at them all: and there was not a battell fought, from whence he returned not with ſome reward of honor. And as for other, the onely reſpect that made them valiant, was that they hoped to haue honour: but touching Martius, the onely thing that made him to loue honour, was the ioy he ſaw his mother did take of him. For he thought nothing made him ſo happy & honourable, as that his mother might heare euery body praiſe and commend him, that ſhe might alwaies ſee him return with a crown vpon his his head, and that ſhe might ſtill imbrace him with teares running downe her cheekes for ioy: Which deſire they ſay Epaminondas did auow and confeſſe to haue bene in him, as to think himſelfe a moſt happy & bleſſed man, that his father & mother in their life time had ſeen the victory he wan in the plaine of LEVCTRES. Now as for Epaminondas, he had this good hap, to haue his father and mother liuing, to be partakers of his ioy & proſperity: but Martius thinking all due to his mother, that had bin alſo due to his father if he had liued, did not only content himſelf to reioyce & honor her, but at her deſire took a wife alſo, by whom he had two children, and yet neuer left his mothers houſe therfore. Now he being grown to great credit and authority in ROME for his valiantneſſe, it fortuned there grew ſedition in the city, becauſe the Senate did fauour the rich againſt the people, who did complaine of the ſore oppreſſion of vſurers, of whom they borrowed mony. For thoſe that had litle, were yet ſpoiled of that litle they had by their creditors, for lack of ability to pay the vſury: who offered their goods to be ſold to thē that would giue moſt. And ſuch as had nothing left, their bodies were laid hold on, and they were made their bondmen, notwithſtanding all the wounds and cuts they ſhewed, which they had receiued in many battels, fighting for defence of their countrey and common wealth: of the which, the laſt warre they made was againſt the SABYNES, wherein they fought vpon the promiſe the rich men had made them, that from thenceforth they would intreate thē more gently, and alſo vpon the word of Marcus Valerius chiefe of the Senate, who by authority of the Counſell, and in the behalfe of the rich, ſaid they ſhould performe that they had promiſed. But after that they had faithfully ſerued in this laſt battel of al, where they ouercame their enemies, ſeeing they were neuer a whit the better, nor more gently intreated, and that the Senate would giue no eare to them, but made as though they had forgotten the former promiſe, and ſuffered them to be made ſlaues and bondmen to their creditours, and beſides, to be turned out of all that euer they had: they fel then euen to flat rebellion & mutiny, and to ſtirre vp dangerous tumults within the city. The ROMAINES enemies hearing of this rebellion, did ſtraight enter the teritories of ROME with a maruellous great power, ſpoiling and burning all as they came. Whereupon the Senate immediatly made open proclamation by ſound of trumpet, that all thoſe that were of lawfull age to cary weapon, ſhould come and enter their names into the muſter-maſters book, to go to the wars: but no man obeyed their commandement. Wherupon their chiefe magiſtrates, and many of the Senate, began to be of diuers opinions among thēſelues. For ſome thought it was reaſon, they ſhold ſomewhat yeeld to the poore peoples requeſt, and that they ſhould a litle qualifie the ſeuerity of the law. Other held hard againſt that opinion, and that was Martius for one. For he alledged, that the creditours loſing their money they had lent, was not the worſt thing that was herein: but that the lenity that was fauoured, was a beginning of diſobedience, and that the proud attempt of the communalty, was to aboliſh law, and to bring all to confuſion. Therefore he ſaid, if the Senate were wiſe, they ſhould betimes preuent and quench this ill fauoured & worſe meant beginning. The Senate met many daies in conſultation about it: but in the end they concluded nothing. The poore common people ſeeing no redreſſe, gathered themſelues one day together, and one encouraging another, they all forſook the city, & encamped themſelues vpon a hil, called at that day the holy hill, along the riuer of Tyber, offering no creature any hurt or violence, or making any ſhew of actuall rebellion, ſauing that they cried as they went vp and down, that the rich men had driuen them out of the city, and that throughout all ITALY they might find aire, water, and ground to bury them in. Moreouer, they ſaid, to dwell at ROME was nothing els but to be ſlain, or hurt with continuall wars, and fighting for defence of the rich mens goods. The Senate being afeard of their departure, did ſend vnto them certaine of the pleaſanteſt old men, and the moſt acceptable to the people among them. Of thoſe Menenius Agrippa was he, who was ſent for chiefe man of the meſſage from the Senate. He after many good perſwaſions and gentle requeſts made to the people, on the behalfe of the Senate, knit vp his oration in the end, with a notable tale, in this manner: That on a time all the members of mans body did rebell againſt the belly, complaining of it, that it only remained in the midſt of the body, without doing any thing, neither did beare any labour to the maintenance of the reſt: wheras all other parts and members did labour painfully, & were very carefull to ſatisfie the appetites and deſires of the body. And ſo the belly, all this notwithſtanding, laughed at their folly, and ſaid: It is true, I firſt receiue all meates that nouriſh mans body: but afterwards I ſend it againe to the nouriſhment of other parts of the ſame. Euen ſo (quoth he) O you, my maſters, and citizens of ROME, the reaſon is alike betweene the Senate and you. For matters being wel digested, & their counsels throughly examined, touching the benefite of the common-wealth, the Senatours are cause of the common commodity that cometh vnto euery one of you. These persuasions pacified the people conditionally; that the Senate would grant there shold be yearely chosen fiue Magistrates, which they now call Tribuni plebis, whose office should be to defend the poore people from violence & oppression. So Iunius Brutus, and Sicinius Velutus, were the first tribunes of the people that were chosen, who had only bene the causers and procurers of this sedition. Hereupon the city being growne againe to good quiet and vnity, the people immediatly went to the wars, shewing that they had a good will to do better then euer they did, & to be very willing to obey the Magistrates in that they would command, concerning the wars. Martius also though it liked him nothing to see the greatnesse of the people thus increased, considering it was to the preiudice and imbasing of the Nobility, and also saw that other noble Patricians were troubled as wel as himselfe: he did perswade the Patricians, to shew themselues no lesse forward and willing to fight for their country, then the common people were: & to let them know by their deeds and acts, that they did not so much passe the people in power and riches, as they did exceed them in true nobility and valiantnesse in the countrey of the VOLSCES against whom the ROMAINES made warre at that time, there was a principall city and of most fame, that was called CORIOLES, before the which the Consul Cominius did lay siege. Wherfore all the other VOLSCES fearing lest that city should be taken by assault, they came from all parts of the countrey to saue it, intending to giue the ROMAINES battel before the city, and to giue an onset on them in two seueral places. The Consul Cominius vnderstanding this, deuided his army also into two parts, and taking the one part with himself, he marched towards them that were drawing to the city out of the countrey: and the other part of his army he left in the campe with Titus Latius (one of the valiantest men the ROMAINES had at that time) to resist those that would make any sally out of the city vpon them. So the CORIOLANS making smal account of thē that lay in campe before the city, made a sally out vpon them, in the which at the first the CORIOLANS had the better, and draue the ROMAINES back againe into the trenches of their campe. But Martius being there at that time, running out of the camp with a few men with him, he slue the first enemies he met withall, and made the rest of them stay vpon the sodain, crying out to the ROMAINES that had turned their backs, and calling thē again to fight with a loud voice. For he was euen such another, as Cato would haue a souldier and a captaine to be, not only terrible and fierce to lay about him, but to make the enemy afeard with the sound of his voice, & grimnesse of his countenance. Thē there flocked about him immediatly, a great number of ROMAINES: whereat the enemies were so afeard, that they gaue back presently. But Martius not staying so, did chase & follow them to their own gates, that fled for life. And there perceiuing that the ROMAINES retired back, for the great number of darts & arrowes which flew about their eares from the wals of the city, and that there was not one man amongst thē that durst venter himself to follow the flying enemies into their city, for that it was full of men of warre, very wel armed and appointed he did incourage his fellowes with words & deeds, crying out to thē, that fortune had opened the gates of the city, more for the followers then the fliers. But all this notwithstanding, few had the hearts to follow him. Howbeit Martius being in the throng amongst the enemies, thrust himself into the gates of the city, & entred the same among them that fled, without that any one of them durst at the first turne their face vpon him, or offer to stay him. But he looking about him, and seeing he was entred the city with very few men to helpe him, and perceiuing he was enuironed by his enemies that gathered round about to set vpon him, did things as it is written, wonderfull and incredible, aswell for the force of his hand, as also for the agility of his body, and with a wonderfull courage and valiantnesse he made a lane through the midst of them, and ouerthrew also those he layed at: that some he made runne to the furthest part of the city, and other for feare he made yeeld themselues, and to let fall their weapons before him. By this meanes Martius that was gotten out, had some leisure to bring the ROMAINES with more safety into the city. The city being taken in this sort, the most part of the souldiers began incontinently to spoile, to cary away, and to looke vp the bootie they had wonne. But Martius was maruellous angry with them, and cryed out on them, that it was no time now to looke after spoile, and to runne stragling here and there to enrich themselues, whilest the other Consull and their fellow citizens peraduenture were fighting with their enemies: and how that leauing the spoile, they should seeke to winde them themſelues out of danger and perill. Howbeit, cry and ſay to them what he could, very few of them would hearken to him. Wherfore taking thoſe that willingly offered themſelues to follow him, he went out of the city, and tooke his way toward that part, where he vnderſtood the reſt of the army was, exhorting and intreating them by the way that followed him, not to be faint-hearted; & oft holding vp his hands to heauen, he beſought the gods to be gracious and fauourable vnto him, that he might come in time to the battell, & in a good houre to hazard his life in defence of his county-men. Now the Romaines when they were put in battell ray, and ready to take their targets on their armes, and to gird them vpon their arming coates, had a cuſtome to make their willes at that very inſtant, without any maner of writing, naming him onely whom they would make their heire in the preſence of three or foure witneſſes. Martius came iuſt to that reckoning, whilſt the ſouldiers were doing after that ſort, & that the enemies were approached ſo neere, as one ſtood in view of the other. When they ſaw him at his firſt coming all bloudy, and in a ſweate, and but with a few men following him: ſome thereupon beganne to be afeard. But ſoone after, when they ſaw him runne with a liuely cheere to the Conſull, and to take him by the hand, declaring how he had taken the city of Coriols, and that they ſaw the Conſull Cominius alſo kiſſe and imbrace him, then there was not a man but took heart again to him, and beganne to be of good courage, ſome hearing him report from point to point, the happy ſucceſſe of this exploit, and other alſo coniecturing it by ſeeing their geſtures afarre off. Then they all began to call vpon the Conſull to march forward, and to delay no longer, but to giue charge vpon the enemie. Martius asked him how the order of their enemies battell was, and on which ſide they had placed their beſt fighting men. The Conſull made him anſwer, that he thought the bands which were in the vaward of their battell, were thoſe of the Antiates, whom they eſteemed to be the warlikeſt men, and which for valiant courage would giue no place, to any of the hoaſt of their enemies. Then prayed Martius, to be ſet directly againſt them. The Conſull granted him, greatly praiſing his courage. Then Martius, when both armies came almoſt to ioyne, aduanced himſelfe a good ſpace before his company, and went ſo fiercely to giue charge on the vaward that came right againſt him, that they could ſtand no longer in his hands: he made ſuch a lane through them, and opened a paſſage into the battell of the enemies. But the two wings of either ſide turned one to the other, to compaſſe him in betweene them: which the Conſull Cominius perceiuing, he ſent thither ſtraight of the beſt ſouldiers he had about him. So the battell was maruellous bloudie about Martius, and in a very ſhort ſpace many were ſlaine in the place. But in the end the Romaines were ſo ſtrong, that they diſtreſſed the enemies, and brake their arraye: and ſcattering them, made them flye. Then they prayed Martius that he would retire to the campe, becauſe they ſaw he was able to do no more, he was already ſo wearied with the great paine he had taken, and ſo faint with the great woundes he had vpon him. But Martius anſwered them, that it was not for conquerours to yeeld, nor to be faint hearted: and thereupon began afreſh to chaſe thoſe that fledde, vntill ſuch time as the armie of the enemies was vtterly ouerthrowne, and numbers of them ſlaine and taken priſoners. The next morning betimes, Martius went to the Conſull, and the other Romaines with him. There the Conſull Cominius going vp to his chayre of ſtate, in the preſence of the whole armie, gaue thanks to the gods for ſo great, glorious, and proſperous a victorie: then he ſpake to Martius, whoſe valiantneſſe he commended beyond the Moone, both for that he himſelfe ſaw him do with his eyes, as alſo for that Martius had reported vnto him. So in the end he willed Martius, that he ſhould chooſe out of all the horſes they had taken of their enemies, and of all their goods they had wonne (whereof there was great ſtore) tenne of euery ſort which he liked beſt, before any diſtribution ſhould be made to other. Beſides this great honourable offer he had made him, he gaue him in teſtimonie that he had wonne that day the priſe of proweſſe aboue all other, a goodly horſe with a cappariſon, and all furniture to him: which the whole army beholding, did maruellouſly praiſe and commend. But Martius ſtepping forth, told the Conſull, he moſt thankfully accepted the gift of his horſe, and was a glad man beſides, that his ſeruice had deſerued his Generals commendation: and as for his other offer, which was rather a mercenarie reward, then a honourable recompence, he would haue none of it, but was contented to haue his equall part with the other ſouldiers. Onely, this grace (ſaid he) I craue and beſeech you to graunt me: Among the Volces there is an old friend and hoaſt of mine, an honeſt wealthy man, and now a priſoner, who liuing before in great wealth in his owne countrey, liueth now a poore prisoner, in the hands of his enemies: & yet notwithstanding all this his misery & misfortune, it would do me great pleasure if I could saue him from this one danger, to keepe him from being sold as a slaue. The souldiers hearing Martius words, made a maruellous great shout among them, and there were more that wondred at his great contenration and abstinence, when they saw so litle couetousnesse in him, then they were that highly praised and extolled his valiantnesse. For euen they themselues that did somewhat malice and enuy his glory, to see him thus honoured and passingly praised, did thinke him so much the more worthy of an honorable recompence for his valiant seruice, as the more carelesly he refused the great offer made vnto him for his profit: and they esteemed more the vertue that was in him, that made him refuse such rewards, then that which made them to be offered to him, as vnto a worthy person. For it is farre more commendable, to vse riches well, then to be valiant: and yet it is better not to desire them then to vse them well. After this shout and noise of the assembly was somewhat appeased, the Consull Cominius began to speake in this sort: We cannot compell Martius to take these gifts we offer him if he will not receiue them, but we will giue him such a reward for the noble seruice he hath done, as he cannot refuse. Therefore we do order and decree, that henceforth he be called Coriolanus, vnlesse his valiant acts haue wonne him that name before our nomination. And so euer since, he still bare the third name of Coriolanus. And thereby it appeareth, that the first name the Romaines haue, as Caius, was as our Christian name now. The second as Martius, was the name of the house and family they came of. The third was some addition giuen, either for some act or notable seruice, or for some marke on their face, or of some shape of their body, or else for some special vertue they had. Euen so did the Grecians in old time giue additions to Princes, by reason of some notable act worthy memory. As when they haue called some, Soter and Callinicos, as much to say as sauiour & conqueror. Or els of some notable apparant mark on ones face, or on his body, they haue called him Piscon and Grypos: as ye would say, gorebelly, and hooke nosed, or else for some vertue, as Euergetes, and Philadelphes, to wit, a benefactor, and louer of his brethren. Or otherwise for ones great felicity, as Eudamon: as much to say, as fortunate. For so was the second of the * Battes surnamed. And some Kings haue had surnames of iest and mockery. As one of the Antigones that was called Doson, to say, the Giuer: who was euer promising, and neuer giuing. And one of Ptolomees was called Lamyros: to say, conceitiue. The Romaines vse more then any other nation, to giue names of mockery in this sort. As there was one Metellus surnamed Diadematus, the banded, because he caried a band about his head of long time, by reason of a sore he had in his forehead. One other of his owne family was called Celer, the quicke flie, because a few dayes after the death of his father, he shewed the people the cruell fight of fencers at vnrebated swords, which they found wonderful for the shortnesse of time. Other had their surnames deriued of some accident at their birth. As to this day they call him Proculetus, that is born, his father being in some farre voyage: and him Posthumius, that is borne after the death of his father. And when of two brethren twins, the one doth die, and the other suruiueth: they call the suruiuer, Vopiscus. Sometime also they giue surnames deriued of some marke or misfortune of the body: as Sylla, to say crooke nosed: Niger, blacke: Rufus, red: Caecus blind: Claudus, lame. They did wisely in this thing to accustome men to thinke, that neither the losse of their sight, nor other such misfortunes as may chance to men, are any shame or disgrace vnto them, but the manner was to answer boldly to such names, as if they were called by their proper names. Howbeit these matters wold be better amplified in other stories then this. Now when this war was ended the flatterers of the people began to stirre vp sedition againe, without any new occasion, or iust matter offered of complaint. For they did ground this second insurrection against the Nobility and Patricians, vpon the peoples misery & misfortune, that could not but fall out, by reason of the former discord & seditiō between thē & the nobility. Because the most part of the arable land within the territory of Rome, was become heathy & barrē for lack of plowing, for that they had no time nor mean to cause corne to be brought thē out of other countries to sow, by reasō of their wars which made the extreme dearth they had among thē. Now those busie pratlers that sought the peoples good wil by such flattering words, perceiuing great scarsity of corne to be within the city, & though there had bin plenty enough, yet the common people had no mony to buy it: they spread abroad false tales & rumors against the Nobility, that they in reuenge of the people, had practised & procured the extreme dearth among thē. Furthermore, in the midst of this stir, there came

Names of mockery among the Romaines.

Sedition at Rome, by reason of famine.

came Ambaſſadours to Rome from the city of Velitres, that offered vp their city to the Romaines, and prayed them they would ſend new inhabitants to repleniſh the ſame: becauſe the plague had bene ſo extreme among them, and had killed ſuch a number of them, as there was not left aliue the tenth perſon of the people that had bin there before. So the wiſe men of Rome began to thinke, that the neceſſity of the Velitrians fell out in a moſt happy houre, and how by this occaſion it was very meet in ſo great a ſcarſity of victuals, to disburden Rome of a great number of citizens: and by this means aſwell to take away this new ſedition, & vtterly to rid it out of the city, as alſo to cleare the ſame of many mutinous & ſeditious perſons, being the ſuperfluous ill humours that grieuouſly fed this diſeaſe. Hereupon the Conſuls prickt out all thoſe by a bill, whom they intended to ſend to Velitres, to go dwell there as in forme of a colonie: and they leauied out all the reſt that remained in the city of Rome, a great number to go againſt the Volsces, hoping by the mean of forraine warre, to pacifie their ſedition at home. Moreouer they imagined, when the poore with the rich, and the meane ſort with the Nobility, ſhould by this deuice be abroad in the warres, and in one campe, and in one ſeruice, and in one like danger: that then they would be more quiet and louing together. But Sicinius and Brutus, two ſeditious Tribunes, ſpake againſt either of theſe deuices, and cried out vpon the noble men, that vnder the gentle name of a Colonie, they would cloake and colour the moſt cruell and vnnaturall fact as might be: becauſe they ſent their poore citizens into a ſore infected city & peſtilent ayre, full of dead bodies vnburied, and there alſo to dwell vnder the tuition of a ſtrange god, that had ſo cruelly perſecuted his people. This were (ſaid they) euen as much, as if the Senate ſhould headlong caſt downe the people into a moſt bottomleſſe pit. And are not yet contented to haue famiſhed ſome of the poore citizens heretofore to death, & to put other of them euen to the mercie of the plague: but afreſh they haue procured a voluntary warre, to the end they would leaue behind no kind of miſery and ill, wherewith the poore ſilly people ſhould not be plagued, and onely becauſe they are weary to ſerue the rich. The common people being ſet on a broile and brauery with theſe words, would not appeare when the Conſuls called their names by a bill, to preſſe them for the warres, neither would they be ſent out to this new colonie: inſomuch as the Senate knew not well what to ſay or to do in the matter. Martius then, who was now growne to great credit, and a ſtout man beſides, & of great reputation with the nobleſt men of Rome, roſe vp, and openly ſpake againſt theſe flattering Tribunes. And for the repleniſhing of the citie of Velitres, he did compell thoſe that were choſen to go thither, and to depart the city, vpon great penalties to him that ſhould diſobey: but to the warres, the people by no meanes would be brought or conſtrained. So Martius taking his friends and followers with him, and ſuch as he could by faire words intreat to go with him, did run certain forreyes into the dominion of the Antiates, where he met with great plenty of corne, and had a maruellous great ſpoile, aſwel of cattell as of men he had taken priſoners, whom he brought away with him, and reſerued nothing for himſelfe. Afterwards hauing brought back againe all his men that went out with him, ſafe and ſound to Rome, and euery man rich and loaden with ſpoile: then the home-tariers and houſe-doues that kept Rome ſtil, began to repent them that it was not their hap to go with him, and ſo enuied both them that had ſped ſo well in this iourney, and alſo of malice to Martius, they ſpited to ſee his credit and eſtimation encreaſe ſtill more and more, becauſe they accounted him to be a great hinderer of the people. Shortly after this, Martius ſtood for the Conſulſhip: and the common people fauoured his ſuit, thinking it would be a ſhame to them to deny and refuſe the chiefeſt noble man of bloud, and moſt worthy perſon of Rome, & ſpecially him that had done ſo great ſeruice and good to the common-wealth. For the cuſtome of Rome was at that time, that ſuch as did ſue for any office, ſhould for certaine dayes before be in the market place, onely with a poore gowne on their backs, and without any coate vnderneathe, to pray the citizens to remember them at the day of election: which was thus deuiſed, either to moue the people the more, by requeſting them in ſuch meane apparell, or elſe becauſe they might ſhew them their wounds they had gotten in the warres in the ſeruice of the common-wealth, as manifeſt markes and teſtimonies of their valiantneſſe. Now it is not to be thought that the ſuters went thus looſe in a ſimple gowne in the market place, without any coate vnder it, for feare, and ſuſpition of the common people: for offices of dignity in the city were not then giuen by fauour or corruption. It was but of late time, and long after this, that buying and ſelling fell ouer in election of officers, and that the voyces of the electours were bought for money. But after

Whereupon this meanes of ſuing was deuiſed.

Offices giuen then by deſert, without fauor or corruption.

corruption had once gotten way into the election of offices, it hath runne from man to man, euen to the very sentence of iudges, and also among captaines in the warres: so as in the end, that onely turned common wealths into Kingdomes, by making armes subiect to mony. Therefore me thinkes he had reason that said: he that first made banquets, and gaue money to the common people, was the first that tooke away authority, and destroyed common wealth. But this pestilence crept in by litle and litle, & did secretly win ground still, continuing a long time in Rome, before it was openly knowne and discouered. For no man can tell who was the first man that bought the peoples voices for mony, nor that corrupted the sentence of the Iudges. Howbeit at Athens some hold opinion, that Anytus, the sonne of Anthemion, was the first that fed the Iudges with mony, about the end of the warres of Peloponnesvs, being accused of treason for yeelding vp the fort of Pylb at that time, when the golden and vnfoiled age remained yet whole in iudgment at Rome. Now Martius following this custome, shewed many wounds and curs vpon his body, which he had receiued in seuenteene yeares seruice at the wars, and in many sundrie battels, being euer the foremost man that did set out feete to fight. So that there was not a man among the people, but was ashamed of himselfe, to refuse so valiant a man: and one of them said to another, we must needs chuse him Consul, there is no remedy. But when the day of election was come, & that Martius came to the market place with great pomp, accompanied with all the Senate and the whole Nobility of the city about him, who sought to make him Consull, with the greatest instance & intreaty they could, or euer attempted for any man or matter: then the loue and goodwill of the common people turned straight to an hate and enuy toward him, fearing to put this office of soueraigne authoritie into his hands, being a man somewhat partiall towards the Nobility, and of great credit and authoritie amongst the Patricians, and as one they might doubt would take away altogether the liberty frō the people. Whereupon for these considerations, they refused Martius in the end, and made two other that were suters, Consuls. The Senate being maruellously offended with the people, did account the shame of this refusall, rather to redound to themselues then to Martius: but Martius tooke it in farre worse part then the Senate, and was out of all patience. For he was a man too ful of passion and choler, & too much giuen ouer to selfe-wil, & opinion, as one of a high mind & great courage, that lacked the grauitie and affability that is gotten with iudgement of learning & reason, which only is to be looked for in a gouernour of State: and that remembred not how wilfullnes is the thing of the world, which a gouernour of a common-wealth for pleasing should shun, being that which Plato called solitarinesse. As in the end, all men that are wilfully giuen to a selfe opinion and obstinate mind, and who will neuer yeeld to others reason, but to their owne, remaine without company, and forsaken of all men. For a man that will liue in the world, must needs haue patience, which lustie blouds make but a mocke at. So Martius being a stout man of nature, that neuer yeelded in any respect, as one thinking that to ouercome alwaies, and to haue the vpper hand in all matters, was a token of magnanimity, and of no base & faint courage, which spitteth out anger from the most weake and passioned part of the heart, much like the matter of an impostume: went home to his house, full fraighted with spite and malice against the people, being accompanied with al the lustiest yong gentlemen, whose minds were nobly bent, as those that came of noble race, & commonly vsed for to follow and honor him. But then specially they flockt about him, and kept him company to his much harme, for they did but kindle and inflame his choler more and more, being sory with him for the iniury the people offered him, because he was their captain and leader to the wars, that taught them all martiall discipline, and stirred vp in them a noble emulation of honour and valiantnesse, and yet without enuy, praising them that deserued best. In the meane season there came great plenty of corne to Rome, that had bene bought, part in Italy, and part was sent out of Sicile, as giuen by Gelon the tyrant of Syracvsa: so that many stood in great hope, that the dearth of victuals being holpen, the ciuill dissention would also ceasse. The Senate sate in councell vpon it immediatly, the common people stood also about the palace where the counsell was kept, gaping what resolution would fall out: perswading themselues that the corne they had bought should be sold good cheape, and that which was giuen should be deuided by the polle, without paying any pennie, and the rather, because certaine of the Senatours amongst them did so wish and perswade the same. But Martius standing vpon his feet, did somewhat sharpely take vp those who went about to gratifie the people therein: and called them people-pleasers, and traitours to the Nobility. Moreouer he said, they nourished against themselues, the naughtie naughtie ſeede and cockle of inſolencie and ſedition, which had bene ſowed and ſcattered abroade amongſt the people, which they ſhould haue cut off, if they had bene wiſe, in their growth: and not (to their owne deſtruction) haue ſuffered the people, to eſtabliſh a magiſtrate for themſelues, of ſo great power and authority, as that man had, to whom they had granted it. Who was alſo to be feared, becauſe he obtained what he would, and did nothing but what he liſted, neither paſſed for any obedience to the Conſuls, but liued in all liberty, acknowledging no ſuperiour to command him, ſauing the onely heads and authours of their faction, whom he called his magiſtrats. Therefore ſaid he, they that gaue counſell, and perſwaded that the corne ſhould be giuen out to the common people gratis, as they vſed to do in the cities of Greece, where the people had more abſolute power, did but onely nouriſh their diſobedience, which would breake out in the end, to the vtter ruine and ouerthrow of the whole ſtate. For they will not thinke it is done in recompence of their ſeruice paſt, ſithence they know well enough they haue ſo oft refuſed to go to the warres, when they were commanded: neither for their mutinies when they went with vs, whereby they haue rebelled and forſaken their countrey: neither for their accuſations which their flatterers haue preferred vnto them, and they haue receiued, & made good againſt the Senate: but they will rather iudge, we giue and grant them this, as abaſing our ſelues, and ſtanding in feare of them, and glad to flatter them euery way. By this means their diſobedience will ſtill grow worſe and worſe: and they will neuer leaue to practiſe new ſedition and vprores. Therfore it were a great folly for vs, me thinks to do it: yea, ſhall I ſay more? we ſhould if we were wiſe, take from them their Tribuneſhip, which moſt manifeſtly is the embaſing of the Conſulſhip, and the cauſe of the diuiſion of their city. The ſtate whereof as it ſtandeth, is not now as it was wont to be, but becometh diſmembred in two factions, which maintaines alwaies ciuill diſſention and diſcord between vs, and will neuer ſuffer vs againe to be vnited into one body. Martius dilating the matter with many ſuch like reaſons, wonne all the yong men, & almoſt all the rich men to his opinion: inſomuch as they rang it out, that he was the only man, and alone in the city, who ſtood out againſt the people, and neuer flattered them. There were only a few old men that ſpake againſt him, fearing leſt ſome miſchiefe might fall out vpon it, as indeed there followed no great good afterward. For the Tribunes of the people, being preſent at this conſultation of the Senate, when they ſaw that the opinio of Martius was confirmed with the more voices, they left the Senate, and went downe to the people, crying out for helpe, and that they would aſſemble to ſaue their Tribunes. Hereupon the people ranne on head in tumult together, before whom the words that Martius ſpake in the Senate were openly reported: which the people ſo ſtomacked, that euen in that furie they were ready to fly vpon the whole Senate. But the Tribunes laid all the fault and burthen wholly vpon Martius, and ſent their ſergeants foorthwith to arreſt him, preſently to appeare in perſon before the people, to anſwer the words he had ſpoken in the Senate. Martius ſtoutly withſtood theſe officers that came to arreſt him. Then the Tribunes in their owne perſons, accompanied with the Ædiles, went to fetch him by force, and ſo laid violent hands vpon him. Howbeit the noble Patricians gathering together about him, made the Tribunes giue backe, and laid ſore vpon the Ædiles: ſo for that time, the night parted them, and the tumult appeaſed. The next morning betimes, the Conſuls ſeeing the people in an vprore, running to the market place out of all parts of the city, they were afraid leſt all the city would together by the eares: wherfore aſſembling the Senate in all haſt, they declared how it ſtood them vpon, to appeaſe the fury of the people, with ſome gentle words, or gratefull decrees in their fauour: and moreouer, like wiſe men they ſhould conſider, it was now no time to ſtand at defence and in contention, nor yet to fight for honour againſt the communalty, they being fallen to ſo great an extremity, and offering ſuch imminent danger. Wherefore they were to conſider temperately of things, and to deliuer ſome preſent and gentle pacification. The moſt part of the Senatours that were preſent at this councell, thought this opinion beſt, & gaue their conſents vnto it. Wherupon the Conſuls riſing out of councel, went to ſpeak vnto the people as gently as they could, and they did pacifie their furie and anger, purging the Senate of all the vniuſt accuſations laid vpon them, and vſed great modeſty in perſwading them, and alſo in reprouing the faults they had committed. And as for the reſt, that touched the ſale of corne, they promiſed there ſhould be no diſliking offered them in the price. So the moſt part of the people being pacified, and appearing ſo plainely by the great ſilence that was among them, as yeelding to the Conſuls, and liking wel of their words: the Tribunes then of the people

roſe out of their ſeates, and ſaid: Foraſmuch as the Senate yeelded vnto reaſon, the people alſo for their part, as became them, did likewiſe giue place vnto them: but notwithſtanding, they would that Martius ſhould come in perſon to anſwer to the articles they had deuiſed. Firſt, whether he had not ſollicited and procured the Senate to change the preſent ſtate of the commonweale, and to take the ſoueraigne authoritie out of the peoples hands. Next, when he was ſent for by authoritie of their officers, why he did contemptuouſly reſiſt and diſobey. Laſtly, ſeeing he had driuen and beaten the Ædiles into the market place before all the world: if in doing this, he had not done as much as in him lay, to raiſe ciuill wars, and to ſet one citizen againſt another. All this was ſpoken to one of theſe two ends, either that Martius againſt his nature ſhould be cõſtrained to humble himſelfe, and to abaſe his haughtie and fierce mind: or els if he continued ſtill in his ſtoutneſſe, he ſhould incurre the peoples diſpleaſure and ill will ſo far, that he ſhould neuer poſſibly win them againe. Which they hoped would rather fall out ſo, then otherwiſe: as indeed they geſſed vnhappily, conſidering Martius nature & diſpoſition. So Martius came and preſented himſelfe to anſwer their accuſations againſt him, & the people held their peace, and gaue attentiue eare, to heare what he would ſay. But where they thought to haue heard very humble and lowly words come from him, he began not only to vſe his wonted boldneſſe of ſpeaking (which of it ſelfe was very rough and vnpleaſant, and did more aggrauate his accuſation, then purge his innocencie) but alſo gaue himſelfe in his words to thunder, and looke therewithall ſo grimly, as though he made no reckoning of the matter. This ſtirred coales among the people, who were in wonderfull furie at it, & their hate and malice grew ſo toward him, that they could hold no longer, beare, nor indure his brauery and careleſſe boldneſſe. Whereupon Sicinius, the cruelleſt and ſtouteſt of the Tribunes, after he had whiſpered a litle with his companions, did openly pronounce in the face of all the people, Martius as cõdemned by the Tribunes to die. Then preſently he commanded the Ædiles to apprehend him, and cary him ſtraight to the rocke Tarpeian, and to caſt him headlong down the ſame. When the Ædiles came to lay hands vpon Martius to do that they were commanded, diuers of the people themſelues thought it too cruell and violent a deed. The noble men being much troubled to ſee ſo much force and rigour vſed, began to crie aloud; helpe Martius: ſo thoſe that laid hands on him being repulſed, they compaſſed him in round among themſelues, and ſome of them holding vp their hands to the people, beſought them not to handle him thus cruelly. But neither their words not crying out could ought preuaile, the tumult and hurly burly was ſo great, vntill ſuch time as the Tribunes own friends and kinſemen weying with themſelues the impoſſibleneſſe to conuey Martius to execution, without great ſlaughter and murder of the nobilitie: did perſwade and aduiſe not to proceed in ſo violent and extraordinary a ſort, as to put ſuch a man to death, without lawfull proceſſe in law, but that they ſhould referre the ſentence of his death, to the free voice of the people. Then Sicinius bethinking himſelfe a litle, did aske the Patricians, for what cauſe they tooke Martius out of the officers hands that went to do execution? The Patricians asked him againe, why they would of themſelues ſo cruelly and wickedly put to death, ſo noble and valiant a Romaine as Martius was, and that without law and iuſtice? Well then, ſaid Sicinius, if that be the matter, let there be no quarrell or diſſention againſt the people: for they do grant your demand, that his cauſe ſhall be heard according to the law. Therefore, ſaid he to Martius, we do will and charge you to appeare before the people, the third day of our next ſitting & aſſembly here, to make your purgation for ſuch articles as ſhall be obiected againſt you, that by free voice the people may giue ſentence vpon you as ſhall pleaſe them. The noble men were glad then of the adiornment, and were much pleaſed they had gotten Martius out of this danger. In the meane ſpace, before the third day of their next ſeſſion came about, the ſame being kept euery ninth day continually at Rome, whereupon they call it now in Latine, Nundina: there fell out war againſt the Antiates, which gaue ſome hope to the nobility, that this adiornment wold come to litle effect, thinking that this warre would hold them ſo long, as that the furie of the people againſt him would be well ſwaged, or vtterly forgotten, by reaſon of the trouble of the wars. But contrary to expectation, the peace was concluded preſently with the Antiates, and the people returned againe to Rome. Then the Patricians aſſembled oftentimes together, to conſult how they might ſtand to Martius, and keepe the Tribunes from occaſion to cauſe the people to mutine againe, and riſe againſt the Nobility. And there Appius Claudius (one that was taken euer as an heauie enemy to the people) did auow and proteſt, that they would vtterly abaſe the authoritie of the Senate

Senate, and deſtroy the common-weale, if they would ſuffer the common people to haue authoritie by voyces to giue iudgement againſt the Nobilitie. On the other ſide againe, the moſt ancient Senatours, and ſuch as were giuen to fauour the common people, ſaid: that when the people ſhould ſee they had authoritie of life and death in their hands, they would not be ſo cruell and fierce, but gentle & ciuill. More alſo, that it was not for contempt of Nobilitie or the Senate, that they ſought to haue the authoritie of iuſtice in their hands, as a preheminence and prerogatiue of honour: but becauſe they feared, that themſelues ſhould be contemned and hated of the Nobilitie. So as they were perſwaded, that ſo ſoone as they gaue them authoritie to iudge by voyces, they would leaue all enuie and malice to condemne any. Martius ſeeing the Senate in great doubt how to reſolue, partly for the loue and goodwill the Nobilitie did beare him, and partly for the feare they ſtood in of the people: asked aloud of the Tribunes, what matter they would burden them with? The Tribunes anſwered him, that they would ſhew how he did aſpire to be King, and would proue that all his actions tended to vſurpe tyrannicall power ouer ROME. Martius with that, riſing vpon his feete, ſaid: that thereupon he did willingly offer himſelfe to the people, to be tryed vpon that accuſation: and that if it were proued by him, he had ſo much as once thought of any ſuch matter, that he would then refuſe no kind of puniſhment they would offer him: conditionally (quoth he) that you charge me with nothing elſe beſide, and that ye do not alſo abuſe the Senate. They promiſed they would not. Vnder theſe conditions the iudgement was agreed vpon, and the people aſſembled. And firſt of all the Tribunes would in any caſe (whatſoeuer became of it) that the people ſhould proceed to giue their voyces by Tribes, and not by hundreds: for by this meanes the multitude of the poore needie people (and all ſuch rabble as had nothing to loſe, and had leſſe regard of honeſty before their eyes) came to be of greater force (becauſe their voyces were numbred by the polle) then the noble honeſt citizens, whoſe perſons and purſe did dutifully ſerue the common-wealth in their warres. And then when the Tribunes ſaw they could not proue he went about to make himſelfe King, they beganne to broach afreſh the former words that Martius had ſpoken in the Senate, in hindering the diſtribution of the corne at meane price vnto the common people, and perſwading alſo to take the office of Tribuneſhip from them. And for the third, they charged him anew, that he had not made the common diſtribution of the ſpoile he had gotten in the inuading the territories of the ANTIATES: but had of his owne authoritie deuided it among them, who were with him in that iourney. But this matter was moſt ſtrange of all to Martius, looking leaſt to haue bene burdened with that, as with any matter of offence. Whereupon being burdened on the ſodaine, and hauing no ready excuſe to make euen at that inſtant: he began to fall a praiſing of the ſouldiers that had ſerued with him in that iourney. But thoſe that were not with him, being the greater number, cryed out ſo loude, and made ſuch a noiſe that he could not be heard. To conclude, when they came to tell the voyces of the Tribes, there were three voyces odde, which condemned him to be baniſhed for euer. After declaration of the ſentence, the people made ſuch ioy, as they neuer reioyced more for any battell they had wonne vpon their enemies, they were ſo braue and liuely, and went home ſo iocondly from the aſſembly, for triumph of this ſentence. The Senate againe in contrarie manner were as ſadde and heauie, repenting themſelues beyond meaſure, that they had not rather determined to haue done and ſuffered any thing whatſoeuer, before the common people ſhould ſo arrogantly and outragiouſly haue abuſed their authoritie. There needed no difference of garments I warrant you, nor outward ſhewes to know a Plebeian from a Patrician, for they were eaſily diſcerned by their lookes. For he that was on the peoples ſide, looked chearefully on the matter: but he that was ſad, and hung downe his head, he was ſure of the Noble mens ſide. Sauing Martius alone, who neither in his countenance nor in his gate, did euer ſhew himſelfe abaſhed, or once let fall his great courage: but he onely of all other gentlemen that were angry at his fortune, did outwardly ſhew no manner of paſſion, nor care at all of himſelfe. Not that he did patiently beare and temper his euill hap, in reſpect of any reaſon he had, or by his quiet condition: but becauſe he was ſo caried away with the vehemencie of anger, and deſire of reuenge, that he had no ſence nor feeling of the hard ſtate he was in, which the common people iudge not to be ſorrow, although indeed it be the very ſame. For when ſorow (as you wold ſay) is ſet on fire, then it is conuerted into ſpite and malice, and driueth away for that time all fainteſſe of heart and naturall feare. And this is the cauſe why the cholericke man is ſo altered and mad in his actions, as a man on fire with a burning ague: for when a mans heart is troubled within, his pulse will beate maruellous strongly, Now that Martius was euen in that taking, it appeared true soone after by his doings. For when he was come home to his house again, & had taken his leaue of his mother and wife, finding them weeping and shriking out for sorrow, and had also comforted and perswaded them to be content with his chance: he went immediatly to the gate of the citie, accompanied with a great number of Patricians, that brought him thither, from whence he went on his way with three or foure of his friends onely, taking nothing with him, nor requesting any thing of any man. So he remained a few dayes in the country at his houses, turmoyled with sundry sorts & kinds of thoughts, such as the fire of his choler did stirre vp. In the end seeing he could resolue no way, to take a profitable or honourable course, but onely was pricked forward still to be reuenged of the ROMAINES: he thought to raise vp some great warres against them, by their neerest neighbours. Whereupon he thought it his best way, first to stirre vp the VOLSCES against them, knowing they were yet able enough in strength and riches to encounter them, notwithstanding their former losses they had receiued not long before, and that their power was not so much impaired, as their malice and desire was increased to be reuenged of the ROMAINES. Now in the city of ANTIVM, there was one called Tullus Aufidius, who for his riches, as also for his nobilitie and valiantnesse was honoured among the VOLSCES as a King. Martius knew very well that Tullus did more malice and enuy him then he did all the ROMAINS besides: because that many times in battels where they met, they were euer at the encounter one against another, like lusty couragious youths, striuing in all emulation of honor and had encountered many times together. Insomuch as besides the common quarrell betwene them, there was bred a maruellous priuate hate one against another. Yet notwithstanding, considering that Tullus Aufidius was a man of a great mind, and that he aboue all other of the VOLSCES most desired reuenge of the ROMAINES, for the iniuries they had done vnto them: he did an act that confirmed the words of an ancient Poet to be true, who said:

Tullus Aufidius, a great person among the Volsces.

It is a thing full hard, mans anger to withstand,
If it be stiffely bent to take an enterprise in hand.
For then most men will haue the thing that they desire,
Although it cost their liues therefore, such force hath wicked ire.

And so did he. For he disguised himselfe in such array and attire, as he thought no man could euer haue knowne him for the person he was, seeing him in that apparell he had vpon his backe: and as Homer said of Vlisses:

So did he enter into the enemies towne.

Coriolanus disguised, goeth to Antium, a city of the Volsces.

It was euen twi-light when he entred the city of ANTIVM, and many people met him in the streets, but no man knew him. So he went directly to Tullus Aufidius house, and when he came thither, he got him vp straight to the chimney harth, and sate him downe, and spake not a word to any man, his face all muffled ouer. They of the house spying him, wondred what he should be, and yet they durst not bid him rise. For il fauouredly muffled and disguised as he was, yet there appeared a certaine maiestie in his countenance, and in his silence: whereupon they went to Tullus who was at supper, to tell him of the strange disguising of this man. Tullus rose presently from the board, and coming towards him, asked him what he was, and wherfore he came. Then Martius vnmuffled himselfe, and after he had pawsed awhile, making no answer, he said vnto him: If thou knowest me not yet, Tullus and seeing me, doest not perhappes beleeue me to be the man I am indeed, I must of necessitie bewray my selfe to be that I am. I am Caius Martius, who hath done to thy selfe particularly, and to all the VOLSCES generally, great hurt and mischiefe, which I cannot denie for my surname of Coriolanus that I beare. For I neuer had other benefite nor recompence of the true and painfull seruice I haue done, and the extreme dangers I haue bene in, but this onely surname: a good memorie and witnesse of the malice and displeasure thou shouldest beare me. Indeed the name only remaineth with me: for the rest, the enuie & crueltie of the people of ROME haue taken from me, by the sufferance of the dastardly nobilitie and magistrates, who haue forsaken me, and let me be banished by the people. This extremitie hath now driuen me to come as a poore suter, to take thy chimney harth, not of any hope I haue to saue my life thereby. For if I had feared death, I would not haue come hither to haue put my selfe in hazard: but prickt forward with desire to be reuenged of them that thus haue banished me, which now I do beginne, in putting my person into the hands of their enemies.

Coriolanus oration to Tullus Aufidius.

enemies. Wherfore, if thou haſt any heart to be wrecked of the iniuries thy enemies haue done thee, ſpeed thee now, & let my miſery ſerue thy turne, & ſo vſe it, as my ſeruice may be a benefit to the VOLSCES: promiſing thee, that I will fight with better good will for all you, then I did whē I was againſt you, knowing that they fight more valiātly, who know the force of the enemy then ſuch as haue neuer proued it. And if it be ſo that thou dare not, and that thou art wearie to proue fortune any more, then am I alſo wearie to liue any longer. And it were no wiſedome in thee, to ſaue the life of him, who hath bene heretofore thy mortall enemy, and whoſe ſeruice now can nothing help nor pleaſure thee. Tullus hearing what he ſaid, was a marueſlous glad man, and taking him by the hand, he ſaid vnto him: Stand vp, ô Martius, and be of good cheare, for in proferring thy ſelfe vnto vs, thou doeſt vs great honour: and by this means thou maiſt hope alſo of greater things at all the VOLSCES hands. So he feaſted him for that time, & entertained him in the honourableſt manner he could, talking with him of no other matter at that preſent: but within few dayes after, they fell to conſultation together in what ſort they ſhould beginne their wars. Now on the other ſide, the city of ROME was in marueilous vproare & diſcord, the nobilitie againſt the communaltie, and chiefly for Martius condemnation and baniſhment. Moreouer the Prieſts, the Soothſayers, and priuate men alſo, came and declared to the Senate certaine ſights and wonders in the aire, which they had ſeene, and were to be conſidered of: amongſt the which ſuch a viſion happened: There was a citizen of ROME called Titus Latinus, a man of meane quality and condition, but otherwiſe an honeſt ſober man, giuen to a quiet life, without ſuperſtition, and much leſſe to vanity or lying. This man had a viſion in his dreame, in the which he thought that Iupiter appeared vnto him, and commanded him to ſignifie to the Senate, that they had cauſed a very vile lewd dauncer to go before the proceſſion: and ſaid, the firſt time this viſion had appeared vnto him, he made no reckoning of it: and comming againe another time in his mind, he made not much more account of the matter then before. In the end, he ſaw one of his ſons die, who had the beſt nature and condition of all his brethren: and ſuddenly he himſelfe was ſo taken in all his lims, that he became lame and impotent. Herupon he told the whole circumſtance of this viſion before the Senate, ſitting vpon his litle couch or bed, whereon he was caried on mens armes: and he had no ſooner reported this viſion to the Senate, but he preſently felt his body and lims reſtored againe to their former ſtrength and vſe. So raiſing vp himſelf vpon his couch, he got vp on his feet at that inſtant, & walked home to his houſe, without helpe of any man. The Senate being amazed at this matter, made diligent enquirie to vnderſtand the truth: and in the end they found there was ſuch a thing: There was one that had deliuered a bondman of his that had offended him, into the hands of other ſlaues and bondmen, and had commanded them to whip him vp and downe the market place, and afterwards to kill him: and as they had him in execution, whipping him cruelly, they did ſo martyr the poore wretch, that for the cruell ſmart and paine he felt, he turned and writhed his body in ſtrange and pitifull ſort. The proceſſion by chance came by euen at the ſame time, and many that followed it, were heartily moued & offended with the ſight, ſaying: that this was no good ſight to behold, nor meet to be met in proceſſion time. But for all this, there was nothing done: ſauing they blamed and rebuked him that puniſhed his ſlaue ſo cruelly. For the ROMAINS at that time, did vſe their bondmen very gently, becauſe they themſelues did labor with their owne hands, and liued with them and among them: and therfore they did vſe them the more gently and familiarly. For the greateſt puniſhment they gaue a ſlaue that had offended, was this. They made him carrie a limmer on his ſhoulders that is faſtened to the axeltree of a coach, and compelled him to go vp and downe in that ſort amongſt all their neighbours. He that had once abidden this puniſhment, and was ſeene in that maner, was proclaimed and tried in euery market towne: ſo that no man would euer truſt him after, and they called him Furciſer, becauſe the LATINES call the wood that runneth into the axeltree of the coach, Furca, as much to ſay, as a forke. Now when Latinus had made report to the Senate of the viſion that had happened to him, they were deuiſing whō this vnpleaſant dauncer ſhould be, that went before the proceſſion. Therupon certaine that ſtood by, remembred the poore ſlaue that was ſo cruelly whipped through the market place, whom they afterwards put to death: and the thing that made him remember it, was the ſtrange and rare manner of his puniſhment. The Prieſts hereupon were repaired vnto for their aduice: they were wholly of opinion, that it was the whipping of the ſlaue. So they cauſed the ſlaues maſter to be puniſhed, and began againe a new proceſſion, and all other ſhewes and ſights in honour of swer. But hereby appeareth plainely, how king Numa did wisely ordaine all other ceremonies concerning deuotion to the gods, and specially this custome which he established, to bring the people to religion. For when the magistrats, bishops, priests, or other religious ministers go about any diuine seruice, or matter of religion, an herauld euer goeth before them, crying out aloud, Hoc age: as to say, do this, or mind this. Hereby they are specially commaunded, wholly to dispose themselues to serue God, leauing all other businesse and matters aside: knowing well enough, that whatsoeuer most men do, they do it as in a manner constrained vnto it. But the ROMAINES did euer vse to begin againe their sacrifices, processions, playes, and such like shewes, done in honour of the gods, not onely vpon such an occasion, but vpon lighter causes then that. As when they went on procession through the citie, and did carrie the images of their gods, and such other like holy reliques vpon open hallowed coaches or chariots, called in Latine Thensa: one of the coach horses that drew them stood still, and would draw no more: and because also the coach-man tooke the raines of his bridle with the left hand, they ordained that the procession should be begunne againe anew. Of late time also, they did renew and beginne a sacrifice thirty times one after another, because they thought still there fell out one fault or other in the same: so holy and deuout were they to the gods. Now Tullus and Martius had secret conference with the greatest personages of the citie of ANTIVM, declaring vnto them that now they had good time offered them to make warre with the ROMAINES, while they were in dissention one with another. They answered them, the were ashamed to breake the league, considering that they were sworne to keep peace for two yeares. Howbeit, shortly after, the ROMAINS gaue them great occasion to make warre with them. For on a holy day common playes being kept in ROME, vpon some suspition or false report, they made proclamation by sound of trumper, that all the VOLSCES should auoid out of ROME before Sunne set. Some thinke this was a craft and deceit of Martius, who sent one to ROME to the Consuls, to accuse the VOLSCES falsely, aduertising them how they had made a conspiracie to set vpon them while they were busie in seeing these games, and also to set their city on fire. This open proclamation made all the VOLSCES more offended with the ROMAINES, then euer they were before: and Tullus aggrauating the matter, did so inflame the VOLSCES against them, that in the end they sent their ambassadours to ROME, to summon them to deliuer their lands and townes againe, which they had taken from them in times past, or to looke for present warres. The ROMAINES hearing this, were maruellously netled: and made no other answer but thus: If the VOLSCES be the first that begin warre, the ROMAINES will be the last that will end it. Incontinently vpon returne of the VOLSCES ambassadors, and deliuery of the ROMAINES answer, Tullus caused an assembly generall to be made of the VOLSCES, and concluded to make warre vpon the ROMAINES. This done, Tullus did counsell them to take Martius into their seruice, and not to mistrust him for the remembrance of any thing past, but boldly to trust him in any matter to come: for he would do them more seruice in fighting for them, then euer he did them displeasure in fighting against them. So Martius was called forth, who spake so excellently in the presence of them all, that he was thought no lesse eloquent in tongue, then warlike in shew: and declared himself both expert in wars, and wise with valiantnesse. Thus he was ioyned in commission with Tullus as generall of the VOLSCES, hauing absolute authoritie betweene them to follow and pursue the warres. But Martius fearing lest tract of time to bring this army together with all the munition and furniture of the VOLSCES, would rob him of the meane he had to execute his purpose and intent, left order with the rulers and chiefe of the citie, to assemble the rest of their power, and to prepare all necessary prouision for the campe. Then he with the lightest souldiers he had, and that were willing to follow him, stole away vpon the sodaine, and marched with all speed, and entred the teritories of ROME, before the ROMAINES heard any newes of his coming. Insomuch as the VOLSCES found such spoile in the fields, as they had more then they could spend in their campe, and were wearie to driue and carrie away that they had. Howbeit the gaine of the spoile and the hurt they did to the ROMAINES in this inuasion, was the left part of his intent: for his chiefest purpose was, to increase still the malice and dissention betweene the Nobilitie and the communaltie: and to draw that on, he was very carefull to keepe the Noble mens lands and goods safe from harme and burning, but spoiled all the whole country besides, and would suffer no man to take or hurt any thing of the noble mens. This made greater stir & broile between the nobility & the people, then was before. For the noble men fell out with the people, because they

they had ſo vniuſtly baniſhed a man of ſo great valour and power. The people on the other ſide, accuſed the Nobility, how they had procured Martius to make theſe wars to be reuēged of thē: becauſe it pleaſed them to ſee their goods burnt & ſpoyled before their eies, whilſt themſelues were well at eaſe, and did behold the peoples loſſes and misfortunes, knowing their own goods ſafe and out of danger: & how the war was not made againſt the noble men, that had the enemy abroad, to keep that they had in ſafety. Now Martius hauing done his firſt exploit (which made the VOLSCES bolder, and leſſe fearefull of the ROMAINES) brought home all the army again, without loſſe of any man. After their whole army (which was maruellous great, & very forward to ſeruice) was aſſembled in one campe, they agreed to leaue part of it for gariſō in the country about, & the other part ſhould go on, and make the war vpon the ROMAINES. So Martius bad Tullus chooſe, and take which of the two charges he liked beſt. Tullus made him anſwer, he knew by experience that Martius was no leſſe valiant then himſelfe, and how he euer had better fortune and good hap in all battels, then himſelfe had. Therfore he thought it beſt for him to haue the leading of thoſe that would make the wars abroad, and himſelfe would keep home, to prouide for the ſafety of the cities of his countrey, and to furniſh the campe alſo of all neceſſary prouiſion abroad. So Martius being ſtronger then before, went firſt of all vnto the city of CERCEES, inhabited by the ROMAINES, who willingly yeelded themſelues, and therefore had no hurt. From thence he entred the countrey of the LATINES, imagining the ROMAINES would fight with him there to defend the LATINES, who were their confederates, and had many times ſent vnto the ROMAINES for their aide. But on the one ſide, the people of ROME were very ill willing to go: and on the other ſide, the Conſuls being vpon going out of their office, would not hazard themſelues for ſo ſmall a time: ſo that the ambaſſadours of the LATINES returned home againe, and did no good. Then Martius did beſiege their cities, and hauing taken by force the towne of the TOLERINIANS, VICANIANS, PEDANIANS, and the BOLANIANS, who made reſiſtance, he ſacked all their goods, and took thē priſoners. Such as did yeeld themſelues willingly vnto him, he was as carefull as poſſible might be, to defend them from hurt: and becauſe they ſhould receiue no damage by his will, he remoued his campe as farre from their confines as he could. Afterwards, he took the city of BOLES by aſſault, being about an hundred furlong from ROME, where he had a maruellous great ſpoile, and put euery man to the ſword that was able to carry weapon. The other VOLSCES that were appointed to remaine in gariſon for defence of their countrey, hearing this good newes, would tarry no longer at home, but armed themſelues, and ranne to Martius campe, ſaying they did acknowledge no other captaine but him. Hereupon his fame ranne through all ITALY, and euery one praiſed him for a valiant captaine, for that by change of one man for another, ſuch and ſo ſtrange euents fell out in the ſtate. In this while, all went ſtill to wracke at ROME. For to come into the field to fight with the enemy, they could not abide to heare of it, they were one ſo much againſt another, and full of ſeditious words, the Nobilitie againſt the people, and the people againſt the Nobility. Vntil they had intelligence at the length, that the enemies had laid ſiege to the city of LAVINIVM, in the which were all the temples & images of their gods their protectours, and from whence came firſt their ancient originall, for that AEneas at his firſt arriuall into ITALY did build that city. Then fell there out a maruellous ſodaine change of mind among the people, and farre more ſtrange and contrary in the Nobility. For the people thought it good to repeale the condemnation & exile of Martius. The Senate aſſembled vpon it, would in no caſe yeeld to that: who either did it of a ſelfe will to be contrary to the peoples deſire: or becauſe Martius ſhould not returne thorough the grace and fauour of the people. Or els, becauſe they were throughly angry and offended with him, that he would ſet vpon the whole, being offended but by a few, and in his doings would ſhew himſelfe an open enemy beſides vnto his country: notwithſtanding the moſt part of them tooke the wrong they had done him, in maruellous ill part, and as if the iniury had bene done vnto themſelues. Report being made of the Senates reſolution, the people found thēſelues in a ſtraight: for they could authoriſe and confirme nothing by their voices, vnleſſe it had bene firſt propounded and ordained by the Senate. But Martius hearing this ſtirre about him, was in a greater rage with them then before: inſomuch as he raiſed his ſiege incontinently before the city of LAVINIVM, and going towards ROME, lodged his campe within forty furlong of the city, at the ditches called Cluilia. His incamping ſo neere ROME, did put all the whole citie in a wonderfull feare: howbeit for the preſent time it appeaſed the ſedition and diſſention betwixt the Nobility and the people, For there was no Consull, Senatour, nor Magistrate, that durst once contrary the opinion of the people, for the calling home againe of Martius. When they saw the women in a maruellous feare, running vp and downe the city: the temples of the gods full of old people, weeping bitterly in their prayers to the gods: & finally, not a man either wise or hardy to prouide for their safety: then they were all of opinion, that the people had reason to call home Martius againe, to reconcile themselues to him, and that the Senate on the contrary part, were in maruellous great fault to be angry and in choler with him, when it stood them vpon rather to haue gone out & intreated him. So they all agreed together to send ambassadors vnto him, to let him vnderstand how his countreymen did call him home againe, and restored him to all his goods, and besought him to deliuer them from this warre. The ambassadours that were sent, were Martius familiar friends & acquaintance, who looked at the least for a curteous welcome of him, as of their familiar friend & kinsman. Howbeit they found nothing lesse: for at their coming they were brought through the campe, to the place where he was set in his chaire of state, with a maruellous and an vnspeakable maiesty, hauing the chiefest men of the VOLSCES about him: so he commanded them to declare openly the cause of their coming. Which they deliuered in the most humble and lowly words they possibly could deuise, and with all modest countenance and behauiour agreable to the same. When they had done their message: for the iniury they had done him, he answered them very hotly, and in great choler: but as Generall of the VOLSCES, he willed them to restore vnto the VOLSCES, all their lands and cities they had taken from them in former warres: and moreouer, that they should giue them the like honour and freedome of ROME, as they had before giuen to the LATINES. For otherwise they had no other meane to end this warre, if they did not grant these honest and iust conditions of peace. Thereupon he gaue them thirtie dayes respite to make him answer. So the ambassadours returned straight to ROME, and Martius forthwith departed with his armie out of the teritories of the ROMAINES. This was the first matter wherewith the VOLSCES (that most enuied Martius glorie and authoritie) did charge Martius with. Among those, Tullus was chiefe: who though he had receiued no priuate iniury or displeasure of Martius, yet the common fault and imperfection of mans nature wrought in him, and it grieued him to see his owne reputation blemished through Martius great fame and honour, and so himselfe to be lesse esteemed of the VOLSCES then he was before. This fell out the more, because euery man honoured Martius, and thought he onely could do all, and that all other gouernours and captaines must be content with such credite and authoritie as he would please to countenance them with. From hence they deriued all their first accusations and secret murmurings against Martius. For priuate captaines conspiring against him, were very angry with him: and gaue it out, that the remouing of the campe was a manifest treason, not of the townes, nor forts, nor of armes, but of time and occasion, which was a losse of great importance, because it was that which in reason might both loose and bind all; and preserue the whole. Now Martius hauing giuen the ROMAINES thirty dayes respite for their answer, and specially because the wars haue not accustomed to make any great changes in lesse space of time then that, he thought it good yet, not to lie asleepe and idle all the while, but went & destroyed the lands of the enemies allies, & tooke seuen great cities of theirs well inhabited, and the ROMAINES durst not once put themselues into the field, to come to their aide and helpe, they were so faint-hearted, so mistrustfull, and loth besides to make warrs. Insomuch as they properly resembled the bodies paralyticke and loosed of their limmes and members, as those which through the palsey haue lost all their sence and feeling. Wherfore, the time of peace expired, Martius being returned into the dominions of the ROMAINES againe with all his armie, they sent another ambassade vnto him, to pray peace, and the remoue of the VOLSCES out of their countrey: that afterwards they might with better leisure fall to such agreements together, as should be thought most meete and necessary. For the ROMAINES were no men that would euer yeeld for feare. But if he thought the VOLSCES had any ground to demand reasonable articles and conditions, all that they woulde reasonably aske should be granted vnto by the ROMAINES, who of themselues would willingly yeeld to reason, conditionally, that they did lay downe armes. Martius to that answered: that as Generall of the VOLSCES he would reply nothing vnto it: but yet as a ROMAINE citizen, he would counsell them to let fall their pride, and to be conformable to reason, if they were wise: and that they should returne againe within three dayes, deliuering vp the articles agreed vpon, which he

he had first deliuered them. Otherwise, that he would no more giue them assurance or safe conduct to returne againe into his camp, with such vaine and friuolous messages. When the Ambassadors were returned to Rome, and had reported Martius answer to the Senate: their city being in extreme danger, and as it were in a terrible storme or tempest, they threw out (as the common prouerb saith) their holy anker. For then they appointed all the Bishops, Priests, Ministers of the gods, and keepers of holy things, & all the augures or soothsayers, which foreshew things to come by obseruation of the flying of birds (which is an old ancient kind of prophecying and diuination amongst the Romains) to goto Martius apparelled, as when they do their sacrifices: and first to intreate him to leaue off warre, and then that he would speake to his country men, and conclude peace with the Volsces. Martius suffered them to come into his camp, but yet he granted them nothing the more, neither did he entertaine them or speake more curteously to them, then he did the first time that they came vnto him, sauing only that he willed thē to take the one of the two: either to accept peace vnder the first conditions offered, or else to receiue warre. When all this goodly rabble of superstitious priests were returned, it was determined in counsell that none should go out of the gates of the city, and that they should watch and ward vpon the walles to repulse their enemies if they came to assault them: referring themselues and all their hope to time, and fortunes vncertaine fauour, not knowing otherwise how to remedy the danger. Now all the city was full of tumult, feare, and maruellous doubt what would happen, vntill at the length there fell out such a like matter, as Homer oft times said they would least haue thought of. For in great matters, that happen seldome, Homer saith, and crieth out in this sort:

The Priests and soothsayers sent to Coriolanus.

The goddesse Pallas she, with her faire glistering eyes,
Did put into his mind such thoughts, and made him so deuise.

And in another place.

But sure some god hath tane out of the peoples mind,
Both wit and vnderstanding eke, and haue therewith assigned.
Some other simple spirit, in stead thereof to bide,
That so they might their doings all, for lacke of wit misguide.

And in another place:

The people of themselues did either it consider, or else some god instructed them, and so they ioyn'd together.

Many reckon not of Homer, as referring matters vnpossible, and fables of no likelihood or troth, vnto mans reason, freewill, or iudgement, which indeed is not his meaning. But things true and likely, he maketh to depend of our owne free will and reason. For he oft speaketh these words:

I haue thought it in my noble heart.

And in another place:

Achilles angry was, and sory for to heare
Him so to say, his heauy breast was fraught with pensiue feare.

And in another place:

Bellerophon (she) could not moue with her faire tongue,
So honest and so vertuous, he was the rest among.

But in wondrous and extraordinary things, which are done by secret inspirations & motions, he doth not say that God taketh away from man his choice and freedome of will, but that he doth moue it: neither that he doth work desire in vs, but obiecteth to our minds certain imaginations whereby we are led to desire and thereby doth not make this our action forced, but openeth the way to our will, and addeth thereto courage, and hope of successe. For either we must say, that the gods medle not with the causes and beginnings of our actions: or else what other meanes haue they to helpe & further men? It is apparent that they handle not our bodies, nor moue not our feete and hands, when there is occasion to vse them: but that part of our mind from which these motions proceed, is induced thereto, or caried away by such obiects and reasons, as God offereth vnto it. Now the Romaine Ladies & gentlewomen did visite al the temples and gods of the same, to make their prayers vnto them: but the greatest Ladies (and more part of them) were continually about the altar of Iupiter Capitolin, among which troupe by name, was Valeria, Publicolaes own sister. The selfe same Publicola, who did such notable seruice to the Romains, both in peace and wars, and was dead also certaine yeares before, as we haue declared in his life.

Valeria, Publicolaes ſiſter.

His ſiſter Valeria was greatly honored and reuerenced among all the ROMAINS: and did ſo modeſtly and wiſely behaue her ſelfe, that ſhe did not ſhame nor diſhonour the houſe ſhe came off. So ſhe ſodainely fell into ſuch a fancy, as we haue rehearſed before, and had (by ſome god as I think) taken hold of a noble deuice. Wherupon ſhe roſe and the other Ladies with her, and they all together went ſtraight to the houſe of Volumnia, Martius mother: and coming in to her, found her, and Martius wife her daughter in law, ſet together, and hauing her husband Martius yong children in her lap. Now al the traine of theſe Ladies, ſitting in a ring round about her, Valeria firſt began to ſpeake in this ſort vnto her: We ladies, are come to viſite you ladies (my lady Volumnia and Virgilia) by no direction from the Senate, nor commandement of other Magiſtrate, but through the inſpiration (as I take it) as ſome god aboue: who hauing taken compaſſion and pitie of our prayers, hath moued vs to come vnto you, to intreate you in a matter, as well beneficial for vs, as alſo for the whole citizens in general, but to your ſelues in ſpecial (if it pleaſe you to credit me) and ſhall redound to your more fame and glory, then the daughters of the SABYNES obtained in former age, when they procured louing peace, in ſtead of hatefull warre, betweene their fathers and their husbands. Come on good Ladies, and let vs go all together vnto Martius, to intreat him to take pitie vpon vs, & alſo to report the troth vnto him, how much you are bound vnto the citizens: who notwithſtanding they haue ſuſtained great hurt and loſſes by him, yet they haue not hitherto ſought reuenge vpon your perſons by any diſcourteous vſage, neither euer conceiued any ſuch thought or intent againſt you, but to deliuer you ſafe into his hands, though thereby they looke for no better grace or clemency from him. When Valeria had ſpoken this vnto them, all the other ladies, together with one voice confirmed that ſhe had ſaid.

Volumnia, Martius mother.

The words of Valeria, vnto Volumnia and Virgilia.

The anſwer of Volumnia to the Romaine Ladies.

Then Volumnia in this ſort did anſwer her: My good Ladies, we are partakers with you of the common miſery and calamity of our country, and yet our griefe exceedeth yours the more, by reaſon of our particular misfortune, to feele the loſſe of my ſon Martius former valiancy & glory, and to ſee his perſon enuironed now with our enemies in armes, rather to ſee him forth comming & ſafe kept, then of any loue to defend his perſon. But yet the greateſt griefe of our heaped miſhaps is to ſee our poore country brought to ſuch extremity, that al the hope of the ſafety and preſeruation therof, is now vnfortunatly caſt vpon vs ſimple women: becauſe we know not what account he will make of vs, ſince he hath caſt from him all care of his naturall country and common-weale, which heretofore he hath holden more deare and precious, then either his mother, wife or children. Notwithſtāding, if ye think we can do good, we wil willingly do what you wil haue vs, bring vs to him I pray you. For if we cānot preuaile, we may yet die at his feet, as hūble ſuters for the ſafety of our country. Her anſwer ended, ſhe took her daughter in law, & Martius children with her, and being accompanied with all the other ROMAINE Ladies, they went in troupe together vnto the VOLSCES campe: whom when they ſaw, they of themſelues did both pitie and reuerence her, and there was not a man among them that once durſt ſay a word vnto her. Now was Martius ſet then in his chaire of ſtate, with all the honors of a Generall, and when he had ſpied the women coming afar off, he maruelled what the matter meant: but afterwards knowing his wife which came foremoſt, he determined at the firſt to perſiſt in his obſtinate and inflexible rancor. But ouercome in the end with natural affection, and being altogether altered to ſee them, his heart would not ſerue him to tarrie their coming to his chaire, but coming downe in haſt, he went to meet them, and firſt he kiſſed his mother, & embraced her a prety while, then his wife & litle children. And nature ſo wrought with him, that the teares fell from his eyes, and he could not keep himſelf from making much of them, but yeelded to the affection of his bloud, as if he had bene violently caried with the fury of a moſt ſwift running ſtreame. After he had thus louingly receiued them, and perceiuing that his mother Volumnia would begin to ſpeake to him, he called the chiefeſt of the counſel of the VOLSCES to heare what ſhe wold ſay. Then ſhe ſpake in this ſort: If we held our peace (my ſonne) and determined not to ſpeake, the ſtate of our poore bodies, & preſent ſight of our rayment, would eaſily bewray to thee what life we haue led at home, ſince thy exile and abode abroad; but think now with thy ſelf, how much more vnfortunate then all the women liuing, we are come hither, conſidering that the ſight which ſhould be moſt pleaſant to all other to behold, ſpightfull fortune had made moſt feare full to vs: making my ſelfe to ſee my ſonne, and my daughter here her husband, beſieging the walls of his natiue countrey: ſo as that which is the onely comfort to all other in their aduerſitie and miſerie, to pray vnto the gods, and to call to them for aide, is the onely thing which plungeth vs into moſt

moſt deepe perplexitie. For we cannot (alas) together pray, both for victory to our countrey, and for ſafety of thy life alſo: but a world of grieuous curſes, yea more then any mortall enemy can heape vpō vs, are forcibly wrapt vp in our prayers. For the bitter ſop of moſt hard choiſe is offered thy wife and children, to forgo one of the two: either to loſe the perſon of thy ſelf, or the nurſe of their natiue country. For my ſelfe (my ſonne) I am determined not to tary, till fortune in my life time do make an end of this warre. For if I cannot perſwade thee, rather to do good vnto both parties then to ouerthrow and deſtroy the one, preferring loue and nature before the malice and calamity of wars, thou ſhalt ſee, my ſonne, and truſt vnto it, thou ſhalt no ſooner march forward to aſſault thy coūtry, but thy foot ſhall treade vpon thy mothers wombe, that brought thee firſt into this world. And I may not deferre to ſee the day, either that my ſon be led priſoner in triumph by his naturall countrymen, or that he himſelfe do triumph of them, and of his naturall country. For if it were ſo, that my requeſt tended to ſaue thy country, in deſtroying the Volsces, I muſt confeſſe, thou wouldeſt hardly and doubtfully reſolue on that. For as to deſtroy thy natural country, it is altogether vnmeete and vnlawfull, ſō were it not iuſt, and leſſe honourable, to betray thoſe that put their truſt in thee. But my onely demand conſiſteth, to make a gaile-deliuery of all euils, which deliuereth equall benefite and ſafety, both to the one and the other, but moſt honourable for the Volsces. For it ſhall appeare, that hauing victory in their hands, they haue of ſpeciall fauour granted vs ſingular graces, peace, & amity, albeit themſelues haue no leſſe part of both then we. Of which good, if ſo it came to paſſe, thy ſelfe is the onely author, and ſo haſt thou the only honour. But if it faile, and fall out contrary, thy ſelf alone deſeruedly ſhalt carry the ſhameful reproch and burthen of either party. So, though the end of war be vncertain, yet this notwithſtanding is moſt certain, that if it be thy chāce to conquer, this benefite ſhalt thou reape of thy goodly conqueſt, to be chronicled the plague and deſtroyer of thy countrey. And if fortune ouerthrow thee, then the world will ſay, that through deſire to reuenge thy priuate iniuries, thou haſt for euer vndone thy good friends, who did moſt louingly & courteouſly receiue thee. Martius gaue good eare vnto his mothers words, without interrupting her ſpeech at all, and after ſhe had ſaid what ſhe would, he held his peace a prety while, and anſwered not a word. Herevpon ſhe began againe to ſpeake vnto him, and ſaid: My ſonne, why doeſt thou not anſwer me? doeſt thou think it good altogether to giue place vnto thy choler and deſire of reuenge, and thinkeſt thou it not honeſty for thee to grant thy mothers requeſt, in ſo weighty a cauſe? doſt thou take it honorable for a noble man, to remember the wrongs and iniuries done him, and doſt not in like caſe think it an honeſt noble mans part, to be thankfull for the goodnes that parents do ſhew to their children, acknowledging the duty & reuerēce they ought to beare vnto them? No man liuing is more bound to ſhew himſelf thankfull in all parts & reſpects then thy ſelf: who ſo vniuerſally ſheweſt all ingratitude. Moreouer (my ſon) thou haſt ſorely taken of thy country, exacting grieuous payments vpon thē, in reuenge of the iniuries offered thee, beſides, thou haſt not hitherto ſhewed thy poore mother any curteſie. And therfore it is not onely honeſt, but due vnto me, that without compulſion I ſhould obtaine my ſo iuſt and reaſonable requeſt of thee. But ſince by reaſon I cānot perſwade thee to it, to what purpoſe do I defer my laſt hope? And with theſe words, her ſelf, his wife, & children fell down vpon their knees before him: Martius ſeeing that could refraine no longer, but went ſtraight and lift her vp crying out Oh mother, what haue you done to me? And holding her hard by the right hād, oh mother ſaid he, you haue won a happy victory for your country, but mortall and vnhappy for your ſon: for I ſee my ſelf vanquiſhed by you alone. Theſe words being ſpoken openly, he ſpake a litle apart with his mother & wife, & then let them return again to Rome, for ſo they did requeſt him, and ſo remaining in campe that night, the next morning he diſlodged, and marched homeward into the Volsces country againe, who were not all of one mind, nor all alike contented. For ſome miſliked him and that he had done: other being well pleaſed that peace ſhold be made, ſaid: that neither the one nor the other, deſerued blame nor reproch. Other though they miſliked that was done, did not thinke him an ill man for that he did, but ſaid, he was not to be blamed, though he yeelded to ſuch a forcible extremity. Howbeit no man cōtraried his departure, but al obeied his commandement, more for reſpect of his worthineſſe & valiancy then for feare of his authority. Now the citizens of Rome plainly ſhewed, in what feare & danger their city ſtood of this war, whē they were deliuered. For ſo ſoon as the watch vpō the wals of the city perceiued the Volsces campe to remoue, there was not a tēple in the city but was preſently ſet open, & ful of mē

wearing garlands of flowers vpon their heads, ſacrificing to the gods, as they were wont to do vpon the newes of ſome great obtained victory. And this common ioy was yet more manifeſtly ſhewed, by the honorable curteſies the whole Senate and people did beſtow on their Ladies. For they were all throughly perſwaded, and did certainly beleeue, that the Ladies only were cauſe of the ſauing of the city, and deliuering themſelues from the inſtant danger of the warre. Wherupon the Senate ordained, that the Magiſtrates to gratifie and honor theſe Ladies, ſhould graunt them all that they would require. And they only requeſted that they would build a temple of Fortune for the women, vnto the building whereof they offered themſelues to defray the whole charge of the ſacrifices, and other ceremonies belonging to the ſeruice of the gods. Neuertheleſſe, the Senate commending their goodwill and forwardneſſe, ordained, that the temple and image ſhould be made at the common charge of the city. Notwithſtanding that, the Ladies gathered money among them, and made with the ſame a ſecond image of Fortune, which the ROMAINES ſay did ſpeake as they offered her vp in the temple, and did ſet her in her place: and they affirme, that ſhe ſpake theſe words: Ladies, ye haue deuoutly offered me vp. Moreouer, that ſhe ſpake that twiſe together, making vs to beleeue things that neuer were, and are not to be credited: For to ſee images that ſeeme to ſweate or weepe, or to put forth any humor red or bloudie, it is not a thing vnpoſſible. For wood and ſtone do commonly receiue certaine moiſture, whereof are ingendred humours, which do yeeld of themſelues, or do take of the aire, many ſorts and kinds of ſpots and colours: by which ſignes and tokens it is not amiſſe, me thinke, that the gods ſometimes do warne men of things to come. And it is poſſible alſo, that theſe images and ſtatues do ſometimes put forth ſounds like vnto ſighes or mourning, when in the middeſt or botome of the ſame, there is made ſome violent ſeparation, or breaking aſunder of things, blowne or deuiſed therein: but that a body which hath neither life nor ſoule, ſhould haue any direct or exquiſite words formed in it by expreſſe voice, that is altogether vnpoſſible. For the ſoule, nor god himſelfe can diſtinctly ſpeake without a body, hauing neceſſary organs and inſtruments meet for the parts of the ſame, to forme and vtter diſtinct words. But where ſtories many times do force vs to beleeue a thing reported to be true, by many graue teſtimonies: there we muſt ſay, that it is ſome paſſion contrary to our fiue naturall ſenſes, which being begotten in the imaginatiue part or vnderſtanding, draweth an opinion vnto it ſelfe, euen as we do in our ſleeping. For many times we thinke we heare, that we do not heare, and we imagine we ſee that we ſee not. Yet notwithſtanding, ſuch as are godly bent, and zealouſly giuen to think on heauenly things, ſo as they can no way be drawne from beleeuing that which is ſpoken of them, they haue this reaſon to ground the foundation of their beleefe vpon; that is, the omnipotencie of God, which is wonderfull, and hath no maner of reſemblance or likeneſſe of proportion vnto ours, but is altogether contrary, as touching our nature, our mouing, our art, and our force: and therefore if he do any thing vnpoſſible to vs, or do bring forth and deuiſe things, aboue mans common reach and vnderſtanding, we muſt not therfore think it vnpoſſible at all. For if in other things he is farre contrary to vs, much more in his works and ſecret operations, he far paſſeth all the reſt: but the moſt part of Gods doings, as Heraclitus ſaith, for lack of faith, are hidden and vnknowne vnto vs. Now when Martius was returned againe into the city of ANTIVM from his voyage, Tullus that hated and could no longer abide him for the feare he had of his authority, ſought diuerſe meanes to make him away, thinking if he let ſlipt that preſent time, he ſhould neuer recouer the like and fit occaſion againe. Wherfore Tullus hauing procured many other of his confederacy, required Martius, might be depoſed from his eſtate, to render vp account to the VOLSCES of his charge and gouernement. Martius fearing to become a priuate man againe vnder Tullus being Generall (whoſe authority was greater otherwiſe, then any other among all the VOLSCES) anſwered: He was willing to giue vp his charge, and would reſigne it into the hands of the Lords of the VOLSCES, if they did al command him, as by al their commandment he receiued it. And moreouer, that he would not refuſe euen at that preſent to giue vp an account vnto the people, if they would tary the hearing of it. The people hereupon called a common counſell, in which aſſembly there were certaine oratours appointed, that ſtirred vp the common people againſt him: and when they had told their tales, Martius roſe vp to make them anſwer. Now, notwithſtanding the mutinous people made a maruellous great noiſe, yet when they ſaw him, for the reuerence they bare vnto his valiantneſſe, they quieted themſelues, and gaue him audience to alledge with leiſure what he could for his purgation. Moreouer, the honeſteſt men of the the ANTIATES, and who moſt reioyced in peace, ſhewed by their countenance that they would heare him willingly. And iudge alſo according to their conſcience. Whereupon Tullus fearing that if he did let him ſpeake, he would proue his innocencie to the people, becauſe amongſt other things he had an eloquent tongue; beſides that the firſt good ſeruice he had done to the people of the VOLSCES, did winne him more fauour, then theſe laſt accuſations could purchaſe him diſpleaſure: and furthermore, the offence they laid to his charge, was a teſtimony of the goodwill they ought him; for they would neuer haue thought he had done them wrong for that they tooke not the city of ROME, if they had not bin very neare taking of it, by meanes of his approach and conduction. For theſe cauſes Tullus thought he might no longer delay his pretence and enterpriſe, neither to tary for the mutining and riſing of the common people againſt him: wherefore, thoſe that were of the conſpiracy, began to cry out that he was not to be heard, and that they would not ſuffer a traitor to vſurpe tyrannicall power ouer the tribe of the VOLSCES, who would not yeeld vp his ſtate and authority. And in ſaying theſe words, they all fell vpon him, and killed him in the market place, none of the people once offering to reſcue him. Howbeit it is a cleare caſe, that this murder was not generally conſented vnto, of the moſt part of the VOLSCES: for men came out of all parts to honor his body, and did honourably bury him; ſetting vp his tombe with great ſtore of armour and ſpoiles, as the tombe of a worthy perſon and great captaine. The ROMAINES vnderſtanding of his death, ſhewed no other honour or malice, ſauing that they granted the ladies their requeſt they made: that they might mourne tenne moneths for him, and that was the full time they vſed to weare blackes for the death of their fathers, brethren, or husbands, according to Numa Pompilius order, who ſtabliſhed the ſame, as we haue enlarged more amply in the deſcription of his life. Now Martius being dead, the whole ſtate of the VOLSCES heartily wiſhed him aliue againe. For, firſt of all they fell out with the ÆQVES who were their friends and confederates) touching preheminence and place: and this quarrell grew on ſo farre betweene them, that fraies and murders fell out vpon it one with another. After that the ROMAINES ouercame them in battell, in which Tullus was ſlain in the field and the flower of all their force was put to the ſword: ſo that they were compelled to accept moſt ſhamefull conditions of peace, in yeelding themſelues ſubiect vnto the conquerers, and promiſing to be obedient at their commandement.

THE COMPARISON OF Alcibiades with Martius Coriolanus.

The actes done by both.

NOW that we haue written all the deedes of worthy memory, done by either of them both, we may presently discerne, that in matters of war the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were alike hardy and valiant for their persons, as also wise and politicke in the warres: vnlesse they will say, that Alcibiades was the better captaine, as he that had foughten more battels with his enemies, both by sea and land, then euer Coriolanus had done, and had alwayes the victory of his enemies. For otherwise, in this they were much alike: that where they were both present and had charge and power to command, all things prospered notably, and with good successe on the part they were of; and also when they tooke the contrary side, they made the first haue the worst euery way. Now for matters of gouernment, the Noble men and honest citizens did hate Alcibiades manner of rule in the common weale, as of a man most dissolute, and giuen to flattery: because he euer studied by all deuice he could, to curry fauour with the common people. So did the ROMAINES malice also Coriolanus gouernement, for that it was too arrogant, proud, and tyrannicall: whereby neither the one nor the other was to be commended. Notwithstanding he is lesse to be blamed that seeketh to please and gratifie his common people, then he that despiseth and disdaineth them; and therefore offereth them wrong and iniury, because he would not seeme to flatter them, to winne the more authoritie. For as it is an euill thing to flatter the common people to winne credite: euen so is it besides dishonesty, and iniustice also, to attaine to credit and authoritie, for one to make himselfe terrible to the people, by offering them wrong and violence. It is true that Martius was euer counted an honest natured man, plaine, and simple, without art or cunning: but Alcibiades meerely contrary; for he was fine, subtill, and deceitfull. And the greatest fault they euer burdened Alcibiades for, was his malice and deceit, wherewith he abused the Ambassadors of the LACEDÆMONIANS, & that he was a let that peace was not concluded, as Thucydides reporteth. Now, though by this act he suddenly brought the city of ATHENS into wars, yet he brought it thereby to be of greater power, and more fearefull to the enemies, by making alliance with the MANTINEANS and the ARGIVES, who by Alcibiades practise entred into league with the ATHENIANS. And Martius, as Dionysius the historiographer writeth: did by craft and deceit bring the ROMAINES into warres against the VOLSCES, causing the VOLSCES maliciously and wrongfully to be suspected, that went to ROME to see the games plaid. But the cause why he did it, made the fact so much more foule and wicked: for it was not done for any ciuill dissention, nor for any iealousie and contention in matters of gouernment as Alcibiades did: but only following his cholericke mood, that would be pleased with nothing, as Dion said, he would needes trouble and turmoile the most part of ITALY; and so being angry with

The matters of Alcibiades and Coriolanus.

with his country, he destroyed many other towns and cities that could not helpe it, nor do withall. This is true also, that Alcibiades spite and malice did worke great mischiefe and misery to his country: but when he saw they repented them of the iniury they had done him, he came to himselfe, and did withdraw his army. Another time also, when they had banished Alcibiades, he would not yet suffer the captaines of the ATHENIANS to run into great errors, neither would he see them cast away, by following ill counsell which they tooke, neither would he forsake them in any danger they put themselues into. But he did the very same that Aristides had done in old time vnto Themistocles, for which he was then, and is yet so greatly praised. For he went vnto the captaines that had charge then of the army of the ATHENIANS, although they ... not his friends, and told them wherein they did amisse, and what they had further to do. Where Martius to the contrary, did first great hurt vnto the whole city of ROME, though all in ROME had not generally offended him: yea, and when the best and chiefest part of the city were grieued for his sake, and were very sory and angry for the iniury done him. Furthermore, the ROMAINES sought to appease one only displeasure and despight they had done him, by many ambassades, petitions and requests they made; whereunto he neuer yeelded, vntill his mother, wife, and children came, his heart was so hardened. And hereby it appeared he was entred into this cruell warre (when he would hearken to no peace) of an intent vtterly to destroy and spoile his country, and not as though he meant to recouer it, or to returne thither again. Here was indeed the difference betweene them: that spials being laid by the LACEDÆMONIANS to kill Alcibiades, for the malice they did beare him, as also for that they were affraid of him, he was compelled to returne home againe to ATHENS. Where Martius contrariwise, hauing bene so honourably receiued & entertained by the VOLSCES, he could not with honesty forsake them, considering that they had done him that honour, as to chuse him their Generall, and trusted him so farre, as they put all their whole army and power into his hands: and not as the other, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS rather abused then vsed him, suffering him to go vp and downe their city (and afterwards in the midst of their campe) without honour or place at all. So that in the end Alcibiades was compelled to put himselfe into the hands of Tisaphernes: vnlesse they will say that he went thither of purpose to him, with intent to saue the city of ATHENS from vtter destruction, for the desire he had to returne home againe. Moreouer, we reade of Alcibiades, that he was a great taker, and would be corrupted with mony: and when he had it, he would most licentiously and dishonestly spend it. Where Martius in contrary maner would not so much as accept gifts lawfully offered him by his captaines, to honor him for his valiantnesse. And the cause why the people did beare him such ill will, for the controuersie they had with the Nobility about clearing of debts, grew: for that they knew well inough it was not for any gaine or benefite he had gotten thereby, so much as it was for spite and displeasure he thought to do them. Antipater in a letter of his, writing of the death of Aristotle the philosopher, doth not without cause commend the singular gifts that were in Alcibiades, and this especially: that he passed all other for winning mens good wils. Whereas Martius noble acts and vertues, wanting that affability, became hatefull, euen to those that receiued benefite by them, who could not abide his seuerity and selfe will: which causeth desolation, (as Plato saith) and men to be ill followed, or altogether forsaken. Contrariwise, seeing Alcibiades had a trimme entertainement, and a very good grace with him, and could fashion himselfe in all companies, it was no maruell if his well doing were gloriously commended, and himself much honoured and beloued of the people, considering that some faults he did, were oftentimes taken for matters of sport, and toyes of pleasure. And this was the cause, that though many times he did great hurt to the commonwealth, yet they did oft make him their Generall, and trusted him with the charge of the whole city. Where Martius suing for an office of honor, that was due to him, for the sundry good seruices he had done to the state, was notwithstanding repulsed, and put by. Thus do we see, that they to whom the one did hurt, had no power to hate him: and the other that honored his vertue, had no liking to loue his person. Martius also did neuer any great exploit, being General of his country men, but when he was General of their enemies against his natural country: wheras Alcibiades, being both a priuate person, and a General did notable seruice vnto the ATHENIANS. By reason whereof, Alcibiades whersoeuer he was present, had the vpper hand euer of his accusers, euen as he would himselfe, and their accusations tooke no place against him: vnlesse it were in his absence. Where Martius being present, was condemned by the ROMAINES: and in his person murdered and slaine by the VOLSCES. But here I cannot say they haue done well, nor iustly, albeit himselfe gaue them some colour to do it, when he openly denied the ROMAINE ambassadours peace, which after he priuately graunted, at the request of women. So by this deed of his, he tooke not away the enmity that was betweene both people: but leauing warre still betweene them, he made the VOLSCES (of whom he was Generall) to lose the opportunity of noble victory. Where indeed he should (if he had done as he ought) haue withdrawne his army with their counsell and consent, that had reposed so great affiance in him, in making him their General: if he had made that account of them, as their goodwill towards him did in duty bind him. Or else, if he did not care for the VOLSCES in the enterprise of this warre, but had only procured it of intent to be reuenged, and afterwards to leaue it off when his anger was blowne ouer: yet he had no reason for the loue of his mother to pardon his country, but rather he should in pardoning his country, haue spared his mother, because his mother and wife were members of the body of his countrey and citty, which he did besiege. For in that he vncourteously reiected all the publike petitions, requests of Ambassadors, intreaties of the bishops and priests, to gratifie only the request of his mother with his departure: that was no act so much to honour his mother with, as to dishonour his country by, the which was preserued for the pity and intercession of a woman, and not for the loue of it self, as if it had not bene worthy of it. And so was this departure a grace (to say truly) very odious & cruell, and deserued no thanks of either party, to him that did it. For he withdrew his army, not at the request of the ROMAINES, against whom he made war: nor with their consent, at whose charge the warre was made. And of all his misfortune and ill hap, the austeritie of his nature, and his haughty obstinate mind, was the onely cause: the which of it selfe being hateful to the world, when it is ioyned with ambition, it groweth then much more churlish, fierce and intollerable. For men that haue that fault in nature, are not affable to the people, seeming thereby as though they made no estimation or regard of the people: and yet on the other side, if the people should not giue them honour and reuerence, they would straight take it in scorne, and little care for the matter. For so did Metellus, Aristides and Epaminondas, all vsed this maner: not to seeke the goodwill of the cõmon people by flattery and dissimulation: which was indeed, because they dispised that which the people could giue or take away. Yet would they not be offended with their citizens, when they were amerced, and set at any fines, or that they banished them, or gaue them any other repulse: but they loued them as well as they did before, so soone as they shewed any token of repentance, and that they were sory for the wrong they had done them, and were easily made friends againe with them, after they were restored from their banishment. For he that disdaineth to make much of the people, and to haue their fauour, should much more scorne to seeke to be reuenged when he is repulsed. For, to take a repulse and denyall of honour so inwardly to the heart, cometh of no other cause, but that he did too earnestly desire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not dissemble at all, that he was not very glad to see himselfe honored, and sory to be reiected and denyed any honour: but also he sought all the meanes he could to make himselfe beloued of those amongst whom he loued. Whereas Martius stoutnesse and haughty stomacke, did stay him from making much of those that might aduance and honour him: and yet his ambition made him gnaw himselfe for spite and anger, when he saw he was despised. And this is all that reasonably may be reproued in him: for otherwise he lacked no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperance, and cleane hands from taking of bribes and mony, he may be compared with the most perfect, vertuous, and honest men of all GREECE: but not with Alcibiades, who was vndoubtedly alwaies too licentious and looselie giuen, and had too small regard of the duty of honestie.

THE LIFE OF Paulus Æmylius.

WHEN I firſt began to write theſe liues, my intent was to profite other: but ſince cõtinuing and going on, I haue much profited my ſelf by looking into theſe hiſtories, as if I looked into a glaſſe, to frame and faſhion my life to the mould & patterne of theſe vertuous noble men. For running ouer their maners in this ſort, & ſeeking alſo to deſcribe their liues: me thinks I am ſtil conuerſant and familiar with them, and do as it were lodge them with me, one after another. And when I come to peruſe their hiſtories, and to wey the vertues and qualities they haue had, and what ſingularitie each of them poſſeſſed: and to chuſe and cull out the chiefeſts thing of note in them, and their beſt ſpeeches and doings moſt worthy of memory: then I crie out:

Or is there any thing of more force, to teach man ciuill manners, and a ruled life, or to reforme the vice in man? Democritus the Philoſopher writeth, that we ſhould pray we might euer ſee happie images and ſignes in the aire, and that the good which is meete and proper to our nature, may rather come to vs, then that is evill and vnfortunate: preſuppoſing a falſe opinion and doctrine in Philoſophie, which allureth men to infinite ſuperſtitions: That there are good and badde images flying in the ayre, which giue a good or ill impreſſion vnto men, and incline men to vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by cõtinuall reading of ancient hiſtories, and gathering theſe liues together which now I leaue before you, and by keeping alwaies in mind the acts of the moſt noble, vertuous, and beſt giuen men of former age, & worthie memory: I do teach and prepare my ſelfe to ſhake off and baniſh from me all lewd and diſhoneſt conditions, if by chance the company and conuerſation of them whoſe company I keepe, and muſt of neceſſitie haunt, do acquaint me with ſome vnhappie or vngracious touch. This is eaſie vnto me, that do diſpoſe my mind, being quiet and not troubled with any paſſion, vnto the deepe cõſideration of ſo many noble examples. As I do preſent vnto you now in this volume, the liues of Timoleon the CORINTHIAN, and of Paulus Æmylius the ROMAINE, who had not only a good and an vpright mind with thẽ, but were alſo fortunate & happy, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you ſhall hardly iudge, when you haue read ouer their liues, whether wiſdom or good fortune brought them to atchieue to ſuch honourable acts and exploits as they did. Many (and the moſt part of hiſtoriographers) do write, that the houſe and family of the AEmylians in Rome, was alwaies of the moſt ancient of the nobility, which they call Patricians. Some writers affirme alſo that the firſt of that houſe that gaue name to all the poſterity after, was Marcus, the ſonne of Pythagoras the wiſe, whom king Numa for the ſweetneſſe and pleaſant grace of his tongue, ſurnamed Marcus Æmylius: and thoſe ſpecially affirme it, that ſay king Numa was Pythagoras ſcholler. Howſoeuer it was, the moſt part of this family that obtained honour and eſtimation for their vertue, were euer fortunate alſo in all their doings, ſauing Lucius Paulus onely, who died in the battell of Cannes. But his misfortune doth beare manifeſt teſtimony of his wiſdom & valiancie together. For he was forced to fight againſt his will, when he ſaw he could not bridle the raſhneſſe of his fellow Conſull that would needs ioyne battell; and to do as he did, ſauing that he fled not as the other, who being the firſt procurer of the battel, was the firſt that ran away: where he to the contrary, to his power did what he could to let him, and did ſticke by it, and fought it valiantly vnto the laſt gaſpe. This AEmylius left a daughter behind him called AEmylia, which was maried vnto Scipio the Great: and a ſonne, Paulus AEmylius, being the ſame man whoſe life we preſently treate of. His youth fortunately fell out in a flouriſhing time of glorie and honour, through the ſundry vertues of many great and noble perſons liuing in thoſe dayes, among whom he made his name famous alſo: and it was not by that ordinary art and courſe, which the beſt eſteemed yong men of that age did take and follow. For he did not vſe to pleade priuate mens cauſes in law, neither would creepe into mens fauour by fawning vpon any of them: though he ſaw it a common practiſe, and policy of men, to ſeeke the peoples fauour and goodwils by ſuch meanes. Moreouer, he refuſed not that common courſe which other tooke, for that it was contrary to his nature, or that he could not frame with either of both, if he had bene ſo diſpoſed: but he rather ſought to winne reputation by his honeſty, his valiantneſſe, and vpright dealing, as chooſing that the better way then either of the other two, inſomuch as in maruellous ſhort time he paſſed all thoſe that were of his age. The firſt office of honor he ſued for, was the office of Ædylu, in which ſuite he was preferred before twelue other that ſued for the ſelf ſame office: who were men of no ſmall quality, for they all came afterwards to be Conſuls. After this, he was choſen to be one of the number of the prieſts, whom the Romaines call Augures: who haue the charge of all the diuinations and ſoothſayings, in telling of things to come by flying of birds, and ſignes in the aire. He was ſo carefull, and took ſuch pains to vnderſtand how the Romaines did vſe the ſame, and with ſuch diligence ſought the obſeruation of the ancient religion of Romains in all holy matters: that where that prieſthood was before eſteemed but a title of honor, and deſired for the name only, he brought it to paſſe, that it was the moſt honorable ſcience, and beſt reputed of in Rome: wherin he confirmed the philoſophers opinion, that religion is the knowledge how to ſerue God. For when he did any thing belonging to his office of prieſthood, he did it with great experience, iudgement, & diligence leauing all other thoughts, & without omitting any ancient ceremony, or adding to any new, contending oftentimes with his companions, in things which ſeemed light, and of ſmall moment: declaring vnto them, that though we do preſume the gods are eaſie to be pacified, & that they readily pardon all faults and ſcapes committed by negligence, yet if it were no more but for reſpect of common wealths ſake, they ſhold not ſlightly nor careleſly diſſẽble or paſſe ouer faults cõmitted in thoſe matters: for no man (ſaith he) at the firſt that committeth any fault, doth alone trouble the ſtate of the cõmon wealth: but withal, we muſt thinke he leaueth the grounds of ciuil gouernmẽt, that is not as careful to keepe the inſtitutions of ſmal matters, as alſo of the great. So was he alſo a ſeuere captaine & ſtrict obſeruer of all martial diſcipline, not ſeeking to win the ſouldiers loue by flattery, when he was generall in the field, as many did in that time: neither corrupting them for a ſecond charge, by ſhewing himſelf gentle and courteous in the firſt, vnto thoſe that ſerued vnder him: but himſelfe did orderly ſhew them the very rules and precepts of the diſcipline of wars, euen as a prieſt that ſhold expreſſe the names & ceremonies of ſome holy ſacrifice, wherin were danger to omit any part or parcell. Howbeit, being terrible to execute the law of armes vpon rebellious and diſobedient ſouldiers, he kept vp ther by the ſtate of the commonweale the better: iudging to ouercome the enemy by force, was but an acceſſarie as a man may terme it, in reſpect of well training and ordering his citizens by good diſcipline. While the Romaines were in warres againſt king Antiochus ſurnamed the Great, in the South parts, all the chiefeſt captaines captains of ROME being employed that wayes, there fell out another in the necke of that, in the West parts towards SPAINE where they were vp in armes. Thither they sent Æmylius Prætor, not with fixe axes as the other Prætors had borne before them, but with twelue: so that vnder the name of Prætor, he had the authoritie and dignity of a Consull. He twise ouercame the barbarous people in maine battell, and slue thirty thousand of them, and got this victory through his great skill and wisedome, in chusing the aduantage of place and time, to fight with his enemies, euen as they passed ouer a riuer: which easily gaue his souldiers the victory. Moreouer he took there two hundred & fifty cities, all which did open, and gladly receiue him in. So, leauing all that country quiet and in good peace, and hauing receiued their fealty by oath made between his hands, he returned againe to ROME, not inriched the value of a Drachma more then before. For then he tooke litle regard to his expences, he spent so frankly, neither was his purse his master, though his reuenue was not great to beare it out, as it appeared to the world after his death, for all that he had was litle enough to satisfie his wiues ioynter. His first wife was Papyria, the daughter of a noble Consull Papyrius Masso, and after they had liued a long time together, he was diuorced from her, notwithstanding he had goodly children by her. For by her he had that famous Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus. The iust cause of the diuorce betweene them, appeared not to vs in writing: but me thinkes the tale that is told concerning the separation of a certaine mariage is true: That a certaine ROMAINE hauing forsaken his wife, her friends fel out with him, and asked him, What fault dost thou find in her? is she not honest of her body? is she not faire? doth she not bring thee goodly children? But he putting forth his foot, shewed them his shooe, and answered them: Is not this a goodly shooe? is not it finely made? and is it not new? yet I dare say there is neuer a one of you can tel where it wringeth me. For to say truly, great & open faults are commonly occasions to make husbands put away their wiues: but yet oftētimes housholde words runne so betweene them (proceeding of crooked conditions, or of diuersity of natures, which strangers are not priuy vnto) that in processe of time they do beget such a strange alteration of loue and minds in them, as one house can no longer hold them. So Æmylius, hauing put away Papyria his first wife, he maried another that brought him two sonnes, which he brought vp with himselfe in his house, and gaue his two first sonnes (to wit, Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption to two of the noblest and richest families of the city of ROME. The elder of the twaine, vnto Fabius Maximus, he that was fiue times Consul, and the yonger vnto the house of the Cornelians, whom the sonne of the greate Scipio the AFRICAN did adopt, being his cosin germaine, and named him Scipio. Concerning his daughters, the sonne of Cato maried the one, and Ælius Tubero the other, who was a maruellous honest man, and did more nobly maintaine himselfe in his pouerty, then any other ROMAINE: for they were sixteene persons all of one name, and of the house of the Ælians, very neere akinne one to the other, who had all but one litle house in the city, and a smal farme in the country, wherewith they entertained themselues, and liued all together in one house, with their wiues, and many litle children. Amongst their wiues, one of them was the daughter of Paulus Æmylius, after he had beene twise Consull, and had triumphed twise, not being ashamed of her husbands pouerty, but wondring at his vertue that made him poore. Whereas brethren and kinsemen, as the world goeth now, if they dwell not far asunder, and in other countries, not one neare another, and that riuers part them not, or walles deuide their lands, leauing great large wastes betweene them: they are neuer quiet, but stil in quarrel one with another. Goodly examples doth this story lay before the wise, and well aduised readers, to learne thereby how to frame their life, and wisely to behaue themselues. Now Æmylius being chosen Consull, went to make warre with the LIGVRIANS, who dwelled in the ALPES, & which otherwise are called LIGVSTINES. These are very valiāt and warlike men, and were very good souldiers at that time, by reason of their continuall wars against the ROMAINS, whose neere neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the furthest part of ITALY, that bordereth vpon the great ALPES, and the row of ALPES, whereof the foot ioyneth to the THVSCAN sea, & pointeth towards AFRICK, & are mingled with the GAVLES and SPANIARDS, neighbours vnto the sea coast: who scowring al the Mediterranian sea at that time, vnto the straight of Hercules pillers, did with their litle light pinnaces of pirates, let al the traffick and entercourse of merchādize. Æmylius being gone to seek thē in their country, they taried his coming with an army of forty thousand men: neuertheless, though he had but eight thousand men in all, and that they were fiue to one of his, yet he gaue the onset vpon them, and ouerthrew them,& draue thē into their cities. Then he ſent to offer them peace;for the ROMAINES would not altogether deſtroy the LIGVRIANS,becauſe their country was as a rampier or bulwarke against the inuaſion of the GAVLES,who lay lurking for oportunity and occaſion to inuade ITALY:wherupon theſe LIGVRIANS yeelded thēſelues vnto him, & put all their forts & ſhips into his hands. Æmylius deliuered vnto them their holds again, without other hurt done vnto them, ſauing that he razed the walles of their fortifications: howbeit he took all their ſhips from them, leauing them litle botes of three owers onely, and no greater; and ſet all the priſoners at liberty they had taken,both by ſea and by land,aſwell ROMAINES as other, which were a maruellous number. Theſe were all the notable acts he did worthy memory,in the firſt yeare of his Cōſulſhip. Afterwards he oftentimes ſhewed himſelfe very deſirous to be Conſul againe, and did put forth himſelfe to ſue for it:but when he was denied it,he neuer after made ſute for it againe,but gaue himſelfe only to ſtudy diuine things,and to ſee his children vertеouſly brought vp,not only in the ROMAINE tongue which himſelfe was taught, but alſo a litle more curiouſly in the GREEKE tongue. For he did not onely retaine Gramarians, Rhetoritians, and Logicians, but alſo painters,grauers of images,riders of horſes,and hunts of GREECE about his children:& he himſelfalſo(if no matters of common wealth troubled him)was euer with thē in the ſchoole when they were at their books,& alſo when they otherwiſe did exerciſe themſelues. For he loued his children as much or more then any other ROMAINE. Now concerning the ſtate of the common wealth,the ROMAINS were at wars with king Perſeus,and they much blamed the captains they had ſent thither before,for that for lack of skil & courage, they had ſo cowardly behaued themſelues,as their enemies laughed them to ſcorne:and they receiued more hurt of them,then they did vnto the king.For not long before,they had driuen king Antiochus beyond mount Taurus,and made him forſake the reſt of ASIA , and had ſhut him vp within the borders of SYRIA, who was glad that he had bought that country with fifteene thouſand talents,which he paid for a fine.A litle before alſo,they had ouercome Philip,king of MACEDON in THESSALY,and had deliuered the GRECIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS. And moreouer , hauing ouercome Hannibal (vnto whom no Prince nor King that euer was in the world was comparable , either for his power or valianteneſſe) they thought this too great a diſhonour to them,that this warre they had againſt king Perſeus,ſhould hold ſo long of euen hand with them,as if he had bene an enemy equall with the people of ROME : conſidering alſo that they fought not againſt them, but with the refuſe and ſcattered people of the ouerthrowne army his father had loſt before,and knew not that Philip had left his army ſtronger,and more expert by reaſon of his ouerthrow,then it was before:as I will briefly rehearſe the ſtory from the beginning. Antigonus,who was of the greateſt power of all the captaines and ſucceſſours of Alexander the Great,hauing obtained for himſelfe and his poſterity the title of a King,had a ſonne called Demetrius, of whom came Antigonus the ſecond, that was ſurnamed Gonatos, whoſe ſonne was alſo called Demetrius, that raigned no long time, but died, and left a yong ſonne called Philip.By reaſon whereof,the Princes and Nobility of MACEDON,fearing that the Realme ſhould be left without heire, they preferred one Antigonus,coſin to the laſt deceaſſed King,& made him marry the mother of Philip the leſſe, giuing him the name at the firſt of the Kings protectour only , and lieutenant generall of his maieſty. But after, when they had found he was a good and wiſe Prince, and a good husband for the Realme,they then gaue him the abſolute name of a king, & ſurnamed him Doſon, to ſay, the giuer:for he promiſed much and gaue litle. After him raigned Philip, who in his greene youth gaue more hope of himſelfe,then any other of the Kings before:inſomuch as they thought that one day he would reſtore MACEDON her ancient fame and glory, and that he alone would pluck downe the pride and power of the ROMAINS,who roſe againſt all the world. But after that he had loſt a great battell, and was ouerthrowne by Titus Quintus Flaminius neare vnto the city of SCOTVSA,then he began to quake for feare,and to leaue all to the mercy of the ROMAINES;thinking he eſcaped good cheape,for any light ranſome or tribute the ROMAINES ſhould impoſe vpon him. Yet afterwards coming to vnderſtand himſelfe,he grew to diſdaine it much,thinking that to raigne through the fauour of the ROMAINES,was but to make himſelfe a ſlaue,to ſeek to liue in pleaſure at his eaſe,and not for a valiant & noble prince borne. Wherupon he ſet all his mind,to ſtudy the diſcipline of wars,& made his preparation as wiſely & cloſely as poſſibly he could. For he left all his townes along the ſea coaſt,and ſtanding vpon any high waies,without any fortification at al & in maner deſolate without people,to the end there might appeare no occaſion of doubt or miſtruſt in him: and in the meane time, in the high countries of his Realme farre from great beaten waies, he leauied a great number of men of warre, and repleniſhed his townes and ſtrong holds that lay ſcatteringly abroad, with armour and weapon, mony, and men, prouiding for warre, which he kept as ſecretly as he could. For he had prouiſion of armour in his armory, to arme thirty thouſand men, & eight million buſhels of corne ſafely lockt vp in his forts and ſtronger places, and ready money, as much as would ſerue to entertaine ten thouſand ſtrangers in pay, to defend his country for the ſpace of ten yeares. But before he could bring that to paſſe he had purpoſed, he died for griefe and ſorrow, after he knew he had vniuſtly put Demetrius the beſt of his ſonnes to death, vpon the falſe accuſation of the worſt, that was Perſeus: who as he did inherite the kingdome of his father by ſucceſſion, ſo did he alſo inherite his fathers malice againſt the ROMAINES. But he had no ſhoulders to beare ſo heauy a burden, & eſpecially being as he was, a man of ſo vile and wicked nature: for among many leud and naughty conditions he had, he was extreme couetous and miſerable. They ſay alſo, that he was not legitimate, becauſe Philips wife had taken him from Gnathainia (a tailors wife borne at ARGOS) immediatly after he was borne, and did adopt the child to be hers. And ſome thinke that this was the chiefeſt cauſe why he practiſed to put Demetrius to death, fearing leſt this lawful ſon wold ſeeke occaſion to proue him a baſtard. Notwithſtanding, ſimple though he was, & of vile and baſe nature, he found the ſtrength of his kingdome ſo great, that he was contented to take vpon him to make war againſt the ROMAINS, which he maintained a long time, & fought againſt their Conſuls, that were their Generals, and repulſed great armies of theirs both by ſea & land, and ouercame ſome. As Publius Licinius among other, the firſt that inuaded MACEDON, was ouerthrown by him in a battel of horſmẽ, where he ſlew at that time two thouſand fiue hundred good men of his, & took ſix hundred priſoners. And their army by ſea, riding at anker before the city of ORETVM, he did ſodainly ſet vpon, & took twenty great ſhips of burden, and all that was in them, and ſunke the reſt, which were all loaden with corn: and took of all ſorts beſides, about 54. foyſts & galliots of fifty owers apeece. The ſecond Conſul and General he fought withall, was Hoſtilius, whom he repulſed, attẽpting by force to inuade MACEDON by way of the city of ELVMIA. Another time again, when he entred in by ſtealth vpõ the coaſt of THESSALY, he offered him battel, but the other durſt not abide it. And as though this war troubled him nothing at all, and that he had cared little for the ROMAINES, he went and fought a battell in the meane time with the DARDANIANS, where he ſlue ten thouſand of thoſe barbarous people, and brought away a marueilous great ſpoile. Moreouer he procured the nation of the GAVLES dwelling vpon the riuer of Danuby, which they call Baſtarnæ (men very warlike, and excellent good horſemen) & did practiſe with the ILLYRIANS alſo by meane of their king Gentius, to make them ioyne with him in this warre: ſo that there ranne a rumor, that for mony he had gotten thoſe GAVLES to come downe into ITALY, frõ the high country of GAVLE all along the Adriatike ſea. The ROMAINS being aduertiſed of theſe newes, thought the time ſerued not now to diſpoſe their offices in wars any more by grace and fauour vnto thoſe that ſued for them: but contrariwiſe, that they ſhould call ſome noble man that were very skilful & a wiſe captain, & could diſcreetly gouerne & performe things of great charge: as Paulus Æmylius, a man wel ſtepped on in yeares, being threeſcore yeares old, & yet of good power, by reaſõ of the luſty yong men his ſons, & ſons in law, beſides a great nũber of his friends and kinsfolk. So al that bare great authority, did altogether with one conſent counſell him to obey the people, which called him to the Conſulſhip. At the beginning indeed he delayed the people much that came to importune him, and vtterly denied them: ſaying, he was no meete man neither to deſire, nor yet to take vpon him any charge. Howbeit in the end, ſeeing the people did vrge it vpon him, by knocking continually at his gates, & calling him aſoud in the ſtreets, willing him to come into the market place, and perceiuing they were angry with him, becauſe he refuſed it, he was content to be perſwaded. And when he ſtood among thẽ that ſued for the Cõſulſhip, the people thought ſtraight that he ſtood not there ſo much for deſire of the office, as for that he put them in hope of aſſured victory, & happy ſucceſſe of this begun warre: ſo great was their loue towards him, and the good hope they had of him, that they choſe him Conſul again the ſecond time. Wherfore ſo ſoone as he was choſen, they would not proceed to drawing of lots according to their cuſtome, which of the two Conſuls ſhould happẽ to go into MACEDON: but preſently with a ful and whole conſent of them all, they gaue him the whole charge of the warres of MACEDON. So being Conſull now, and appointed to make war

vpon king Perſeus, all the people did honourably company him home vnto his houſe: where a little girle (a daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant, came weeping vnto her father. He making much of her, asked her why ſhe wept. The poore girle answered, colling him about the necke, and kiſſing him: Alas father, wote you what? our Perſeus is dead. She meant it by a little whelp ſo called, which was her play-fellow. In good houre my girle, ſaid he, I like the ſigne wel. Thus did Cicero the orator report of it in his booke of diuinations. The ROMAINES, had a cuſtome at that time, that ſuch as were elected Conſuls (after that they were openly proclaimed) [illegible] make an oration of thankes vnto the people, for the honour and fauour they had ſhewed him. The people then (according to the cuſtome) being gathered together to heare Æmylius ſpeak, he made this oration vnto them: that the firſt time he ſued to be Conſul, was in reſpect of himſelfe, ſtanding at that time in need of ſuch honour: now he offered himſelfe the ſecond time vnto it, for the good loue he bare vnto them, who ſtood in need of a Generall, wherefore he thought himſelfe nothing bound nor beholding vnto them now. And if they did thinke alſo this warre might be better followed by any other then by himſelfe, he would preſently with all his hart reſigne the place. Furthermore, if they had any truſt or confidence in him, that they thought him a man ſufficient to diſcharge it: then that they would not ſpeake nor meddle in any matter that concerned his dutie, and the office of a Generall, ſauing onely, that they would be diligent (without any words) to do whatſoeuer he commanded, and ſhould be neceſſary for the warre and ſeruice they took in hand. For if euery man would be a commander, as they had bin heretofore, of thoſe by whom they ſhould be commanded: then the world would more laugh them to ſcorne in this ſeruice, then euer before had bin accuſtomed. Theſe words made the ROMAINS very obedient to him, and perceiued good hope to come, being all of them very glad that they had refuſed thoſe ambitious flatterers that ſued for the charge, and had giuen it vnto a man, that durſt boldly and frankly tell them the troth. Marke how the ROMAINS by yeelding vnto reaſō & vertue, came to command all other, & to make themſelues the mightieſt people of the world. Now that Paulus Æmylius ſetting forward to this warre, had wind at will, and faire paſſage to bring him to his iourneys end, I impute it to good fortune, that ſo quickly and ſafely conueyed him to his campe. But for the reſt of his exploits, he did in all his warre part of them being performed by his owne hardineſſe, other by his wiſdome and good counſell, other by the diligence of his friends in ſeruing him with good will, other by his owne reſolute conſtancy and courage in extremeſt danger, & laſt, by his maruellous skil in determining at an inſtant what was to be done, I cannot attribute any notable act or worthy ſeruice vnto this his good fortune they talke of ſo much, as they may do in other captains doings: vnleſſe they wil ſay peraduenture, that Perſeus couetouſneſſe and miſery was Æmylius good fortune: for his miſerable feare of ſpending mony, was the only cauſe & deſtruction of the whole realme of MACEDON, which was in good ſtate & hope of continuing in proſperity. For there came down into the country of MACEDON at king Perſeus requeſt, ten thouſand Baſtarnæ a horſe-backe, & as many footmen to them, who alwaies ioyned with them in battel: all mercenary ſouldiers, depending vpon pay and entertainment of wars, as men that could not plow, nor ſow, nor trafficke marchandizes by ſea, nor skill of grazing to gaine their liuing with: and to be ſhort, that had no other occupation or marchandize, but to ſerue in the warres, and to ouercome thoſe with whom they fought. Furthermore, when they came to incamp and lodge in the MEDICA, neare to the MACEDONIANS, who ſaw them ſo goodly great men, and ſo well trained and exerciſed in handling all kind of weapons, ſo braue and luſty in words and threats againſt their enemies: they began to pluck vp their hearts, and to look big, imagining that the ROMAINS would neuer abide them, but would be afeard to look them in the face, & only to ſee their march, it was ſo terrible & fearefull. But Perſeus after he had incouraged his men in this ſort, & had put them in ſuch a hope and iollity, when this barbarous ſupply came to ask him a thouſand crownes in hand for euery captain, he was ſo damped & troubled withall in his mind, caſting vp the ſum it came to, that his only couetouſnes and miſery made him returne them back, and refuſe their ſeruice: not as one that meant to fight with the ROMAINES, but rather to ſpare his treaſure, & to be a husband for thē, as if he ſhould haue giuen vp a ſtraight account vnto thē of his charges in this war, againſt whom he made it. And notwithſtanding alſo his enemies did teach him what he had to do, cōſidering that beſides al other their warlike furniture & munitiō, they had no leſſe then a hundred thouſand fighting men lying in camp together, ready to execute the Conſuls cōmandement: yet he taking vpō him to reſiſt ſo puiſſant an an army,& to maintaine the wars,which forced his enemies to be at extreme charge in entertaining ſuch multitudes of men, more then needed:hardly would depart with his gold and ſiluer, but kept it ſafe locked vp in his treaſury,as if he had bene afraid to touch it,and had bin none of his. And he did not ſhew that he came of the noble race of the kings of LYDIA,& PHOENICIA who gloried to be rich: but ſhewed how by inheritance of bloud he chalenged ſome part of the vertue of Philip,and of Alexander,who both becauſe they eſteemed to buy victory with money, not money with victory,did many notable things, and thereby conquered the world. Hereof came the common ſaying in old time,that it was not Philip,but his gold and ſiluer that won the cities of GREECE. And Alexander whē he went to conquer the INDIES,ſeeing the MACEDONIANS cary with them all the wealth of PERSIA, which made his campe very heauy , and ſlow to march:he himſelf firſt of al ſet fire on his own cariage that conueyed al his neceſſaries,& perſwaded other to do the like,that they might march more lightly,and eaſily on the iourney. But Perſeus contrarily would not ſpend any part of his goods,to ſaue himſelfe,his children and realme, but rather yeelded to be led priſoner in triumph with a great ranſome, to ſhew the ROMAINES how good a husband he had bene for them. For he did not onely ſend away the GAVLES without giuing them pay as he had promiſed,but moreouer hauing perſwaded Gentius king of ILLYRIA to take his part in theſe wars , for the ſum of three hundred talents which he had promiſed to furniſh him with:he cauſed the money to be told,and put vp in bags by thoſe whom Gentius ſent to receiue it. Whereupon Gentius thinking himſelfe ſure of the money promiſed,committed a fond and foule part:for he ſtayed the ambaſſadours the ROMAINES ſent vnto him , and committed them to priſon. This part being come to Perſeus eares,he thought now he needed not hire him with mony to be an enemy to the ROMAINS, conſidering he had waded ſo farre, as that he had already done,was as a manifeſt ſigne of his ill will towards them;and that it was too late to looke backe and repent him,now that his foule part had plunged him into certain warres,for an vncertain hope. So did he abuſe the vnfortunate King, and defrauded him of the three hundred talents he had promiſed him. And worſe then this , ſhortly after he ſuffered Lucius Ancius the ROMAINE Prætor,whom they ſent againſt him with an army,to plucke King Gentius,his wife, and children out of his kingdome , and to cary them priſoners with him. Now when Æmylius was arriued in MACEDON,to make warre againſt ſuch an enemy,he made no manner of reckoning of his perſon , but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one camp he had foure thouſand horſemen, & no leſſe then forty thouſand footmen,with the which army he had planted himſelfe along the ſea ſide, by the foot of the mount Olympus,in a place vnpoſſible to be approached:and there he had ſo well fortified all the ſtraights and paſſages vnto him with fortifications of wood,that he thought himſelf to lie ſafe out of all danger,and imagined to dally with Æmylius,and by tract of time to eate him out with charge. Æmylius in the meane ſeaſon lay not idle, but occupied his wits throughly , and left no meanes vnattempted , to put ſomething in proofe. And perceiuing that his ſouldiers by ouer much licentious liberty (wherin by ſufferance they liued before) were angry with delaying and lying ſtill , and that they did buſily occupy themſelues in the Generals office ſaying this, and ſuch a thing would be done that is not done: he tooke them vp roundly, and commanded them they ſhould meddle no more too curiouſly in matters that pertained not to them, and that they ſhould take care for nothing elſe,but to ſee their armour and weapon ready to ſerue valiantly,and to vſe their ſwords after the ROMAINS faſhion, when their Generall ſhould appoint and command them. Wherefore , to make them more carefull to look to themſelues,he commanded thoſe that watched,ſhould haue no ſpeares nor pikes,becauſe they ſhould be more wakefull , hauing no long weapon to reſiſt the enemy,if they were aſſaulted. The greateſt trouble his army had,was lack of freſh water,becauſe the water that ran to the ſea,was very litle,& maruellous foule by the ſea ſide. But Æmylius cōſidering they were at the foot of the mount Olympus (which is of a maruellous height, and full of wood withal)cōiectured,ſeeing the trees ſo freſh & green,that there ſhold be ſome litle prety ſprings among them,which ran vnder the ground. So he made them dig many holes & wels along the moūtain,which were ſtraight filled with faire water,being pent within groūd before for lack of breaking open the heads, which thē ran down in ſtreames,& met together in ſundry places. And yet ſome do deny,that there is any meeting of waters within the ground,frō whence the ſprings do come:and they ſay,that running out of the earth as they do,it is not for that the water breaketh out by any violence,or openeth in any place,as meeting together in one place of long time:

but that it ingendreth & riſeth at the ſame time and place where it runneth not, turning the ſubſtance into water, which is a moiſt vapour, thickned & made cold by the coldneſſe of the earth, and ſo becometh a ſtreame and runneth downe. For (ſay they) as womens breaſts are not alwaies full of milk (as milk pans are, that continually keep milk) but do of themſelues cõuert the nutriment women take into milke, and after cometh forth at their nipples: euen ſo the ſprings and watery places of the earth, from whence the fountaines come, haue no meetings of hidden waters, nor hollow places ſo capable readily to deliuer water from thẽ, as one wold draw it out of a pumpe or ciſterne, from ſo many brooks, and deep riuers: but by their natural coldnes and moiſture, they waxe thick, and put forth the vapour and aire ſo ſtrong, that they turne it into water. And this is the reaſõ why the places where they dig & open the earth, do put forth more abũdance of water by opening the ground: like as womens breaſts do giue more milk when they are moſt drawne and ſuckt, becauſe in a ſort they do better feed the vapour within them, & conuert it thereby into a running humour. Where to the contrary, thoſe parts of the earth that are not digged, nor haue no vent outward, are the more vnable, & leſſe meete to ingender water hauing not that prouocation and courſe to runne, that cauſeth the bringing forth of moiſture. Yet ſuch as maintain this opinion, do giue them occaſion that loue argument, to contrary them thus: Then we may ſay by like reaſon alſo, that in the bodies of beaſts there is no bloud long before, and that it ingendreth vpon a ſodaine, when they are hurt, by transferring of ſome ſpirit or fleſh that readily changeth into ſome running liquor. And moreouer, they are confuted by the common experiẽce of theſe mine-men, that dig in the mines for mettal, or that vndermine caſtles to win them: who when they dig any great depth, do many times meet in the bowels of the earth with running riuers, the water whereof is not ingendred by litle & litle, as of neceſſity it ſhould be, if it were true, that vpon the preſent opening of the ground, the humour ſhould immediatly be created, but it falleth vehemently all at one time. And we ſee oftentimes that in cutting thorough a mountaine or rocke, ſodainely there runneth out a great quantitie of water. And thus much for this matter. Now to return to our hiſtory again. Æmylius lay there a conuenient time, and ſtirred not: and it is ſaid there were neuer ſeen two ſo great armies one ſo neere to the other, and to be ſo quiet. In the end, caſting many things with himſelf, and deuiſing ſundry practiſes, he was informed of another way to enter into MACEDON, through the country of PERRÆBIA, ouer againſt the temple called Pythion, and the rock vpõ which it is built, where there lay no garriſon: which gaue him better hope to paſſe that way, for that it was not kept, then that he feared the narrownes and hardnes of the way vnto it. So, he brake the matter of his councel. Thereupõ Scipio called Naſica (the ſon adopted of that Great Scipio the AFRICAN, who became afterwards a great man, and was preſident of the Senate or councell) was the firſt man that offered himſelfe to leade them, whom it would pleaſe him to ſend to take that paſſage, & to aſſault their enemies behind. The ſecond was Fabius Maximus, the eldeſt ſon of Æmylius, who being but a very yong man, roſe notwithſtanding, and offered himſelfe very willingly. Æmylius was very glad of their offers, and gaue them not ſo many men as Polybius writeth, but ſo many as Naſica himſelf declareth in a letter of his he wrot to a king, where he reporteth al the ſtory of this iourny. There were 3000. ITALIANS, leauied in ITALY, by the confederates of the ROMAINES, who were not of the ROMAINE legions, and in the left wing about 5000. Beſides thoſe, Naſica tooke alſo 120. men at armes, and about 200. CRETANS and THRACIANS mingled together, of thoſe Harpalus had ſent thither. With this number Naſica departed from the campe, and tooke his way toward the ſea ſide, and lodged by the temple of Hercules, as if he had determined to do this feate by ſea, to enuiron the campe of the enemies behind. But when the ſouldiers had ſupped, & that it was darke night, he made the captaines of euery band priuy to his enterpriſe, and ſo marched all night a contrary way from the ſea, vntil at the length they came vnder the temple of Pythius, where he lodged to reſt the ſouldiers that were ſore trauelled all night. In this place, the mount Olympus is aboue ten furlongs high as appeared in a place ingrauen by him that meaſured it.

And ſo Xenagoras the ſonne of Eumelus,
In olden dayes by meaſure made, the ſame did find for vs:
And did engraue it here in writing for to ſee,
When as he tooke his lateſt leaue (Apollo god) of thee.

Yet the Geometricians ſay that there is no mountaine higher, nor ſea deeper, then the length of ten furlongs: ſo that I thinke this Xenagoras (in my opinion) did not take his meaſure at aduenture, and by geſſe, but by true rules of the art and inſtruments Geometricall. There Naſica reſted all night. King Perſeus perceiuing in the meane time that Æmylius ſtirred not from the place where he lay, miſtruſting nothing his practiſe, and the coming of Naſica, who was at hand; vntill ſuch time as a traytor of CRETE (ſtealing from Naſica) did reueale vnto him the pretended practiſe, as alſo the ROMAINES compaſſing of him about: he wondered much at theſe newes, howbeit he remoued not his campe from the place he lay in, but diſpatched one of his captaines called Milon, with ten thouſand ſtrangers, and two thouſand MACEDONIANS: and ſtraightly commanded him with all the poſſible ſpeed he could, to get the top of the hill before them. Polybius ſaith, that the ROMAINES came and gaue them an alarum, when they were ſleeping: But Naſica writeth, that there was a maruellous ſharpe and terrible battell on the top of the mountaine: and ſaid plainely, that a THRACIAN ſouldier coming towards him, he threw his dart at him, and hitting him right in the breſt, ſlew him ſtarke deade: and hauing repulſed their enemies, Milon their captain ſhamefully running away in his coat without armor or weapon, he followed him without any danger, and ſo went downe to the valley, with the ſafety of all his company. Naſica won the ſtraights of Macedon

This conflict fortuning thus, Perſeus raiſed his campe in great haſte from the place where he was, & being diſappointed of his hope, he retired in great feare, as one at his wits end, & not knowing how to determine. Yet was he conſtrained either to ſtay, & incampe before the city of PYDNE, there to take the hazard of battel, or elſe to deuide his army into his cities and ſtrong holds, and to receiue the wars within his own country, the which being once crept in, could neuer be driuen out againe, without great murder and bloudſhed. Hereupon his friends did counſell him, to chuſe rather the fortune of battell: alleadging vnto him, that he was the ſtronger in men a great way, & that the MACEDONIANS wold fight luſtily with all the courage they could, cõſidering that they fought for the ſafety of their wiues & children, and alſo in the preſence of their king, who ſhould both ſee euery mans doing, and fight himſelfe in perſon alſo for them. The king moued by theſe perſwaſions, determined to venture the chance of battell. So he pitched his campe and viewed the ſituation of the places all about, & deuided the cõpanies amongſt his captaines, purpoſing to giue a hot charge vpon the enemies when they ſhould draw neere. The place and country was ſuch, as being al chãpion, there was a goodly valley to range a battel of footmen in, and litle prety hils alſo one depending vpõ another, which were very commodious for archers, naked men, & ſuch as were lightly armed, to retire themſelues being diſtreſſed, & alſo to enuiron their enemies behind. There were two ſmall riuers alſo, Æſon and Leucus that ran through the ſame, the which though they were not very deepe, being about the latter end of Sommer, yet they would annoy the ROMAINS notwithſtanding. Now when Æmylius was ioyned with Naſica, he marched on ſtraight in battell ray towards his enemies. But perceiuing afar off their battel marched in very good order, and the great multitude of men placed in the ſame: he wondred to behold it, and ſuddenly ſtayed his army, conſidering with himſelfe what he had to do. Then the yong captains hauing charge vnder him, deſirous to fight it out preſently went vnto him to pray him to giue the onſet, but Naſica ſpecially aboue the reſt, hauing good hope in the former good lucke he had at his firſt encounter. Æmylius ſmiling, anſwered him: So would I do, if I were as yong as thou. But the ſundry victories I haue wonne heretofore, hauing taught me by experience the faults the vanquiſhed do commit, do forbid me to go ſo hotly to worke (before my ſouldiers haue reſted, which did returne but now) to aſſault an army ſet in ſuch order of battell. When he had anſwered him thus, he commanded the firſt bands that were now in view of the enemies, ſhould embattell themſelues, ſhewing a countenance to the enemie as though they would fight: and that thoſe in the rereward ſhould lodge in the meane time, and fortifie the campe. So, bringing the foremoſt men to be hindmoſt, by changing from man to man, before the enemies were aware of it: he had broken his battell by litle and litle, and lodged his men, fortified within the campe without any tumult or noyſe, and the enemies neuer perceiuing it. But when night came, and euery man had ſupped, as they were going to ſleepe and

The eclipse of the Moone. take their reſt: the Moone which was at the full, and of a great height, began to darken and to change into many ſorts of colours, looſing her light, vntill ſuch time as ſhe vaniſhed away, and was eclipſed altogether. Then the ROMAINES began to make a noiſe with baſons and pans, as their faſhion is to do in ſuch a chance, thinking by this ſound to call her againe, and to make her come to her light, lifting vp many torches lighted and firebrands into the aire. The MACEDONIANS on the other ſide did no ſuch matter within the campe, but were altogether ſtriken with an horrible feare: and there ranne a whiſpering rumour through the people, that this ſigne in the element ſignified the eclipſe of the King. For Æmylius was not ignorant of the diuerſities of the eclipſes, and he had heard ſay the cauſe is, by reaſon that the Moone making her ordinarie courſe about the world (after certaine reuolutions of time) doth come to enter into the round ſhadow of the earth, within the which ſhe remaineth hidden, vntill ſuch time as hauing paſt the darke region of the ſhadow, ſhe commeth afterwards to recouer her light which ſhe taketh of the Sunne. Neuertheleſſe, he being a godly deuout man, ſo ſoone as he perceiued the Moone had recouered her former brightneſſe againe, he ſacrificed eleuen calues. And the next morning alſo by the breake of day, making ſacrifice to Hercules, he could neuer haue any ſignes or tokens that promiſed him good luck, in ſacrificing twenty oxen one after another: but at the one & twentieth he had ſignes that promiſed him victory, ſo he defended himſelf. Wherfore, after he had vowed a ſolemne ſacrifice of an hundred oxen to Hercules, and alſo games of prices at the weapons, he commanded his captaines to put their men in readineſſe to fight: and ſo ſought to win time, tarying till the Sunne came about in the afternoone towards the Weſt, to the end that the ROMAINES which were turned towards the Eaſt, ſhould not haue it in their faces when they were fighting. In the meane time, he repoſed himſelfe in his tent, which was all open behind towards the ſide that looked into the valley, where the campe of his enemies lay. When it grew towards night, to make the enemies ſet vpon his men, ſome ſay he vſed this policy. He made a horſe be driuen towards them without a bridle, & certain ROMAINS followed him, as they would haue taken him againe: and this was the cauſe of procuring the skirmiſh. Other ſay, that the THRACIANS ſeruing vnder the charge of captaine Alexander, did ſet vpon certaine forragers of the ROMAINS, that brought forrage into the campe: out of the which, ſeuen hundred of the LIGVRIANS ranne ſuddenly to the reſcue and reliefe coming ſtill from both armies, at the laſt the maine battel followed after. Wherfore Æmylius like a wiſe General foreſeeing by the danger of this skirmiſh, and the ſtirring of both campes, what the fury of the battell would come to: came out of his tent, and paſſing by the bands did encourage them, and prayed them to ſticke to it like men. In the meane time, Naſica thruſting himſelfe into the place where the skirmiſh was hotteſt, perceiued the army of the enemies marching in battell ready to ioyne. The firſt that marched in the voward were the THRACIANS, who ſeemed terrible to look vpon, as he writeth himſelf: for they were mighty made men, & caried maruellous bright targets of ſteele before them, their legges were armed with greaues, & their thighes with taſes, their coates were black, and marched ſhaking heauy halberds vpon their ſhouldiers. Next vnto theſe THRACIANS, there followed them all the other ſtrangers and ſouldiers whom the king had hired, diuerſly armed and ſet forth: for they were people of ſundry nations gathered together, among whom the PÆONIANS were mingled. The third ſquadron was of MACEDONIANS, and all of thē choſen men, aſwell for the flower of their youth, as for the valiantnes of their perſons: & they were all in goodly gilt armours, & braue purple caſſockes vpon thē, ſpicke and ſpan new. And at their backes came after them, the old bands to ſhew themſelues out of the campe with targets of copper, that made all the plaine to ſhine with the brightnes of their ſteele and copper. And all the hils and mountaines thereabouts did ring againe like an Echo, with the cry and noiſe of ſo many fighting men, one encouraging another. In this order they marched ſo fiercely with ſo great heart-burning, and ſuch ſwiftneſſe: that the firſt which were ſlaine at the incounter, fell dead two furlongs from the camp of the ROMAINS. The charge being giuen and the battel begunne, Æmylius gallopping to the voward of the battel, perceiued that the captains of the MACEDONIANS which were in the firſt ranks, had already thruſt their pikes into the ROMAINES targets, ſo as they could not come neere them with their ſwords: and that the other MACEDONIANS carying their targets behind them, had now plucked them before them, and did baſe their pikes all at one time, and made a violent thruſt into the targets of the ROMAINES. Which when he had conſidered, and of what ſtrength and force his wall and ranke of of targets was, one ioyning ſo neere another, and what a terrrour it was to ſee a front of a battell with ſo many armed pikes and ſteele heads: he was more afeard and amazed withall, then with any ſight he euer ſaw before, neuertheles he could wiſely diſſemble it at that time. And ſo paſſing by the companies of his horſemen, without either curaces or helmet vpon his head, he ſhewed a noble cheereful countenance vnto them that fought. But on the contrary ſide, Perſeus the king of Macedon, as Polybius writeth, ſo ſoone as the battell was begun, withdrew himſelfe, and got into the city of Pydne, vnder pretence to go to do ſacrifice vnto Hercules: who doth not accept the faint ſacrifice of cowards, neither doth receiue their prayers, becauſe they be vnreaſonable. For it is no reaſon, that he that ſhooteth not ſhould hit the white: nor that he ſhould winne the victory, that bideth not the battell, neither that he ſhould haue any good, that doth nothing towards it: nor that a naughty man ſhould be fortunate and proſper. The gods did fauour Æmylius prayers, becauſe he prayed for victory with his ſword in his hand, and fighting did call to them for aide. Howbeit there is one Poſidonius a writer, who ſaith he was in that time, and moreouer that he was at the battell: and he hath written an hiſtory containing many bookes of the acts of king Perſeus, where he ſaith, that it was not for faint heart, nor vnder colour to ſacrifice vnto Hercules, that Perſeus went from the battel, but becauſe he had a ſtripe of an horſe on the thigh the day before: who though he could not very well helpe himſelfe, and that all his friends ſought to perſwade him not to go to the battell, yet he cauſed one of his horſes to be brought to him notwithſtanding (which he commonly vſed to ride vp and downe on) and taking his backe, rode into the battell vnarmed, where an infinite number of darts were throwne at him frō both ſides. And among thoſe, he had a blow with a dart that hurt him ſomewhat, but it was ouerthwart, & not with the point, and did hit him on the left ſide glancing wiſe, with ſuch a force, that it rent his coat, and raſed his skin vnderneath, ſo as it left a marke behind a long time after. And this is all that Poſidonius writeth to defend and excuſe Perſeus. The Romains hauing their hands full, and being ſtaied by the battell of the Macedonians that they could make no breach into them, there was a captaine of the Pelignians called Salius, who tooke the enſigne of his band, and caſt it among the preaſe of his enemies. Then all the Pelignians ſet vpon them, with a maruellous force and fury in that place: for all Italians thinke it too greate a ſhame and diſhonour for ſouldiers to loſe or forſake their enſigne. Thus was there maruellous force of both ſides vſed in that place: for the Pelignians proued to cut the Macedonians pikes with their ſwords, or elſe to make them giue backe with their great targets, or to make a breach into thē, and to take their pikes with their hands. But the Macedonians to the contrary, holding their pikes faſt with both hands, ran thē through that came neere vnto them, ſo that neither target not corſlet could hold out the force and violence of the puſh of their pikes, in ſo much as they turned vp the heeles of the Pelignians and Thracians, who like deſperate beaſts without reaſon, ſhutting in themſelues among their enemies, ranne wilfully vpon their owne deaths, and their firſt ranke were ſlaine euery man of them. Thereupon thoſe that were behinde, gaue backe a litle, but fled not turning their backs, and only retired giuing backe towards the mountaine Olocrus. Æmylius ſeeing that (as Poſidonius writeth) rent his arming coate from his backe for anger, becauſe that ſome of his men gaue backe: other durſt not front the battell of the Macedonians, which was ſō ſtrongly imbattelled on euery ſide and ſo mured in with a wall of pikes, preſenting their armed heads on euery ſide a man could come, that it was impoſſible to breake into them, no not ſo much as come neere them onely. Yet notwithſtanding, becauſe the field was not altogether plaine and euen, the battell that was large in the front, could not alwayes keepe that wall, continuing their targets cloſe one to another, but they were driuen of neceſſity to breake and open in many places, as it happeneth oft in great battels, according to the great force of the ſouldiers: that in one place they thruſt forward, and in another they giue backe, and leaue a hole. Wherefore Æmylius ſuddenly taking the vantage of this occaſion, deuided his men into ſmall companies, and commanded them they ſhould quickly thruſt in betweene their enemies, and occupy the places they ſaw voide in the front of their enemies, and that they ſhould ſet on them in that ſort, and not with one whole continuall charge, but occupying them here and there with diuerſe companies in ſundry places. Æmylius gaue this charge vnto the priuate captaines of euery band and their lieuetenants, and the captaines alſo gaue the like charge vnto their ſouldiers that could skilfully execute their commandement. For they went preſently into thoſe parts where they ſaw the places open, and being once entred in among them, ſome gaue charge vpon the flanckes of the MACEDONIANS, where they were all naked and vnarmed: other ſet vpon them behind, ſo that the ſtrength of all the corpes of the battell (which conſiſteth in keeping cloſe together) being opened in this ſort, was ſtraight ouerthrowne. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or a few againſt a few, the MACEDONIANS with their litle ſhort ſwords, came to ſtrike vpon the great ſhields of the ROMAINES, which were very ſtrong, and couered all their bodies downe to the foote. And they to the contrary, were driuen of neceſſity to receiue the blowes of the ſtrong heauy ſwords of the ROMAINES, vpon their light weake targets, ſo that what with their heauineſſe, and vehement force wherewith the blowes lighted vpon them, there was no target nor corſlet, but they paſſed it through, and ran them in. By reaſon whereof they could make no long reſiſtance, whereupon they turned their backs and ranne away. But when they came to the ſquadron of the old beaten ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, there was the cruelleſt fight and moſt deſperate ſeruice, where they ſay that Marcus Cato (ſon of great Cato, and ſon in law of Æmylius) ſhewing all the valiantnes in his perſon that a noble mind could poſſibly performe, loſt his ſword which fell out of his hand. But he like a yong man of noble courage, that had bin valiantly brought vp in all diſcipline, & knew how to follow the ſteps of his father (the nobleſt perſon that euer man ſaw) was to ſhew then his valure and worthines, and thought it more honor for him there to die, then liuing to ſuffer his enemies to enioy any ſpoile of his. So, by and by he ran into the ROMAINE army, to find out ſome of his friends, whom he told what had befallen him, and prayed them to help him to recouer his ſword; whereto they agreed. And being a good company of luſty valiant ſouldiers together, they ruſhed ſtraight among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and ſo did ſet vpon them with ſuch force and fury, that they made a lane through the middeſt of them, and with great ſlaughter and ſpilling of bloud, euen by plaine force, they cleared the way ſtill before them. Now when the place was voided, they ſought for the ſword, and in the end found it with great ado, amongſt a heape of other ſwords and dead bodies; whereat they reioyced maruellouſly. Then ſinging a ſong of victory, they went again more fiercely then before to giue a charge vpon their enemies, who were not yet broken aſunder: vntill ſuch time as at the length, the three thouſand choſen MACEDONIANS fighting valiantly euen to the laſt man, and neuer forſaking their rankes, were all ſlaine in the place. After whoſe ouerthrow, there was a great ſlaughter of other alſo that fled, ſo that all the valley and foote of the mountaines thereabouts was couered with dead bodies. The next day after the battell, when the ROMAINES did paſſe ouer the riuer Leucus, they found it running all bloudy. For it is ſaid there were ſlaine at this field of Perſeus men, aboue fiue and twenty thouſand: and of the ROMAINES ſide, as Poſſidonius ſaith, not aboue ſixeſcore, or as Naſica writeth, but foureſcore only. And for ſo great an ouerthrow, it is reported it was wonderful quickly done, & executed. For they began to fight about three of the clocke in the afternoone, and had wonne the victory before foure, and all the reſt of the day they followed their enemies in chaſe, an hundred and twenty furlongs from the place where the battell was fought, ſo that it was very late, and farre forth night, before they returned againe into the campe. So ſuch as returned, was receiued with maruellous great ioy of their pages that went out with linkes and torches lighted, to bring their maſters into their tents, where their men had made great bonfires, and decked them vp with crownes & garlands of laurell, ſauing the Generals tent onely: who was very heauy, for that of his two ſonnes he brought with him to the warres, the younger could not be found, which he loued beſt of the twaine, becauſe he ſaw he was of a better nature then the reſt of his brethren. For euen then, being new crept out of the ſhell as it were, he was maruellous valiant and hardie, and deſired honour wonderfully. Now Æmylius thought he had bene caſt away, fearing leſt for lacke of experience in the warres, and through the raſhneſſe of his youth, he had put himſelfe too farre in fight amongſt the preaſe of the enemies. Hereupon the campe heard ſtraight what ſorow Æmylius was in, and how grieuouſly he tooke it. The ROMAINS being ſet at ſupper, roſe from their meat, and with torch-light ſome ran to Æmylius tent, other went out of the campe to ſeeke him among the dead bodies, if they might know him: ſo all the campe was ful of ſorow & mourning, the valleys and hils all about did ring againe with the cries of thoſe that called Scipio aloud. For euen from his childhood he had a naturall gift in him, of all the rare and ſingular parts required in a captaine and wiſe gouernour of the common-weale, aboue all the young men of his time. At the laſt, when they were out of all hope of his coming againe, he happily returned from the

the chaſe of the enemies, with two or three of his familiars onely, all bloudied with new bloud (like a ſwift running greyhound fleſhed with the bloud of the hare) hauing purſued very farre for ioy of the victory. It is that Scipio which afterwards deſtroyed both the cities of CARTHAGE and NVMANTIVM, who was the greateſt man of war and valianteſt captaine of the ROMAINS in his time, and of the greateſt authority & reputation among them. Thus fortune deferring till another time the execution of her ſpite, which ſhe did beare to ſo noble an exploit ſuffered Æmylius for that time, to take his full pleaſure of that noble victory. And as for Perſeus, he fled firſt frō the city of PYDNE, vnto the city of PELLA, with his horſemen, which were in manner all ſaued. Wherupon the footmen that ſaued themſelues by flying, meeting them by the way, called them traytors, cowards, & villaines: and worſe then that, they turned them off their horſe backes, and fought it out luſtily with them. Perſeus ſeeing that, and fearing leſt this mutiny might turne to light on his necke, he turned his horſe out of the high way, and pulled off his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe in his hand, fearing to be knowne thereby: and that he might the more eaſily ſpeake with his friends by the way, he lighted on foot, & led his horſe in his hand. But ſuch as were about him, one made as though he would mend the latchet of his ſhoo, another ſeemed to water his horſe, another as though he would drink: ſo that one dragging after another in this ſort, they al left him at the laſt, & ran their way, not fearing the enemies fury ſo much, as their kings cruelty: who being grieued with his misfortune, ſought to lay the fault of the ouerthrow vpon all other but himſelf. Now he being come into the city of PELLA by night, Euctus & Eudeus, two of his treaſurers came vnto him, & ſpeaking boldly (but out of time) preſumed to tell him the great fault he had committed, and to counſell him what he ſhould do. The king was ſo moued with their preſumption, that with his own hands he ſtabbed his dagger in them both, & ſlew them outright. But after this fact, all his ſeruants & friends refuſed him, and there only taried with him but Euander CRETAN, Archedamus ÆTOLIAN, & Neo BOEOTIAN. And as for the meane ſouldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, & yet it was not for the good will they did beare him, but for the loue of his gold and ſiluer, as Bees that keepe their hiues for loue of the hony: for he caried with him a great treaſure, & gaue thē leaue to ſpoile certain plate & veſſel of gold and ſiluer, to the value of fifty talents. But firſt of all when he was come into the city of AMPHIPOLIS, & afterwards into the city of ALEPSE, & that the feare was well blowne ouer, he returned againe to his old humour which was borne and bred with him, and that was auarice and miſery: for he complained vnto thoſe that were about him, that he had vnwares giuen to the ſouldiers of CRETA, his plate and veſſell of gold to be ſpoiled, being thoſe which in old time belonged vnto Alexander the great: and prayed them with teares in his eies that had the place, they wold be contented to change it for ready mony. Now ſuch as knew his nature, found ſtraight this was but a fraud & a CRETAN lye, to deceiue the CRETANS with: but thoſe that truſted him, and did reſtore againe the plate they had, did loſe it euery iot, for he neuer payed thē peny for it. So he got of his friends, the value of thirty talents, which his enemies ſoone after did take from him. And with that ſum he went into the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he took the ſanctuary and priuiledge of the temple of Caſtor & Pollux. They ſay, that the MACEDONIANS of long continuance did naturally loue their kings: but then ſeeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hearts failed thē, & broke withall. For they all came & ſubmitted themſelues to Æmylius, and made him Lord of the whole Realme of MACEDON in two dayes: and this doth ſeeme to confirme their words, who impute all Æmylius doings vnto his good fortune. And ſurely, the maruellous fortune he happened on in ẏ city AMPHIPOLIS, doth confirme it much, which a man cannot aſcribe otherwiſe, but to the ſpeciall grace of the gods. For one day beginning to do ſacrifice, lightning fell from heauen, and ſet all the wood on fire vpon the altar, & ſanctified the ſacrifice. But yet the miracle of his fame is more to be wondred at. For foure daies after Perſeus had loſt the battell, and that the city of PELLA was taken, as the people of ROME were at the liſts or ſhew place, ſeeing horſes run for games: ſuddenly there aroſe a rumor at the entring into the liſts where the games were, that Æmylius had wonne a great battell of King Perſeus, and had conquered all MACEDON. This newes was rife ſtraight in euery mans mouth, and there followed vpon it a maruellous ioy and great cheere in euery corner, with ſhouts & clapping of hands, that continued all the day through the city of ROME. Afterwards they made diligent enquiry, how this rumour firſt came vp, but no certaine author could be knowne, and euery man ſaid they heard it ſpoken: ſo as in the end it came to nothing, and passed away in that sort for a time. But shortly after, there came letters, and certaine newes that made them wonder more then before, from whence the messenger came that reported the first newes of it, which could be deuised by no naturall meanes, and yet proued true afterwards. We do reade also of a battell that was fought in ITALY, neare vnto the riuer of SAGRA, whereof newes was brought the very same day vnto PELOPONNESVS. And of another also in like maner that was fought in ASIA against the MEDES, before the city of MYCALA: the newes whereof came the same day vnto the campe of the GRECIANS, lying before the city of PLATOES. And in that great iourny where the ROMAINS ouerthrew the Tarquins, & the army of the LATINS: immediatly after the battell was wonne, they saw two goodly yong men come newly from the campe, who brought newes of the victory to ROME, and they iudged they were Castor & Pollux. The first man that spake to them in the market place before the fountaine, where they watered their horse being all of a white some, told them, that he wondered how they could so quickly bring these newes. And they laughing came to him, & tooke him softly by the beard with both their hands, and euen in the market place his haire being black before, was presently turned yellow. This miracle made them beleeue the report the man made, who euer after was called Æneabarbus, as you would say, bearded as yellow as gold. Another like matter that happened in our time maketh all such newes credible: For when Antonius rebelled against the Emperour Domitian, the city of ROME was in a maruellous perplexity, because they looked for great warres towards GERMANIE. But in this feare, there grew a sudden rumor of victory, & it went currantly through ROME, that Antonius himselfe was slaine, and all his army ouerthrowne, and not a man left aliue. This rumour was so rife, that many of the chiefest men of ROME beleeued it, & did sacrifise thereupon vnto the gods, giuing them thankes for the victory. But when the matter came to sifting, who was the first author of the rumour, no man could tell: for one put it ouer still to another, and it died so in the end amongst the people, as in a bottomlesse matter, for they could neuer boult out any certaine ground of it: but euē as it came flying into ROME, so went it flying away againe, no man could tell how. Notwithstanding, Domitian holding on his iourny to make this warre, met with posts that brought him letters of the certaine victory: and remembring the rumor of the victory that ran before in ROME, he found it true, that it was on the very same day the victory was gotten; and the distance between ROME and the place where the field was won, was aboue 20000 furlongs off. Euery man in our time knoweth this to be true. But again to our history. Cn. Octauius, lieutenant of the army of Æmylius by sea, came to anker vnder the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he wold not take Perseus by force out of the sanctuary where he was, for the reuerence he did beare vnto the gods Castor & Pollux: but he did besiege him in such sort, as he could not scape him, nor flie by sea out of the Iland. Yet he had secretly practised with one Orondes a CRETAN, that had a brigantine, and was at a prise with him for a sum of mony to conuey him away by night: But the CRETAN serued him a right CRETANS tricke. For when he had taken aboard by night into his vessel, all the kings treasure of gold & siluer, he sent him word that he should not faile the next night following to come into the peere by the temple of Ceres, with his wife, his children and seruants, where indeed was no possibility to take shipping; but the next night following he hoised saile, and got him away. It was a pitifull thing that Persens was driuen to do and suffer at that time. For he came downe in the night by ropes, out of a litle straight window vpon the wals, and not only himselfe, but his wife and litle babes, who neuer knew before what flying and hardnesse meant. And yet he fetched a more grieuous bitter sigh, when one told him on the peere, that he saw Orondes the CRETAN vnder saile in the maine seas. Then day beginning to breake, & seeing himself void of all hope, he ran with his wife for life to the wall, to recouer the sanctuary againe, before the ROMAINS that saw him could ouertake him. And as for his children, he had giuen them himself into the hands of one Ion, whom before he had maruellously loued, & who did then traiterously betray him: for he deliuered his children vnto the ROMAINS. Which part was one of the chiefest causes that draue him (as a beast that will follow her litle ones being taken frō her) to yeeld himself into their hands that had his children. Now he had a speciall confidence in Scipio Nasica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to yeeld himself: but it was answered him, that he was not there. Then he began to lament his hard and miserable fortune euery way. And in the end, considering how necessity enforced him, he yeelded himselfe into the hands of Cneus Octauius, wherein he shewed plainly, that he had another vice in him more vnmanly and vile, then auarice, that was, a faint heart, and feare to die. But hereby hereby he depriued himselfe of others pity and compassion towards him, being that only thing which fortune cannot deny & take from the afflicted, and specially from them that haue a noble heart. For he made request they would bring him vnto the General Æmylius who rose from his chaire when he saw him come, and went to meete him with his friends, the water standing in his eyes, to meete a great king, by fortune of warre and by the will of the gods, fallen into that most lamentable state. But he to the contrary, vnmanly, and shamefully behaued himselfe. For he fell downe at his feet, and embraced his knees, and vttered such vncomely speech and vile requests, as Æmylius selfe could not abide to heare them: but knitting his browes against him, being hartily offended, he spake thus vnto him: Alas poore man, why dost thou discharge fortune of this fault, where thou mightest iustly charge and accuse her of thy discharge, doing things, for the which euery one iudgeth thou hast deserued thy present misery, and art vnworthy also of thy former honor? Why dost thou defame my victory, and blemish the glory of my doings, shewing thy selfe so base a man, as my honour is not great to ouercome so vnworthy an enemy? The ROMAINES haue euer esteemed magnanimity, euen in their greatest enemies: but dastardlinesse, though it be fortunate, yet it is hated of euery body. Notwithstanding, he tooke him vp, and taking him by the hand, gaue him into the custody of Ælius Tubero. Then Æmylius went into his tent and caried his sons, and sons in law with him, and other men of quality, and specially the yonger sorte. And being set downe, he continued a great space very pensiue with himselfe, not speaking a word: insomuch that all the standers by wondered much at the matter. In the end he began to enter into discourse and talke of fortune, and the vnconstancy of these worldly things, and said vnto them: Is there any man liuing, my friends, who hauing fortune at will, should therefore boast & glory in the prosperity of his doings, for that he had conquered a country, city, or Realme: and not rather to feare the vnconstancy of fortune? who laying before our eyes, and all those that professe armes at this present, so notable an example of the common frailty of men, doth plainely teach vs to thinke, that there is nothing constant or perdurable in this world. For when is it, that men may thinke themselues assured, considering that when they haue ouercome others, then are they driuen to mistrust fortune most, and to mingle feare and mistrust, with ioy of victory: if they will wisely consider the common course of fatall destiny that altereth daily, sometime fauouring one, otherwise throwing downe another? You see, that in an houres space we haue troden vnder our feet the house of Alexander the Great: who hath bin the mightiest and most redoubted prince of the world. You see a king, that not long since was folowed & accompanied, with many thousand souldiers of horsemen & footmen, brought at this present into such miserable extremity, that he is inforced to receiue his meate and drinke daily at the hands of his enemies. Should we haue any better hope then, that fortune wil alwaies fauor our doings, more then she doth his now, at this present? no out of doubt. Therefore digesting this matter wel, you yong men I say, be not too brag nor fooliſh proud, of this conquest and noble victory: but think what may happen hereafter, marking to what end fortune will turne the enuy of this our present prosperity. Such were Æmylius words to these yong men, as it is reported, bridling by these and such like perswasions, the lusty brauery of this youth, euen as with the bit and bridle of reason. Afterwards he put his army into garrisons to refresh them: and went himselfe in person in the meane time to visite GREECE, making it an honorable progresse, and also a commendable. For as he passed through the cities, he relieued the people, reformed the gouernment of their state, and euer gaue them some gift or present. Vnto some he gaue corne, which king Perseus had gathered for the wars: and vnto other he gaue oiles, meeting with so great store of prouision, that he rather lacked people to giue it vnto, to receiue it at his hands, then wanting to giue, there was so much. As he passed by the city of DELPHES, he saw there a great piller, foure square, of white stone, which they had set vp, to put king Perseus image of gold vpon it. Whereupon he commanded them to set vp his in that place, saying: It was reason the conquered should giue place vnto the conquerors. And being in the city of OLYMPIA, visiting the temple of Iupiter Olympian, he spake this openly, which euer since hath bene remembred: that Phidias had rightly made Iupiter, as Homer had described him. Afterwards when the ten ambassadors were arriued that were sent from ROME to establish with him the realm of MACEDON, he redeliuered the MACEDONIANS their country and townes againe, to liue at liberty, according to their lawes, paying yearly to the ROMAINS for tribute, a hundred talents: where before they were wont to pay vnto their kings ten times as much. And he made playes and games of all sorts, & did celebrate sumptuous sacrifices vnto the gods. He kept open court to all comers, and made noble feasts, and defrayed the whole charge thereof, with the treasure Perseus had gathered together, sparing for no cost. But through his care and foresight, there was a speciall good order taken, euery man so courteously receiued and welcomed, and so orderly marshalled at the table according to their estate and calling, that the GRECIANS wondred to see him so carefull in matters of sport and pleasure: and that he took as great paines in his own person, to see that smal matters should be ordered as they ought, as he tooke regard for discharge of more weightie causes. But this was a maruellous pleasure to him, to see that among such sumptuous fights prepared to shew pleasure to the persons inuited, no sight nor stately shew did so delight thē, as to enioy the sight and company of his person. So he told them, that seemed to wonder at his diligence & care in these matters: that to order a feast well, required as great iudgement and discretion, as to set a battel: to make the one feareful to the enemies, and the other acceptable to his friends. But men esteemed his bounty & magnanimity for his best vertue and quality. For he did not only refuse to see the kings wonderfull treasure of gold and siluer, but caused it to be told, and deliuered to the custody of the treasures, to cary to the coffers of store in ROME: and onely suffered his sons that were learned, to take the books of the kings library. When he did reward the soldiers for their valiant seruice in this battel, he gaue his son in law Ælius Tubero a cup, weying fiue talents. It is the same Tubero we told you of before, who liued with sixteene other of his kin al in one house, and of the only reuenue they had of a litle farme in the country. Some say, that that cup was the first peece of plate that euer came into the house of the Ælyans: & yet it came for honor and reward of vertue: but before that time, neither thēselues, nor their wiues, would euer haue, or weare any gold or siluer. After he had very well ordered and disposed all things, at the last he tooke leaue of the GRECIANS, and counselled the MACEDONIANS to remember the liberty the ROMAINS had giuen thē, & that they should be carefull to keepe it, by their good gouernment and concord together. Then he departed from them, and took his iourny towards the country of EPIRVS, hauing receiued commission from the Senate of ROME, to suffer his souldiers who had done seruice in the battel, and ouerthrow of king Perseus, to spoile all the cities of that country. Wherfore that he might surprise them on a sudden, and that they should mistrust nothing, he sent to all the cities that they should send him by a certain day, ten of the chiefest men of euery city. Who when they were come, he commanded them to go and bring him by such a day, all the gold & siluer they had within their cities, aswell in their priuate houses, as in their temples and churches, and gaue vnto euery one of them a captaine and garrison with them, as if it had bene only to haue receiued and searched for the gold and siluer he demanded. But when the day appointed was come, the souldiers in diuerse places (and all at one time) set vpon their enemies, and did rifle and spoile them of that they had, and made them also pay ransome euery man: So as by this policy, they were taken & made slaues in one day, a hundred and fifty thousand persons, and threescore & ten cities spoiled and sacked euery one, And yet when they came to diuide the spoile of this generall destruction of a whole Realme by the poll, it came not to euery souldiers part, aboue eleuen siluer Drachmes a peece. Which made euery one to wonder greatly, and to feare also the terror of the wars to see the wealth and riches of so great a Realme, to mount to so little for euery mans share. When Æmylius had done this fact against his own nature, which was very gentle and courteous, he went vnto the sea side to the city of ORICA, and there embarked with his army bound for ITALIE. Where when he was arriued, he went vp the riuer of Tyber against the streame, in king Perseus chiefe galley, which had sixteene owers on a side, richly set out with the armor of the prisoners, rich clothes of purple colour, and other such spoiles of the enemies: so that the ROMAINS running out of ROME in multitudes of people to see his galley, & going side by side by her as they rowed softly, Æmylius took as great pleasure in it, as in any open games or feasts, or triumph that had bin shewed indeed. But when the souldiers saw, that the gold and siluer of king Perseus treasure was not diuided amongst them according vnto promise, & that they had a great deale lesse then they looked for, they were maruellously offended, and inwardly grudged Æmylius in their hearts. Neuertheless they durst not speake it openly, but did accuse him, that he had bene too straight vnto them in this war: and therefore they did shew no great desire, nor forwardnesse, to procure him the honour of triumph. Which Seruius Galba vnderstanding, that had bene an old enemy of his, notwithstanding he had the charge of a thousand men vnder him in this warre: he like an enuious viper told the people, that Æmylius had not deserued the honor of triumph, and sowed sowed seditious words against him among the souldiers, to aggrauate their il wil the more against him. Moreouer he craued a day of the Tribunes of the people, to haue respit to bring forth such matter as they determined to obiect against him: saying the time then was far spent, the Sun being but foure houres high, and that it would require longer time and leisure. The tribunes made him answer, that he should speake then what he had to say against him, or otherwise they would not grant him audience. Hereupon he began to make a long oration in his dispraise, ful of railing words, and spent all the rest of the day in that railing oration. Afterwards when night came on, the Tribunes brake vp the assembly, and the next morning the souldiers being incouraged by Galbaes oration, and hauing confedered together, did flock about Galba, in the mount of the Capitoll, where the Tribunes had giuen warning they would keepe their assembly. Now being broad day Æmylius triumph was referred to the most number of voices of the people, & the first tribe flatly did deny his triumph. The Senate, & the residue of the people hearing that, were very sory to see they did Æmylius so open wrong and iniury. The common people said nothing to it, but seemed to be very sory, howbeit they sought no redresse. The Lords of the Senate cried out vpon them, and said, it was too much shame; and exhorted one another to bridle the insolency and boldnesse of those souldiers, who wold grow in the end to such tumult & disorder, that they would commit all mischiefe and wickednesse, if betimes they were not looked to and preuented, seeing they did so openly stand against their Generall, seeking to depriue him of the honor of his triumph and victory. So they assembled a good company of them together, and went vp to the Capitol, and prayed the Tribunes they would stay to take the voices of the people, vntill they had acquainted them with such needfull matter, as they had to open vnto them. The Tribunes granted to it, & silence was made. Then Marcus Seruilius, who had bene Consull, and had fought three and twenty combats of life and death in his owne person, & had alwaies slaine as many of his enemies as chalenged him man for man; rose vp, and spake in fauour of Æmylius in this matter: I know now (said he) better then before, how noble and worthy a captaine Paulus Æmylius is, who hath atcheiued such glory & honorable victory, with so dishonorable & disobedient souldiers. And I can but wonder that the people not long since reioyced and made great account of the victories and triumphs won vpon the ILLYRIANS & other nations of AFRICK: and that now they should for spite enuy his glory (doing what lyeth in them to hinder) to bring a MACEDONIAN king aliue in a triumph, and to shew the glory and greatnesse of king Philip and Alexander the Great, subdued by the ROMAINS force and power. What reason haue ye, that not long since, vpon a flying rumour that Æmylius had won the battell against Perseus, you straight made sacrifice to the gods with great ioy, praying them that you might be witnesses, of the truth thereof: and now that the person himselfe whom ye made Generall is returned home, and doth deliuer you most assured victory, you do frustrate the gods most solemne thanks and honor due to them, and do depriue your selues also of your wonted glory in such a case: as if you were afeard to see the greatnesse of your prosperity, or that you meant to pardon a king, your slaue and prisoner. And yet of the two, you haue more reason to hinder the triumph, as pitying the king, then enuying your Captaine. But the malice of the wicked, through your patience is growne to such an insolent audacity, & boldnesse, that we see men present here before vs, which neuer went from the smoke of the chimney, nor caried away any blowes in the field, being crammed at home like women and house-doues; and yet they are so impudent and shameless, as they dare presume vnreuerently to your faces to prate of the office and duty of a Generall of an army, and of the desert of triumph, before you I say, who by experience of many a sore cut and wound vpon your bodies in the warres, haue learned to know a good and valiant captaine, from a vile and cowardly person. And speaking these words, he cast open his gowne, and shewed before them all the infinite scars and cuts he had receiued vpon his brest: and then turning him behind, shewed all such places as were not fit to be seene openly, and so turned himself againe to Galba, and said vnto him: Thou mockest me for that I shew thee: but I reioyce before my countrymen and citizens, that for seruing my country night and day on horse backe, I haue these wounds vpon me which thou seest. Now get thee about thy businesse and receiue their voices: & I will come after, noting them that are naughty & vnthankful citizens, who like to be soothed with flattery, and not stoutly cõmanded, as behoued a General in the warre. These words so reined the hard-headed souldiers with the curbe of reason, that all the other tribes agreed in one, & granted Æmylius triumph: the order and solemnitie whereof was performed in this sort. First, the people

hauing ſet vp ſundry ſcaffolds, aſwell in the liſts and field called Circos by the LATINES, where the games and common running of horſes & chariots are made, as alſo about the market place, and in other ſtreets of the citie, in the which the ſhew of the triumph ſhould paſſe: they all preſented themſelues in their beſt gownes to ſee the magnificence, and ſtate therof. All the temples of the gods alſo were ſet wide open, hanged full of garlands of flowers, and all perfumed within: and there were ſet through all the quarters of the citie, numbers of ſergeants and other officers holding tipſtaues in their hands to order the ſtragling people, & to keepe them vp in corners and lanes ends, that they ſhould not peſter the ſtreets, & hinder the triumph. Furthermore the ſight of this triumph was to continue three daies, wherof the firſt was ſcant ſufficient to ſee the paſſing by of the images, tables, and pictures, and ſtatues of wonderfull bigneſſe, all won and gotten of their enemies, & drawn in the ſhew vpon 250. chariots. The ſecond day, there were caried vpon a number of carts, all the faireſt and richeſt armour of the MACEDONIANS, aſwel of copper, as alſo of iron and ſteele, all gliſtring bright, being newly furbuſhed, and artificially laid in order (and yet in ſuch ſort, as if they had bin caſt in heapes one vpon another, without taking any care otherwiſe for the ordering and laying of them) faire burganets vpon targets: habergions, or brigantines and corſlets, vpon graues: round targets of the CRETANS, and iauelins of the THRACIANS, and arrowes amongſt the armed pikes: all this armour and cariage, being bound one to another ſo trimly (neither being too looſe, nor too ſtraight) that one hitting againſt another, as they drew them vpon the carts through the city, they made ſuch a ſound & noiſe, as is was fearfull to heare it: ſo that the onely ſight of theſe ſpoiles of the captiues being ouercome, made the ſight ſo much more terrible to behold, after theſe carts loden with armour, there followed 3000 men, which caried the ready mony in 750 veſſels, which weighed about three talents apeece, & euery one of them were caried by foure men: & there were other that caried great bolles of ſiluer, cups and goblets faſhioned like pitchers, & other pots to drink in, goodly to behold, aſwel for their bignes, as for their great & ſingular imboſſed works about them. The third day early in the morning the trumpets began to ſound and ſet forwards, ſounding no march nor ſweet note, to beautifie the triumph withall: but they blew out the braue alarum the ſound at an aſſault, to giue the ſouldiers courage for to fight. After them followed ſixſcore goodly fat oxen, hauing all their hornes gilt, and garlands of flowers & noſegaies about their heads, and there went by thé certaine yong men, with aprons of needle-worke, girt about their middle, who led them to the ſacrifice, and yong boyes with them alſo, that caried goodly baſons of gold & ſiluer, to caſt and ſprinkle the bloud of the ſacrifices about. And after theſe, followed thoſe that caried all coynes of gold deuided by baſons & veſſels, and euery one of them weying three talents, as they did before, that caried the great holy cup, which Æmylius had cauſed to be made of maſſie gold, ſet ful of precious ſtons, weying the weight of ten talents, to make an offering vnto the gods. And next vnto them went other that caried plate, made and wrought after antike faſhion, & notable cups of the ancient kings of MACEDON: as the cup called Antigonus, and another Seleucus: and to be ſhort, al the whole cubboord of plate of gold and ſiluer of king Perſeus. And next them came the chariot of his armour in the which was all king Perſeus harneſſe, and his royall band (they call a Diademe) vpon his armour. And a litle ſpace betweene them, followed next the kings children, whom they led priſoners, with the traine of their ſchoole-maſters & other officers, & their ſeruants, weeping and lamenting: who held vp their hands vnto the people that looked vpon them, and taught the kings yong children to do the like, to aske mercy & grace at the peoples hands. There were three prety litle children, two ſonnes and a daughter amongſt them, whoſe tender yeares and lacke of vnderſtanding, made them (poore ſoules) they could not feele their preſent miſery, which made the people ſo much the more to pity them, when they ſaw the poore little infants, that knew not the change of their fortune: ſo that for the compaſſion they had of them, they almoſt let the father paſſe without looking vpon him. Many peoples hearts did melt for very pity, that the teares ran downe their cheekes, ſo as this ſight brought both pleaſure and ſorow, together to the lookers on, vntill they were paſt and gone a good way out of ſight. King Perſeus the father, followed after his children and their traine, and he was cloathed in a blacke gown, wearing a paire of ſlippers on his feet after his country maner. He ſhewed by his countenance his troubled mind, oppreſt with ſorow of his moſt miſerable ſtate & fortune. He was followed with his kinsfolkes, his familiar friends, his officers & houſhold ſeruants, their faces diſfigured by blubbering, ſhewing to the world by their lamenting teares, and ſorrowfull eyes caſt

vpon their vnfortunate maſter, how much they ſorowed and bewailed his moſt hard and cruell fortune, litle accounting of their owne miſery. The voyce goeth, that Perſeus ſent vnto Æmilius to intreat him, that he ſhould not be led through the city in the ſhew & ſight of the triumph. But Æmylius mocking (as he deſerued) his cowardly faint heart, anſwered: As for that, it was before, and is now in him, to do if he will. Meaning to let him vnderſtand thereby, that he might rather chuſe to dye, then liuing to receiue ſuch open ſhame. Howbeit his heart would not ſerue him, he was ſo cowardly, & made ſo effeminate, by a certain vaine hope he knew not what, that he was contented to make one among his owne ſpoiles. After all this, there followed 400. princely crownes of gold, which the cities & towns of GREECE had purpoſely ſent by their ambaſſadors vnto Æmylius, to honour his victory: and next vnto them, he came himſelf in his chariot triumphing, which was paſſing ſumptuouſly ſet forth and adorned. It was a noble ſight to behold: and yet the perſon of himſelfe only was worth the looking on, without all that great pomp & magnificence. For he was apparrelled in a purple gowne branched with gold, and caried in his right hand a laurell bough, as all his army did beſides: the which being deuided by bands and companies, followed the triumphing chariot of their captaine, ſome of the ſouldiers ſinging ſongs of victory, which the ROMAINS vſed to ſing in like triumphs, mingling them with merry pleaſant toyes, reioycing at their captaine. Other of thē alſo did ſing ſongs of triumph, in the honor and praiſe of Æmylius noble conqueſt and victory. He was openly praiſed, bleſſed, and honoured of euery body, and neither hated nor enuied of honeſt men: ſauing the ordinary vſe of ſome god, whoſe property is alwayes to leſſen or cut off ſome part of mans exceeding proſperity & felicitie, mingling with mans life the ſence and feeling of good and euill together: becauſe that no liuing perſon ſhould paſſe all his time of life, without ſome aduerſity or misfortune, but that ſuch (as Homer ſaith) ſhould only thinke themſelues happy, to whom fortune hath equally ſorted the good with the euill. And this I ſpeak, becauſe Æmylius had foure ſons, two of the which he gaue in adoption vnto the families of Scipio and of Fabius, as we haue ſaid before: & two other which he had by his ſecond wife, he brought vp with him in his owne houſe, and were both yet very yong: of the which the one died, being fourteene yeares of age fiue dayes before his fathers triumph: and the other died alſo three dayes after the pompe of triumph at twelue yeares of age. When this ſorrowfull chance had befallen him, euery one in ROME did pity him in their hearts: but fortunes ſpite & cruelty did more grieue and feare thē, to ſee her litle regard towards him, to put into a houſe of triumph (full of honour and glory, and of ſacrifices and ioy) ſuch a pitifull mourning, and mingling of ſorowes and lamentations of death, amongſt ſuch ſongs of triumph and victory. Notwithſtanding this, Æmylius taking things like a wiſe man, thought that he was not only to vſe conſtancy and magnanimity, againſt the ſword and pike of the enemy: but alike alſo againſt all aduerſity and enmity of ſpiteful fortune. So, he wiſely weyed and conſidered his preſent misfortune, with his former proſperitie: and finding his misfortune counterpoiſed with felicity, and his priuate griefes cut off with common ioy, he gaue no place to his ſorowes & miſchances, neither blemiſhed any way the dignity of his triumph & victory. For when he had buried the eldeſt of his two laſt ſons, he left not to make his triūphant entry, as you haue heard before. And his ſecond ſon alſo being deceaſed after his triumph, he cauſed the people to aſſēble, & in face of the whole city he made an oration, not like a diſcomforted man, but like one rather that did comfort his ſorowfull countrimen for his miſchance. He told them, that concerning mens matters, neuer any thing did feare him: but for things aboue, he euer feared fortune, miſtrūſting her change and inconſtancy, and ſpecially in the laſt war, doubting for ſo great proſperity as could be wiſhed, to be payed home with an after intollerable aduerſitie & ſiniſter chāce. For as I went (ſaid he) I paſſed ouer the gulfe of the Adriatick ſea, from BRINDES vnto CORFV in one day: and from thence in fiue dayes after, I arriued in the city of DELPHES, where I did ſacrifice vnto Apollo. And within fiue other dayes, I arriued in my campe, where I found mine army in MACEDON. And after I had done the ſacrifice, and due ceremonies for purifying of the ſame, I preſently began to follow the purpoſe and cauſe of my coming: ſo as in fifteene dayes after I made an honorable end of all thoſe wars. But yet, miſtruſting fortune alwaies, ſeeing the proſperous courſe of my affaires, & conſidering that there were no other enemies, nor dangers I needed to feare: I feared ſorely ſhe would change at my return, when I ſhould be vpon the ſea, bringing home ſo goodly and victorious an army, with ſo many ſpoiles, and ſo many Princes and Kings taken priſoners. excellent turner and ioyner, and was learned, and could speake the Romaine tongue very wel, and did write it so trimly, that afterwards he was chancelour to the magistrates of Rome, & did wisely & discreetly behaue himself in his office. Furthermore, they do adde to this goodly con-queſt of the realme of Macedon, that Æmylius conquered another speciall good thing, that made him maruellously well liked of the common people: that is, that he brought so much gold contribution for any thing, vntill the very time and yeare that Hircius and Pansa were Consuls, which was about the beginning of the first wars of Augustus and Antonius. And yet Æmylius had one singular good gift in him: that though the people did greatly loue & honor him, yet he euer tooke part with the Senate and nobility, and did neuer by word nor deed any thing in fauour of the people, to flatter or please them, but in matters concerning gouernment, he did euer leane to the nobility & good men. And this did Appius afterwards cast in his sons teeth, Scipio Africanus.

For both of them being two of the chiefest men of their time, and contending together for the office of Censor: Appius had about him to fauor his suite, all the Senate and Nobilitie, as of ancient time the family of the Appians had euer held on their part, And Scipio Africanus, though he was a great man of himselfe, yet he was at all times fauored and beloued of the common people.
Wherupon when Appius saw him come into the market place, followed with men of small quality and base condition, that had bene slaues before, but otherwise could skillfully handle such practises, bring the people together, and by opportunity of cries and loud voices (if need were) obtaine what they would in the assemblies of the citie: he spake out aloud and said: O Paulus Æmylius, now hast thou good cause to sigh & mourn in thy graue where thou liest (if the dead do know what we do here on earth) to see Æmylius a common sergeant, and Licinius a prating fellow, how they bring thy son vnto the dignity of a Censor. And as for Scipio, he was alwayes beloued of the common people, because he did fauour them in all things. But Æmylius also, although he tooke euer the noble mens part, he was not therefore lesse beloued of the common people, then those that alwaies flattered them, doing all things as the people would, to please them: which the common people did witnesse, aswell by other honors and offices they offered

mans life and maners. For he that was Censor, had authority to put any Senator off the councel, and so disgrade him, if he did not worthily behaue himselfe according to his place and calling: and might name and declare any one of the Senate, whom he thought to be most honest, and fittest for the place againe. Moreouer, they might by their authority, take from licentious yong men, their horse which was kept at the charge of the common-weale. Furthermore, they be the sessours of the people, and the muster-maisters, keeping books of the number of persons at euery mustering. So there appeared numbred in the register booke Æmilius made then of them, three hundred seuen and thirty thousand, foure hundred and two and fiftie men, and Marcus Æmylius Lepidus named president of the Senate, who had that honour foure times before, and did put off the councell three Senators, that were but meane men. And the like meane & moderation he and his companion Martius Philippus kept, vpon view and muster taken of the ROMAINE horsmen. And after he had ordered and disposed the greatest matters of his charge and office, he fell sicke of a disease that at the beginning seemed very dangerous, but in the end there was no other danger, sauing that it was a lingring disease, and hard to cure. So, following the counsell of physitions, who willed him to go to a city in ITALY called VELIA, he took sea and went thither, and continued there a long time, dwelling in pleasant houses vpon the sea side, quietly and out of all noise. But during this time of his absence, the ROMAINES wished for him many a time and often. And when they were gathered together in the Theaters, to see the playes and sports, they cried out diuerse times for him: whereby they shewed that they had a great desire to see him againe. Time being come about when they vsed to make a solemne yearly sacrifice, and Æmilius finding himself also in very good perfect health: he returned againe to ROME, where he made sacrifice with the other priests, all the people of ROME gathered about him, reioycing much to see him. The next day after, he made another particular sacrifice, to giue thankes vnto the gods for recouery of his health. After the sacrifice was ended, he went home to his house, and sate him downe to dinner: he suddenly fell into a raging (without any perseuerance of sickenesse spied in him before, or any change or alteration in him) and his wits went from him, in such sort, that he died within three daies after, lacking no necessary thing that an earthly man could haue, to make him happy in this world. For he was euen honoured at his funerals, and his vertue was adorned with many goodly glorious ornaments, neither of gold, siluer, nor iuorie, nor with other such sumptuousnesse or magnificence of apparell, but with the loue and goodwill of the people, all of them confessing his vertue and well doing: and this did not only his naturall countrimen performe in memory of him, but his very enemies also. For all those that met in ROME by chance at that time, that were either come out of SPAINE, from GENVA, or out of MACEDON, all those that were young and strong, did willingly put themselues vnder the coffin where his body lay, to helpe to carry him: and the old men followed his body to accompany the same, calling Æmilius the benefactor, sauiour, and father of their countrey. For he did not onely intreat them gently, and graciously, whom he had subdued: but all his life time he was euer ready to pleasure them: and to set forwards their causes, euen as they had bene his confederates, very friends, and neare kinsmen. The inuentory of all his goods after his death, did scant amount vnto the summe of three hundred, threescore, and ten thousand siluer Drachmas, which his two sonnes did inherit. But Scipio being the yonger, left all his right vnto his elder brother Fabius, because he was adopted into a very rich house, which was the house of the Great Scipio Africanus,

THE LIFE OF Timoleon.

The state of the Syracusans, before Timoleons cõming.

BEFORE Timoleon was sent into SICILE, thus stood the state of the SYRACVSANS. After that Dion had driuen out the tyrant Dionysius, he himselfe after was slaine immediatly by treason; and those that aided him to restore the SYRACVSANS to their liberty, fell out, and were at dissention among themselues. By reason whereof, the city of SYRACVSA changing continually new tyrants, was so troubled and turmoiled with all sorts of euils, that it was left in manner desolate, and without inhabitants. The rest of SICILE in like case was vtterly destroyed, and no cities in manner left standing, by reason of the long warres: and those few that remained, were most inhabited of forreine souldiers and strangers, (a company of loose men gathered together that tooke pay of no Prince nor city) all the dominions of the same being easily vsurped, and as easie to change their Lord. Insomuch, Dionysius the tyrant, ten yeares after Dion had driuen him out of SICILE, hauing gathered a certaine number of souldiers together againe, and through their helpe driuen out Niseus, that reigned at that time in SYRACVSA: he recouered the Realme againe, and made himselfe king. So, if he was strangely expulsed by a small power out of the greatest kingdome that euer was in the world: likewise he more strangely recouered it againe, being banished and very poore, making himselfe king ouer them, who before had driuen him out. Thus were the inhabitants of the city compelled to serue this tyrant: who besides that of his own nature was neither courteous nor ciuill, he was now growne to be farre more dogged and cruell, by reason of the extreme misery and misfortune he had endured. But the noblest citizens repaired vnto Icetes, who at that time as Lord ruled the city of the LEONTINES, and they chose him for their Generall in these warres: not for that he was any thing better then the open tyrants, but because they had no other to repaire vnto at that time: and they trusted him best, for that he was borne (as themselues) within the city of SYRACVSA, and because also he had men of war about him, to make head against the tyrant. But in the meane time, the CARTHAGINIANS came downe into SICILE with a great army, and inuaded the country. The SYRACVSANS being affraid of them, determined to send ambassadours into GRECE vnto the CORINTHIANS, to pray aid of them against the barbarous people, hauing better hope of them, then of any other of the GRECIANS. And that not altogether because they were lineally descended

Icetes, tyrant of the Leontines

ſcended from them, and that they had receiued in times paſt many pleaſures at their hands: but alſo for that they knew that CORINTH was a city, that in all ages and times did euer loue liberty and hate tyrants, and that had alwayes made their greateſt warres, not for ambition of kingdomes, nor of couetous deſires to conquer and rule, but onely to defend and maintaine the liberty of the GRECIANS. But Icetes in another contrary ſort, tooke vpon him to be Generall, with a mind to make himſelfe king of SYRACVSA. For he had ſecretly practiſed with the CARTHAGINIANS, and openly notwithſtanding, in words he commended the counſel and determination of the SYRACVSANS, and ſent ambaſſadors from himſelf alſo with theirs, vnto PELOPONNESVS: not that he was deſirous any ayd ſhould come from them to SYRACVSA, but becauſe he hoped if the CORINTHIANS refuſed to ſend them aid (as it was very likely they would, for the wars and troubles that were in GRECE) that he might more eaſily turn all ouer to the CARTHAGINIANS, and vſe them as his friends, to aid him againſt the SYRACVSANS, or the tyrant Dionyſius. And that this was his full purpoſe and intent, it appeared plainely ſoone after. Now when their ambaſſadors arriued at CORINTH, and had deliuered their meſſage, the CORINTHIANS, who had euer bene carefull to defend ſuch cities as had ſought vnto them, and ſpecially SYRACVSA: very willingly determined in councell to ſend them aid, and the rather for that they were in good peace at that time, hauing wars with none of the GRECIANS. So their only ſtay reſted vpon chuſing of a Generall to lead their army. Now as the magiſtrats and gouernors of the city were naming ſuch citizens, as willingly offered their ſeruice, deſirous to aduance thēſelues, there ſtept vp a meane commoner who named Timoleon, Timodemus ſon, a man that vntil that time was neuer called on for ſeruice, neither looked for any ſuch preferment. And truly it is to be thought it was the ſecret working of the gods, that directed the thought of this meane cōmoner to name Timoleon: whoſe election fortune fauored very much, and ioyned to his valiantneſſe and vertues maruellous good ſucceſſe in al his doings afterwards. This Timoleon was born of noble parents both by father and mother: his father was called Timodemus, and his mother Demareta. He was naturally inclined to loue his country and common-weale: and was alwayes gentle and courteous to all men, ſauing that he mortally hated tyrants and wicked men. Furthermore nature had framed his body apt for warres and for paines: he was wiſe in his greeneſt youth, in all things he tooke in hand, and in his age he ſhewed himſelfe very valiant. He had an elder brother called Timophanes, who was nothing like to him in condition: for he was a raſh hare-braind man, and had a greedy deſire to reigne, being put into his head by a company of meane men, that bare him in hand they were his friends, and by certaine ſouldiers gathered together, which he had alwayes about him. And becauſe he was very hot and forward in wars, his citizens tooke him for a notable captaine, and a man of good ſeruice, and therefore oftentimes they gaue him charge of men. And therein Timoleon did helpe him much to hide the faults he committed, or at the leaſt made thē ſeeme leſſe, & lighter then they were, ſtill increaſing that ſmall good gift that nature brought forth in him. As in a battell the CORINTHIANS had againſt the ARGIVES and the CLEONEIANS, Timoleon ſerued as a priuate ſouldier amongſt the footmen: and Timophanes his brother, hauing charge of horſmen, was in great danger to be caſt away, if preſent help had not bin. For his horſe being hurt, threw him on the ground in the midſt of his enemies: wherupon part of thoſe that were about him, were afraid and diſperſed themſelues here and there; and thoſe that remained with him, being few in number, and hauing many enemies to fight withall, did hardly withſtand their force & charge. But his brother Timoleon ſeeing him in ſuch inſtāt danger afar off, ran with all ſpeed poſſible to helpe him, and clapping his target before his brother Timophanes, that lay on the ground, receiuing many wounds on his body with ſword and arrowes, with great difficulty he repulſed the enemies, & ſaued his own & his brothers life. Now the CORINTHIANS fearing the like matter to come that before had happened vnto thē, which was, to loſe their city through default of their friends help, they reſolued in councel, to entertaine in pay continually 400 ſoldiers that were ſtrangers, whom they aſſigned ouer to Timophanes charge: who, abandoning al honeſty & regard of the truſt repoſed in him, did preſently practiſe al the waies he could to make himſelfe Lord of the city: and hauing put diuerſe of the chiefeſt citizens to death without order of law, in ỹ end he openly proclaimed himſelf king. Timoleon being very ſory for this and taking his brothers wickednes would be the very high-way to his fall & deſtruction, ſought firſt to win him with all the good words and perſwaſions he could, to leaue his ambitious deſire to reigne, and to ſeeke to ſalue (as neare as might be) his hard dealing with the citizens.

Timoleon ſaued his brothers life

Timophanes cruelty and vſurpation of the kingdome.

Timophanes set light by his brothers perswasions, and would giue no eare vnto them. Therupon Timoleon then went vnto one, Æschilus his friend, and brother vnto Timophanes wife, and to one Satyrus a southsayer (as Theopompus the historiographer calleth him, and Ephorus calleth him, Orthagoras) with whom he came againe another time vnto his brother: and they three coming to him, instantly besought him to beleeue good counsell, and to leaue the kingdome. Timophanes at the first did but laugh them to scorne, and sported at their perswasions: but afterwards he waxed hot, and grew into great choler with them. Timoleon seeing that, went a litle aside, and couering his face fel a weeping: & in the meane season, the other two drawing out their swords, slue Timophanes in the place. This murther was straight blown abroad through the city, & the better sort did greatly commend the noble mind and hate Timoleon bare against the tyrant: considering that he being of a gentle nature, and louing to his kin, did notwithstanding regard the benefit of his country, before the naturall affection of his brother, & preferred duty and iustice, before nature and kinred. For, before he had saued his brothers life, fighting for the defence of his country: & now in seeking to make himselfe king and to rule the same, he made him to be slaine. Such then as misliked popular gouernement and liberty, and alwaies followed the nobility, they set a good face on the matter, as though they had bin glad of the tyrants death: yet still reprouing Timoleon for the horrible murther he had committed against his brother, declaring how detestable it was both to the gods & men, they so handled him, that it grieued him to the hart he had done it. But when it was told him that his mother tooke it maruellous ill, and that she pronounced horrible curses against him, and gaue out terrible words of him, he went vnto her in hope to comfort her: howbeit she could neuer abide to see him, but alwaies shut her doore against him. Thē he being wounded to the hart with sorow, took a conceit sodainly, to kil himself by abstaining frō meat: but his friends would neuer forsake him in this despaire, and vrged him so far by intreaty & perswasion, that they cōpelled him to eat. Therupon he resolued thenceforth to giue himself ouer to a solitary life in the country, secluding himself from all company and dealings: so as at the beginning, he did not only refuse to repaire vnto the city, and all accesse of company, but wandring vp and downe in most solitary places, consumed himselfe and his time with melancholy. And thus we see, that counsels & iudgments are lightly caried away (by praise or dispraise) if they be not shored vp with rule of reason & philosophy, & rest confounded in themselues. And therfore it is very requisite and necessary, that not only the act be good and honest of it selfe, but that the resolution therof be also constant, and not subiect vnto change: to the end we may do all things cōsiderately; lest we be like vnto lickerous mouthed men, who as they desire meats with a greedy appetite, and after are soone weary, disliking the same: euen so do we sodainly repent our actions grounded vpon a weak imagination, of the honesty that moued vs therunto. For repentance maketh the act naught which before was good. But determination, grounded vpon certaine knowledge and truth of reason, doth neuer change, although the matter enterprised, haue not alwayes happy successe. And therefore Phocion the Athenian hauing resisted (as much as in him lay) certaine things which the Generall Leosthenes did, and which contrary to his mind tooke good effect: and perceiuing the Athenians did open sacrifice vnto the gods, to giue them thanks for the same, and much reioyce at the victory they had obtained: I would haue reioyced too (said he) if I had done this: but so would I not for any thing, but I had giuen the counsell. And after that sort, but more sharply did Aristides Locrian (a very friend and companion of Platoes) answer Dionysius the elder, tyrant of Syracusa: who asked his good will to mary one of his daughters. I had rather see my daughter dead (said he) then maried vnto a tyrant. And within a certaine time after, the tyrant put all his sonnes to death: and then he asked him in derision to grieue him the more, If he were still of his former opinion for the marying of his daughter. I am very sory (said he) with all my heart for that which thou hast done: but yet I do not repent me of that I haue said. That peraduenture proceeded of a more perfect vertue. But to returne againe vnto Timoleon. Whether that inward sorow strucke him to the heart for the death of his brother Timophanes, or that shame did so abash him, as he durst not abide his mother, twenty yeares after, he did neuer any notable or famous act. And therefore, when he was named to be Generall of the aid that should be sent into Sicile, the people hauing willingly chosen and accepted of him: Teleclides, who was chiefe gouernour at that time in the city of Corinth, standing vpon his feet before the people, spake vnto Timoleon, and did exhort him to behaue himselfe like an honest man, and valiant captaine in this charge. For said he, if that you handle your your selfe well, we will think you haue killed a tyrant: but if you order your self otherwise then wel, we will iudge you haue killed your brother. Now Timoleon being busie in leauying of men, and preparing himselfe, letters came to the CORINTHIANS from Icetes, wherby plainly appeared, that Icetes had caried two faces in one hood, & that he was become a traytor. For he had no sooner dispatched his ambassadors vnto them, but he straight took the CARTHAGINIANS part, and dealt openly for them, intending to driue out Dionysius, and to make himself king of SYRACVSA. But fearing lest the CORINTHIANS would send aid before he had wrought his feate, he wrote againe vnto the CORINTHIANS, sending them word, that they should not need now to put themselues to any charge or danger for coming into SICILE, and specially, because the CARTHAGINIANS were very angry, and did also lye in waite in the way as they should come, with a great fleet of ships to meete with their army: and that for himselfe, because he saw they taried long, he had made league and amity with them, against the tyrant Dionysius. When they had read his letters, if any of the CORINTHIANS were before but coldly affected to this iourny, choler did then so warm thē against Icetes, that they frankly granted Timoleon what he wold ask, and did helpe to furnish him to set him out. When the ships were ready rigged, and that the souldiers were furnished of all things necessary for their departure, the Nuns of the goddesse Proserpina, said they saw a vision in their dreame, and that the goddesses Ceres and Proserpina did appeare vnto them, apparelled like trauellers to take a iourney: and told them, that they would go with Timoleon into SICILE. Vpon this speech only, the CORINTHIANS rigged a galley, they called, the galley of Ceres and Proserpina: and Timoleon himselfe before he would take the seas, went into ỹ city of DELPHES, where he made sacrifice vnto Apollo. And as he entred within the Sanctuarie where the answers of the Oracle are made, there happened a wonderfull signe vnto him. For amongst the vowes and offerings that are hanged vp vpon the wals of the Sanctuary, there fell a band directly vpon Timoleons head, imbrodered all about with crownes of victorie: so that it seemed Apollo sent him already crowned, before he had set out one foot towards the iourney. He tooke ship, and sailed with seuen galleyes of CORINTH, two of CORPHVE, and ten the LEVCADIANS did set out. When he was launced out in the maine sea, hauing a franke gale of wind and large, he thought in the night that the element did open, and that out of the same there came a maruellous great bright light ouer his ship, & it was much like to a torch burning, when they shew the ceremonies of the holy mysteries. This torch did accompany and guide them all their voyage, and in the end it vanished away, and seemed to fal down vpon the coast of ITALY, where the ship-maisters had determined to arriue. The wise mens opinions being asked what this might signifie: they answered: That this wonderfull sight did betoken the dreame, the Nunnes of the goddesse Ceres dreamed, and that the goddesses fauouring his iourney, had shewed them the way, by sending of this light from heauen: because that the Ile of SICILE is consecrated vnto the goddesse Proserpina; and specially for that they report her rauishment was in that Ile, and that the whole realme was assigned vnto her for her iointer, at the day of her mariage. Thus did this celestiall signe of the gods both incourage those that went this iourny, and deliuer them also assured hope, who sailed with all speed possible they could, vntill such time as hauing crossed the seas, they arriued vpon the coast of ITALY. But when they came thither, the newes they vnderstood from SICILE put Timoleon in great perplexity, and did marueilously discourage the souldiers he brought with him: for Icetes hauing ouerthrowne the battell of the tyrant Dionysius, and possessed the greatest part of the city of SYRACVSA, he did besiege him within the castle, and within that part of the city which is called the Ile, where he had pent him vp, and inclosed him in with walles round about. And in the meane time he had prayed the CARTHAGINIANS, that they would be carefull to keepe Timoleon from landing in SICILE, to the end that by preuenting that ayde, they might easily diuide SICILE betweene them, and no man to let them. The CARTHAGINIANS following his request, sent twenty of their galleyes vnto RHEGIO, amongst which Icetes Ambassadours were sent vnto Timoleon, with testimony of his doings: for they were faire flattering words to cloke his wicked intent he purposed. For they willed Timoleon that he should go himselfe alone (if he thought good) vnto Icetes, to counsell him, and to accompany him in all his doings, which were now so farre onwards in good towardnesse, as he had almost ended them all. Furthermore, they did also perswade him, that he should send backe his ships and souldiers to CORINTH, againe, considering that the warre was now brought to good passe, and that the CARTHAGINIANS would in no caſe that his men ſhould paſſe into SICILE, and that they were determined to fight with them, if they made any force to enter. So the CORINTHIANS at their arriuall into the city of RHEGIO, finding there theſe ambaſſadours, and ſeeing the fleete of the CARTHAGINIANS ſhips, which did ride at anker not farre off from them: it ſpited them on the one ſide, to ſee they were thus mocked and abuſed by Icetes. For euery one of them were maruellous angry with him, and were greatly afeard alſo for the poore SICILIANS, whom too plainly they ſaw left a prey vnto Icetes for reward of his treaſon, and to the CARTHAGINIANS for recompence of the tyrannie which they ſuffered him to eſtabliſh. So, on the other ſide they thought it impoſſible to conquer the ſhips of the CARTHAGINIANS, which did lye in waite for them, and ſo neare vnto them, conſidering they were twice as many in number as they: and as hard for them to ſubdue the army alſo that was in the hands of Icetes in SICILE, conſidering that they were not come to him, but onely for the maintenance of the warres. Notwithſtanding Timoleon ſpake very courteouſly vnto thoſe Ambaſſadours, and Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS ſhips, letting them vnderſtand that he would do as much as they would haue him: and to ſay truly, if he would haue done otherwiſe, he could haue wonne nothing by it. Neuertheleſſe he deſired for his diſcharge, they would ſay that openly, in the preſence of the people of RHEGIO (being a city of GREECE, friend and common to both parties) which they had ſpoken to him in ſecret: and that done, he would depart incontinently, alledging that it ſtood him very much vpon for the ſafety of his diſcharge, and that they themſelues alſo ſhould more faithfully keep that they had promiſed vnto him touching the SYRACVSANS, when they had agreed vpon it and promiſed it before all the people of RHEGIO, who ſhould be witneſſe of it. Now all this was but a fetch and policy deliuered by him, to ſhadow his departure, which the captaines and gouernours of RHEGIO did fauour, and ſeeme to helpe him in: becauſe they wiſhed SICILE ſhould fall into the hands of the CORINTHIANS, and feared much to haue the barbarous people for their neighbours. For this cauſe they commanded a generall aſſembly of all the people, during which time, they cauſed the gates of the city to be ſhut: giuing it out, that it was becauſe the citizens ſhould not go about any other matters in the meane time. Thē when all the people were aſſembled, they began to make long orations without concluding any matter: the one leauing alwayes to the other alike matter to talke of, to the end they might win time, vntill the galleys of the CORINTHIANS were departed. And ſtaying the CARTHAGINIANS alſo in this aſſembly, they miſtruſted nothing, becauſe they ſaw Timoleon preſent: who made a countenance, as though he would riſe to ſay ſomething. But in the meane time, ſome one did ſecretly aduertiſe Timoleon, that the other galleys were vnder ſaile and gone away, and that there was but one gally left which taried for him in the hauen. Therupon he ſuddenly ſtole away through the preaſſe, with the helpe of the RHEGIANS, being about the chaire where the orations were made: and trudging quickly to the hauen, he imbarked incontinently, and hoiſed ſaile alſo. And when he had ouertaken his fleete, they went all ſafe together to land at the city of TAVROMENION, which is in SICILE: there they were very well receiued by Andromachus, who long time before had ſent for them, for he gouerned this city as if he had bin Lord therof. He was the father of Timæus the Hiſtoriographer, and honeſteſt man of all thoſe that did beare rule at that time in SICILE. For he did rule his citizens in all iuſtice and equity, and did alwayes ſhew himſelfe an open enemie to tyrants. And following his affection therein, he lent his city at that time vnto Timoleon, to gather people together, and perſwaded his citizens to enter into league with the CORINTHIANS, and to aide them, to deliuer SICILE from bondage, and to reſtore it againe to liberty. But the captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS that were in RHEGIO, when they knew that Timoleon was vnder ſaile and gone, after that the aſſembly of the councell was broken vp, they were ready to eate their fingers for ſpite to ſee themſelues thus finely mocked and deceiued. The RHEGIANS on the other ſide, were merry at the matter, to ſee how the PHOENICIANS ſtormed at it, that they had ſuch a fine part played them. Howbeit in the end, they determined to ſend an Ambaſſadour vnto TAVROMENION, in one of their galleys. This Ambaſſadour ſpake very boldly and barbarouſly vnto Andromachus, and in a choler: and laſt of all, he ſhewed him firſt the palme of his hand, then the backe of his hand, and did threaten him that his citie ſhould be ſo turned ouer hand, if he did not quickly ſend away the CORINTHIANS. Andromachus fell a laughing at him, and did turne his hand vp and downe as the Ambaſſadour had done, and commanded him that he ſhould get him going, and that with all ſpeed ſpeed out of his city, if he would not ſee the keele of his galley turned vpward. Icetes now vnderſtanding of Timoleons coming, and being affraid, ſent for a great number of galleyes vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. Then the SYRACVSANS began to deſpaire vtterly when they ſaw their hauen full of the CARTHAGINIANS galleys, the beſt part of their city kept by Icetes, and the caſtle by the tyrant Dionyſius. And on the other ſide, that Timoleon was not yet come but to a little corner of SICILE, hauing no more but the litle citie of TAVROMENION, with a ſmall power, and leſſe hope: becauſe there was not aboue a thouſand footmen in all, to furniſh theſe warres, neither prouiſion of victuals, nor ſo much money as would ſerue to entertaine and pay them. Beſides alſo, that the other cities of SICILE did nothing truſt him. But by reaſon of the violent extortions they had of late ſuffered, they hated all captaines and leaders of men of warre to the death, and ſpecially for the treachery of Calippus and Pharax, whereof the one was an ATHENIAN, and the other a LACEDÆMONIAN. Both of them ſaid they came to ſet SICILE at liberty, and to driue out the tyrants: and yet neuertheleſſe, they had done ſo much hurt vnto the poore SICILIANS, that the miſery and calamity which they had ſuffered vnder the tyrants, ſeemed all to be gold vnto them, in reſpect of that which theſe captaines had made them to abide. And they did thinke them more happy, that had willingly ſubmitted themſelues vnto the yoke of ſeruitude: then thoſe which they ſaw reſtored and ſet at liberty. Therefore perſwading themſelues, that this CORINTHIAN would be no better vnto them, then the other had bene before, but ſuppoſing they were the ſelf ſame former crafts, and alluring baits of good hope & faire words, which they had taſted of before, to draw them to accept new tyrants: they did ſore ſuſpect it, and reiect all the CORINTHIANS perſwaſions. Sauing the ADRANITANS only, whoſe litle city being conſecrated to the god Adranus (and greatly honoured and reuerenced through all SICILE) was then in diſſention one againſt another: in ſo much as one part of them tooke part with Icetes, and the CARTHAGINIANS, and the other ſent vnto Timoleon. So it fortuned that both the one and the other, making all the poſſible ſpeed they could, who ſhould come firſt, arriued both in maner at one ſelfe time. Icetes had about fiue thouſand ſouldiers. Timoleon had not in all aboue twelue hundred men, with which he departed to go towards the city of ADRANVS diſtant from TAVROMENION, about three hundred and forty furlongs. For the firſt dayes iourny he went no great way, but lodged betimes: but the next morning he marched very haſtily, and had maruellous ill way. When night was come, and daylight ſhut in, he had newes that Icetes did but newly arriue before ADRANVS, where he encamped. When the priuate captaines vnderſtood this, they cauſed the vward to ſtay, to eate and repoſe a litle, that they might be the luſtier, and the ſtronger to fight. But Timoleon did ſet ſtill forwards, and prayed them not to ſtay, but to go on with all the ſpeed they could poſſible, that they might take their enemies out of order (as it was likely they ſhould) being but newly ariued and troubled with making their cabbons, and preparing for ſupper. Therewith as he ſpake theſe words, he tooke his target on his arme, and marched himſelfe the formoſt man, as brauely and couragiouſly as if he had gone to a moſt aſſured victory. The ſouldiers ſeeing him march with that life, they followed at his heels with like courage. So they had not paſſing thirty furlongs to go, which when they had ouercome, they ſtraight ſet vpon their enemies, whom they found all out of order, and beganne to flie, ſo ſoone as they ſaw they were vpon their backes before they were aware. By this meanes there were not aboue three hundred men ſlaine, and twiſe as many more taken priſoners, and ſo their whole camp was poſſeſſed. Then the ADRANITANS opening their gates, yeelded vnto Timoleon, declaring vnto him with great feare, and no leſſe wonder, how at the very time when he gaue charge vpon the enemies, the doores of the temple of their god opened of themſelues, and that the launce in which the image of their god did hold in his hand, did ſhake at the very end where the iron head was, and how all his face was ſeen to ſweat. This (in my opinion) did not onely ſignifie the victory he had gotten at that time, but all the notable exploits he did afterwards, vnto the which, this firſt encounter gaue a happy beginning. For immediatly after, many cities ſent vnto Timoleon, to ioyne in league with him. And Mamertus the tyrant of CATANA, a ſouldier, and very full of money, did alſo ſeeke his friendſhip. Furthermore, Dionyſius the tyrant of SYRACVSA, being weary to follow hope any longer, and finding himſelfe in maner forced vnto it by long continuance of ſiege, made no more reckoning of Icetes, when he knew that he was ſo ſhamefully ouerthrown. And contrariwiſe, much eſteeming Timoleons valiantneſſe, he ſent to aduertiſe him, that he was contented to yeeld himſelfe and the castle into the hands of the CORINTHIANS. Timoleon being glad of this good hap vnlooked for, sent Euclides and Telemachus, two captaines of the CORINTHIANS, to take possession of the castle, with foure hundred men, not all at a time, nor openly (for it was vnpossible, the enemies lying in waite in the hauen) but by small companies, and by stealth, he conueyed them all into the castle, so the souldiers possessed the castle, and the tyrants pallace, with all the moueables and munition of warre within the same. There were a great number of horse of seruice, great store of staues and weapons offensiue of all sorts, and engines of battery to shoot farre off, and sundry other weapons of defence, that had bene gathered together of long time, to arme threescore and ten thousand men. Moreouer, besides all this, there were two thousand souldiers, whom with all the other things rehearsed, Dionysius deliuered vp into the hands of Timoleon: and he himselfe, with his mony & a few of his friends, went his way by sea, Icetes not knowing it, and so came to Timoleons campe. This was the first time that euer they saw Dionysius a priuate man, in base and meane estate. And yet within few dayes after, Timoleon sent him from thence vnto CORINTH in a ship, with little store of money: who was borne and brought vp in the greatest and most famous tyranny and kingdome, conquered by force, that euer was in the world: and which himselfe had kept by the space of ten yeares after the death of his father. Since Dion draue him out, he had bene maruellously turmoiled in warres, by the space of twelue yeares: in which time, although he had done much mischiefe, yet he had suffered a great deale more.

Timoleon chosen Generall to go into Sicile

For he saw the death of his sonnes when they were men growne, and able to serue and cary armour. He saw his daughters rauished by force, and defloured of their virginity. He saw his owne sister (who was also his wife) first of all shamed, and cruelly handled in her person, with the greatest villanies and most vile parts done vnto her, that his enemies could deuise: and afterwards horribly murthered with her children, and their bodies in the end throwne into the sea, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Dion. Now when Dionysius was arriued in the city of CORINTH, euery GRECIAN was wonderfull desirous to go see him, and to talke with him. And some went thither very glad of his ouerthrow, as if they had troden him downe with their feete, whom Fortune had ouerthrowne, so bitterly did they hate him. Other pitying him in their hearts to see so great a change, did behold him as it were with a certaine compassion, considering what great power, secret and diuine causes haue ouer mens weakenesse and frailty, and those things that daily passe ouer our heads. For the world then, did neuer bring forth any worke of nature, or of mans hand so wonderfull, as was this of Fortune: who made the world see a man, that before was in maner Lord and King of all SICILE, sit then commonly in the city of CORINTH, talking with a victualler, or sitting a whole day in a perfumers shop, or commonly drinking in some cellar or tauerne; or to brawle and scold in the middest of the streetes, with common whores in the face of the world, or else to teach common minstrels in euery lane and alley, and to dispute with them with the best reason he had, about the harmony and musicke of the songs they sang in Theaters. Now some say he did this, because he knew not else how he should driue the time away, for that indeed he was of a base mind, and an effeminate person, giuen ouer to all dishonest lusts and desires. Other are of opinion, he did it to be the lesse regarded, for feare lest the CORINTHIANS should haue him in iealousie and suspition, imagining that he did take the change and state of his life in grieuous part, and that he should yet looke backe, hoping for a time to recouer his state againe: and that for this cause he did it, and of purpose fained many things against his nature, & seeming to be a stark idiot, to see him do those things he did. Some notwithstanding haue gathered together certaine of his answers, which do testifie that he did not all these things of a base brutish mind, but to fit himselfe onely to his present misery and misfortune. For when he came to LEVCADES, an ancient city built by the CORINTHIANS, as was also the city of SYRACVSA, he told the inhabitants of the same, that he was like to yong boyes that had done a fault: for as they flie from their fathers being ashamed to come to their sight, and are gladder to be with their brethren: euen so is it with me, said he: for it would please me better to dwell here with you, then to go to CORINTH our head city. Another time, being at CORINTH, a stranger was very busie with him (knowing how familiar Dionysius was with learned men and Philosophers, while he reigned in SYRACVSA) and asked him in the end in derision: what benefit he got by Platoes wisdome and knowledge? he answered him againe: How thinkest thou, hath it done me no good, when thou seest me beare so patiently this change of fortune? Aristoxenus a musitian, and other, asking him what offence Plato had done

vnto him: he answered, That tyrants state is euer vnfortunate, and subiect to many euils: but yet no euill in their state was comparable to this; that none of all those they take to be their most familiars, dare once tell them truly any thing: and that through their fault, he left Platoes company. Another time there cometh a pleasant fellow to him, and thinking to mocke him finely, as he entred into his chamber, he shooke his gowne, as the manner is when they come to tyrants, to shew that they haue no weapons vnder their gownes. But Dionysius encountred him as pleasantly, saying to him: Do that when thou goest hence, to see if thou hast stolne nothing. And againe, Philip king of MACEDON, at his table one day descending into talke of songs, verse, and tragedies, which Dionysius his father had made, making as though he wondred at them, how possibly he could haue leisure to do them: he answered him very trimly, and to good purpose: He did them euen at such times (quoth he) as you & I, & other great Lords whom they reckon happy, are disposed to be drunk, & play the fooles. Now for Plato he neuer saw Dionysius at CORINTH. But Diogenes Sinopian, the first time that euer he met with Dionysius, said vnto him: O, how vnworthy art thou of this state! Dionysius staied suddenly & replyed: Truly I thank thee (Diogenes) that thou hast compassion of my misery. Why, said Diogenes againe: dost thou think I pity thee? nay it spiteth me rather, to see such a slaue as thou (worthy to die in the wicked state of a tyrant like thy father) to liue in such security and idle life, as thou leadest amongst vs. When I came to compare these words of Diogenes, with Philistus words the historiographer, bewailing the hard fortune of ỹ daughters of the LEPTINES, saying that they were brought frõ the top of all worldly felicity, honor and goods (wherof tyrannicall state aboundeth) vnto a base, priuate & humble life: me thinks they are the proper lamentations of a woman, that sorroweth for the losse of her boxes of painting colours, or for her purple gowns, or for other such prety fine trims of gold, as women vse to weare. So, me thinks these things I haue intermingled concerning Dionysius, are not impertinent to the description of our liues, neither are they troublesome or vnprofitable to the hearers, vnlesse they haue other hasty businesse to let or trouble them. But now if the tyrant Dionysius wretched state seeme strange, Timoleons prosperity then was no lesse wonderfull. For within fifty daies after he had set foot in SICILE, he had the castle of SYRACVSA in his possession and sent Dionysius as an exile to CORINTH. This did set the CORINTHIANS in such a iolitie, that they sent him a supply of 2000 footemen, and 200 horsemen, which were appointed to land in ITALY, in the country of the THVRIANS. And perceiuing that they could not possibly go from thence into SICILE, because the CARTHAGINIANS kept the seas with a great nauy of ships, and that thereby they were compelled to stay for better opportunity: in the meane time they bestowed their leisure in doing a notable good act. For the THVRIANS being in wars at that time with the BRVTIANS, they did put their city into their hands, which they kept very faithfully and friendly, as it had bin their own natiue country. Icetes all this while did besiege the castle of SYRACVSA, preuenting all he could possible, that there should come no corne by sea vnto the CORINTHIANS that kept within the castle: and he had hired two strange souldiers, which he sent vnto the city of ADRANVS, to kill Timoleon by treason, who kept no guard about his person, and continued amongst the ADRANITANS, mistrusting nothing in the world, for the trust and confidence he had in the safegard of the god of the ADRANITANS. These souldiers being sent to do this murder, were by chance informed that Timoleon should one day do sacrifice vnto this god. So vpon this, they came into the temple, hauing daggers vnder their gownes, and by litle and litle thrust in through the prease, that they got at the length hard to the altar. But at the present time as one incouraged another to dispatch the matter, a third person they thought not of, gaue one of the two a great cut in the head with his sword, that he fell to the ground. The man that had hurt him thus, fled straight vpon it, with his sword, drawne in his hand, and recouered the top of a high rocke. The other souldier that came with him, and that was not hurt, got hold of a corner of the altar, and besought pardon of Timoleon, and told him he would discouer the treason practised against him. Timoleon thereupon pardoned him. Then he told him how his companion that was slaine, and himselfe, were both hired, and sent to kill him. In the meane time, they brought him also that had taken the rocke, who cried out aloud, He had done no more then he should do: for he had killed him that had slaine his owne father before, in the city of LEONTINES. And to iustifie this to be true, certaine that stood by did affirme, it was so indeed. Whereat they wondred greatly to consider the maruellous working of Fortune, how she doth bring one thing to passe by meanes of another, and gathereth all things together, how far asunder soeuer they be, and linketh them together, though they seeme to be cleane contrary one to another, with no maner of likenesse or coniunction betweene them, making the end of the one, to be the beginning of another. The CORINTHIANS examining this matter throughly, gaue him that slue the souldier with his sword, a crowne of the value of ten minas, because that by means of his iust anger, he had done good seruice to the god that had preserued Timoleon. And furthermore, this good hap did not only serue the present turne, but was to good purpose euer after. For those that saw it, were put in better hope, & had thenceforth more care and regard vnto Timoleons person, because he was a holy man, one that loued the gods, and that was purposely sent to deliuer SICILE from captiuity. But Icetes hauing missed his first purpose, and seeing numbers daily drawne to Timoleons deuotion, he was mad with himselfe, that hauing so great an army of the CARTHAGINIANS at hand at his commandement, he took but a few of them to serue his turn, as if he had bene ashamed of his fact, and had vsed their friendship by stealth. So he sent hereupon for Mago their Generall, with all his fleete. Mago at his request brought an huge army to see to, of a hundred and fifty saile, which occupied and couered all the hauen: and afterwards landed threescore thousand men, whom he lodged euery man within the city of SYRACVSA. Then euery man imagined the time was now come, which old men had threatned SICILE with many years before, and that continually: that one day it should be conquered, and inhabited by the barbarous people. For in all the wars the CARTHAGINIANS euer had before in the country of SICILE, they could neuer come to take the city of SYRACVSA: and then through Icetes treason, who had receiued them, they were seene encamped there. On the other side, the CORINTHIANS that were within the castle, found themselues in great distresse, because their victuals waxed scant, and the hauen was so straitly kept. Moreouer, they were driuen to be armed continually to defend the wals, which the enemies battered, and assaulted in sundry places, with all kinds of engines of battery, and sundry sorts of deuised instruments and inuentions to take cities: by reason whereof, they were compelled also to diuide themselues into many companies. Neuertheless, Timoleon without, gaue them all the ayd he could possible: sending them corne from CATANA, in litle fisher-boats and small crayers, which got into the castle many times, but specially in stormy and foule weather, passing by the galleys of the barbarous people, that lay scattering one from another, disperssed abroad by tempest, and great billowes of the sea. But Mago and Icetes finding this, determined to go take the city of CATANA, from whence those of the castle of SYRACVSA were victualed: and taking with them the best souldiers of all their army, they departed from SYRACVSA, and sailed towards CATANA. Now in the meane space, Leon CORINTHIAN, captaine of all those that were within the castle, perceiuing the enemies within the city, kept but slender ward, made a sudden sallie out vpon them, and taking them vnwares, slue a great number at the first charge, and draue away the other. So by this occasion he wan a quarter of the city, which they call ACRADINA, and was the best part of the city, that had receiued least hurt. For the city of SYRACVSA seemeth to be built of many townes ioyned together. So hauing found there great plenty of corn, gold, & siluer, he wold not forsake that quarter no more, nor returne againe into the castle: but fortifying with all diligence the cõpasse and precinct of the same, & ioyning it vnto the castle with certaine fortifications he built vp in hast, he determined to keepe both the one and the other. Now were Mago and Icetes very neare vnto CATANA, when a post ouertooke them, purposely sent from SYRACVSA vnto them, who brought them newes, that the ACRADINA was taken. Whereat they both wondred, & returned back againe with all speed possible (hauing failed of their purpose they pretended) to keepe that they had yet left in their hands. Now for that matter, it is yet a question, whether we should impute it vnto wisdome and valiancy, or vnto good fortune: but the thing I will tell you now, in my opinion, is altogether to be ascribed vnto fortune. And this it is: The two thousand footmen and two hundred horsemen of the CORINTHIANS, that remained in the city of the THVRIANS, partly for feare of the galleyes of the CARTHAGINIANS, that lay in wait for them as they should passe, Hanno being their Admirall: and partly also for that the sea was very rough and high many dayes together, and was alwayes in storme and tempest: in the end, they ventured to go through the countrey of the BRVTIANS, and partly with their goodwill (but rather by force) they got through, and recouered the city of RHEGIO, the sea being maruellous high and rough. Hanno the Admirall of the CARTHAGINIANS, looking no more then for their passage, thought with himselfe that he had deuised a maruellous fine policy, to deceiue the enemies enemies. Thereupon he willed all his men to put garlands of flowers of triumph vpon their heads, and therewithall also made them dresse vp, and set forth his gallies, with targets, corslets, and brigantines after the GRECIANS fashion. So in this bravery he returned backe againe, sailing towards SYRACVSA, and came in with force of owers, rowing vnder the castles side of SYRACVSA, with great laughing and clapping of hands, crying out aloud to them that were in the castle, that he had ouerthrowne their aid which came from CORINTH, as they thought to passe by the coast of ITALY into SICILE; flattering himselfe, that this did much discourage those that were besieged. But whilest he sported thus with this fond deuice, the two thousand CORINTHIANS being arriued through the countrey of the BRVTIANS in the city of RHEGIO, perceiuing the coast cleare, and that the passage by sea was not kept, and that the raging seas were by miracle (as it were) made of purpose calme for them: they tooke sea foorthwith in such fisherboates and passengers as they found ready, in the which they went into SICILE, in such good safety, as they drew their horse (holding them by the raines) alongst their boats with them. When they were all passed ouer, Timoleon hauing receiued them, went immediatly to take MESSINA, & marching thence in battell ray, tooke his way towards SYRACVSA, trusting better to his good fortune, then to his force he had: for his whole number in all were not aboue foure thousand fighting men. Notwithstanding Mago hearing of his coming, quaked for feare, and doubted the more vpon this occasion: About SYRACVSA are certain marishes, that receiue great quantity of sweet fresh water, as well of fountaines and springs, as also of litle runnings, brooks, lakes, and riuers, which runne that wayes towards the sea: and therefore there are great store of eeles in that place, and the fishing is great there at all times, but specially for such as delight to take eeles. Whereupon the GRECIANS that tooke pay on both sides, when they had leisure, and that all was quiet betweene them, they intended fishing. Now, they being all countrymen, and of one language, had no priuate quarrell one with another: but when time was to fight, they did their duties, and in time of peace also frequented familiarly together, and one spake with another, and specially when they were busie fishing for eeles: saying, that they maruelled at the situation of the goodly places thereabouts, and that they stood so pleasantly and commodious vpon the sea side. So one of the souldiers that serued vnder the CORINTHIANS chanced to say vnto them: Is it possible that you that be GRECIANS borne, and haue so goodly a city of your owne, and full of so many goodly commodities: that ye will giue it vp vnto these barbarous people, the CARTHAGINIANS, and most cruell murderers of the world? where you should rather wish that there were many SICILES betwixt them and GRECE. Haue ye so litle consideration or iudgement to thinke, that they haue assembled an army out of all AFRICKE, vnto Hercules pillars, and to the sea ATLANTICKE, to come hither to fight to establish Icetes tyranny? who, if he had bene a wise and skilfull captaine, would not haue cast out his ancestours and founders, to bring into his country the ancient enemies of the same: but might haue receiued such honor and authority of the CORINTHIANS and Timoleon, as he could reasonably haue desired, and that with all their fauor and goodwill. The souldiers that heard this tale, reported it againe in their campe: insomuch they made Mago suspect there was treason in hand, & so sought some colour to be gone. But herupon, notwithstanding that Icetes praied him al he could to tary, declaring vnto him how much they were stronger then their enemies, and that Timoleon did rather preuaile by his hardinesse and good fortune, then exceed him in number of men: yet he hoised saile, & returned with shame inough into AFRICKE, letting slip the conquest of SICILE out of his hands without any sight of reason or cause at all. The next day after he was gone, Timoleon presented battell before the city, when the GRECIANS and he vnderstood that the CARTHAGINIANS were fled, and that they saw the hauen rid of all the ships: and then began to iest at Magoes cowardlinesse, and in derision proclaimed in the city, that they would giue him a good reward that could bring them newes, whither the army of the CARTHAGINIANS were fled. But for all this, Icetes was bent to fight, and would not leaue the spoile he had gotten, but defend the quarters of the city he had possessed, at the swords point, trusting to the strength and situation of the places, which were hardly to be approached. Timoleon perceiuing that, diuided his army, and he with one part thereof did set vpon that side which was the hardest to approch, and did stand vpon the riuer of ANAPVS: then he appointed another part of his army to assault all at one time, the side of ACARDINA, whereof Isias CORINTHIAN had the leading. led, he appointed to assault the quarter called Epipoles. Thus, assault being giuen on all sides at one time, Icetes bands of men were broken, & ran their way. Now that the city was thus won by assault, and come so suddenly to the hands of Timoleon, and the enemies being fled, it is good reason we ascribe it to the valiantnesse of the souldiers, and the captaines great wisdome. But where there was not one Corinthian slaine nor hurt in this assault, sure me thinkes herein it was onely the worke and deed of Fortune, that did fauour and protect Timoleon, to contend against his valiantnesse: to the end that those which should hereafter heare of his doings, should haue more occasion to wonder at his good hap, then to praise and commend his valiantnes. For the fame of this great exploit, did in few daies not only run through all Italy, but also through all Greece. In so much as the Corinthians (who could scant belieue their men were passed with safty into Sicile) vnderstood withall that they were safely arriued there, and had gotten the victory of their enemies: so prosperous was their iourny, and Fortune so speedily did fauour his noble acts. Timoleon hauing now the castle of Syracvsa in his hands, did not follow Dion. For he spared not the castle for the beauty and stately building thereof, but auoiding the suspition that caused Dion first to be accused, and lastly to be slaine, he caused it to be proclaimed by trumpet, that any Syracvsan whatsoeuer, should come with crowes of iron and mattocks, to helpe to dig downe and ouerthrow the fort of the tyrants. There was not a man in all the city of Syracvsa, but went thither straight, and thought that proclamation and day to be a most happy beginning of the recouery of their liberty. So they did not only ouerthrow the castle, but the pallace also, & the tombes: and generally all that serued in any respect for the memory of any of the tyrants. And hauing cleared the place in few daies, and made all plaine, Timoleon at the suit of the citizens, made councell hals, and places of iustice to be built there: and did by this means stablish a free state and popular gouernment, and did suppresse all tyrannical power. Now, when he saw he had won a city that had no inhabitants, which wars before had consumed, and feare of tyranny had emptied, so as grasse grew so high and rank in the great market place of Syracvsa as they grased their horses there, and the horse-keepers lay downe by them on the grasse as they fed: and that all the cities, a few excepted, were full of red deare and wild bores, so that men giuen to delight in hunting, hauing leisure, might find game many times within the suburbes and towne ditches, hard by the wals: and that such as dwelt in castles and strong holds in the country, would not leaue them, to come and dwell in cities, by reason they were all growne so stout, and did so hate and detest assemblies of councell, orations, and order of gouernement, where so many tyrants had reigned. Timoleon thereupon seeing this desolation, and also so few Syracvsans borne that had escaped, thought good, and all his captains to write to the Corinthians to send people out of Greece to inhabit the city of Syracvsa againe. For otherwise the countrey would grow barren and vnprofitable, if the ground were not plowed. Besides, that they looked also for great warres out of Africke: being aduertised that the Carthaginians had hung vp the body of Mago their Generall vpon a crosse, (who had slaine himselfe for that he could not answer the dishonor laid to his charge) and that they did leauy another great mighty army, to return again the next yeare following, to make wars in Sicile. These letters of Timoleon being brought vnto Corinth, and the ambassadours of Syracvsa, being arriued with them also, who besought the people to take care & protection ouer their poore city, & that they would once againe be founders of the same: the Corinthians did not greedily desire to be Lords of so goodly and great a city, but first proclaimed by the trumpet in all the assemblies, solemne feasts, and common playes of Greece, that the Corinthians hauing destroyed the tyranny that was in the city of Syracvsa, and driuen out the tyrants, did call the Syracvsans that were fugitiues out of their countrey home againe, and all other Sicilians that liked to come and dwell there, to enioy all freedome and liberty, with promise to make iust and equall diuision of the lands among them, the one to haue as much as the other. Moreouer, they sent out posts & messengers into Asia, & into all the Ilands where they vnderstood the banished Syracvsans remained, to perswade and intreat them to come to Corinth, and that the Corinthians would giue them ships, captaines, and means to conduct them safely vnto Syracvsa, at their own proper costs and charges. In recompence wherof, the city of Corinth receiued euery mans most noble praise and blessing, aswell for deliuering Sicile in that sort from the bondage of tyrants, as also for keeping it out of the hands of the barbarous people, and restoring the naturall Syracvsans and Sicilians, to their home and countrey againe. Neuertheless, such

ſuch SICILIANS as repaired to CORINTH vpon this proclamation (themſelues being but a ſmal number to inhabite the country) beſought the CORINTHIANS to ioyne to thē ſome other inhabitants, aſwel of CORINTH it ſelfe, as out of the reſt of GREECE: the which was performed. For they gathered together about ten thouſand perſons, whom they ſhipped and ſent to SYRACVSA. Where there were already a great number of other come vnto Timoleon, aſwel out of SICILE it ſelfe, as out of ITALY beſides: ſo that the whole number (as Athanis writeth) came to threeſcore thouſand perſons. Amongſt them he deuided the whole country, and ſold them houſes of the citie vnto the value of a thouſand talents. And becauſe he would leaue the old SYRACVSANS able to recouer their owne, and made the poore people by this meanes to haue money in common, to defray the common charge of the city, as alſo their expences in time of wars: the ſtatues or images were ſould, and the people by moſt voices did condemne them: for they were ſolemnly indited, accuſed and arraigned, as if they had bene men aliue to be condemned. And it is reported that the SYRACVSANS did reſerue the ſtatue of Gelon, an ancient tyrant of their city, honoring his memory becauſe of a great victory he had won of the CARTHAGINIANS, nere the city of HIMERA: and condemned all the reſt to be taken away out of euery corner of the city, and to be ſold. Thus began the city of SIRACVSA to repleniſh again, and by litle and litle to recouer it ſelfe, many people coming thither from all parts to dwell there. Thereupon Timoleon thought to ſet all other cities at liberty alſo, & vtterly to root out all the tyrants of SICILE: and to obtaine his purpoſe, he went to make wars with them at their owne doores. The firſt he went againſt was Ieetes, whom he compelled to forſake the league of the CARTHAGINIANS, and to promiſe alſo that he would race all the fortreſſes he kept, and to liue like a priuate man within the city of the LEONTINES. Leptines in like maner, that was tyrāt of the city of APPOLLONIA, and of many other litle villages thereabouts, when he ſaw himſelf in danger to be taken by force, did yeeld himſelfe: Whereupon Timoleon ſaued his life, and ſent him vnto CORINTH: thinking it honorable for his country, that the other GRECIANS ſhould ſee the tyrants of SICILE in their chiefe city of fame, liuing meanly and poorely like baniſhed people. When he had brought this to paſſe, he returned forthwith to SYRACVSA about the ſtabliſhment of the commonweale, aſſiſting Cephalus and Dionyſius, two notable men ſent from CORINTH to reforme the lawes, and to helpe them to ſtabliſh the godlieſt ordinances for their commonweale. And now in the meane time, becauſe the ſouldiers had a mind to get ſomething of their enemies, and to auoid idleneſſe, he ſent them out abroad into a country ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, vnder the charge of Dimarchus, and Demaratus: where they made many litle townes rebel againſt the barbarous people, and did not only liue in all abundance of wealth, but they gathered mony together alſo to maintaine the wars. The CARTHAGINIANS on the other ſide while they were buſie about theſe matters, came downe into LYLIBEA, with an army of threeſcore and ten thouſand men, two hundred gallies, and a thouſand other ſhips and veſſels that caried enſignes of batterie, carts, victuals, munition, and other neceſſary prouiſion for a campe, intending to make ſporting wars no more, but at once to driue all the GRECIANS again quite out of SICILE. For indeed it was an able army to ouercome all the SICILIANS, if they had bene whole of themſelues, and not diuided. Now they being aduertiſed that the SICILIANS had inuaded their country, they went towards them in great fury led by Aſtrubal and Amilcar, Generals of the army. This newes was ſtraight brought to SYRACVSA, and the inhabitants were ſo ſtriken with feare of the report of their army: that being a maruellous great number of them within the city, ſcant three thouſand of them had the hearts to arme themſelues, and to go to the field with Timoleon. Now the ſtrangers that tooke pay, were not aboue foure thouſand in all: and of them, a thouſand of their hearts failed, and left him in mid way, and returned home againe: ſaying, that Tymoleon was out of his wits, and more raſh then his yeeres required, to vndertake with fiue thouſand footmen, and a thouſand horſe, to go againſt threeſcore and tenne thouſand men: and beſides, to carie that ſmall force he had to defend himſelfe withall, eight great dayes iourney from SYRACVSA: ſo that if it chanced they were compelled to fly, they had no place whither they might retire themſelues vnto with ſafetie, nor man that would take care to burie them, when they were ſlaine. Neuertheleſſe, Timoleon was glad he had that proofe of them, before he came to battell. Moreouer, hauing encouraged thoſe that remained with him, he made them march with ſpeed towards the riuer of CRIMESVS, where he vnderſtood he ſhould meet with the CARTHAGINIANS. So getting vp vpon a litle hill, from whence he might see the campe of the enemies on the other side: by chance certaine moiles fell vpon his army, loden with smallage. The souldiers tooke a conceit at the first vpon sight of it, and thought it was a token of ill lucke: because it is a maner we vse to hang garlands of this Herbe, about the tombes of the dead. Hereof came the common prouerbe they vse to speake, when one lyeth a passing in his bed: He lacketh but smallage: as much to say, he is but a dead man. But Timoleon to draw them from this fooliſh superstition and discourage they tooke, staid the army: & when he had vsed certaine perswasions vnto them, according to the time, his leisure, and occasion, he told them that the garland of it self came to offer them victory before hand. For, said he, the CORINTHIANS do crowne them that winne the ISTMIAN games (which are celebrated in their country) with garlands of smallage. And at that time also euen in the solemne ISMIAN games, they vsed the garland of smallage for reward and token of victory: and at this present it is also vsed in the games of NEMEA. And it is but lately taken vp, that they haue vsed branches of pine apple trees in the ISTMIAN games. When Timoleon had thus encouraged his men, as you haue heard before: he first of all tooke of this smallage, and made himself a garland, and put it on his head: and after him the Captaines and all the souldiers also tooke of the same, and made themselues the like. The soothsayers in like maner at the very same time, perceiued two Eagles flying towards them: the one of them holding a snake in her talens, which she pierced through and through, and the other as she flew, gaue a terrible cry. So they shewed them both vnto the souldiers, who did then all together with one voice call vpon the gods for helpe. Now this fortuned about the beginning of Sommer, and towards the latter end of May, the Sunne drawing towards the solstice of Sommer: when there arose a great mist out of the riuer, that couered all the fields ouer, so as they could not see the enemies campe, but onely heard a maruellous confused noise of mens voices, as it had come from a great army: and rising vp to the top of the hill, they laid their targets downe on the ground to take a litle breath: and the Sun hauing drawn and sucked vp all the moist vapours of the mist vnto the top of the hils, the aire began to be so thicke that the tops of the mountaines were all couered ouer with clouds: and contrarily, the valley vnderneath was all cleare and faire, that they might easily see the riuer of CRIMESVS, & the enemies also, how they passed it ouer in this sort. First, they had put their carts of warre foremost, which were very hotly armed & well appointed. Next vnto them there followed ten thousand footmen, armed with white targets vpon their armes: whom they seeing afar off so well appointed, they coniectured by their stately march and goodly order, that they were the CARTHAGINIANS themselues, after them, diuers other nations followed confusedly one with another, & so they thronged ouer with great disorder. There Timoleon considering the riuer gaue him opportunity to take them before they were halfe past ouer, and to set vpon what number he would: after he had shewed his men with his finger, how the battell of their enemies was diuided in two parts by means of the riuer, some of them being already passed ouer, & the other to passe: he cõmanded Demaratus with his horsemen to giue a charge on the voward, to keepe them from putting themselues in order of battell. And himself coming down the hill also with all his footmen into the valley, he gaue to the SICILIANS the two wings of his battell, mingling with thẽ some strangers that serued vnder him: and placed with himself in the midst, the SYRACVSANS with all the choice and best liked strangers. So he taried not long to ioyne, when he saw the small good his horsemen did. For he perceiued they could not come to giue a lustie charge vpõ the battel of the CARTHAGINIANS, because they were paled in with these armed carts, that ran here & there before them: wherupon they were compelled to wheele about continually, (vnlesse the would haue put themselues in danger to haue bin vtterly ouerthrown) & in their returnes to giue venture of charge, by turns on their enemies. Wherfore Timoleon taking his target on his arme, cried out aloud to his footmen, to follow him couragiously, & to feare nothing. Those that heard his voice, thought it more thẽ the voice of a man, whether the fury of his desire to fight did so strain it beyond ordinary course, or that some god (as many thought it then) did stretch his voice to cry out so loud & sensibly. His souldiers answered him againe with the like voice: and praied him to leade thẽ without longer delay. Then he made his horsemen vnderstand, that they should draw on the one side from the carts, and that they should charge the CARTHAGINIANS on the flankes: and after he did set the foremost ranke of his battell, target to target against the enemies, commanding the trumpets withall to sound. Thus with great fury he went to giue a charge vpon them, who valiantly receiued the first charge, their bodies being armed with good iron corselets and their heads with faire murrions of copper, beſides the great targets they had alſo, which did eaſily receiue the force of their darts, and the thruſt of the pike. But when they came to handle their ſwords, where agilitie was more requiſite then force: a fearefull tempeſt of thunder, and flaſhing lightning withall, came from the mountaines. After that came darke thicke clouds alſo (gathered together from the top of the hils) and fell vpon the vally, where the battel was fought with a maruellous extreme ſhower of raine, fierce violent winds, and haile withall. All this tempeſt was vpon the GRECIANS backs, and full before the barbarous people, beating on their faces, and did blindfold their eyes, and continually tormented them with the raine that came full vpon them with the wind, and the lightnings ſo oft flaſhing amongſt them, that one vnderſtood not another of them. Which did maruellouſly trouble them, and ſpecially thoſe that were but freſh-water ſouldiers, by reaſon of the terrible thunderclaps, and the noiſe the boiſterous wind and haile made vpon their harneſſe: for that made them they could not heare the order of their Captaines. Moreouer, the dirt did as much annoy the CARTHAGINIANS, becauſe they were not nimble in their armour, but heauily armed as we haue told you: and beſides that alſo, when the plaites of their coates were through wet with water, they did lode and hinder them ſo much the more, that they could not fight with any eaſe. This ſtood the GRECIANS to great purpoſe to throw them downe the eaſier. Thus when they were tumbling in the dirt with their heauie armour, vp they could riſe no more. Furthermore, the riuer of CRIMESVS being riſen high through the great rage of waters, and alſo for the multitude of people that paſſed ouer it, did ouerflow the valley all about: which being full of ditches, many caues, and hollow places, it was ſtraight all drowned ouer, and filled with many running ſtreames, that ran ouerthwart the field, without any certaine channell. The CARTHAGINIANS being compaſſed all about with theſe waters, they could hardly get the way out of it. So as in the end they being ouercome with the ſtorme that ſtill did beat vpon them, and the GRECIANS hauing ſlaine of their men at the firſt, onſet, to the number of foure hundred of their choiceſt men, who made the firſt front of their battel all the reſt of their army turned their backs immediatly, & fled for life. Inſomuch as ſome of thē being followed very nere, were put to the ſword in the midſt of the vally: other holding one another hard by the arms together, in the midſt of the riuer as they paſſed ouer, were caried downe the ſtreame and drowned with the ſwiftneſſe and violence of the riuer. But the greateſt number thinking by footmanſhip to recouer the hils thereabouts, were ouertaken by them that were light armed, and put to the ſword euery man. They ſay, that of ten thouſand which were ſlaine in this battell, three thouſand of them were naturall citizens of CARTHAGE, which was a very ſorrowfull and grieuous loſſe to the city: for they were of the nobleſt, the richeſt, the luſtieſt and valianteſt men of all CARTHAGE. For there is no chronicle that mentioneth any former wars at any time before, where there dyed ſo many of CARTHAGE at one field and battell, as was ſlaine at that preſent time. For before that time, they did alwayes entertaine the FYRIANS, the SPANIARDS, and the NOMADES, in all their wars: ſo as when they loſt any battell, the loſſe lighted not on them, but the ſtrangers paid for it. The men of account alſo that were ſlain, were eaſily known by their ſpoiles. For they that ſpoiled them, ſtood not trifling about getting of copper and iron together, becauſe they found gold and ſiluer enough. For the battell being won, the GRECIANS paſſed ouer the riuer, and tooke the campe of the barbarous people, with all their cariages and baggage. And as for the priſoners, the ſouldiers ſtole many of them away, and ſent them going: but of them that came to light in the common diuiſion of the ſpoile, they were about fiue thouſand men, and two hundred carts of war that were taken beſides. Oh, it was a noble ſight to behold the tent of Timoleon the Generall, how they enuironed it all about with heapes of ſpoiles of euery ſort: among which there were a thouſand braue corcelets gilt, and grauen with maruellous curious works, and they brought thither with thē alſo ten thouſand targets. So the conquerers being but a ſmal number, to take the ſpoile of a multitude that were ſlain they filled their purſes euen to the top. Yet were they three daies about it, & in the end, the third day after the battel, they ſet vp a marke or token of their victory. Then Timoleon ſent vnto CORINTH, with the newes of this ouerthrow, the faireſt armor that were gotten in the ſpoile: becauſe he would make his country & natiue city ſpoken of & commended through the world, aboue all the other cities of GRECE. For that at CORINTH only, their chiefe temples were ſet forth & adorned, not with ſpoils of the GRECIANS, nor offerings gotten by ſpilling the bloud of their owne nation and countrey, (which to ſay truly, are vnpleaſant memories) but with the

ſpoiles taken from the barbarous people their enemies, with inſcriptions witneſſing the valiancy and iuſtice of thoſe alſo, who by victory had obtained thē. That is to wit, that the CORINTHIANS and their captaine Timoleon (hauing deliuered the GRECIANS dwelling in SICILY, from the bondage of the CARTHAGINIANS) had giuen thoſe offerings vnto the gods, to giue thanks for their victory. That done, Timoleon leauing the ſtrangers he had in pay, in their cōtry ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, to ſpoile and deſtroy it, he returned with the reſt of his army vnto SYRACVSA: whereat his firſt coming home, he baniſhed the thouſand ſouldiers that had forſaken him in his iourney, with expreſſe charge that they ſhould depart the city before Sun ſet. So theſe thouſand cowardly and mutinous ſouldiers paſſed ouer into ITALY, where, vnder promiſe of the contrary, they were all vnfortunatly ſlaine by the BRVSIANS: ſuch was the iuſtice of the gods to pay the iuſt reward of their treaſon. Afterwards, Mamercus the tyrant of CATHANA, and Icites (whether it was for the enuy they did beare to Timoleons famous deedes, or for that they were afraid of him) perceiuing tyrants could looke for no peace at his hands: they made league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and wrote vnto them that they ſhould ſend another army and captaine ſuddenly, if they would not vtterly be driuen out of SICILE. The CARTHAGINIANS ſent Giſco thither with threeſcore and ten ſaile, who at his firſt coming tooke a certaine number of GRECIAN ſouldiers into pay, which were the firſt the CARTHAGINIANS euer retained in their ſeruice: for they neuer gaue them pay vntill that preſent time, when they thought them to be men inuincible, and the beſt ſouldiers of the world. Moreouer, the inhabitants of the territory of MESSINA, hauing made a ſecret conſpiracy among themſelues, did ſlay foure hundred men that Timoleon had ſent vnto them: & in the teritories ſubiect vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, neere vnto a place they called HIERES, there was another ambuſh laid for Euthimus LEVCADIAN, ſo as himſelfe and all his ſouldiers were cut in peeces. Howbeit the loſſe of them made Timoleons doings notwithſtanding more fortunate: for they were euen thoſe that had forceably entred the temple of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES, with Philodemus the PHOCIAN, and with Onomarchus, who were partakers of their ſacriledge. Moreouer, they were looſe people & abiects, that were abhorred of euery body, who vagabonelike wandred vp and downe the country of PELOPONNESVS, when Timoleon for lacke of other was glad to take them vp. And when they came into SICILE, they alwaies ouercame in all battels they fought, whilſt they were in his company. But in the end, when the fury of wars was pacified, Timoleon ſending them about ſome ſpeciall ſeruice to the aide of ſome of his, they were caſt away euery man of them: and not all together, but at diuers times. So as it ſeemed that gods iuſtice, in fauour of Timoleon, did ſeparate them from the reſt, when he was determined to plague them for their wicked deſerts, fearing leſt good men ſhould ſuffer hurt by puniſhing of the euill. And ſo was the grace & goodwill of the gods wonderfull towards Timoleon, not onely in matters againſt him, but in thoſe things that proſpered well with him. Notwithſtanding, the common people of SYRACVSA tooke the ieſting words and writings of the tyrants againſt them, in maruellous euill part. For Mamercus amongſt other, thinking well of himſelfe, becauſe he could make verſes and tragedies, hauing in certaine battels gotten the better hand of the ſtrangers which the SYRACVSANS gaue pay vnto, he gloried very much. And when he offered vp the targets he had gotten of them, in the temples of the gods, he ſet vp alſo theſe cutting verſes, in deriſion of them that were vanquiſhed:

Timoleon baniſhed the thouſand traiterous ſouldiers out of Sicile.

Giſco ſent from Carthage with 70 ſaile into Sicile.

And gorgeouſly with gold, and eke with Iuorie.

These things done, Timoleon led his army before the citie of CALAVRIA, and Icetes therewhile entred the confines of the SYRACVSANS with a maine army, and carried away a maruellous great ſpoile: and after he had done great hurt, and ſpoiled the country, he returned backe againe, and came by CALAVRIA, to deſpite Timoleon, knowing well enough he had at that time but few men about him. Timoleon ſuffered him to paſſe by, but followed him afterwards with his horſemen and ligheſt armed footmen. Icetes vnderſtanding that, paſſed ouer the riuer called DAMYRIAS, and ſo ſtaid on the other ſide as though he would fight, truſting to the ſwift running of the riuer, and the height of the banks on either ſide of the ſame. Now the captaines of Timoleons bands fell out maruellouſly amongſt themſelues, ſtriuing for honor of this ſeruice, which was cauſe of delaying the battell. For none would willingly come behind, but euery man deſired deſired to leade the vward, for honour to begin the charge: ſo as they could not agree for their going ouer, one thruſting another to get before his companion. Wherefore Timoleon fell to drawing of lots, which of them ſhould paſſe ouer firſt, and tooke a ring of euery one of them, and caſt them all within the lap of his cloke: ſo rolling them together, by chance he pluckt one at the firſt, whereon was grauen the markes and tokens of a triumph. The yong captaines ſeeing that, gaue a ſhout of ioy, and without tarying drawing of other lots, they began euery man to paſſe the riuer as quickly as they could, and ſet vpō the enemies as ſuddenly. But they being not able to abide their force, ran their waies, & were faine to caſt their armour away to make more haſte: howbeit there were 2 thouſand of them lay dead in the field. And within few dayes after Timoleon leading his army to the city of the LEONTINES, tooke Icetes aliue there, with his ſon Eupolemus, & the Generall of his horſmen, who were deliuered into his hands by his own ſouldiers. So Icetes and his ſonne were put to death, like traitors and tyrants: and ſo was Euthydemus alſo, who though he was a valiant ſouldier, had no better mercy ſhewed him, then the father and the ſon, becauſe they did burthen him with certaine iniurious words he ſpake againſt the CORINTHIANS. For they ſay, that when the CORINTHIANS came firſt out of their countrey into SICILE, to make wars againſt the tyrants: that he making an oration before the LEONTINES, ſaid amongſt other things, that they ſhould not need to be afraid, if

The women of Corinth were come out of their couztry.

Thus we ſee, that men do rather ſuffer hurt, then put vp iniurious words: and do pardon their enemies, though they reuenge by deeds, becauſe they can do no leſſe. But as for iniurous words they ſeeme to proceed of a deadly hate, and of a cankered malice. Furthermore, when Timoleon was returned againe to SYRACVSA, the SYRACVSANS arraigned the wiues of Icetes, and his ſon, and their daughters: who being arraigned, were alſo condemned to die by the iudgement of the people. Of all the acts Timoleon did, this of all other (in my opinion) was the fouleſt deede: for if he had liſted, he might haue ſaued the poore women from death. But he paſſed not for them, and ſo left them to the wrath of the citizens, who would be reuenged of them, for the iniuries that were done to Dion, after he had driuen out the tyrant Dyoniſius. For it was Icetes that cauſed Arete, the wife of Dion, to be caſt into the ſea, his ſiſter Ariſtomache, and his ſonne that was yet a ſuckling child, as we haue written in another place in the life of Dion. That done, he went to CATANA againſt Mamercus, who taried for him by the riuer ABOLVS, where Mamertus was ouerthrowne in battell, and aboue two thouſand men ſlaine, the greateſt part whereof were the CARTHAGINIANS, whom Giſco had ſent for his reliefe. Afterwards he granted peace to the CARTHAGINIANS, vpon earneſt ſuite made to him, with condition, that they ſhould keepe on the other ſide of the riuer of LYCVS, and that it ſhould be lawfull for any of the inhabitants there that would, to come and dwell in the teritorie of the SYRACVSANS, and to bring away with them their goods, their wiues and their children: and furthermore, that from thenceforth the CARTHAGINIANS ſhould renounce all league, confederacy, and alliance with the tyrants. Whereupon Mamercus hauing no hope of good ſucceſſe in his doing, he would go into ITALY, to ſtir vp the LVCANIANS againſt Timoleon and the SYRACVSANS. But they that were in his company, returned back againe with their gallies in the mid way: and when they were returned into SICILE, they deliuered vp the city of CATANA into the hands of Timoleon, ſo as Mamercus was conſtrained to ſaue himſelf, and to flie into MESSINA, to Hippon the tyrant thereof. But Timoleon followed him, and beſieged the city both by ſea and by land. Whereat Hippon quaked for feare, and thought to flie by taking ſhip, but he was taken ſtarting. And the MESSINIANS hauing him in their hands, made all the children come from the ſchoole to the Theater, to ſee one of the goodlieſt ſights that they could deuiſe: to wit, to ſee the tyrant puniſhed, who was openly whipped, and afterwards put to death. Now for Mamercus, he did yeeld himſelfe vnto Timoleon, to be iudged by the SYRACVSANS, ſo that Timoleon might not be his accuſer. So he was brought vnto SYRACVSA, where he attempted to make an oration to the people, which he had premeditated long before. But ſeeing that the people cryed out and made a great noiſe, becauſe they would not heare him, and that there was no likelihood they would pardon him: he ranne ouerthwart the Theater, and knocked his head as hard as he could driue, vpon one of the degrees whereon they ſate there to ſee their ſports, thinking to haue daſhed out his braines, and haue ridde himſelfe ſodainly out of his paine. But he was not happy to die ſo, for he was taken ſtraight being yet aliue, and put to death as theeues and murtherers are. Thus did Timoleon roote all tyrants out of SICILE, and made an end of ill warres there. And whereas he found the whole Ile, wilde, sauage, and hated of the natural countrymen and inhabitants of the same, for the extreme calamities and miseries they suffered, he brought it to be so ciuill, and so much desired of strangers, that they came far & neare to dwell there, where the naturall inhabitants of the country selfe before, were glad to fly and forsake it. For AGRIGENTVM, and GELA, two great cities, did witnesse this, which after the wars of the ATHENIANS, had bin vtterly forsaken and destroyed by the CARTHAGINIANS, and were then inhabited againe: the one, by Megellus and Pheristus, two captaines that came from ELEA: and the other by Gorgos, who came from the Ile of CEO. And as neere as they could, they gathered againe together the first ancient citizens and inhabitants of the same: whom Timoleon did not onely assure of peace and safety to liue there, to settle them quietly together: but willingly did helpe them besides, with all other things necessary, to his vttermost meane and ability, for which they loued and honoured him as their father and founder. And this his good loue and fauour was common also to all other people of SICILE whatsoeuer. So that in all SICILE there was no truce taken in wars, nor lawes established, nor lands diuided, nor institution of any policy or gouernment thought good or auaileable, if Timoleons deuice had not bene in it, as chief directer of such matters: which gaue him a singular grace to be acceptable to the gods, and generally to be beloued of all men. For in those dayes, there were other famous men in GREECE, that did maruellous great things: amongst whom were these, Timotheus, Agesilaus, Pælopidas, and Epaminondas: which Epaminondas, Timoleon sought to follow in all things, as neare as he could, aboue any of them all. But in all the actions of these other great captaines, their glory was alwaies mingled with violence, paine, and labour: so as some of them haue bene touched with reproch, and other with repentance. Whereas contrariwise, in all Timoleons doings (that only excepted which he was forced to do to his brother) there was nothing but they might with troth (as Timæus said) proclaime the saying of Sophocles:

Timoleon quieteth all Sicile.

Timoleon compared with the famousest men in Greece.

Oh mighty gods of heauen, what Venus stately dame,
Or Cupid, (god) haue thus yput, their hands vnto this same?

And like as Antimachus verses, and Dionysius painting, both COLOPHONIANS, are full of sinewes and strength, and yet at this present we see they are things greatly laboured and made with much paine: and that contrariwise in Nicomachus tables, and Homers verses, besides the passing workmanship and singular grace in them, a man findeth at the first sight, that they were easily made, and without great paine. Euen so in like manner, whosoeuer will compare the painfull bloudie wars and battels of Epaminondas, and Agesilaus, with the wars of Timoleon, in the which, besides equity and iustice, there is also great ease and quietnesse: he shall find, weighing things indifferently. That they haue not bin Fortunes doings simply, but that they came of a most noble and fortunate courage. Yet he himself doth wisely impute it vnto his good hap and fauorable fortune. For in his letters he wrote vnto his familiar friends at CORINTH, and in some other orations he made to the people of SYRACVSA, he spake it many times, that he thanked the almightie gods, that it hath pleased them to saue and deliuer SICILE frō bondage by his means and seruice, and to giue him the honour and dignity of the name. And hauing builded a temple in his house, he dedicated it vnto Fortune, and furthermore did consecrate his whole house vnto her. For he dwelt in a house the SYRACVSANS kept for him, and gaue him in recompence of the good seruice he had done them in the warres, with a maruellous faire pleasant house in the countrey also, where he kept most when he was at leisure. For he neuer after returned vnto CORINTH againe, but sent for his wife and children to come thither, and neuer dealt afterwards with those troubles that fell out amongst the GRECIANS, neither did make himselfe to be enuied of the citizens (a mischiefe that most gouernours and captaines do fall into, through their vnsatiable desire of honour and authoritie) but liued all the rest of his life after in SICILE, reioycing for the great good he had done, and specially to see so many cities and thousands of people happy by his meanes. But because it is an ordinary matter, and of necessitie, (as Simonides saith) that not onely all larkes haue a tuft vpon their heads, but also that in all cities there be accusers, where the people rule: there were two of those at SYRACVSA, that continually made orations to the people, who did accuse Timoleon, the one called Laphystius, and the other Demænetus. So this Laphystius appointing Timoleon a certaine day to come and answer to his accusation before the people, thinking to conuince him: the citizens began to mutine, and would not in any case suffer

ſuffer the day of adiornment to take place. But Timoleon did pacifie thē, declaring vnto them that he had takē all the extreme paines & labor he had done, & had paſſed ſo many dangers, becauſe euery citizen & inhabitant of SYRACVSA, might frankly vſe the liberty of their laws. And another time Demenetus, in open aſſēbly of the people, reprouing many things Timoleon did whē he was General: Timoleon anſwered neuer a word, but only ſaid vnto the people, that he thanked the gods they had granted him the thing he had ſo requeſted of them in his prayers, which was, that he might once ſee the SYRACVSANS haue full power and liberty to ſay what they would. Now Timoleō in al mens opiniō, had done the nobleſt acts that euer GRECIAN captain did in his time, and had alone deſerued the fame & glory of all the noble exploits, which the rhetoricians, with all their eloquent orations perſwaded the GRECIANS vnto, in the open aſſemblies, & common feaſts and playes of GREECE, out of the which Fortune deliuered him ſafe and ſound before the trouble of the ciuill wars, that followed ſoone after: and moreouer he made a great proofe of his valiancy and knowledge in wars, againſt the barbarous people & tyrants, and had ſhewed himſelf alſo a iuſt & merciful man vnto all his friends, and generally to all the GRECIANS. And furthermore, ſeeing he won the moſt part of all his victories and triumphs, without the ſhedding of any one teare of his men, or that any of thē mourned by his meanes, & alſo rid all SICILE of all the miſeries and calamities reigning at that time, in leſſe then eight yeares ſpace: he being now grown old, his ſight firſt beginning a litle to faile him, ſhortly after he loſt it altogether. This happened, not through any cauſe or occaſion of ſickneſſe that came vnto him, nor that Fortune had caſually done him this iniury: but it was in my opinion, a diſeaſe inheritable to him by his parents, which by time came to lay hold on him alſo. For the voice went, that many of his kin in like caſe had alſo loſt their ſight, which by litle and litle with age, was cleane taken from them. Howbeit Athanis the hiſtoriographer writeth, that during the warres he had againſt Mamercus & Hippon, as he was in his camp at MYLLES, there came a white ſpot in his eies, that dimmed his ſight somewhat: ſo that euery man perceiued that he ſhould loſe his ſight altogether. Notwithſtanding that, he did not raiſe his ſiege, but continued his enterpriſe, vntil he tooke both the tyrants at laſt: and ſo ſoone as he returned to SYRACVSA againe, he did put himſelf out of his office of general, praying the citizens to accept that he had already done, the rather becauſe things were brought to ſo good paſſe, as they thēſelues could deſire. Now that he patiently tooke this misfortune to be blind altogether, peraduenture men may ſomewhat maruell at it: but this much more is to be wondred at, that the SYRACVSANS after he was blind, did ſo much honour him, and acknowledge the good he had done thē, that they went themſelues to viſite him oft, and brought ſtrangers (that were trauellers) to his houſe in the city, & alſo in the country, to make them ſee their benefactor, reioycing & thinking themſelues happy, that he had choſen to end his life with thē, and that for this cauſe he had deſpiſed the glorious returne that was prepared for him in GREECE for the great and happy victories he had won in SICILE. But amongſt many other things the SYRACVSANS did, and ordained to honor him with, this of all other me thinketh was the chiefeſt: that they made a perpetuall law, ſo oft as they ſhould haue warres againſt forrein people, and not againſt their owne countrymen, that they ſhould chuſe a CORINTHIAN for their generall. It was a goodly thing alſo to ſee how they did honor him in the aſſemblies of their councel. For if any triſling matter fell in queſtion among them, they diſpatched it of themſelues: but if it were a thing that required great counſell and aduice, they cauſed Timoleon to be ſent for. So he was brought through the market place in his litter, into the Theater, where all the aſſembly of the people was, and caried in euen ſo in his litter as he ſate: and then the people did all ſalute him with one voice, and he them in like caſe. And after he had pauſed a while, to heare the praiſes and bleſſings the whole aſſembly gaue him, they did propound the matter doubtfull to him, and he deliuered his opinion vpon the ſame: which being paſſed by the voices of the people, his ſeruants caried him backe againe in his litter through the Theater, and the citizens did waite on him a little way with cries of ioy, and clapping of hands: and that done, they did repaire to diſpatch common cauſes by themſelues, as they did before. So his old age being thus entertained with ſuch honour, and with the loue & good will of euery man, as of a common father to them all: in the end a ſickneſſe tooke him by the backe, whereof he died. So the SYRACVSANS had a certaine time appointed them to prepare for his funerals, and their neighbours alſo thereabouts to come vnto it. By reaſon whereof his funerall was ſo much more honourably performed in all things, and ſpecially for that the people appointed the nobleſt young gentlemen of the city to cary his coffin vpon their ſhoulders, richly furniſhed, and ſet forth, whereon his body lay, and ſo did conuey him through the place, where the palace and caſtle of the tyrant Dionyſius had bene, which then was razed to the ground. There accompanied his body alſo many thouſands of people, all crowned with garlands of flowers, and apparelled in their beſt apparel: ſo as it ſeemed it had bin the proceſſion of ſome ſolemne feaſt, & all their words were praiſings and bleſſings of the dead, with teares running down their cheekes, which was a good teſtimony of the entire good will and loue they did beare him, and that they did not this as men that were glad to be diſcharged of the honour they did him, neither for that it was ſo ordained: but for the iuſt ſorrow and griefe they took for his death, & for very hearty good loue they did beare him. And laſtly, the coffin being put vpon the ſtacke of wood, where it ſhould be burnt, Demetrius one of the herauldes that had the lowdeſt voice, proclaimed the decree that was ordained by the people, the effect whereof was this. The people of SYRACVSA hath ordained, that this preſent body of Timoleon CORINTHIAN, the ſonne of Timodemus, ſhould be buried at the charges of the common-weale, vnto the ſumme of two hundred Minas, and hath honoured his memory with playes and games of muſick, with running of horſes, & with other exerciſes of the body, which ſhall be celebrated yearely on the day of his death for euermore: and this, becauſe he did driue thy tyrants out of SICILE, for that he ouercame the barbarous people, and becauſe he repleniſhed many great cities with inhabitants againe which the wars had left deſolate and vnhabited, and laſtly, for that he had reſtored the SICILIANS againe to their libertie, and to liue after their owne lawes. And afterwards, his tombe was built in the market place, about the which a certaine time after, they builded certain cloiſters and galleries to exerciſe the youth in, with exerciſe of their bodies, and the place ſo walled in, was called Timoleontium: and ſo long as they did obſerue the lawes and ciuill policy, he ſtabliſhed amongſt them, they liued long time in great and continuall proſperity.

THE COMPARISON OF Paulus Æmylius with Timoleon.

The compariſon of Timoleon and Paulus Æmylius for the warres.

SIth theſe two men were ſuch as the Hiſtoriographers haue deſcribed them to be: it is certaine, that comparing one with the other, we ſhall finde no greate oddes or difference betweene them. For firſt of all, the warres they made, haue bene againſt great and famous enemies: the one againſt the MACEDONIANS, and the other againſt the CARTHAGINIANS, and both their victories very notable. For the one of them, conquered the realme of MACEDON, which he tooke from the ſeuenth king that rained by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne, ſince the time of the great Antigonus: and the other draue all the tyrants out of SICILE, and reſtored the whole Ile and cities therein, vnto their former libertie. Vnleſſe ſome will alledge perhaps that there was this difference betweene them, that Æmylius fought againſt King Perſeus, when he had all his power whole and entire, and

and had fought with the ROMAINES many times before, and had the better of them in all conflicts: where Timoleon set vpon Dionysius, when he was in greatest dispaire, and in manner vtterly cast away. On the contrary side, it may be obiected for Timoleon, that he ouercame many tyrants and a mightie great army of the CARTHAGINIANS, with a very small number of men, and yet men of all sorts: not as Æmylius with a great army of well trained and expert souldiers in warres, but with men gathered together, at aduenture of all sorts, being mercenary hirelings, and men fighting for pay, loose people, & vnruly in wars, that would do but what they listed. For where the goodly deeds are like, and the meanes vnequall: there we must confesse that the praise is due vnto the Generall. Both the one and the other kept their hands cleane from corruption, in the charge which they tooke vpon them. But it seemeth that Æmylius came so fashioned and prepared, by the good ciuill law, & morall discipline of his country: & that Timoleon came rawly thither, and afterwards fashioned himself to be that he was. And this is to be proued: for that all the ROMAINES in that time were so ciuilly brought vp, and exceeded all other in straight keeping the lawes of their countrey. Where to the contrary, there was not one of the Captaines of the GRECIANS that came then, or were sent into SICILE, but fell straight to corruption, when he had put his foot into SICILE, Dion only excepted: and yet they had a certaine suspition of him, that he aspired to the kingdome, and imagined in his head to stablish a certain Empire at SYRACVSA, like vnto that of LACEDÆMON. Timæus the historiographer writeth, that the SYRACVSANS sent Gilippus with shame back again into his coũtry, for his vnsatiable greedy couetousnes, and for his great thefts and bribes taken in his charge. Diuerse other haue also written the great treasons and falsehoods Pharax SPARTAN, and Calippus ATHENIAN did commit, both of them seeking to make themselues Lords of SYRACVSA, and yet what men are they, and what meanes had they to haue such a foolish vaine hope and fancy in their heads? considering that the one did follow and serue Dionysius, after he was driuen out of SYRACVSA: and the other also was but a priuate captaine of a band of footmen, of those that came with Dion. Timoleon in contrary maner was sent to be General of the SYRACVSANS, vpon their great instance and suite. And he hauing no need to seeke or hunt after it, but onely to keepe the power and authority they did willingly put into his hands: so soone as he had destroyed and ouerthrowne all such as would vniustly vsurpe the gouernment, he did immediatly of his own good will, frankly resigne vp his office and charge. And sure, so is this a notable thing to be commended, and esteemed in Paulus Æmylius: who hauing conquered so great and rich a realme, he neuer increased his goods the value of one farthing, neither did see nor handle any mony at all, although he was very liberall, & gaue largely vnto others. I meane not in speaking this to vpbraide or detect Timoleon, for that he accepted a faire house the SYRACVSANS gaue him in the city, and a goodly mannor also in the countrey: for in such cases there is no dishonestie in receiuing, but yet it is greater honesty to refuse, then to take. But that vertue is most rare & singular, where we see they will receiue nor take nothing, though they haue iustly deserued it. And if it be so, that the body is stronger and better compounded, which best abideth change of parching heat, & nipping cold: and that the mind is much more stronger & stable, that swelleth not vp with pride of prosperity, nor droopeth for sorrow in aduersitie. Then it appeareth that Æmylius vertue was so much more perfect, in that he shewed himself of no lesse graue and constant a mind, in the patience he endured for his losse and sorrow happened vnto him, (losing at one time in maner, both his children) then he had done before, in all his triumph & greatest felicity. Where Timoleon to the contrary, hauing done a worthy act against his brother, could with no reason suppresse the griefe & sorrow he felt: but ouercome with bitter griefe and repentance, continued the space of twenty yeeres together, and neuer durst once only shew his face again in the market place, nor deale any more in matters of the common-weale. Truly, for a man to beware to do euill, and to shun from euill, it is a very good and comely thing: so also to be sory, and afeard of euery reproch, and ill opinion of the world, it sheweth a simplenesse of nature, and a good and well disposed mind, but no manly courage.

THE LIFE OF Pelopidas.

To be too bold and venterous is not good.

CATO the elder, answered certaine on a time, that maruellously commended a bold, a venturous, and desperate man for the warres: That there was great oddes, to esteeme manhood so much, and life so little. And surely it was wisely spoken of him. The report goeth, that king Antigonus gaue pay to a souldier among other, that was very hardie and venturous, but he had a naughtie sickly body. The King asked him one day, what he ayled to be so pale, and euill coloured? The souldier told him, he had a secret disease vpon him, that he might not tell him with reuerence. The King hearing him say so, commanded his Physitions and Surgeons to looke to him, and if he were curable, that they should heale him with all possible speede: and so they did. After the souldier had his health againe, he would venture no more so desperatly in the wars, as he did before. Insomuch as king Antigonus self perceiuing his slackenesse in drawing backe, rebuked him and said vnto him: that he wondered to see so great a change & alteration in him. The souldier neuer shrinking at the matter, told him the troth plainly: Your self, & it please your Maiesty, is cause of my cowardlinesse now, by healing my disease, that made my life lothsome to me. Much like were a SYBARITANS words touching the life and maner of the LACEDÆMONIANS: that it was no maruel they had such a desire to die in the wars seeing they did it to rid themselues of their troubles, and most miserable & straight life. But we must not wonder though the SYBARITANS, being womanish men, altogether giuen to pleasure, did so thinke: that those men hated their liues, who feared not death, for the desire they had to do good, and good will they had to do their dutie. Which was contrary in the LACEDÆMONIANS: for they were of opinion, that to liue and die willingly, was a vertue: as these funerall verses do witnesse:

The answer of a souldier to king Antigonus.

Diuers opinions of life and death.

The dead which here do rest, did not in life esteeme,
That life or death were (of themselues) or good or bad to deeme.
But euen as life did end, or death was brought to passe,
So life or death, was good or bad; this their opinion was.

And indeede to flie death is no shame, so it proceede not of a cowardly heart: neither to desire death is commendable, if it be with hate and contempt of life. This is the reason why Homer saith, the valiantest men are euer best armed, when they come to battel. The law-makers among the

the GRECIANS, do euer puniſh him that caſts away his target, but neuer him that caſteth away his ſword or lance. For euery man muſt firſt thinke to defend himſelf, before he ſeeke to hurt his enemy, and ſpecially ſuch as haue the whole ſtate of a Realme in their hands, and be Generals of the field. For if the compariſon be true, that Iphicrates the ATHENIAN captain made, that in an army of men, the light horſmen reſemble the hands, the men of armes the feet, the battel of footmen the ſtomack and breaſt, the captaine the head of a mans body: it ſeemed then that the venturous captaine putting himſelfe in danger without cauſe, is not onely careleſſe of his owne life, but alſo of al theirs whoſe liues depend vpon his ſafety. And contrarily, he being carefull of his owne perſon, cannot but be carefull of his ſouldiers that ſerue vnder him. Therfore Callicratidas a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine, and a worthy man otherwiſe, did vnwiſely anſwer a ſoothſayer that bad him take heed to himſelf: for the ſignes & tokens of the ſacrifices did threatē his death. SPARTA, ſaid he ſtandeth not vpon one man alone. It is true, that to fight by ſea or by land, man for man, Callicratidas was but one man of himſelfe, but as captaine or lieutenant general, he had the whole power & force of the army in his perſon. For he was not a man alone, when ſo many mens liues were loſt with his. Now old Antigonus was of a cōtrary mind: for he being ready to giue battell by ſea, about the Ile of ANDROS, made a better anſwer to one that ſaid vnto him: his enemies had moe ſhips then himſelf. For how many ſhips then doeſt thou reckon my ſelfe, ſaid he? Therin he did wiſely to make great account of the worthineſſe of a General, ſpecially when it is ioyned with hardineſſe and experience. For the chiefeſt point of ſeruice, is to ſaue him that ſaueth all other. For when Chares on a time ſhewed the ATHENIANS opēly, the ſundry wounds and cuts he had receiued vpon his body, and his target alſo thruſt through with many pikes: Timotheus ſtraight ſaid vnto him: Chares, I am not of thy mind. For when I did beſiege the city of SAMOS, I was aſhamed to ſee a dart throwne from the wals, light hard by me, for that I ſhewed my ſelfe a raſh yong man, and more venturous then became a Generall of ſo great an army. For when it ſtandeth much vpon the whole army, and that it is neceſſary the General therof do put himſelfe in danger: then he ſhould put himſelfe forward, and occupy both hands and body without reſpect, not regarding their words that ſay, A good and wiſe Captaine ſhould die for age, or at the leaſt, old. But where there is ſmall honor to be won by very good ſucceſſe, & contrariwiſe much loſſe and deſtruction by great misfortune: no man of wiſdome or iudgement would wiſh a Generall to fight as a priuate ſouldier, to hazard the loſſe of a Generall. I thought good therefore to make this preface before the liues of Pelopidas and of Marcellus, both which were worthy men, and died otherwiſe then they ſhould. For they were both valiant ſouldiers in the field, and did both of them honor their country with famous victories, and ſpecially againſt great & dreadfull enemies. For the one was the firſt (as they ſay) that ouerthrew Hannibal, who was neuer ouercome by any before. And the other alſo ouercame the LACEDÆMONIANS in battel, that ruled al GREECE at that time both by ſea & by land, yet they both careleſly loſt their liues, by venturing too boldly, when their country ſtood in greateſt need of ſuch men & captains as they were. This is the cauſe why we following the reſemblance that was between them, haue compared their liues together. Pelopidas, the ſon of Hippoclus, came of one of the nobleſt houſes of the city of THEBES, as Epaminondas did. He being brought vp in great wealth, his father left him heire of all his lands and goods, being but a yong man. So he ſtraight ſhewed himſelfe willing to do good, with his mony, to thoſe that needed helpe, and were worthy: to let the world ſee that his mony was not his maſter. For as Ariſtotle ſaith of theſe rich men, the moſt part of them do not vſe their goods for extreme couetouſnes, other again do abuſe thē, as being giuē to ouermuch pleaſures. So rich men become ſlaues all their life time, ſome to pleaſure, other to profite. Now, all Pelopidas other friends would be beholding to him, & take very thankfully his courteſie & liberality towards them: but Epaminondas could neuer be brought to take any thing at his hands. Howbeit Pelopidas ſelfe followed Epaminondas maner: for he took a pride and pleaſure to go ſimply apparelled, to fare meanely, to labour willingly, and to make wars openly as he did. He was euen ſuch another, as Euripides the Poet deſcribed Capaneus to be, when he ſaid of him:

He rich and wealthy was, yet was he therewithall
No wight that purchac'd worldly hate, nor inſolent at all.

For he wold haue bin aſhamed, that the pooreſt man of the city of THEBES, ſhould haue worne meaner apparell vpon his backe then himſelfe. As for Epaminondas, his pouerty was not dainty to him, becauſe his parents were euer poore, & yet for al that he paſſed it ouer more eaſily by ſtudy of Philoſophy, which he gaue himſelf vnto, and for that from his youth he liked to leade a ſpare life without exceſſe. Where Pelopidas matched in a noble houſe, and maried highly, & had two children by his wife: neuertheleſſe he had no mind to keepe or increaſe his goods the more for that, but gaue himſelfe altogether to ſerue the cõmon-weale as long as he liued. By reaſon whereof his wealth decayed, and his beſt friends grew angry with him, telling him that he did not well to make no more reckoning of a thing that was ſo neceſſary, as to haue goods. And he anſwered them: Indeed they are neceſſary I do confeſſe it, but yet for ſuch a one as this poore, lame, and blind man that ſtandeth by. They both were alike borne to all vertue, ſauing that Pelopidas tooke moſt pleaſure in exerciſe of his body and ſtrengh, and Epaminondas in the exerciſe of his wit and learning. So as the paſtime each of them tooke when they were at leaſure was, that the one delighted to wreſtle & to hunt, and liked any kind of exerciſe of his body: and the other to heare, to ſtudy, and alwaies to learne ſomething of Philoſophy. But among all the excellent gifts and good parts in either of them, and that moſt wanne them honour and eſtimation in the world, they were only commended, and ſingularly noted of wiſe men, for the perfect loue and friendſhip that was euer inuiolably kept betweene them vntill their deaths: hauing bene ioyned together in ſo many battels, warres, charges of armies, and otherwiſe in matters of ſtate and gouernement. For if a man will conſider, and looke into the doings of Ariſtides, Themiſtocles, and Cimon, of Pericles Nicias, and Alcibiades, how full of diſſentions, enuies, and ſuſpitions they were one againſt another, in gouerning the common-weale: and againe will conſider the loue, honour, and kindneſſe, that continued alwaies betwixt Pelopidas, and Epaminondas: no doubt they will ſay theſe two are more worthy to be called brethren in warre (as they ſay) and companions in gouernement, then any of them we haue named before, whoſe care and ſtudy was alwayes rather to ouercome one another, then to ouercome their enemies, & the only cauſe therof was their vertue. For their acts ſhewed they did not ſeeke glory, nor riches for themſelues (the couetouſneſſe whereof doth alwayes breed quarrels and enuy) but both of them from the beginning fell one in loue with another, with a great kindneſſe and eſtimation of themſelues, to ſee their countrey flouriſh, and grow to great honour through their ſeruice, and in their time: and ſo they reckoned all the good exploits both of the one and the other, that tended to that end, as their own. The moſt part of writers thinke, this great and earneſt loue the one did beare to another, did grow firſt betweene them in a iourney they made together vnto MANTINEA to aid the LACEDÆMONIANS, that were at that time confederates of the THEBANS. For they being both ſet in battell ray, one hard by another among the footmen, againſt the Arcadians that ſtood before them: it fortuned that the point of the battell of the LACEDÆMONIANS in the which they were, gaue backe, and many of them ranne away. But they determining to die rather then to flie, ſtood cloſe together, and fought with the enemies that came vpon them, vntill ſuch time as Pelopidas being hurt in ſeuen places before, fell downe at the laſt vpon a heape of dead bodies, aſwell of their owne ſouldiers as of their enemies, euen one vpon another. Then Epaminondas thinking he had bene ſlaine, ſtept notwithſtanding before him to defend his body and armour, and he alone fought againſt many, being willing to die rather then to forſake Pelopidas lying amongſt the dead bodies: vntil himſelfe being thruſt into the breaſt with a pike, and ſore cut on his arme with a ſword, was euen ready to giue ouer, when Ageſipolis (King of the LACEDÆMONIANS) came with the other point of the battell in happy houre, who ſaued both their liues paſt all hope. Now after this battel, the LACEDÆMONIANS both in words and deeds did courteouſly intreate the THEBANS as their friends & confederates. Notwithſtanding, in truth they began to feare the power and great courage of that city, and ſpecially the faction and aſſociats Iſmenias and Androclidas had ſet vp, whereof Pelopidas alſo was a companion: becauſe they thought it was popular, and inclined much to deſire liberty. Whereupon Archias, Leontidas, and Philip, all three great wealthy men of the city of THEBES, & miſliking to be equall with other citizens, did perſwade Phœbidas, a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that going and coming through the countrey of BOEOTIA with an army, he would one day aſſay to take the caſtle of THEBES called CADMEA and driuing thoſe out of the city that would reſiſt him, he would put the gouernement of the ſtate into the hands of a few of the nobleſt perſons, who would be at the deuotion of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and obey them in all things. Phœbidas brought it to paſſe, & did work his feate before the THEBANS miſtruſted any thing, vpon a holy day called THESMOPHORIA. After he had wonne the caſtle, he apprehended Iſmenias, and ſent him to LACEDÆMON, where ſhortly after

after they put him to death, Pelopidas. Pherenicus, and Androclidas, with many other saued themselues by flying, & were banished THEBES by sound of trumpet. Epaminondas taried still in THEBES, & no man touched him, for they made small account of him, because he was altogether giuen to his booke: and though his goodwill had serued him to haue done some feate, his pouerty made him vnable to do any thing. The LACEDÆMONIANS vnderstanding of the taking of the castle, did straight put Phœbidas out of his charge, and set a fine of a hundred thousand drachmes vpon his head: but yet they kept still the castle of CADMEA in their hands with a great garrison. All the other cities & people of GREECE did wonder much at it, that they should allow the fact, and punish notwithstanding the doer. So the THEBANS hauing lost their ancient liberty, and being made subiect by both these, Archias and Leontidas, so as all hope was taken from them euer to wind out of this tyranny, or at any time to ouerthrow it, seeing it was maintained and defended by the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that they could not possibly take from them all the seigniorie & dominion they had throughout GREECE, as well by sea as by land: Leontidas and his followers notwithstanding, when they vnderstood that they who were banished frō THEBES, were very well receiued and entertained of the people at ATHENS, & much made of also by the nobility, they sought secretly by treason to haue them killed. To do this feate, they sent certaine men vnknown to ATHENS, who by treason slue Androclidas, howbeit they missed the killing of the other. Furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS, wrote to the ATHENIANS, that they should not receiue such as were banished from THEBES, nor that they should fauour them, but driue them out of their city, as those which by their allies were iustly proclaimed common enemies. The ATHENIANS, notwithstanding, being men alwaies ciuilly giuen, and inclined in nature to humanitie, as being borne, and bred vp withall, and very desirous besides to requite the THEBANS courtesie, who had bene the chiefest meanes and doers in restoring againe the popular state and gouernement at ATHENS: they would by no meanes offer the THEBANS any such iniurie, seeing they had stablished a law and decree, that if any ATHENIAN passing too and fro through the countrey of BOEOTIA, did beare armour against the thirty tyrants, that were gouernours and oppressors of the liberty of ATHENS, there should no BOEOTIAN seeme to see, or know any thing thereof. In the meane time Pelopidas, though he were of the younger sort, did procure still euery one that was banished, to seeke the liberties of his country, and openly made an oration to them all, declaring that it were not onely a cowardly part, but also a wicked offence to the goddes, if they would suffer their countrey to remaine so in continuall bondage, and strangers to inhabite it with a garrison, to make them subiect to the yoke: and they in the meane time to be contented to saue themselues, to liue delicately and idlely at ATHENS, to studie to do what shall please the ATHENIANS to command them, and to be afraid of the Oratours, and those which through eloquence can perswade the common people to do what they lust. Therefore he perswaded them that they should hazard all, being a matter of so great weight, and take example of Thrasybulus noble courage and hardinesse: who departing from THEBES, did driue out the tyrants that oppressed ATHENS: and euen so, we departing from ATHENS, should seeke to deliuer THEBES also from bondage. When he had by these perswasions drawne them to his opinion, they secretly sent vnto their friends that remained still in THEBES, to let them vnderstand their mind and determination: who all liked very well of their purpose. Insomuch as Charon that was the chiefest man among them, promised to lend them his house to assemble in. Philidas also found meanes to be Secretary to Philip and Archias, who were gouernors and Captaines of the citie at that time for the LACEDÆMONIANS. Epaminondas on the other side making no shew of any thing, had of long time practised to stirre vp the courage of the young men of THEBES. For when they were at any games or exercises of body, he would euer procure them to wrestle with the LACEDÆMONIANS. And after he saw them reioyce when they had cast them, and that they were the stronger: he would chide them, and tell them they might be ashamed, for lacke of courage to suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to hold their noses to the grindstone, that were nothing like to them in strength. Now, the confederates appointed a day certaine to breake the ice of their pretended enterprise, and agreed that Pherenicus, with other that were banished, should arie at the village of THRIASIVM, and that they should send the valianteſt and lustiest young men before, to giue the venture to enter the city: adding this therewithal, that if the enemies fortuned to surprise thē, al the other of ẏ cōspiracy ioyntly together, shold be ready to giue order, that their fathers, mothers, & childrē shold lacke nothing neceſſary for them. Pelopidas was the firſt man that offered himſelfe to vndertake the enterpriſe: and after him Melon, Damoclidas, and Theopompus, all three, men of the greateſt houſes of THEBES, who loued maruellouſly together, & for no reſpect would euer offend one another, although from the beginning there was euer emulation among them for honour and glory, by ſtriuing who ſhould exceed other in vertue and valiantneſſe. Now they were twelue of them, who taking leaue of the reſt, ſent a foot poſt before to Charon, to aduertiſe him of their coming: and they themſelues went on their iourney caſting little ſhort clokes vpon them, and taking hounds with them, and hunters ſtaues in their hands, becauſe their enterpriſe ſhould not be miſtruſted by thoſe that met them on the way, and that they ſhould thinke them hunters vp and downe the fields for their pleaſure. So, when the meſſengers they ſent, came to the citie, and had told Charon that they were coming, he neuer ſhrunke from his word, though the danger towards was great, but like a ſtout and honeſt man did abide by his promiſe made, and told him they ſhould be moſt heartily welcome to his houſe. But another man called Hippoſthenidas, very honeſt otherwiſe, and one that loued his country and the preſeruation thereof, and a good friend of thoſe alſo that were baniſhed: fainting ſtraight vpon the ſudden report of theſe newes, his mind was troubled, and his heart failed him ſo, as his noſe fell a bleeding, to thinke vpon the greatneſſe of the inſtant danger he was like to fall into, hauing neuer caſt before with himſelfe, how by this enterpriſe they ſhould put all the empire of the LACEDÆMONIANS in hazard of vtter deſtruction, and lay a plot beſides to ouerthrow all their cõmon weale and ſtate: by laying all their hope vpon a few baniſhed men, hardly able to wade through with their enterpriſe. Whereupon ſo ſoone as he was come home, he ſecretly diſpatched a meſſenger one of his familiar friends, vnto Melon and Pelopidas, to will them they ſhould defer their enterpriſe for better oportunitie, and ſo to returne backe againe to ATHENS. Chlidon was the man he ſent of this meſſage, who preſently went home to his houſe: and taking his horſe out of the ſtable, bad his wife fetch him the bridle quickly. The bridle being not readily to be found, ſhe told him ſhe had lent it out to one of their neighbors. Then they fell a chiding together about it, and at length brake out to foule words, and laſtly his wife fell a curſing of him, and praied the gods he might haue ill lucke in his iourney, and thoſe that ſent him. Chlidon hauing ſpent the moſt part of the day chiding and brawling with his wife about the bridle, and furthermore miſliking the tokens of his wiues curſing and banning of him: he determined not to go a foote out of the doores on that arrand, and ſo went about ſome other buſineſſe. Thus had this noble enterpriſe in manner bene altogether daſhed before it was fully begun. Now thoſe that were in Pelopidas companie, changed apparell with the countrey men, becauſe they would not be knowne, and did deuide themſelues for that they would not come into the citie all together, but at diuers gates, being day light. At that time it was a maruellous wind and great ſnow, and the weather was ſo boiſterous, that euery man got him within dores: which fell out happily for the conſpirators, that they were not knowne when they came into the city. So their friends & confederates within the city receiued them as they came, and brought them to Charons houſe, where were aſſembled together, with thoſe that were baniſhed, eight and forty perſons onely. Now for the tyrants, thus ſtood the matter with them. Philidas their Secretary was of the conſpiracy, as we haue told you before, and he knew all the practiſe. Wherfore he had long before ſolemnly bidden Archias and his company, to ſupper to his houſe, that very night, to be merry together, and had promiſed to entertaine them with women to welcome them withall: of purpoſe, that when they had in their full cups, and were in the midſt of all their pleaſure, the conſpirators might then vſe them as they would. So they being ſet at table, before they were ſped of their cups, one came to them, & told them truly of the treaſon (not the particularities, neither as a thing certaine, but of a rumour onely that ran abroad in the towne) that the baniſhed men were hidden in Charons houſe. Philidas would haue paſſed the matter ouer. Howbeit Archias would needs ſend one of his guard ſtraight for Charon, to command him to come to him preſently. It was within night, and Pelopidas and his company prepared themſelues to worke their feat, being armed euery man, & their ſwords in their hands, when vpon a ſodaine they heard one knocke at the gate. And one of the houſe running ſtraight to the gate, came back again afeard, to tell them that it was one of Archias guard that came for Charon, to come immediatly to the gouernours. Then were they in doubt that their practiſe was diſcouered, & that they were all caſt away, before they could make any proof of their valiantnes: notwithſtanding, they were all of opinion, that Charon ſhould obey the meſſage, and that he ſhould preſent himſelfe before the gouernours, to take away all ſuſpition from them. Charon of himſelfe was a ſtout man, very conſtant, and reſolute in danger for his own perſon: yet it grieued him much at that time, for feare the confederats ſhould ſuſpect him he had bewraied them, if ſo many honeſt citizens whom he had lent his houſe vnto, ſhould vnfortunatly miſcary. Therefore before he went out of his houſe, he went into his wiues chamber, to fetch his ſon, that was a goodly boy, but ſtrong as any boy of his age could be: ſo he brought him to Pelopidas, & praied him, if he vnderſtood he had betraied thē any way, or otherwiſe had ſought their hurt, they ſhould then vſe his ſon as an enemy, without any compaſſion towards him. Whē the confederates ſaw the good zeale and true noble mind of Charon, they all fell a weeping, and were angry with him, that he ſhonld thinke any of thē ſo faint hearted, or timorous, for any danger could come to them, that they ſhould ſuſpect or accuſe him for any thing: and therewithall they prayed him, not to leaue the boy with them, but rather to conuey him into ſome place out of the tyrants danger, where he might be brought vp, that one day he might be reuenged of the wrong and iniury they had done to them, and to their country. Charon anſwered them, he would not take him away, & that he ſaw no life nor health more happy for him, then to die with his father without infamy, and with ſo many honeſt men his friends. So after he had beſought the gods to proſper them, and had encouraged and embraced euery one of the confederators one after another: he went to the gouernours, and ſtudied by the way ſo to frame his words & countenance, as though he ſhould ſeeme to thinke of any thing elſe, then of that he purpoſed to do. When he came to Philidas dore that made the feaſt, Archias & Philidas himſelfe came vnto him, and asked him: Charon, what are they (ſaid they) that are come into the citie, and hidden in ſome houſe, with certaine citizens, that do accompany them? Charon was ſomewhat abaſhed at the firſt and asked them againe: What men be they? who are they that hide them in the city? But when he perceiued that Archias could tel nothing of certainty, then he thought ſtraight that ſome man had informed them that was not priuy to the practiſe, but had heard ſomething of it. Therupon he willed them to take heed it was nofalſe alarme, to make them afraid: neuerthel ſſe (ſaid he) I wil enquire further of it: for at all aduenture it is good to be circumſpect in ſuch a caſe to be ſure. Philidas anſwered him, he ſaid truly: and ſo he brought Archias backe again into the hall, where he made him drinke deeper then before, ſtill entertaining the company with hope of the womens coming. Charon returning home againe, found all the confederates ready to attempt their enterpriſe, not as men that reckoned of their liues, nor that had hope to preuaile: but as thoſe that were determined to die valiantly, & to ſell their lines dearely. Now he truly told vnto Pelopidas only, what was ſaid vnto him: and the reſt, he told that Archidas had ſent for him to ſpeake with him of other matters. The ſtorme of the former danger was ſcant blown ouer, but Fortune ſent them another: for immediatly vpon talke had with Charon at the firſt, came a meſſenger from ATHENS, that brought a letter to the ſame Archias, written by the Biſhop of ATHENS at that time, called Archias, alſo as himſelfe, and was his old hoſt and friend: wherein he wrote not of ſimple coniecture, nor ſurmiſed ſuſpition, but the plaine conſpiracie in euery degree, as afterwards it fell out. So the meſſenger was brought to Archias that was drunke, and deliuering him the letter he ſaid vnto him: Sir, he that ſendeth you this letter, ſtraightly charged me to tell you, that you ſhould preſently reade the contents thereof, becauſe it is a matter of great importance. Archias laughing ſaid vnto him: Weightie matters to morrow. So he tooke the letter and put it vp, and then fell againe to his tale he had begun with Philidas. But euer after, the GRECIANS made this a common prouerbe among them, Weighty matters to morrow. Now when the conſpirators ſpied their time to go about their buſines, they diuided themſelues in two companies. Pelopidas and Damoclidas went with one company, to ſet vpon Leontidas and Hypates, becauſe they dwelt neare together: Charon and Melon with the reſt, went againſt Archias and Philip, being diſguiſed in womens apparell they had put vpon their priuy coates, and wearing garlands of pine apple and firre trees on their heads, they couered all their faces. So when they came to ſhew themſelues at the hall doore where the banket was made, they that were in the hall at the firſt ſight, thinking they had bene the women they looked for, began to ſhoute and made great noiſe for ioy. But when the conſpirators caſt their eyes round about the hall to know thoſe that were at the table, they drew out their ſwords, and ſet vpon Archias and Philip ouerthwart the table: then they ſhewed thēſelues what they were. Then Philidas bad his gueſts he had bidden to the banket with them, that they ſhould not ſtir, for they ſhould haue no hurt: ſo ſome of thē ſate ſtil,

But the greateſt number of them would needs from the boord, to defend their gouernors. Howbeit becauſe they were drunke that they knew not what they did, they were ſoone ſlaine with them. Now Pelopidas enterpriſe was not ſo eaſie. For they went againſt Leontidas, that was a ſober diſcreet man, and withall hardy of his hands: and they found he was gone to bed, his doores were ſhut vp, & they knocked long before any man came to the doore. At the length, one of his men that heard them rap ſo hard, with much ado came to open the doore: but he had no ſooner thruſt backe the bolt of the doore, and began to open it, but they puſhed it from them with ſuch a force vpon him altogether, that they laid him on the ground, and went ſtraight to his maſters chamber. Leontidas hearing the noiſe of them that ran vp to him in ſuch haſt, preſently miſtruſted the matter: and leaping out of his bed, tooke his ſword in his hand, but did forget to put out the lampes that burned in his chamber all night; for if they had bene out, they might eaſily haue hurt one another in the darke. But the lampes giuing cleare light in the chamber, he went to the chamber doore, and gaue Cephiſodorus the firſt man that preſſed to enter vpon him, ſuch a blow with his ſword, that he dropped downe dead at his feet. Hauing ſlain the firſt man, he dealt with the ſecond that came after him, and that was Pelopidas. The fight went hard betweene them two, both for that the chamber dore was very ſtrait, as alſo for that Cephiſodorus body lying on the ground, did choke the coming in at the chamber. Notwithſtanding, Pelopidas ouercame him in the end, and ſlew him: and went from thence with his company ſtraight to Hypates houſe, where they got in, as they did vnto Leontidas houſe before. But Hypates knew preſently what it was, and thought to ſaue himſelfe in his neighbours houſes. Howbeit the conſpirators followed him ſo hard, that they cut him off before he could recouer their houſes. Then they gathered together, and ioyned with Melons company, and ſent immediatly with all poſſible ſpeede to Athens, to the baniſhed Thebans there, and cryed through the city, Liberty, liberty, arming thoſe citizens that came to them with the armour and ſpoiles of their enemies, that were hanged vp in common vaults, and armourers ſhops about Charons houſe, which they brake open, or cauſed to be opened by force. On the other ſide, Epaminondas and Gorgidas, came to ioyne with them, with a company of young men and honeſt old men well appointed, whom they had gathered together. Herupon the whole city was ſtraight in an vprore and tumult, and euery houſe was full of lights, one running to another to know what the matter was. Neuertheleſſe the people did not yet aſſemble together, but euery one being amazed, muſing at this ſtir, not vnderſtanding the troth, ſtayed till day came on, that they might call a councell. But truly herein me thinkes the Captaines of the garriſon of the Lacedæmonians were greatly in fault, that they did not ſtir betimes, & ſet vpon them incontinently: conſidering there was fifteene hundred ſoldiers, beſides a great number of citizens that would haue come, one after another to take their parts. But the great noiſe they heard made them afeard, & to ſee lights in euery mans houſe, and the people running vp and downe the ſtreets in great multitudes too and fro: whereupon they ſtirred not, but only kept them within the caſtle of Cadmea. The next morning by breake of day, came the other baniſhed Thebans from Athens, very well armed, and all the people of Thebes drew together in councell. Thither did Epaminondas and Gorgidas bring Pelopidas and his conſorts, and preſented them before the people, compaſſed about with prieſts and the profeſſed of the city, offering them crownes to put vpon their heads, and they prayed the aſſembly of the citizens, that they would helpe their gods & their country. All the people that were preſent, when they ſaw them, aroſe vp and ſtood on their feet, and with great ſhouts and clapping of hands receiued them, as their ſauiours, that had deliuered their country from bondage, & reſtored them again to liberty: and thereupon before them all, euen in the market place, by the whole voice and conſent of the people, they choſe Pelopidas, Melon, and Charon, gouernors and captains of Boeotia. Pelopidas then immediatly made them beſiege the caſtell of Cadmea about, with trenches and force of wood, doing all he could poſſible to win it, and to expulſe the Lacedæmonians, before any ſupply or aide came to them from Sparta. So he did, and preuented it ſo ſuddenly, that the garriſon being departed out of the caſtle by compoſition, as they returned towards Lacedæmonia, they found Cleombrotus king of Sparta in the country of Megara, coming towards them with a great army to helpe them. Afterwards, of the three Captaines which had charge of their garriſon that lay at Thebes, the Spartans condemned two of them to death: Hirmippidas and Arciſſus were preſently executed: and the third captaine, Dyſcoridas, they ſet ſo grieuous a fine on his head, that he went out of Peloponnesvs. This enterpriſe priſe being attempted, and executed with the like valiantneſſe, and the ſame danger and trouble, that Thraſibulus practiſe was, when he deliuered ATHENS from the ſlauery of the thirty Gouernours and tyrants; and hauing the like fortune and happy end, the GRECIANS termed it coſin german to Thraſibulus act. And indeed it were a hard matter to finde two other ſuch, beſides them two, that with ſo few men ouercame their enemies, being many mo in number then themſelues, or that with ſo ſmall help did ouercome thoſe that were of ſo great force, or that performed their enterpriſe with their onely valiance and wiſdome, and were cauſe beſides of ſo great bleſſing and benefite to their country, as Pelopidas and Thraſibulus attempt was. But the great change and alteration of the ſtate afterwards, did make their acts farre more noble and famous. For the warre that ouerthrew the maieſtie of SPARTA, and that tooke away all the ſeignorie and rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS both by ſea and by land, beganne the very ſame night, when Pelopidas himſelfe making the twelfth perſon, and entring into a priuate houſe, taking neither citie, nor caſtle, nor ſtrong hold (to tell truly by figuratiue ſpeech) did breake and cut in ſunder, the links and chaines that linked ſtraight together, and ſtrengthened the LACEDÆMONIANS whole Empire and monarchie ouer all GRECE: who vntill that preſent time were thought ſo ſtrong, as no poſſibility could breake or ſunder them. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuning afterwards to inuade the country of BOEOTIA with a mighty army, the ATHENIANS trembling for feare of their great power, did vtterly leaue to protect them, and renounced the league and alliance they had made before with them. And moreouer, they did ſtraightly proſecute lawe againſt thoſe, that were accuſed to take part with the BOEOTIANS: whereof ſome of them were put to death, other were baniſhed from ATHENS, and the reſt condemned in great ſummes of money. To be ſhort, euery man ſaid the THEBANS were but vndone, conſidering they had no helpe, and were beloued beſides of none. At that preſent time it fell out Pelopidas and Gorgidas were Generals ouer all BOEOTIA for that yeare, who deuiſing to throw a bone betwixt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS again, to make them ſquare, they vſed this policy. There was a captain of the LACEDÆMONIANS called Sphodrias, a valiant man, but elſe of ſmall capacity, and vainely giuen, hauing a certaine fond ambition and humour, perſwading himſelfe he had done ſome notable good ſeruice in his time. This Sphodrias was left in the citie of THESPIES, with a great band of ſouldiers, to receiue and fauour all the BOEOTIANS that had a mind to reuolt from the THEBANE. Pelopidas of himſelfe ſent a merchant (a very friend of his) vnto Sphodrias with a great ſumme of money from him, and certaine perſwaſions withall, which preuailed more then the money, wiſhing him to attempt ſome greater matter, and to ſeeke to win the hauen of PIRÆA: a thing ſoone wonne, if he came to aſſault it on the ſodaine, and the rather, for that the ATHENIANS miſtruſt nothing, neither keepe watch nor ward there. Moreouer, that he might aſſure himſelfe, nothing could be better welcome to the lords of LACEDÆMONIA, then to make them lords of the city of ATHENS alſo. And again, that the THEBANS being at deadly fode with the ATHENIANS, for that they had betrayed and forſaken them in their need, would not aide nor ſuccor them in any reſpect. Sphodrias giuing too light eare to this vaine perſwaſion, tooke the ſouldiers he had with him, and marching away by night entred the realme of ATTICA, & went on to the city of ELEVSIN: but when he came thither, his ſouldiers were afeard, & would go no further. So his purpoſe being diſcouered, he was forced to returne backe to THESPIES, hauing raiſed ſuch a war to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as fel out to be of no ſmall importance to them, nor eaſie to be pacified. For after that time, the ATHENIANS ſought league and amity again with the THEBANS, and did aide them very louingly: and moreouer, putting themſelues to ſea, they ſailed vp and downe, procuring and drawing to their league all ſuch as were willing to rebell againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS: and the THEBANS beſides, had many prety skirmiſhes with the LACEDÆMONIANS in the meane time, in their owne country of BOEOTIA. It is true they came to no great battels, but yet it was ſuch a great learning and continuall training of them in martiall diſcipline, as the THEBANS ſtil increaſed in courage and valiantneſſe, and waxed ſtronger and better ſouldiers: for by thoſe skirmiſhes they grew not only expert ſoldiers, but waxed more skilful in vſing their weapons, then before. As we reade, that Antalcidas a SPARTAN ſaid one day to king Ageſilaus, coming home ſore hurt from BOEOTIA: Surely the THEBANS haue giuen you a worthy reward, for teaching them to be ſouldiers againſt their wils. But to ſay truly, Ageſilaus was not their maſter to teach them to make wars, but they were the good and wiſe leaders of the THEBANS, who like good woodmen in chusing their game, could skilfully chuse both time and place to giue their enemies battel, and make them retire again with safety, after they had bin fleshed, giuing them a litle tast of the fruits and commodity of victory: but among them, Pelopidas was he that deserued most honor. For since the first time they gaue him charge of men of war, they neuer failed, but chose him continually euery yeare, either captaine of the holy band, or gouernour of BOEOTIA so long as he liued: so that Pelopidas only did the most things in this war. The LACEDÆMONIANS were ouerthrowne in sundry iourneies, that they were distressed by the cities of PLATEES, and of THESPIES, where Phœbydas himselfe (that had before taken the castell of CADMEA) was slaine among other. Another great power of theirs also was ouerthrown neare to the city of TANAGRA, where Panthoidas gouernor of the same, was also slain. Now al these victories, though they much encouraged the hearts of the conquerors, & made them hardy: yet did they not thereby altogether conquer the minds of the vanquished. For the LACEDÆMONIANS were not ouercome in any pitched field, nor set battel, where they had their whole army together: but they were light rodes, & skirmishes properly laid of purpose, where sometime flying, sometime driuing them againe, they bickered very oft, and put them to the worst. But the battell of TEGYRA, which was but a flourish and proofe to the iourny of LEVCTREES, wan Pelopidas great honor: for he had no companion to challenge any part of his glory and victory, neither did he leaue his enemies any lawfull excuse, to shadow or couer their ouerthrow. For he spied all occasion he might possible, how to take the city of ORCHOMENE, that took part with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and had receiued two ensignes of footmen of theirs to keepe it. Pelopidas being aduertised one day, that the garrison of ORCHOMENE was gone abroad to make a rode into the country of the LOCRIDES, hoping he should finde ORCHOMENE without garrison, he marched thither with his holy band, and certaine number of horsemen. But when he drew neare the city, he had intelligence there was another garrison coming from SPARTA to supply the place of the garrison that was abroade: wherupon he returned backe again by the city of TYGYRA, for he could haue passed no other way, but to haue turned down by the foot of the mountaine. For all the valley that lay betweene both, was drowned with ouerflowing of the riuer of MELAS which euen from his very head carieth euer such breadth with it, as it maketh ý marishes nauigable, so as it is vnpassable for any shallow it hath. Not far frō these marishes standeth the temple of Apollo TEGIRIAN, where was an oracle in old time, but left off at this day, and had neuer long continuance, but only vntill the time of the wars of the MEDES, when Echecrates was master and chiefe priest there. And some hold opinion, that Apollo was borne there: for they call the next mountaine to it DELOS, at the foot whereof the marishes of the riuer of MELAS do end, and behind the temple are two goodly springs, from whence cometh great abundance of good sweet water: whereof the one of them is called to this day the Palme, and the other the Oliue. And some say also, that the goddesse Latona was not brought to bed betweene two trees, but betweene these two springs. For mount PROVM is hard by it also, from whence the wild bore came of a sodaine that slighted her. And the tale that is told of the serpent Pytho, and of the giant Tytius, do both confirme it, that Apollo was borne in the same place. I passe ouer many other coniectures confirming the same, for that we do not beleeue in our countrey that Apollo is among the number of those, who from mortall men haue bene translated to immortall goddes, as are Hercules and Bacchus, that through the excellencie of their vertue, did put off mortality, and tooke immortalitie vpon them: but we rather take him for one of those that neuer had beginning nor generation, at the least if those things be to be credited, which so many graue and ancient writers haue left in writing to vs, touching so great and holy things. The THEBANS returning back frō ORCHOMENE, and the LACEDÆMONIANS on the other side returning also from LOCRIDE both at one time, they fortuned both armies to meet about the city of TEGYRA. Now so soone as the THEBANS had discouered the LACEDÆMONIANS passing the straight, one of them ranne sodainly to Pelopidas, and told him: Sir, we are fallen into the hands of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Nay, are not they rather fallen into ours, answered Pelopidas againe? With these words he commanded his horsemen that was in the rereward, to come before, and set vpon them: and him selfe in the meane time put his footemen immediatly into a pretie squadron close together, being in all not aboue three hundred men, hoping when he should come to giue charge with his battell, he should make a lane through the enemies, though they were the greater number. For the LACEDÆMONIANS diuided themselues in two companies, and euery company, as Ephorus writeth, had had fiue hundred men: and as Calliſtenes ſaid, ſeuen hundred. Polybius and diuerſe other authours ſay, they were nine hundred men. So Theopompus and Gorgoleon, the Captaines of the LACEDÆMONIANS, luſtily marched againſt the THEBANS: and it fell out ſo, that the firſt charge was giuen, where the chiefetaines or generals were of either ſide, with great fury on either part, ſo as both the Generals of the LACEDÆMONIANS which ſet vpon Pelopidas together, were ſlaine. They being ſlaine, and all that were about them being either hurt or killed in the field: the reſt of the army was ſo amazed, that they deuided in two, and made a lane on either ſide, for the THEBANS to paſſe through them if they would. But when they ſaw Pelopidas meant not to take the paſſage they offered him, and that he came on ſtill with his men to ſet vpon thoſe that were yet in battell ray, and ſlue all them that ſtood before him: then they turned taile, and tooke them to their legs. Howbeit the THEBANS did not chaſe them farre, fearing the ORCHOMENIANS who were not farre from thē, and the new garriſon beſides, that were come from LACEDÆMON not long before. And this was the cauſe they were content that they had ouercome them by force, and had paſſed through their army in deſpight of them, and broken and ouerthrowne them. So when he had ſet vp markes of triumph, and ſpoiled their ſlaine enemies, they returned home againe, glad men for their obtained victory. For in all the warres the LACEDÆMONIANS euer made, as wel with the GRECIANS as with the barbarous people alſo, there was neuer chronicle mentioned at any time, that their enemies being ſo few, did ouercome them that were ſo many, nor that they were ouercome alſo by any number equall in battell. Whereupon they grew ſo couragious and terrible, that no man durſt once abide them: for their onely fame did ſo terrifie their enemies that came to fight againſt them, that they thought with no equall force to be able to performe as much as they had done. But this battell of TEGYRA was the firſt that made both them and the other GRECIANS know, that it was not the riuer of EVROTAS alone, nor the valley that lieth betweene the riuers of CNACION, and of BABYCE, that breedeth the valiant and hardy fighting men: but that it is in all places els, where they learne yong men to be aſhamed of diſhoneſt and vile things, and to venture their liues for honeſt cauſes, fearing more diſhonorable reproach, then honourable danger. Theſe are the people moſt to be feared, & are moſt terrible alſo to their enemies. And for the holy band we mentioned before, it is ſaid Gorgidas was the firſt erector of the ſame. They were three hundred choſen men entertained by the ſtate, & they alwayes kept within the caſtle of CADMEA, & the band was called the townes band: for at that time, & ſpecially in that part of GREECE, they called the caſtles & great holds in cities, ỹ towns. Other ſay it was a band of footmen that were in loue one with another. And therefore Pammenes pleaſant words are noted, ſaying, that Neſtor could no skill to ſet an army in battell ray, ſeeing he gaue the GRECIANS counſell, in the Iliades of Homer, that they ſhould ſet them in battell ray, euery country and tribe by themſelues:

Pelopidas victorie.

What enemies are moſt terrible and to be feared. The firſt inſtitution of the holy band.

That by affections, force and linkes of kindly loue:
The one might alwayes helpe at hand, that other do behoue.

For, ſaid he, one friend ſhould rather be ſet by another that loues together: becauſe in danger, men commonly do litle regard their countrey men, or ſuch as are of their tribe. But men that do loue one another, can neuer be broken nor ouercome: for the paſſion of loue that entertaineth ech others affection, for affections ſake, doth keep thē frō forſaking one another. And thoſe that are beloued, being aſhamed to do any vile & diſhoneſt thing before thoſe that loue them, for very loue wil ſticke one by another to the death. And ſure the reaſō is good, if it be true that louers do indeed more regard them they loue, though they be abſent, then other that be preſent. As appeareth by the example of him, that being ſtriken downe to the ground, his enemie lifting vp his ſword to kill him, he prayed him he would giue him his deaths wound before, leſt his friend that loued him, ſeeing a wound on his backe, ſhould be aſhamed of him. It is reported alſo, that Iolaus being beloued of Hercules, did helpe and accompany him in all his laboures and quarrels. Wherupon Ariſtotle writeth, that vnto his time, ſuch as loued heartily together, became ſworne brethren one to another, vpon Iolaus tombe. And therefore me thinkes it is likely, that this band was firſt called the holy band, by the ſelfe ſame reaſon that Plato calleth a louer, a diuine friend by Gods appointment. It is written alſo, that this band was neuer broken, nor ouerthrowne before the battell of CHÆRONEA. After that battell, Philip taking view of the ſlaine bodies, he ſtayed in that place where the foure hundred men of that band lay dead on the grōund, one hard by another, and all of them ſlaine and thruſt through with pikes on their breaſts,

Men louing together, fight deſperately againſt their enemies.

Hercules and Iolaus loue.

Plutarch ſaying of a louer.

whereat he wondred much: and being told him that it was the louers band, he fell a weeping for pittie, saying: Wo be to them that thinke these men did, or suffered any euill or dishoneſt thing. And to be ſhort, the misfortune of Laius, that was ſlaine by his owne brother OEdipus, was not the firſt originall cauſe of this cuſtome, that the THEBANS began to be in loue one with another, as the Poets write: but they were their firſt law-makers, who perceiuing them to be a ſtout and fierce nation on nature, they ſought euen from their youth to make them gentle and ciuill, and therefore in all their actions both of ſport and earneſt, they continually acquainted them with playing of the flute, being highly eſteemed of them in thoſe dayes. They brought in the vſe alſo to make loue in the middeſt of all their youthful ſports & exerciſes of their bodies, to frame the yong mens manners, and to bring them to a ciuill life. And therefore they had reaſon that gaue the goddeſſe Harmonia to the THEBANS, for defender and patronceſſe of their citie, who was begotten (as they ſay) between Mars and Venus. For that giueth vs to vnderſtand, that where force and warlike courage is ioyned with grace, to win and perſwade, all things by this vnion and accord are brought to a goodly, profitable, and moſt perfect gouernment. Now, to returne againe to the matter of this holy band of the THEBANS, Gorgidas deuiding it in the former rankes, and placing it all along the front of the battell of the footmen, it did not appeare what they were able to do of themſelues, for that he brought them not all into one body: ſo as thereby they might ſee what ſeruice the whole company could do being together, conſidering that it was deuided and mingled amongſt many other, that were a great deale of leſſe value then themſelues. But Pelopidas that had made good proofe of their valiantneſſe before, when they fought about him of themſelues, without others by them, at TEGYRA: would neuer after deuide nor ſeparate them one from the other, but keeping them together as one entire body that had all his members, he would alwaies begin with them to giue a charge in his moſt dangerous battels. For, as we ſee in running of coaches at games, that horſes being tied all together in a front, do runne faſter and ſtronger then they do when they are looſe, and put to it alone: and not for that they being many together do breake through the aire better, but for that the contention and enuy betweene them to outrunne one another, doth indeed ſet their hearts and ſtomackes on fire. Euen ſo he thought, that valiant men giuing one another a deſire and enuy to do well, ſhould haue the more courage, and would be of greater force, when they fought one in anothers ſight. But the LACEDÆMONIANS afterwards being at peace and league with all the other GRECIANS, proclaimed open warres againſt the THEBANS only: and king Cleombrotus went to inuade them with an army of ten thouſand footmen, and a thouſand horſemen. Whereupon the THEBANS were not only in the like danger they ſtood in before to loſe their libertie, but the LACEDÆMONIANS did openly threaten they would vtterly deſtroy them for euer: ſo that all the country of BOEOTIA ſtood in greater feare then euer they did before. And one day as Pelopidas went out of his houſe to go to the warres, his wife bringing him to the dores to take her leaue of him, weeping, ſhe prayed him heartily to looke well to himſelf. But he anſwered her again: My good wife, it is for priuate ſouldiers to be carefull of themſelues, but not for Captaines: for they muſt haue an eye to ſaue others liues. And when he came to the campe, he found the Captaines and the Lieutenants of the army, in ſundry opinions: and he was the firſt that agreed with Epaminondas opinion, who thought it beſt they ſhould giue battell to the enemies. Pelopidas at that time was neither gouernour of BOEOTIA, nor Generall of the army, but onely captaine of the holy band: notwithſtanding they had great affiance in him, and gaue him great authoritie in counſell concerning their affaires: ſuch as became a man that had made ſo good teſtimony of his naturall loue and affection to his countrey, as he had done. Now being determined in counſell that they ſhould giue the enemie battell, they all muſtered together in the valley of LEVCTRES, where he had a viſion in his dreame, that troubled him very much. In that valley there are the tombes of the daughters of one Scedaſus, which by reaſō of the place, they call the LEVCTRIDES, for that they were buried there, after they had bene defiled and rauiſhed by certaine gueſts of the SPARTANS that lay in their houſe, trauelling that way. This act being ſo horrible and wicked, the poore father of theſe defiled virgines, could neither haue iuſtice nor reuenge of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and therefore after he had banned and curſed the LACEDÆMONIANS with moſt horrible and execrable railings and curſes as might be poſſible, he killed himſelf vpon the graues of his daughters. The LACEDÆMONIANS had many ſundry oracles, prophecies, and ſignes of the gods to warne them, to take heed of the wrath of the LEVCTRIDES: howbeit euery man vnderſtood vnderstood not the signification of this prophecy, but were deceiued by the equiuocation of the name. For there was a litle towne in the country of LACONIA, standing vpon the sea side, called LEVCTRVM: and in ARCADIA also by the city of MEGALIPOLIS, there was another towne called by the same name. This misfortune chanced long before the battell of LEVCTRES: but then Pelopidas dreaming in his tent, thought he saw in a vision the daughters of Scedasus weeping about their graues, and cursing the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that he saw their father also, commanding him to sacrifise a red maiden to his daughters, if they would obtaine the victory. This commandement at the first, seemed very cruell and wicked: whereupon when he arose, he went to the Prognosticators, and Generals of the army, and told them his dreame. So, some of them said, this was no matter to be lightly passed ouer, but to be considered of, alledging many examples in the like cases. As of Menecius the sonne of Creon in old time, and of Macarea the daughter of Hercules. And yet of latter memory, the wise Pherecydes, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS slue, and whose skinne their Kings do keepe at this day, by commandement of an oracle. And Leonidas, who following a prophecy of the gods, did as it were sacrifise himselfe, for the safety of GRECE. And furthermore, the young boyes which Themistocles did sacrifise to Bacchus Omestes (to say, eating raw flesh) before the battell of SALAMINA. And all these sacrifices were acceptable to the gods, as the victories following did plainely shew. In contrary maner also King Agesilaus, coming from those very places, from whence King Agamemnon came in the time of the warres of TROIA, and going also against the same enemies, dreamed one night in the city of AVLIDE, he saw the goddesse Diana, asking him his daughter for sacrifice. But he tenderly louing her, would by no meanes performe it: and thereupon was compelled to breake off his iourny before he had executed his enterprise, and departed with small honor. Other to the contrary stood to it stourly, and said, it was not to be done. For, so cruell, abhominable, & brutish a sacrifice, could not be acceptable to any of the gods, nor to any god, better or mightier then ours: considering that they be no impressions in the aire, nor Gyants that rule the world, but the one onely mighty and eternall God, Father of gods and men. And to beleeue that either gods or demi-gods do delight in murder, or shedding of mans bloud, it is a meere mockery and folly. But admit it were so, they were no more to be regarded therein, then those that haue no power at all: for it is a manifest token of a wicked spirit, when they haue such damnable and horrible desires in them, and specially if they abide still with them. Now the Generals and heads of the army of the THEBANS being of sundry opinions, and Pelopidas being more afraid then before, by reason of their disagreement: a yong mare colt, or filly breaking by chance frō other mares, running and flinging through the campe, came to stay right against them. Then euery man began to looke vpon her, and to marke what a faire filly it was, and red coloured euery where, and what a pride she took with her selfe to heare her owne neighing. Theocritus then the soothsayer being amongst them, did behold her, and knew straight what the filly meant, and so cried out forthwith: O happy Pelopidas, loe here is the sacrifice thou lookest for, seeke no other virgine for thy sacrifice, but take this that God himselfe doth send thee. When Theocritus had said so, they took the filly, and laid her vpon the tombe of Scedasus daughters, and put garlands of flowers about her, as they handled other sacrifices: and then after the prayers made to the gods, they did sacrifice her with great ioy, and told Pelopidas vision in his dreame the night before through all the camp, and the sacrifice they had made also according to the signification therof. Moreouer when they came to ioyne battel, Epaminondas being general, drew all his army on the left hand, because he would bring the right wing of the enemies army (where they had placed the naturall SPARTANS) further from the other GRECIANS their friends and allies, that were set in the other wing of their battel: that he comming with his whole power together to giue a charge vpon Cleombrotus their King (being in a corner by himselfe) might be distressed or ouerthrowne. The enemies finding Pelopidas intent, began to change their order, and hauing men enough, meant to thrust out their right wing at length to compasse in Epaminondas. But Pelopidas in the meane time sodainely preuented them, and running in great fury with his squadron of three hundred men, he set vpon Cleombrotus before he could disorder his men to put foorth the right wing, and ioyne them together againe. And so he found the LACEDÆMONIANS not yet setled in their rankes, and brake them in this disorder, thrusting one in anothers place to put thēselues againe in order: notwithstandiag the LACEDÆMONIANS of all other men were the onely captaines and most expert souldiers in martiall discipline, as men so trained and practised, that no

ſodaine altering, of forme or order in their rankes, could either trouble or diſorder them. For they were men ſo trained, that they could turne head or ſide vpon any ſodaine occaſion offered, and could fight and order themſelues in battell euery way alike. So Epaminondas going to giue the onſet vpon them alone, with the whole force of his battell together, not tarying for others: and Pelopidas alſo with an incredible courage and readineſſe, preſenting himſelf in battell before them, did put them into ſuch a terrible feare, that they cleane forgot their skill in fighting and their wonted courage failed them. For they cowardly turned their backes, and there were moe LACEDÆMONIANS ſlaine at that day, then euer were before in any former battell. Pelopidas therefore, being neither gouernour of BOEOTIA, nor Generall of all the army, but onely captaine of the holy band: did notwithſtanding win as much honour and glorie of this victory, as Epaminondas, that was gouernour of BOEOTIA, and Generall of all the army. Indeed afterwards they were both gouernours of BOEOTIA together, when they inuaded the country of PELOPONNESVS: where they made moſt part of the cities and people rebell againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and take their part; as the ELIANS, the ARGIVES, and all ARCADIA, and the beſt part of LACONIA ſelfe: notwithſtanding it was in the heart of Winter, and in the ſhorteſt dayes of the yeare, and towards the latter end alſo of the laſt moneth of their yeares authority and rule, hauing not many dayes to continue in office, being forced to leaue their authoritie, vpon paine of death if they did refuſe, vnto other officers new choſen, the beginning of the next moneth following. Whereupon their other companions, and gouernours alſo of the country of BOEOTIA, what for feare to incurre the danger of the law, as alſo to auoid the trouble to lie in campe in the ſharpeſt of Winter: they did vrge and perſwade them to bring the army backe againe into their countrey. But Pelopidas was the firſt that yeelded to Epaminondas opinion, and wanne the other THEBANS alſo to conſent vnto it, to be contented to be led by them, to giue aſſault to the city ſelfe of SPARTA. So, through their perſwaſion they paſſed ouer the riuer of EVROTAS, and tooke many litle townes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and waſted and deſtroyed al the countrey to the ſea ſide, leading vnder their enſignes an army of threeſcore & ten thouſand fighting men, and all GRECIANS, the THEBANS not making vp the twelfth part of them, Now, the honour and great reputation of theſe two perſons, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, brought their friends and confederates, that they followed them, without any reſolution of counſell or publike order, and neuer opened their mouthes againſt them, but willingly marched vnder their conduction. And in my opinion, truly me thinkes it is the firſt and chiefeſt point in the law of nature, that he that is weake, not able to defend himſelfe, ſhould leane to one that is ſtrong, and able to defend both. Euen much like to freſh-water ſouldiers, and raw ſea-men, that lying at ſea in calme weather, and in ſafe harbour, are as luſtie and bragge with the maſters and boateſwaines as may be: but let a little ſtorme of weather come vpon them ſuddenly, and that they be in any danger, then they looke on the maſters, hoping for no life but at their hands. And euen in like manner the ELIANS and ARGIVES, who though in all aſſemblies of councell they would euer iarre and ſtriue with the THEBANS, for honour and ſuperiority in the armie: yet when any battell came to be fought, wherein they ſaw there was danger, then their peacockes brauery was gone, and they were glad to obey their Generals commandement. In this iourney they brought all the cities of the prouince of ARCADIA to be in league with them, and tooke all the countrey of MESSENIA from the LACEDÆMONIANS, which they peaceably enioyed: and called home againe all the ancient inhabitants of the ſame; and reſtored them to their country, and repleniſhed the citie of ITHOME. Then returning afterwards into their countrey by the city of CENCHREES, they ouerthrew the ATHENIANS that came to trouble them, in entring into the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, ſuppoſing to haue ſtopped their paſſage. Thus was the valiantneſſe of theſe two worthie men greatly commended and honoured of euery body, for ſo many notable exploits and victories as they had wonne, and their maruellous good ſucceſſe, greatly wondered at. But as their glorie and renowne increaſed abroade, ſo did their country mens malice and enuie increaſe againſt them at home: who had prepared ſuch a welcome home for them, as was ſo bad and vile for ſo honourable ſeruice as they had done. For Epaminondas and Pelopidas both at their returne, were accuſed of treaſon. For there was a ſpeciall law at THEBES, that commanded all ſuch as ſhould happen to be gouernours of BOEOTIA, to reſigne their office immediatly to the new officers elect, at the beginning of the firſt moneth of the yeare, which in BOEOTIA they call BOVCATION: and they had kept it foure whole moneths moneths aboue their terme appointed, in which time they had done all that we haue ſpoken of before, as well in the prouince of MESSENIA and of ARCADIA, as alſo in the countrey of LACONIA. Pelopidas was the firſt of the two that was called in by proceſſe, therfore he ſtood in the greater danger: howbeit in the end, they were both diſcharged againe. As for Epaminondas, he tooke his accuſation and the attempt of his enemies (whereby they ſought to haue caſt them both away) quietly enough: iudging, that patience to thoſe that deale in ſtate and gouernement, is a great ſhew of force and magnanimitie. But Pelopidas being of a hotter nature, and more cholericke, and ſet on beſides by ſome of his friends, did take this occaſion to be reuenged. Meneclidas the orator was one of thoſe that came into Charons houſe with Pelopidas and Melon: but notwithſtanding the THEBANS did nothing honour him, as they did the reſt. He taking this ill at their hands, being maruellous eloquent of ſpeech, but viciouſly giuen otherwayes, and a man of a vile and miſchieuous nature: did fondly abuſe his eloquence, falſly accuſing thoſe that were his betters, in honeſty and credite. And not being contented with this firſt accuſation, he practiſed ſo commonly, that he put Epaminondas one yeare from being gouernour of BOEOTIA, which he ſued for: and moreouer, he was euer againſt him in all matters of ſtate he tooke in hand. But he could neuer bring Pelopidas out of fauour with the people: and therefore he ſought to make debate betwixt him and Charon. For it is the common tricke of all ſpitefull perſons, who when they cannot be thought ſo honeſt men, as thoſe whom they enuy, to go about to prooue that they are not ſo honeſt and meete men, as thoſe whom they preferre and commend. So, in all his orations he made to the people, he continually extolled and commended Charons noble acts & victories, and ſpecially that victory aboue other, which the THEBANS wonne before the iourney of LEVCTRES, in a skirmiſh of horſemen, that was before the city of PLATEES, he hauing charge of the ſame: of the which he would leaue his memorie. Androclides a CYZICENIAN and painter, was at a priſe with the THEBANS to paint them ſome other battell in a table, & he did draw this worke in the city ſelfe of THEBES: but as he was in hand withall, the rebellion of the THEBANS fell out againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and warre followed on the necke of that, whereupon the painter forſooke THEBES, leauing his worke in a manner done and perfect. The THEBANS kept this table by them, and this Meneclidas moued the people they would hang it vp in ſome temple of publike place with an inſcription vpon it, ſaying thus: This was Charons victory: of purpoſe to deface and obſcure the glorie of Pelopidas and of Epaminondas. Too vaine and fond was his ambition, to ſet before ſo many noble battels and victories, one ſimple ouerthrow of Charon, in the which Gerandas, one of the meaneſt gentlemen of all SPARTA was ſlaine, and forty other with him: and this was all he did. Pelopidas miſliked Meneclidas motion, maintaining that it was directly againſt the lawes of THEBES, which did expreſly forbid that no priuate perſon ſhould be honoured with the title of common victorie, but willed the glorie therof ſhould be attributed to all the people generally. Indeed Pelopidas in his orations did greatly praiſe and commend Charon, notwithſtanding he made open proofe, how Meneclidas was an enuious and ſpitefull detractour, and a naughtie wicked man, oftentimes asking the THEBANES, if they themſelues were worthy of no honour? ſo as in the end he cauſed Meneclidas to be condemned in a great ſumme of money. But he finding himſelfe vnable to pay it, being ſo great a ſumme, practiſed afterwards to alter the whole ſtate and gouernement. I thought good to dilate this at large, becauſe me thinkes it doth ſomewhat declare Pelopidas nature & manners, what they were. Now about that time Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, was at open wars with many people of THESSALY, and did vſe all policie he could, to bring them all to his obedience. Whereupon the free cities ſent their Ambaſſadours vnto THEBES, to pray them to ſend them a captaine with an armie to aide them. Then Pelopidas ſeeing Epaminondas occupied about the warres of PELOPONNESVS, did offer himſelfe to the THESSALIAN Ambaſſadours, being loth to drowne his experience and ſufficiencie in warres, with vnprofitable and tedious idleneſſe, knowing that in thoſe parts where Epaminondas lay, there needed no other captaine. Now when he came with his army into THESSALY, the citie of LARISSA yeelded preſently vnto him: where the tyrant Alexander came to meete with him, and to pray him to treate a peace betwixt him and the THESSALIANS. Pelopidas attempted to bring it to paſſe, ſeeking in ſteed of a tyrant to make him a gentle, iuſt, and lawfull gouernour of THESSALY. But when he ſaw no perſwaſions could take place with the tyrant, and that he grew more ſtubburne and vntractable, and would not heare reaſon: and more-

ouer, that he heard many grieuous complaints of his great cruelties, and how they accuſed him to be a maruellous diſſolute and vnruly perſon in all his doings, and extreamely couetous beſides: then he began to ſpeake roundly to him, and to handle him roughly. But the tyrant thereupon ſtole away ſecretly from him, and fled with his guard & ſouldiers about him. So Pelopidas leauing the THESSALIANS out of all feare and danger of the tyrant, and furthermore in good peace and amitie one with the other, he went into MACEDON: where Ptolomie made warre at that time with Alexander, being king of MACEDON, they both hauing ſent for him to heare and determine the quarrell betwixt them, & alſo to help him that had the right, againſt him that did the wrong. So when he came thither, he pacified them both, and reſtored the baniſhed men of either ſide, to their lands and goods againe. For aſſurance of peace, he tooke the kings brother in hoſtage, whoſe name was Philip, and thirtie other children of the nobleſt mens ſonnes of MACEDON, whom he brought away with him to THEBES, to let the GRECIANS ſee, that the reputation of the THEBANS power ſtretched farre and the renowne alſo of their maner of gouernement and iuſtice. It is the ſame Philip, that made warre afterwards with the GRECIANS, to take their liberty from them, howbeit being but a boy at that time, he was brought vp at THEBES in Pammenes houſe. And this is the cauſe, why ſome thought Philip did follow Epaminondas manner: and it might be peraduenture, he did learne of him to be quicke and ready in the warres, which was indeed but a peece of Epaminondas vertue. But as for the continencie, iuſtice, magnanimitie, and clemency, which were the ſpeciall points that made Epaminondas of great fame: Philip could neither by nature, education, or ſtudy euer attaine vnto. The THESSALIANS hauing ſent afterwards to THEBES, to complaine of Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, that did againe moleſt and trouble the free cities of THESSALY, Pelopidas was ſent thither Ambaſſador with Iſmenias, carying no power with him from THEBES, litle thinking he ſhould haue needed to haue made warre: wherupon he was compelled to take men of the country ſelf, vpon the inſtant neceſſitie offered. At the very ſame time alſo, all MACEDON was vp in armes: for Ptolomy had ſlain the King, and vſurped the kingdome, and the ſeruants and friends of the dead king called vpon Pelopidas for aid, who deſiring to come euen vpon the fact, and hauing brought no men of warre out of his owne countrey with him, did preſently leuy certaine men where he was, and ſo marched forward with them againſt Ptolomy. Now Ptolomy when both their powers met, did corrupt the ſouldiers Pelopidas had brought, with money to take his part. But notwithſtanding this policie he had practiſed, yet he was afraid of the name onely, and greatneſſe of Pelopidas reputation: wherefore he went vnto Pelopidas, as to a better man then himſelfe, and making maruellous much of him, and intreating of him, he made promiſe, and bound it by oath, that he would keepe the Realme for the brethren of the dead King, and that he would take all thoſe for his friends or enemies, whom the THEBANS did either loue or hate. And for aſſurance of his promiſe, he gaue him his ſon Philoxenus in hoſtage, and fiftie other of his friends, all the which Pelopidas ſent vnto THEBES. But in the meane time, being maruellouſly offended with the treaſon of the ſouldiers againſt him, vnderſtanding the moſt part of their goods: their wiues, & children, were in the city of PHARSALE, he thought if he could win that, it were a maruellous good way for him to be reuenged of the treachery of the ſouldiers againſt him: whereupon he leauied certaine THESSALIANS, and went to that city. Pelopidas was no ſooner come thither, but Alexander the tyrant arriued alſo with his army. Pelopidas ſuppoſing he had come to iuſtifie himſelfe, clearing the complaints of the THESSALIANS made againſt him: went to him, though he knew him to be a very wicked man, and one that delighted in murther and ſhedding of bloud. Neuertheleſſe, he hoped he durſt not haue attempted any thing againſt him, for the authority and ſeigniories ſake of THEBES, by whom he was ſent thither, as alſo for his owne reputation. But the tyrant ſeeing him ſlenderly accompanied, and without traine of ſouldiers, took him priſoner, and wan the city of PHARSALE at that preſent time. But this act of his put his ſubiects in a great feare, who ſeeing him commit ſo ſhamefull a deed againſt all equity, did thinke ſtraight he meant to ſpare no man, but would vſe men, and all things elſe that came in his hands, like a deſperate man, and one that reckoned himſelfe caſt away. But when the THEBANES vnderſtood this newes, they were maruellous ſory, and ſtraight ſent an army thither, appointing other captaines then Epaminondas: becauſe then they had ſome miſliking of him. Alexander the tyrant hauing brought Pelopidas in the meane time to PHERES, did ſuffer any man that would at the firſt to come to ſee him, and ſpeak with him: ſuppoſing his impriſonment had killed his heart, & had made him very humble.

Philip of Macedon, deliuered for hoſtage to Pelopidas

Pelopidas taken priſoner by the tyrant Alexander at Pharſale.

But

But when he was told the contrary, how Pelopidas did comfort the citizens of PHERES, and willed them to be of good cheare, telling them the houre was now come that the tyrant should smart for all the mischiefes he had done: and that he sent him word to his face, he had no reason to hang and put his poore citizens daily to death as he did, with sundry kinds of cruell torments, who had in nothing offended him; and did let him alone, knowing that if euer he got out of his hands, he would be reuenged of him. The tyrant wondring at this great stomacke of his, and at his maruellous constancy fearing nothing: asked what he meant to long for hastie death? Pelopidas being told what he said, answered him againe: Marie, said he, because thou shouldest die the sooner, being more odious to the gods and men, then yet thou art. After this answer, the tyrant would neuer suffer any man to come and speake with him againe. But Thebe, that was the daughter of the tyrant Iason deceassed, and wife at that time of Alexander the tyrant, hearing report of Pelopidas noble mind and courage by his keepers: she had a maruellous desire to see him, and to speake with him. But when she came to see him, like a woman she could not at the first discerne the greatnesse of his noble heart, and excellent hidden vertue, finding him in such misery: yet coniecturing by exteriour shew, noting his simple apparell, his haires and beard growne very long, and how poorely he was serued, and worse entertained: she thought with her selfe his case was to be pitied, and that he was in no state meete for the glory of his name; wherewith she fell a weeping for compassion. Pelopidas that knew not what she was, beganne to muse at the first; but when it was told him she was Iasons daughter, then he courteously saluted her for her father Iasons sake, who while he liued was his very good friend. So Thebe said vnto him: my Lord Pelopidas, I pitie thy poore ladie and wife. Truly so do I pitie thee, quoth Pelopidas againe to her: that thou being no prisoner, canst abide such a wicked Alexander. This answer tickled Thebe at the heart, who with great impatience did beare the cruelty, violence, & villanie of the tyrant her husband: that besides all other infamous acts of his detestable life, committed Sodomie with her yongest brother. So she oft visiting Pelopidas, and boldly making her moane to him, telling him closely all the iniuries her husband offered her: through Pelopidas talke with her, by litle and litle she grew to abhorre him, and to conceiue a hate in heart against him, desiring reuenge on him. But now the captains of the THEBANES that were sent to deliuer Pelopidas, being entred into THESSALY with their army: whether it was through default of ignorance, or their mishappe) they returned home with shame, and did nothing. Whereupon the THEBANES at their returne home condemned them euery man in the summe of ten thousand Drachmes, and sent Epaminondas thither againe with another armie: at whose coming, all THESSALY rose incontinently, for the reputation of so great a captaine. And his fortune was so good, that he had in a manner vtterly ouerthrowne the whole state of the tyrant: his friends and captaines were so much afraid, and his subiects on the other side so well disposed to rebell, & maruellous glad for the hope they had, quickely to see the tyrant haue his deserued hire, for all his former wicked deedes he had committed. Notwithstanding, Epaminondas preferring the deliuerie and safetie of Pelopidas, before the consideration of his owne honour and glory, and fearing lest Alexander seeing himselfe in danger to be turned out of all he had, falling into despaire like a bedlem beast, would bend all his desperation and furie against Pelopidas: he drew these warres out in length, compassing him round about, but not fiercely setting vpon him, with colour to prepare his way the better by delaying still, thereby to soften the cruell mind of this tyrant, going on in this gentle sort; and partly to cut his combe and extreme pride, but specially to preserue Pelopidas from the danger and crueltie of his beastly rage. For he knew right well he was a cruell man, and one that neuer regarded reason, nor iustice in any sort, considering how he made some men to be buried aliue, and others to be put in the skinnes of beares & wild bores, and then to set hounds vpon them to teare them in peeces, or else himselfe for his pastime would kill them, with shooting or throwing of darts at them. And in the cities of MELIBEA and of SCOTVSA, both of them being in league and friendship with him, he spying time one day when the citizens were assembled in councell together, sodainly compassed them in with his guard and souldiers, and put them euery one to the sword, euen the litle children. And he consecrated the dart also wherewith he had slaine his owne vnkle Polyphron, and hauing put garlands vpon it, he did sacrifise to it, as to a god, and called it Tychon, as one would say, happy killer. And another time being in a Theater, where the Tragedie of Troades in Euripides was played, he went out of the Theater, and sent word to the players notwithstanding, that they should go on with their play, as if he had bene ſtill among them: ſaying that he came not away for any miſliking he had of them or of the play, but becauſe he was aſhamed his people ſhould ſee him weepe, to ſee the miſeries of Hecuba and Andromacha played; and that they neuer ſaw him pitie the death of any one man, of ſo many of the citizens as he had cauſed to be ſlaine. The guilty conſcience therefore of this cruel and heathen tyrant, did make him tremble at the onely name and reputation of Epaminondas: and as the common prouerbe ſaith:

Which doth refuſe the pit prepar'd, and liſt not bide the ſhocke,

So he ſent ſtraight vnto Epaminondas to excuſe himſelfe. But Epaminondas would in no wiſe ſuffer the THEBANS, through his meanes, to make league with ſuch an helhound: onely he yeelded to abſtinence of armes for thirty dayes, vpon delinerie of Pelopidas and Iſmenias into his hands, with whom he ſtraight returned into THEBES. Now the THEBANS being aduertiſed that the LACEDÆMONIANS and the ATHENIANS, did ſend Ambaſſadors to Artaxerxes the mighty king of PERSIA, to make league with him: they ſent to him Pelopidas for them alſo, being wiſely conſidered of them to ſend a man of ſuch fame and reputation. For Pelopidas paſſing firſt through coũtries ſubiect to the king of PERSIA, his fame was ſuch where he came, that the peoples talke was onely of him. For the report of the famous battels he had won of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was not only caried into the next regions and countries of ASIA: but ſince the firſt newes of the iourney of LEVCTRES was brought thither, Pelopidas hauing after that wonne victory vpon victory, his eſtimation grew ſo great, as it was blowne abroad through the world, euen to the higheſt and furtheſt parts of the Eaſt countries. And when he came to the king of PERSIAES court, the Princes, great Lords, and Captaines of PERSIA that ſaw him, had him in great admiration, ſaying: Lo this is he that conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS, and tooke all their ſeignorie and authoritie from them, both by ſea and by land, and draue the SPARTANS beyond the riuer of EVROTAS, and from mount TAVGETVM, who not long before made warres with the great king of PERSIA being led vnder their king Ageſilaus, euen in the middeſt of ASIA, for the realmes of SVSE, and of ECBATANE. So king Artaxerxes ſelfe was very glad of his coming, and praiſed him aboue them all, and made his eſtimation greater then it was before, by his great and honourable entertaining of him, meaning thereby to returne the honour to himſelfe againe: becauſe men ſhould thinke that the moſt famous men of the world came to honour him, and to ſee his Court, as eſteeming both him and his greatneſſe, the onely happineſſe of the world. But when he had ſeene his face, and heard him ſpeake, & perceiued that his words were much greater then the ATHENIANS, and playner then the LACEDÆMONIANS: he then was futher in loue with him then before, and without diſguiſing, he did honour and fauor him aboue all the other Ambaſſadours, who found that he made more eſtimation of him, then of them all. Notwithſtanding, he ſeemed to beare greater goodwill vnto Antalcidas LACEDÆMONIAN, then to any other of the GRECIANS: for that one day being at the table he tooke a garland of flowres from his own head, and waſhed it in perfuming water, and ſent it vnto him. Indeed he did not vſe Pelopidas with that open familiaritie, yet did he ſend him the goodlieſt and richeſt preſents he could deuiſe, and granted him beſides all his requeſts he made vnto him: which were, that all the people of GRECE ſhould be free: that the citie and country of MESSINA ſhould be inhabited againe: and that the citizens of THEBES by their ſucceſſours ſhould be taken, as ancient friends and allies of the kings of PERSIA. So when he had receiued theſe anſwers, he returned home againe, and would by no meanes accept any of the great preſents the king had offered him: which cauſed the other ambaſſadours of the GRECIANS to be ſo ill welcome home to their cities. For among other, Timagoras was accuſed to the ATHENIANS, and condemned to die, and was executed: which if they did in reſpect of the great preſents he had taken of the king, truly they had reaſon, and it was worthily done of them. For he tooke not only gold and ſiluer enough, as much as they would giue him: but receiued a very rich bed alſo, and PERSIAN chamberlaines to make and dreſſe it vp, as if no GRECIAN ſeruants of his could haue ſerued that turne. Moreouer, he receiued foureſcore milch kine to the paile, and neateheardes to keepe them, hauing neede of cowes milke belike, to heale a diſeaſe that fell vpon him: & would needs be caried in a litter vpon mens armes from the kings Court, vnto the Mediterraneum ſea, the king rewarded them for their paines that caried him, with foure talents. Yet it ſeemeth the gifts he tooke did not offend the ATHENIANS ſo much, conſidering that Epicrates (a drudge or

The people laughed to heare him, but yet were they very angry the THEBANS had obtained all that they had demanded: and conſidering that Pelopidas eſtimation and worthines did more preuaile and take better effect, then all the orations the other could make, & ſpecially to a prince that ſought alwaies to entertaine thoſe GRECIANS, which were of greateſt force and power in the warres. This ambaſſage did greatly increaſe euery mans loue and goodwill vnto Pelopidas, becauſe of the repleniſhing again of MESSINA with inhabitants, and infranchiſing and ſetting at liberty of all the other GRECIANS. But the tyrant Alexander of PHERES, returning again to his old accuſtomed cruelty, and hauing deſtroyed many cities of THESSALY & placed his garriſons through all the country of the PHTHIOTES, ACHAIANS, & MAGNESIANS: the cities being aduertiſed of Pelopidas returne againe to THEBES, they ſent ambaſſadours immediatly to THEBES, to pray them to ſend them an army, and namely, Pelopidas for captaine, to deliuer them from the miſerable bondage of the tyrant. The THEBANES willingly granted them, and put all things in readineſſe very ſodainely. But Pelopidas being ready to ſet forward in his iourney, there fell a ſudaine eclypſe of the Sunne, ſo as at noone day it was very darke in THEBES. Pelopidas ſeeing euery man afraid of this eclypſe aboue, he would not compel the people to depart with this feare, nor with ſo ill hope to hazard the loſſe of ſeuen thouſand THEBANS, being all billed to go this iourney: but notwithſtanding, he put himſelfe alone into the THESSALIANS hands, with three hundred horſemen of ſtrangers that were glad to ſerue with him, with whom he took his iourny againſt the ſouthſayers minds, & againſt the goodwill of all his citizens, who thought this eclypſe did threaten the death of ſome great perſon like himſelfe. But Pelopidas though he needed no ſpurre to be reuenged vpon the tyrant Alexander, being by nature hot, and deſirous of himſelfe to reuenge the ſpite and villany he had offered him: yet he had a further hope to find the tyrants houſe deuided againſt himſelf, by the former talke he had with his wife Thebe, in time of his impriſonment there. Neuertheleſſe, the fame and reputation of the iourney vndertaken, did wonderfully increaſe his noble courage, and the rather becauſe he was deſirous (all he could) the GRECIANS ſhould ſee, that at the very ſame time when the LACEDÆMONIANS did ſend gouernors and captaines to Dionyſius the tyrant of SICILE, to ſerue and aide him, and that the ATHENIANS as hirelings tooke pay of the tyrant Alexander of PHERES, in whoſe honour they had ſet vp a ſtatue of braſſe in their city, as vnto their ſauiour: the THEBANS onely at the ſelfe-ſame time tooke armes againſt them, to deliuer thoſe whom the tyrants oppreſſed, and ſought to roote out all tyrannicall gouernment ouer the GRECIANS. So when he came to the city of PHARSALE, and had gathered his army together, he went preſently to the field to meet with the tyrant. Alexander perceiuing Pelopidas had very few THEBANS about him, and that he had twiſe ſo many THESSALIANS with him, then the other had: he went vnto the temple of THETIS, to meet with Pelopidas. There one telling Pelopidas, that Alexander was coming againſt him with a great power, Pelopidas anſwered him ſtraight, All the better we ſhall kill the more. Now in the midſt of the valley, there are certaine round hills of a pretie height, which they commonly call the dogs heads: they both ſtriued which of their footemen ſhould firſt get thoſe hils. Pelopidas hauing a great number of horſmen, and good men at armes in the field, ſent them before to giue charge vpon the enemies, that preſſed to winne the vantage of the place: and hauing ouerthrowne them, they followed the chaſe all the valley ouer. But in the meane time Alexander hauing his footemen by, marched forwards & got the hils, becauſe the THESSALIANS that were further off came too late: notwithſtanding when they came to the hils, they ſought forcibly to clime them vp, being very high and ſteepe: but Alexander coming downe the hill, gaue charge vpon them to their diſaduantage, and ſlue the firſt that gaue the attempt to get vp againſt the hill: and the reſidue being ſore hurt, retired againe without their purpoſe. Pelopidas ſeeing that, ſounded the retraite for the horſemen that followed the chaſe, to repaire to the ſtandard, and commanded them they ſhould ſet vpon the footemen of the enemies that were in battell ray: and he himſelfe ran to helpe thoſe that fought to win the hilles. So he tooke his target on his arme, and paſſing through the rereward, he got to the foremoſt rankes: to whom, the ſight of his perſon did ſo redouble their force and courage, that the enemies themselues thought it had bene a fresh supply of new mens hearts & other bodies then theirs with whom they had fought before, that came thus lustily to set againe vpon them. And yet they did abide two or three onsets. Howbeit in the end, perceiuing those men did still more fiercely force to get vp the hill, and moreouer how their horsemen were come in from the chase: they gaue way, and left them the place, retyring backe by litle and litle. Then Pelopidas hauing won the hils, stayed on the top of them, viewing the army of his enemies, which were not yet returned from their flying, but waued vp and downe in great disorder. And there he looked all about, to see if he could spie out Alexander: and at the length he found him out amongst others, in the right wing of his battell, setting his men againe in order and incouraging of them. After he had set eye on him, it was no holding of him backe, his heart so rose against him vpon sight of him, that giuing place to wrath, he neither regarded his person, nor the intent of his iourney, but returning farre before his men, he cryed with a loud voyce to the tyrant, and challenged the combate of him. The tyrant would not abide him, nor come out to fight with him, but fled, & hid himselfe amongst his souldiers. But for his souldiers, the first that thought to set vpon Pelopidas, was slaine by him, and many left dead in the field. The residue standing stoutly to it, and close together, did passe his curaces through with their long pikes, and thrust him into the breast. The THESSALIANS seeing him thus sore handled & distressed, for pity sake came running from the toppe of those hilles, to the place where Pelopidas was, to help him. But euen as they came, he fell downe dead before them. Then did they together with their horsmen so fiercely set vpon them, that they made the whole battell of the enemies to flie: and following them in chase a great way from that place, they couered the valley with dead bodies, for they slue aboue three thousand men. It is no maruell, if the THEBANS that were at Pelopidas death, tooke it very heauily, and lamented bitterly: calling him their father, their sauiour and master, as one that had taught thē the worthiest things that might be learned of any. But the THESSALIANS, and other friends and confederates also of the city of THEBES, besides their exceeding in setting out their common proclamations and edicts in praise of his memory, and doing him all the honour that could be due to the most rare & excellent person that euer was: they did yet more shew their loue and affection towards him, by their passing great sorow & mourning they made for him. For it is said, that they that were at the battell, did not put off their armour, nor vnbridle their horses, nor would dresse their wounds, hearing tell of his death, before they went first & saw his body not yet cold with fighting, laying great heaps of the enemies spoiles about it, as if he could haue told what they had done; nor before they had clipped off their own haires, and the haire of their horses, in token of sorrow. And many of them also, when they were come into their tents and pauilions, wold neither haue fire, eate, nor drinke: and all in the campe were full of sorow and mourning, as if they had not won a notable victory, but had bene ouerthrown and made subiect by the tyrant. Afterwards when the newes of his death was spread throughal the countrey, the Magistrates of euery citie through which Pelopidas bodie was conueyed, went to receiue it very honourably, accompanied with all the yong men, the Priests and children carying tokens and crownes of triumph, and other ornaments of gold; and when his funerall day was come, and that his bodie should be caried to be buried, the oldest and the noblest persons of the THESSALIANS went vnto the THEBANS, and prayed them that they might haue the burying of him: and one among them being the mouth of the rest, spake in this manner to the THEBANS. My Lords of THEBES, our good beloued friends and confederates, we only craue this good turne at your hands, wherein you shall much honour vs, and in our great calamity somewhat also comfort vs. For we shal neuer more accompany Pelopidas aliue, nor requite his honorable deserts to vs, that he shall euer know them. But if it please you to let vs handle his body with our hands, and that we may bury him, and set forth his obsequies, we will imagine then at ŷ least that you do think that, which we our selues do certainly beleeue: That we THESSALIANS not you THEBANS, haue receiued the greater losse of both. For you haue lost indeed a worthy Captaine, and we haue not onely receiued the like losse with you, but the hope also of recouering of our libertie. For how dare we againe send to you for another Captaine, when we cannot redeliuer you Pelopidas? The THEBANS hearing their petition, granted their desire: and in mine opinion, no funerals could be done with greater pompe and honour, then the THESSALIANS performed his, being men that recken not dignitie, magnificence, and pompe, to consist in ornaments of Iuorie, nor of purple: as Philistus doth set it out, who praiseth

to the moone the burying of Dionyſius the tyrant of SYRACVSA, which was the end of his tyranny, as a ſumptuous concluſion of a ſtately tragedy. And Alexander the Great, at the death of Epheſtion, did not onely clippe his horſe haires and mules, but plucked downe alſo the battelments of the walles of the citie: becauſe it ſhould appeare, that the very walls themſelues did mourne for his death, ſhewing that deformity in ſtead of their former beauty. But all ſuch things are done onely by force and compulſion, vpon the Lords commandements, which do but raiſe vp enuy againſt their memory for whom they are done, and hatred of them that are againſt their wils conſtrained to do the thing they miſliked: and are no iuſt proofes of honour nor goodwill, but rather vaine ſhewes of barbarous pompe and pride in him, that diſpoſeth his authority and plenty of goods, in trifling toyes not to be deſired. Where contrariwiſe it plainely appeareth, that a priuate man dying in a forraine countrey, by reaſon ſhould be accounted moſt happy of al other creatures, that hauing neither his wife, kinne, nor his children by him, he ſhould be conueyed to his funerals, accompanied with ſuch multitudes of crowned people and number of cities, enuying one another, who ſhould moſt honour the funerals, as being vnrequeſted, and leaſt of all compelled. For ſaith Eſope, the death of a happy man is not grieuous, but moſt bleſſed, ſeeing it bringeth all good mens doings to happineſſe, and leaueth fortune to her fickle change, and ſporting pleaſure. But in my iudgement a LACEDÆMONIAN ſpake better, when he ſaid to Diagoras an old man, that had himſelfe in old time gotten victory in the games Olympicall, and had ſeene beſides his own children, and his childrens children (both ſonnes and daughters) crowned with victories alſo in the ſelfe ſame games: O Diagoras, die preſently, elſe thou ſhalt neuer come to heauen. But theſe victories of the Olympicall and Pythian games, whoſoeuer ſhould put thē all together, are not to be compared with one of the battels only, that Pelopidas hath fought and won: hauing ſpent the moſt part of his time in great calling and dignity, and laſtly ended the ſame, being gouernour of BOEOTIA the third time (which was the higheſt office of ſtate in all his countrey) when he had deſtroyed the tyrants that kept the THEBANS in bondage, and was alſo ſlaine himſelf, valiantly fighting for the recouerie of the THESSALIANS liberty. But as Pelopidas death was grieuous to the THEBANS friends and confederates: ſo fell it out very profitable for them. For the THEBANS hearing of Pelopidas death, did not delay reuenge, but ſent an army forthwith of ſeuen thouſand footmen, and ſeuen hundred horſemen, vnder the conduct of Malcitas and of Diagiton. They finding Alexanders army ouerthrowne, and that he had loſt the moſt part of his ſtrength, did compell him to giue vp the THESSALIANS townes he kept by force againſt them, & to ſet the MAGNETIANS, the PHTHIOTES, and the ACHAIANS at liberty, withdrawing his garriſons he had placed in their ſtrong holds: and therewithall to ſweare, that from thenceforth he would march vnder the THEBANS, againſt any enemy they ſhould leade him, or command him to go againſt. So the THEBANS were pacified vpon theſe conditions. Now will I tell you how the gods plagued him ſoone after for Pelopidas death, who (as we haue told you before) had pretily inſtructed Thebe his wife, that ſhe ſhould not feare the outward appearance nor power of his tyranny, although ſhe were enuironed with ſouldiers of baniſhed men, whom the tyrant entertained to guard his perſon. Her ſelfe on the other ſide, fearing his falſhood, as alſo hating his crueltie, conſpired her husbands death with her three brethren, Tiſiphonus, Pytholaus, and Lycophron, and executed her conſpiracie after this ſort. The tyrants pallace where he lay, was ſtraightly guarded euery where with ſoldiers, who nightly watched his perſon: but their bed chamber which they commonly vſed to lye in, was in the toppe of all his pallace, where they kept a dog tyed at the chamber doore to giue warning, which was a terrible dog, and knew none but the tyrant and his wife, and his keeper that gaue him meate. Now when Thebe purpoſed to worke her feate, ſhe locked vp her three brethren a whole day neare vnto their bed chamber. So when night was come, and being bed time, ſhe went her ſelfe alone according to her manner, into Alexanders chamber: and finding him aſleepe, ſhe ſtole out ſtraight again, and bade the keeper of the dogge to carie the dogge away, for her husband was diſpoſed to take reſt, and would haue no noiſe. There was no way to get vp to this chamber but by a ladder, which ſhe let downe: and fearing leſt her brethren ſhould make a noiſe, ſhe had couered the ladder ſtaues with wooll before ſhe let it fall downe. When ſhe had gotten them vp with their ſwords, and had ſet them before the doore, ſhe went firſt her ſelfe into the chamber, and tooke away the tyrants ſword that hung at his beds head, and ſhewed it them as a token giuen them that he was aſleepe. When it came to the pinch to do the deede, theſe young men were afraid, and their hearts began to faile them. But ſhe tooke on with them, and called them cowardly boyes, that would not ſtand to it when it came to the point, and withall, ſware in her rage that ſhe would go wake the tyrant, and open all the treaſon to him. So partly for ſhame, and partly for feare, ſhe compelled them to come in, and to ſtep to the bed, her ſelfe holding a lampe to light them. Then one of them tooke him by the feete, and bound them hard: another caught him by the haire of his head, and pulled him backward: & the third thruſt him through with his ſword. So by chance he died ſooner then he ſhould haue done, and otherwiſe then his wicked life deſerued, for the manner of his death. So Alexander was the firſt tyrant that was euer ſlain by the treaſon of his wife, whoſe body was moſt villanouſly and deſpitefully vſed after his death. For when the townes men of PHERES had drawne him through the city in the mire and dirt, they caſt him out at length to the dogges to deuour.

THE LIFE OF Marcellus.

Marcellus kindred.

Marcellus Arcus Claudius that was fiue times Conſull at ROME, was the ſonne (as they ſay) of another Marcus: and as Poſidonius writeth, he was the firſt of his houſe ſurnamed Marcellus, as who would ſay, a martiall and warlike man by nature. For he was cunning at weapons, skilfull in warres, ſtrong and luſty of body, hardy, and naturally giuen to fight. Yet was he no quarreller, nor ſhewed his great courage, but in wars againſt the enemie: otherwiſe he was very gentle, and faire conditioned. He loued learning, and delighted in the Greeke tongue, and much eſteemed them that could ſpeake it. For he himſelfe was ſo troubled in matters of ſtate, that he could not ſtudy and follow it, as he deſired to haue done. For if God (as Homer ſaith) did euer make men.

Marcellus conditions.

To vſe their youth in warres, and battels fierce and fell,
Till crooked age came creeping on, ſuch feates for to expell:

The Romaines troubled with warr.

They were the nobleſt and chiefeſt men of ROME at that time. For in their youth, they fought with the CARTHAGINIANS in SICILE: in their middle age, againſt the GAVLES, to keepe them from the winning of all ITALIE: and againe in their old age, againſt Hannibal and the CARTHAGINIANS. For their age was no priuiledge for them to be diſpenced with, in the ſeruice of their warres, as it was elſe for common citizens: but they were both for their nobilitie, as alſo for

for their valiantnes and experience in wars, driuen to take charge of the armies deliuered them by the Senate and people. Now for Marcellus, there was no battel could make him giue ground being practised in all fights: but yet he was more valiant in priuate combate man for man, then in any other fight. Therefore he neuer refused enemie that did challenge him, but slue all those in the field that called him to combat. In SICILE he saued his brother Octacilius life, being ouerthrowne in a skirmish: for with his shield he couered his brothers body, and slue them that came to kill him. These valiant parts of him, being but a young man, were rewarded by the Generals vnder whom he serued, with many crownes, & warlike honours, vsually bestowed vpon valiant soldiers. Marcellus increasing still his valiantnesse and good seruice, was by the people chosen Ædilis, as of the number of those that were the worthiest men, and most honorable: and the Priests did create him Augure, which is a kinde of Priesthood at ROME, having authority by law, to consider and obserue the flying of birds, to diuine and prognosticate things thereupon. But in the yeare of his office of Ædile, he was forced against his will to accuse Capitolinus, his brother in office with him. For he being a rash & dissolute man of life, fell in dishonest loue with his collegues sonne Marcellus, that bare his owne name: who being a goodly young gentleman and newly come to mans state, was as well thought of, and taken of euery man for his manhood and good qualities, as any way for his beauty and personage. The first time Capitolinus moued this dishonesty to him, he did of himselfe repulse his shamelesse offer, without any other priuity: but when he saw he came againe to tempt him the second time, he straight reuealed it to his father. Marcellus his father being maruellously offended withall, (as he had good cause) went & accused Capitolinus before the Senate. Capitolinus at the first, laid in many exceptions and fained excuses, to keepe him from appearing, and in the end he appealed to the Tribunes of the people: but they declared plainely they would not receiue his appeale, nor take any knowledge of the matter. At the length he was forced to answer the matter before the Senate, & denied flatly that he attépted euer any such thing, because there were no witnesses to proue it against him. Whereupon the Senate thought good to send for young Marcellus, who comming before them, both blushed and wept together. The Senate seeing shamefastnesse in him, mingled with teares, and a malice that could not be pacified; without seeking other proofe, they took it a cleare case, and so condemned Capitolinus presently in a great summe of mony, which Marcellus conuerted into siluer vessel, to serue at sacrifices, & so did consecrate them to the seruice of the gods. Now when the ROMAINES had ended their first warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, which held them fully the space of two & twenty yeares: immediatly after that, they began a new war against the GAVLES. For the INSVBRIANS, being a people deriued from the GAVLES, and dwelling at the foot of the mountaines of the ALPES on ITALY side, being able to make a good power of themselues, did notwithstanding pray aide of the other GAVLES inhabiting on the other side of the mountaines: and they caused the GESSATES, mercenary people and hirelings to thē that would giue pay, to bring great numbers with them. Truly me thinkes it was a maruellous matter, and wonderfull good hap for the ROMAINES, that this war of the GAVLES came not vpon them, while they were at wars with the CARTHAGINIANS: & that the GAVLES also had lien quiet all that while (as if they had purposely sworne to set vpon the conquerors) expecting still an end betweene thē, & then to set vpon the conquerors, when they had nothing to say to any other. Yet the situation of their country did trouble ỹ ROMAINS much, because they were so neare neighbors vnto them, & had wars as it were at their own doores. And so did the ancient reputation of the GAVLES somwhat appaule the ROMAINS, whō, as it should seeme, they did feare more then any other natiō whatsoeuer: because ROME had bin taken before by the GAVLES. Since which time a law was made, that Priests, & ecclesiasticall persons should be dispenced with from going to the wars, vnlesse the GAVLES did rise against thē. The preparation they made for this war at that time, did plainely shew the feare they had then of the GAVLES. For it is thought, that neuer before nor since, there were so many naturall ROMAINS assēbled together in field, as were then at that present. Moreouer, the new-come crueltie they vsed in their sacrifices, doth record this to be true. For before they neuer vsed any strange maner in their sacrifice, or barbarous fashion, but were fauourable in their opinions about the ceremonies of religiō, & agreeable to the GRECIANS touching the seruice of the gods. But then they were cōpelled to obey certain oracles and ancient prophecies they found written in Sibyls bookes: and they buried two GRECIANS aliue in the oxe market, a man and a woman, and likewise two GAVLES, a man & a woman.

Vnto them they do yet continue certaine secret anniuersaries in Nouember, that are not to be seene of euery body. The Romaines in their first battels of this warre, were often ouercome, and did ouercome: but these battels, were to litle purpose for ending of the warres. In the yeare that C. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Furius Philo were Consuls, and sent with great armies to make warre vpon the Insverians, people subiect to the state of Millane, newes were brought to Rome, there was a riuer seene in the country of Romania, red as bloud, and three moones also at the very same time in the citie of Rimini. Furthermore, the Priests and soothsayers that had obserued & considered the tokens and significations of birds on that day, when these two were chosen Consuls: they told plainly there was errour in their election, and that they were directly chosen against all signes and tokens of the birds. Therupon the Senate wrote immediatly to the camp to them, & willed them to come home to depose themselues of their Consulship, before they did attempt any thing as Consuls against the enemies. The Consull Flaminius receiued the letters in time: but because he was ready to giue battell, he would not open them, before he had first ouerthrown his enemies, and spoiled their country, as indeed he did. But when he was come back to Rome again, and had brought maruellous great spoiles with him, the people for all that would not go out to meete him, because he did not presently obey the letters they wrote vnto him, nor returned vpon it as they commanded him, but contemptuously, without any regard of their pleasure, followed his owne fantasie: whereupon they had almost flatly denied him the honour of triumph. For his triumph was no sooner ended, but they compelled him to giue ouer his Consulship, and made him a priuate man with his companion. The Romains therein were so religiously bent, as they would all things should be referred vnto the gods good grace and pleasure, and would suffer none to contemne the obseruations and prognosticating of the soothsayers, nor their ancient vses and customes, for any prosperity and felicitie that could happen. For they thought it more necessary and profitable for benefit of the common-weale, that the Senate and magistrates should reuerence the ceremonies and seruice of the gods, then that they should ouercome their enemies in battel. As for example, Tiberius Sympronius, a man as much honored and esteemed of the Romains for his iustice and valiantnesse, as any other of his time, being one yeare Consull, did nominate and elect two other for Consuls the yeare following, Scipio Nasica, and Caius Martius. These two being entred into their Consulship, and sent from Rome also to their seuerall prouinces appointed them by lot: Sempronius by chance took certain litle bookes in his hand, where were briefly written the rules appertaining to the ceremonies of publike sacrifice: and reading in them, he found a certaine ordinance he neuer heard before. And this it was: That if a magistrate were set in any tent or hired house without the city, to behold & obserue the prognostications of birds, & that vpon any sodain occasion he were driuen to come againe into the city, before the birds had giuen any certaine signes: the second time when he returned againe to end his obseruations, there was no remedy, but he must leaue his tent or first hired house, and take another, and begin new obseruations again. Tiberius vtterly ignorant of this ordinance before, had kept his obseruations twise in one self house, and had chosen there Nasica and Martius, Consuls to succeed him. But when he knew he had offended, he told the Senate of it: who would not let slip so litle a fault, but wrote to the new Consuls, and they straight left their prouinces, & returned again to Rome, willingly resigning vp their offices. That was a prety while after. Again also, about the very present time we write of now, there were two Priests of noble houses (and noble persons also) the one called Cornelius, & the other Cethegus, both which were disgraded of their Priesthood, because they had not giuen the intrails of the sacrifised beast in order as they should haue done. Quintus Sulpitius in like maner, was disgraded of his Bishopprick, because his miter which the Flamins do weare, fel off his head in his sacrifising. Minutius being dictator also, and hauing chosen Caius Flaminius Generall of the horsemen: because they heard the noise of a rat at the election of Flaminius, they were both put out of their authority & other chosen in their place. Now, though they were thus precise euen in trifles, it was not by reason of any superstition mingled with their religion: but because they would not break any iot of the ancient institutions & ceremonies of their country. But to our story againe. Flaminius being depriued of his Consulship, Marcellus was created Consul in his place, by the regents at that time called Interreges. Marcellus being instituted in his office, chose Cneus Cornelius for his companion: and they say, that the Gavles being inclined to peace, and the Senate of Rome, also willing to harken to peace, Marcellus did stir vp the people, & made them desire war. Notwithstanding, they concluded concluded peace at that time: but the GAVLES GESSATES immediatly after renued the wars againe. For there came ouer the mountaines of the ALPES, thirty thousand of them, and they ioyned with the INSVBRIANS, which were many moe in number then themselues. Now, they being in a maruellous iollitie, went incontinently to lay siege to the citie of ACERRES, that standeth vpon the riuer of Po: and during the siege, King Britomarus taking ten thousand GESSATES with him, went and destroyed all the countrey about the Po. Marcellus hearing that, left with his companion Cneus Cornelius, all the armed footemen, and the third part of the horsmen, in his camp by ACERRES: and he himselfe with the residue of the horsmen, and sixe hundred footmen light armed, marched towards the enemie, trauelling night and day, vntil he met with ten thousand GESSATES, neare vnto a village of GAVLE on this side ỹ mountaines, called CLASTIDIVM, which was subiect not long before to the ROMAINES. So he had no leisure to take rest, nor to refresh his men a litle: for the barbarous people knew straight he was come, & tooke him for no better then by and by ouercome, because he had so few footmen. And for his horsemen, the GAVLES made no reckoning of thē: for besides thēselues are very good men at armes, and excel al other in that fight, yet were their number of horsmen far aboue Marcellus. Therfore they straight marched towards him in a maruellous furie, and with thundring shouts, as if they would haue deuoured them at their coming, Britomarus their king, aduanced himselfe before all his companie. Marcellus fearing to be compassed in behind, being so small a number: he put out the wings of his horsmen as much as he could, to haue the country at large, so that his two wings were very slēder, vntil he came neere his enemies. And being ready to gallop towards ỹ enemy, it fortuned his horse being afraid with the noise of his enemies, turned about, & caried Marcellus back again in spite of his teeth. But he fearing the ROMAINES superstition, in taking this for an euil token, & that they wold take a conceit vpon the same: plucking the bridle with his left hand, turned his horse head again vpō the enemy, & then he worshipped the Sun, as though he had not turned his horse by chance, but purposely for that cause. For it is the ROMAINS maner to turne about so, when they do honor their gods. So when they began to ioyne battel, he made a vow to Iupiter Feretriā, to offer him vp the goodliest spoiles of the enemies, if he did ouercome. The king of the GAVLES seeing him at that instant, imagined by the marks & tokens he saw, that he shold be the General of his enemies: So he set spurs to his horse, & gallopped towards him from al his company, giuing him defiance, & challenged him, shaking his staffe in his hand. He was the goodliest person & strongest man of all the GAVLES, and his armour was all gilt & siluered, and so set forth with sundry works & colours, that it shined as the Sun. Marcellus on the other side hauing viewed all the army of his enemies throughout, & perceiuing none so richly armed as the king, thought straight it was against him, that he had made his prayer & vow to Iupiter. Then he put his horse in full cariere against him, and came with such a force and furie to him, that he pierced his armour with his staffe, and ouerthrew him, but yet he killed him not dead: whereupon he sodainely redoubled two or three strokes besides vpon him, and so slue him right out. Then he lighted from his horse, and taking the dead Kings armour in his hand, he lift vp his eyes to heauen, and said: O Iupiter Feretrian, thou that doest from heauen behold and direct all martiall feates and Captaines deeds: thy selfe I call to witnesse, that I am the third ROMAINE Captaine, that being Generall of the armie, haue slaine with my owne hands, the King and General of the enemies: and I promise here to thee, to offer thee vp the richest spoiles of mine enemies, so thy godhead will vouchsafe to grant vs the like good fortune in all this warre besides. His prayer ended, the men of armes of the ROMAINES ranne in among the horsemen and footemen of the GAVLES, one being vnparted from another: and Fortune did so fauour them, that they wan a passing victory, in such a strange and wonderfull maner, as was incredible. For it was neuer seene before nor since, that so few horsemen did ouerthrow so great a number of men of armes and footmen ranged together. Now when Marcellus had slaine the greater number of them, and had gotten their spoiles and all their baggage, he returned againe to his companion Cneus Cornelius, whom he found making warres vnfortunatly with the GAVLES, before the greatest and most populous citie they had, called MILLAINE, which the GAVLES on this side the mountaines take for their chiefe citie, and from whence all other had their first originall. Wherupon they did all their possible endeuour to defend it, and did as straightly besiege the Consull Cornelius, as he did them. Now when Marcellus was come to the camp againe, the GESSATES vnderstanding that their king Britomarus was slaine in battell, returned backe again into their country, that was as wonderful and worthy a ſight, as any that euer paſt before him: what for the infinite ſpoiles, and the numbers of great men taken priſoners, as alſo for the exceeding ſumptuouſneſſe and ſtately ſhew thereof. But the goodlieſt ſight of all for the rareneſſe, was to behold Marcellus ſelfe, carying on his ſhoulders the whole ſpoile of the barbarous King, to offer vp to Iupiter Fere- trian. For he had cut downe a goodly yong oke of the mountaine, ſtraight, and ſhut vp very long, which he had trimmed vp in forme of triumph, hanging all the armed peeces he had won of the King, very orderly round about it. Then when all the ſhew of his triumph was paſt, he himſelfe tooke the oke vpon his ſhoulders, and got vp vpon his triumphant chariot, & ſo marched thorough the citie, carying theſe ſignes thereupon: which was the nobleſt ſight, and honourableſt ſhew of the whole triumph. His army followed after the chariot, ſinging verſes and ſongs of victory, in praiſe of the gods and their Captaine: and when he had paſſed through the whole city, & was come to the temple of Iupiter called Feretrian, there he ſet vp this yong oke, and token of Marcellus offering vp of his rich ſpoiles. triumph. This Marcellus is the third and laſt ROMAINE captaine, to whom happened this honor

The three perſons that offered vp Spolia opima in Rome: in our age. For the firſt man that euer offered vp to Iupiter the ſpoiles of the General of their enemies, was king Romulus, who wan the like ſpoiles of Acran king of the CÆNINIANS. The ſecond was Cornelius Coſſus, who ſlue Tolumnius, Generall of the THVSCANS. And the third was Mar- cellus, who ſlue with his owne hands Britomarus king of the GAVLES: and after him, no man euer ſince could obtain the like good fortune. The god to whom theſe maner of ſpoiles are con-ſecrated thus is called Iupiter Feretriā, ſo termed as ſome write, becauſe they do cary this token of triumph to him, following the deriuation of this greeke word, Ferio, which ſignifieth to cary:
Romulus. Coſſus. Marcellus. Iupiter Feretrian why ſo called. for in thoſe former times, many Greek words were mingled with the Latine. Other affirme it is one of the ſurnames of Iupiter, ſignifying as much as lightning: for Ferire in the Latin toung, ſignifieth to ſtrike. And ſome ſay alſo, in wars it is properly to hurt or kil with his own hands: for ỹ ROMAINS do vſe at this day when they giue a charge vpon their enemies in battell, or that they haue them in chaſe flying, to cry, incouraging one another, Feri, Peri, which is as much, as kil, kil.
And the ſpoiles taken from the enemies alſo, are generally called Spolia: but thoſe which Lieutenants generall, or Generals, do take from the Generals of their enemies, when they haue ſlaine Spolia opima what they be. them, they are called particularly, Spolia opima. Yet ſome hold opinion that King Numa Pompi- lius mentioning the rich ſpoiles, or Spolia opima, in his commentaries, ſpeaketh of the firſt, the ſecond, and the third: and commandeth that the firſt ſpoiles which are wonne, ſhould be conſecrated to Iupiter Feretrian: the ſecond vnto Mars: and the third vnto Quirinus. And that they
 That is about thirtie crowns.* ſhould giue to him that had wonne the firſt ſpoiles, three hundred * Aſſes, the ſecond, two hundred: and the third a hundred. But notwithſtanding, the beſt opinion, and vſuall taking of Spolia opima, referreth them to be the firſt ſpoiles wonne in a foughten field, and thoſe which the Lieutenant of an army, or a Generall doth take from the Generall of the enemies, after he hath ſlain him with his owne hands. And thus much for the declaration of this matter. Furthermore, the ROMAINS were ſo ioyfull of this victory, and of their good ſucceſſe in this warre, that they cau-ſed a maſſie cup of gold to be made of the ſpoile they had gotten, weighing a hundred pound weight, which they ſent to offer vp in the temple of Apollo Pythias, in the citie of DELPHES in token of thankes: and they made liberall diuiſion beſides of the ſpoiles vnto their friends and confederates, and ſent a great part of it vnto Hieron king of SYRACVSA, who was their confede-Marcellus ſent into Sicile with an army rate. Not long after Hannibal being entred ITALY, Marcellus was ſent with an army by ſea, into SICILE. And after the great ouerthrow was giuen at the battell of CANNES, wherin there died ſo many thouſand ROMAINES, and that very few of them ſaued themſelues by flying into the citie of CANNVSIVM: they looked that Hannibal hauing ouercome the flower of all the ROMAINES youth, and their greateſt force, would not faile to come ſtraight to ROME. Wherefore Marcellus firſt ſent fifteene hundred of his men by ſea, to helpe to defend ROME: & hauing afterwards receiued commandement from the Senate, he came to CANNVSIVM, where he took ſuch as were fled thither for ſuccour after the battell, & ſo brought them out of the field, to defend the countrey. Now the ROMAINS hauing loſt the moſt part of all their beſt Captaines, in diuers ſundry battels before: of all thoſe that remained, Fabius Maximus was the only able and reputed

reputed man for commendation of his honesty and wisdome, yet they misliked of him notwithstanding, for a timorous man, and of no courage, as a man too ful of doubts & considerations, & loth to put any thing in hazard: saying, he was a good captaine to defend, but not to offend the enemy. Wherupon they thought good to ioyne Marcellus liuely youth and courage, with Fabius feminine feare & wisdome: and therefore some yeares they chose them both Consuls together, or els they sent one of them as Consul, & the other as Proconsul, each in his turne, to the countrey where they had wars. And for proof hereof Pisidonius writeth, that the ROMAINES at that time called Fabius Maximus their target, and Marcellus their sword. Therfore Hannibal himself said, he feared Fabius Maximus as his gouernor, and Marcellus as his enemy: because the one kept him from hurting of others, & the other did hurt to himself. Immediatly after this great victory at CANNES, Hannibals souldiers became so bold, so careless, and disordered, that they kept the field without feare of any thing, & dispersed themselues far frō their camp: wherfore Marcellus setting vpon those straglers, he slue them euery man, and so by litle & litle did still lessen the power and strength of his enemy. Afterwards he aided the cities of BIZANTIVM & of NOLA, and stablished the true deuotion and loue of the BIZANTINES towards the ROMAINS: from thence he went to NOLA, & found great sedition there betwixt the Senate & the people, because the Senate could not keep ỹ people in obedience, but they would needs take Hannibals part. The cause of the peoples stubburnesse grew, by occasion of a gentleman of the city called Bandius, a noble gentlemen to the people, & a valiant man of his hands. This Bandius hauing fought valiantly at the battell of CANNES, after he had slaine many a CARTHAGINIAN, was himselfe in the end striken downe, and found lying among the dead bodies, sore wounded and mangled: wherupon Hannibal greatly commending his valiantnesse, did not only let him go without ransome, but also gaue him rich gifts, and made him his host and friend. Hereupon Bandius at his coming home to requite Hannibals honor and courtesie, became one of those that most fauoured Hannibal, and most perswaded the people of NOLA to take his part. Notwithstanding this, Marcellus thinking it too great a sinne against the gods, to put a man to death that had made so great proof of his valiantnesse, and had serued with the ROMAINES in their greatest warres and extremest danger, and who besides the goodnesse of his nature, had a maruellous gift also to winne mens good wils by his great courtesie: when this Bandius came one day to do his dutie to him, Marcellus of purpose asked him what he was, though he had knowne him long before, only to take occasion to talke with him. The other answered him, his name was Lucius Bandius. Then Marcellus seeming to be maruellous glad, and to wonder at him said: And art thou that Bandius they speake so much of at ROME, whō they say did so notable seruice in person at the battel of CANNES, and neuer forsooke Paulus Æmylius the Consull, but receiued so many wounds vpon his body in defence of him? Bandius answered, that he was the man, & therewith shewed him many wounds he had vpon his body. Marcellus then replied: Alas, thou that carriest such notable marks of thy vnfained loue toward vs, what diddest thou meane, that thou camest not straight againe vnto vs? art thou perswaded we are so miserable and vnthankfull, that we will not worthily reward the vertue and valiantnesse of our friends, whom our enemies selues do honor? After Marcellus had vsed this courteous speech vnto him, and had imbraced him, he gaue him a goodly horse for seruice in the warres, and fiue hundred Drachmes of siluer besides. So after that time, Bandius did euer take Marcellus part, and alwayes followed him, being very faithfull to him, and shewed himselfe very seuere and earnest to accuse them that tooke Hannibals part in the citie: which were many in number, and had conspired among themselues, that the first time the ROMAINES should go into the field to skirmish with the enemies, they would shut the gates after them, & take the spoile of all their cariages. Marcellus being informed of this treason, did set his men in battel ray within the city, hard by the gates, and behind them he placed all the sumpters and cariage in good order: besides that, he made proclamation by trumpet, that no citizen vpon paine of death should approach the walles. This occasion drew Hannibal to come hard to the citie, seeing no watch vpon the walles, and made him the bolder to come in disorder, imagining there had bene some mutiny or sedition within, betweene the noble men and the people. But in the meane time, Marcellus set open the gate being hard by, and sallying out vpon the sodaine with the best men of armes he had, he gaue a charge vpon Hannibal in the voward. Immediatly after came out his footmen at another gate, running straight vpon Hannibal, with a wonderfull cry and shout: so as Hannibal to withstand thē, was driuen to deuide his men in two companies.

But as he was deuiding of them, ſodainly a third gate opened vpon them, frō whence all the reſidue of the Romaines iſſued out, who ſet vpon the Carthaginians on euery ſide, they being maruellouſly amazed to be ſo ſodainely ſet on, which they looked not for: ſo hauing their hands full with thoſe that came firſt vpon them, being ſcant able to defend themſelues againſt them, and ſeeing this new and laſt charge alſo, they were forced to retire. This was the firſt time, that euer Hannibals ſouldiers began to giue place to the Romaines, who draue them back vnto their camp, and ſlue a great number of them, and did hurt diuers of thē beſides. For ſome write there were ſlaine of the Carthaginians at that conflict, aboue fiue thouſand, and of the Romains there died not paſt fiue hundred men. But Titus Liuius doth not ſet out the ouerthrow ſo great, and yet confeſſeth that Marcellus wan great honor by it, & that it made the Romains maruellous valiant again, after ſo many and ſundry battels as they had loſt one after another: for thē they were perſwaded that they fought not with an enemy altegether inuincible, but that he might ſometime alſo, as wel as themſelues, receiue both loſſe & hurt. Therfore, one of the Conſuls dying about that time, the people cauſed Marcellus to be ſent for, & placed him in his roome: and in ſpite of the Senate they deferred all deputation vntill his returne from the camp. Marcellus came no ſooner to Rome, but he was choſen Conſull in the dead mans roome, by all the voices of the people. Notwithſtanding, when they went to chuſe him, it thundered maruellouſly: which the Prieſts and Augures took for an ill token, but yet they durſt not openly ſpeake againſt his election, becauſe they feared the people. Howbeit Marcellus of himſelf did willingly giue vp his Conſulſhip, and yet was it no exception to him for his ſeruice in the wars: for they created him Proconſull, and ſent him againe to the camp at Nola, where he did ſeuerely puniſh ſuch as tooke Hannibals part: who being aduertiſed therof, came thither with all poſſible ſpeed to helpe them: and euen at his firſt coming he offered Marcellus battell, which he refuſed at that time. Neuertheleſſe he tooke his time, when Hannibal had ſent the beſt part of his army to forage, as meaning to fight no more battels: and then he ſet vpon him, hauing giuen his footemen long pikes, ſuch as they vſe in fight vpon the ſea, and taught them alſo, how to hurt the enemie afarre off, keeping them ſtill in their hands. But the Carthaginians hauing no skill of their pikes, and fighting with ſhort iauelins in their hands, did ſtrike downe-right blowes: which was the cauſe, that they being ſet vpon by the Romains, were driuen to turne their backes, and flie before them. So there were fiue thouſand of the Carthaginians left dead in the field, foure elephants ſlaine, and two taken aliue: and furthermore, three dayes after the battell, there came three hundred horſemen, ſome of them Spaniards, and other Nvmidians, that ſubmitted themſelues to the Romains. Neuer came there ſuch a misfortune before to Hannibal: who had of long time kept together in loue & amity, an army aſſembled of ſundry barbarous nations and people. Howbeit theſe three hundred continued euer after faithful to the end, both to Marcellus, and to all other Lieutenants and Generals of the Romaines. Shortly after, Marcellus being againe choſen Conſull the third time, went into Sicile. For Hannibals proſperous ſucceſſe and victories, had ſo incouraged the Carthaginians, as they ſought again to conquer this Iland: and ſpecially becauſe that after the death of Hieronimus the tyrant, there roſe ſome tumult at Syracvsa. Vpon which occaſion the Romains had ſent an army thither before, and a Prætor called Appius: at whoſe hands Marcellus hauing receiued the army, a great number of the Romaines became humble ſuters to him, to pray him to aid thē in their calamity, which was this. Of thoſe that ſcaped from the battell of Cannes, ſome ſaued themſelues by flying, other were taken priſoners, of which there was ſuch a number, as it appeared that Rome had not people inough left only to keepe the walles. Neuertheleſſe, thoſe few that remained, their hearts were ſo great, that they would neuer redeeme the priſoners, which Hannibal was contented to deliuer them vpon ſmal ranſome, but made a decree they ſhould not be redeemed: & ſo ſuffered ſome of thē to be killed, others to be ſold for ſlaues out of Italy. And moreouer, thoſe that ſaued thēſelues by flying, they ſent ſtraight into Sicile: commanding they ſhould not ſet a foot again in Italy, whileſt they had wars with Hannibal. Theſe were the men that came altogether, and fell downe at Marcellus feet, ſo ſoone as he arriued in Sicile, and humbly beſought him, to appoint them to ſerue vnder ſome enſigne, that they might fight to do their country honour and ſeruice: promiſing him with teares running downe their cheekes, that their faithfull ſeruice then ſhould witneſſe for them, that the ouerthrow they had at Cannes, fell vpon them rather by misfortune, then through lack of courage. Whereupon Marcellus hauing compaſſion on them, wrote to the

the Senate in their fauour, and prayed them that they would grant him licence to ſupply the bands of his army, as they diminiſhed, with thoſe poore ROMAINS his country men. Many reaſons paſſed too and fro, againſt this ſute: neuerthelesſe it was concluded in the end by the Senate, that the Common-wealth made no reckoning of the ſeruice of faint-hearted men like women: wherefore if Marcellus thought good of their ſeruice, yet it ſhould not be lawfull for him to giue them any crownes or rewards of honour, for any notable ſeruice ſoeuer they did, as all Generals are wont to giue to honeſt men that ſerue valiantly. This order of the Senate miſliked Marcellus very much, who at his returne home out of SICILE, made his complaint in open Senate, and told them they did him manifeſt wrong, to denie him that fauour, that hauing done the commonwealth ſuch faithfull ſeruice diuerſe times, as he had done, he might not reſtore ſo many poore ROMAINES to their honour againe. Now when Marcellus was in SICILE, he receiued great hurts and iniuries by Hippocrates Generall of the SYRACVSANS: who, to pleaſure the CARTHAGINIANS, & by their meanes to make himſelfe chiefe Lord of SYRACVSA, did put many ROMAINE citizens to death. Whereupon Marcellus went and laid ſiege to the city of the LEONTINES, and when he had taken it by aſſault, he hurt neuer a townes man, nor naturall citizen of the ſame: but ſuch traitours as he found there, who had fled from his campe, and yeelded to the enemies, them he cauſed to be whipped, and then hanged. But notwithſtanding, Hippocrates had before cauſed it to be bruited at SYRACVSA, that Marcellus had put all the LEONTINES to the ſword, not ſparing litle children: and afterwards Hippocrates coming thither on the ſodaine, in the feare and garboile of this falſe bruite, he eaſily tooke the citie. Marcellus hearing Hippocrates had taken SYRACVSA, left forthwith the LEONTINES, and went with his whole army, and camped hard by SYRACVSA: and ſent his ambaſſadours to tell the SYRACVSANS truly, what he had done in the citie of the LEONTINES, and quite contrary to that they were informed of. Howbeit that preuailed not, for they beleeued not Marcellus, becauſe Hippocrates being the ſtronger, had won the city. Whereupon he began then to approch the wals, and to aſſault in euery quarter, as well by ſea as by land. Appius took charge of them that gaue aſſault by land. Marcellus himſelfe, with threeſcore gallies of fiue owers at euery banke, well armed, and full of all ſorts of artillery & fire works, did aſſault by ſea, & rowed hard to the wall, hauing made a great engine, and deuice of battery, vpon eight gallies chained together, to batter ŷ wall: truſting in the great multitude of his engines of battery, and to all ſuch neceſſary prouiſion as he had for wars, as alſo in his owne reputation. But Archimedes made light account of all his deuices, as indeed they were nothing comparable to the engines himſelfe had inuented: and yet were not his owne ſuch, as himſelfe did reckon of, to ſhew ſingularitie of worke and deuice. For thoſe he had made, were but his recreations of Geometrie, and things done to paſſe the time with, at the requeſt of king Hieron: who had prayed him to call to mind a litle his Geometricall ſpeculation, and to apply it to things corporall and ſenſible, and to make the reaſon of it demonſtratiue, and plaine, to the vnderſtanding of the common people by experiment, and to the benefit and commodity of vſe. For this inuentiue art to frame inſtruments and engines (which are called mechanicall, or organicall, ſo highly cõmended and eſteemed of all ſorts of people) were firſt ſet forth by Architas and by Eudoxus, partly to beautifie a little the ſcience of Geometry by this fineneſſe; and partly to proue and confirme by materiall examples and ſenſible inſtruments, certaine Geometricall concluſions, whereof a man cannot find out the conceiueable demonſtrations, by enforced reaſons and proofes. As that concluſion which inſtructeth one to ſearch out two lines meane proportionall, which cannot be proued by reaſon demonſtratiue: and yet notwithſtanding is a principle and an accepted ground, for many things which are contained in the art of portraiture. Both of them haue faſhioned it to the workmanſhip of certaine inſtruments, called Meſolabes or Meſographes, which ſerue to find theſe meane lines proportional, by drawing certaine curue lines, and ouerthwart and oblike ſections. But after that, Plato was offended with them, and maintained againſt them, that they did vtterly corrrupt and diſgrace the worthineſſe and excellency of Geometrie, making it to deſcend from things not comprehenſible, and without body, vnto things ſenſible and materiall, and to bring it to a palpable ſubſtance, where the vile and baſe handy worke of man is to be employed: ſince that time I ſay, handy craft, or the art of engines, came to be ſeparated from Geometry, and being long time diſpoſed by the Philoſophers, it came to be one of the warlike arts. But Archimedes hauing told king Hieron, his kinſman and very friend, that it was poſſible to remoue as great a weight as he would, with as little ſtrength as he liſted to put to it: and boaſting himſelfe thus (as they report of him) and truſting to the force of his reaſons, wherewith he proued this cõcluſion, that if there were another globe of earth, he was able to remoue this of ours, & paſſe it ouer to the other: king Hieron wondering to heare him, required him to put this deuice in execution, and to make him ſee by experience, ſome great & heauy weight remoued by litle force. So Archimedes caught hold with a hooke of one of the greateſt carects or hulkes of the king, (that to draw it to the ſhore out of the water, required a maruellous number of people to go about it, and was hardly to be done ſo) and put a great number of men more into her, then her ordinary burthen: and he himſelfe ſitting alone at his eaſe afar off, without any ſtraining at all, drawing the end of an engine with many wheeles & pullies, faire and ſoftly with his hand, made it come as gently and ſmoothly to him, as it had floted in the ſea. The king wondring to ſee that ſight, and knowing by proofe the greatneſſe of his art: he prayed him to make him ſome engines, both to aſſault and defend in all manner of ſieges and aſſaults. So Archimedes made him many engines, but king Hieron neuer occupied any of them, becauſe he raigned the moſt part of his time in peace, without any wars. But this prouiſion and munition of engines, ſerued the SYRACVSANS turne maruellouſly at that time: and not only the prouiſion of the engines ready made, but alſo the enginer and work-maſter himſelf that had inuented them. Now the SYRACVSANS ſeeing themſelues aſſaulted by the ROMAINS both by ſea and by land, were maruellouſly perplexed, and could not tell what to ſay, they were ſo afraid: imagining it was impoſſible for them to withſtand ſo great an army. But when Archimedes fell to handle his engines, and to ſet them at liberty, there flue in the aire infinit kinds of ſhot, and maruellous great ſtones, with an incredible noiſe and force on the ſodaine, vpon the footemen that came to aſſault the citie by land, bearing down, and tearing in peeces all thoſe which came againſt thẽ, or in what place ſo euer they lighted, no earthly body being able to reſiſt the violẽce of ſo heauy a weight: ſo that all their ranks were maruellouſly diſordered. And as for the gallies that gaue aſſault by ſea, ſome were ſunke with long peeces of timber like vnto the yards of ſhips, wherto they faſten their ſayles, which were ſodainly blown ouer the wals with force of theſe engines into their gallies, and ſo ſunke them by their ouer great weight. Other being hoiſſed vp by the prooes with hands of Iron, and hookes made like cranes bils, plunged their poupes into the ſea. Other being taken vp with certaine engines faſtened within, one contrary to another, made them turne in the aire like a whirlegig, and ſo caſt them vpon the rockes by the towne wals, and ſplitted them all to fitters, to the great ſpoile and murther of the perſons that were within them. And ſometimes the ſhips and gallies were lift cleane out of the water, that it was a feareful thing to ſee them hang and turne in the aire as they did: vntill that caſting their men within them ouer the hatches, ſome here, ſome there, by this terrible turning, they came in the end to be emptie, and to breake againſt the wals, or elſe to fall into the ſea againe, when their engines left their hold. Now for Marcellus engine, which he brought againſt the walles, vpon a bridge made of gallies ioyned together: that was called Sambuca, by reaſon of the faſhion it had like to an inſtrument of muſicke of the ſame name, which is a harpe. The ſame being yet a good pretie way off from the wals, there fell a great ſtone vpon it ſent from the wals, weighing ten talents: then a ſecond after that, & a third one after that, the which falling all into this engine with ſuch a thunder and terrible tempeſt, brake the foundation of the engine, and tore all ŷ bridge of the gallies ioyned together in peeces, that ſuſtained it. So that Marcellus being amazed withal, not knowing well what it meant, was glad to retire quickly, and ſent to make his trumpet ſound the retrait to thoſe that gaue aſſault by land. Herupon they ſate in councell to determine what was to be done, & they reſolued, that the next morning before day they ſhould approch the wals if it were poſſible: becauſe that Archimedes engines, which were very ſtrong and hard wound vp, ſhould by this meanes ſend all the force and furie of their ſtones and ſhot ouer their heads, and that neare hand alſo he could do no good with them, for that they had not the ſcope of their leuell and cariage they ſhould haue. But Archimedes had preuented this deuice by long preparation before, hauing made prouiſion of engines for far and neare, the leuell and cariage whereof was proportioned for all diſtances: their ſhot ſhort, their arrowes not very long, many holes & arches in the walles one hard by another, where there were ſtore of crosbowes to kill neare at hand, ſet in ſuch places, as the enemies could not ſee them without. Wherefore, when the ROMAINES thought to approch, thinking they had bene ſafe and cloſe, that no man ſaw them: it amazed thẽ all when they were receiued againe with infinite ſhot, and ſtriken to the ground with ſtones that fell fell vpon their heads like lead: (for there was no part of all the walls, from whence they had not the like shot.) Whereupon they were forced againe to retire from the wals. And yet when they were further off from them, the arrowes, stones, and other kinde of shot, that flue in euery place among them, killed a great number of them, scattered farre from thence: so that many of them were slaine and sore wounded, and diuerse of their ships splitted, and they not once able to be reuenged, nor to hurt their enemies, because Archimedes had placed his engines very closely behind the wals, and not vpon the wals in sight of the enemy. So that it appeared the gods fought against the ROMAINES, they were so slaine and wounded, and yet they could not tell how, nor by whom. Notwithstanding, Marcellus escaped with life, safe from hurt, and mocking his workemasters and engiuers he had in his campe, he said vnto them: What shall we not leaue to make wars with this Briarian engiuer and Geometrician here? who sitting stil vpon the wharfe in sporting manner hath with shame ouerthrowne our nauie, and exceeded all the fabulous hundred hands of the Giants, discharging at one instant so many shot among vs? For indeed, all the residue of the SYRACVSANS, were as the body and members of Archimedes preparation: and he himselfe was the only creature that moued and did all, all weapons else being quiet, and his engines onely occupied, to assault and defend. At the length Marcellus seeing his men thus afeard, as if they did but see the end of a rope, or any peece of timber vpon the wall, they ranne away, crying out, that Archemedis was letting loose some of his engines vpon them: he would no more approch the wals, nor giue assault, determining to see if he could win it by long siege. Notwithstanding, Archimedes had such a great mind, and was so profoundly learned, hauing hidden in him the onely treasure and secrets of Geometricall inuentions, as he would neuer set foorth any booke how to make all these warlike engines, which wan him at that time the fame and glory, not of mans knowledge, but rather of diuine wisedome. But he esteeming all kind of handicraft and inuention to make engines, and generally all maner of sciences bringing common cōmoditie by the vse of them, to be but vile, beggerie, and mercenarie drosse: employed his wit & studie only to write things, the beauty and subtilty whereof, were not mingled any thing at all with necessity. For all that he hath written, are geometricall propositions, which are without comparison of any other writings whatsoeuer: because the subiect whereof they treate, doth appeare by demonstration, the matter giuing them the grace and the greatnesse, and the demonstration proning it so exquisitly, with wonderful reason and facilitie, as it is not repugnable. For in all Geometry are not to be found more profound and difficult matters written, in more plain and simple tearmes, and by more easie principles, then those which he hath inuented. Now some do impute this, to the sharpnesse of his wit and vnderstanding, which was a naturall gift in him: other do referre it to the extreme paines he tooke, which made these things come so easily from him, that they seemed as if they had bene no trouble to him at all. For no man liuing of himself can deuise the demonstration of his propositions, what paine soeuer he take to seeke it: and yet straight so soone as he cometh to declare and open it, euery man then imagineth with himself he could haue found it out well enough, he can then so plainely make demonstration of the thing he meaneth to shew. And therfore that me thinks is like enough to be true, which they write of him: that he was so rauished & drunke with the sweet enticements of this Syren, which as it were lay continually with him, as he forgot his meate & drink, and was careless otherwise of himself, that oftentimes his seruants got him against his will to the baths, to wash and annoint him: and yet being there, he would euer be drawing out of the Geometricall figures, euen in the very imbers of the chimney. And while they were annointing of him with oyles and sweete sauours, with his finger he did draw lines vpon his naked body: so far was he taken frō himselfe, & brought into an extasie or traunce, with the delight he had in the study of Geometrie, being rauished with the loue of the Muses. But among many notable things he deuised, it appeareth, that they most esteemed the demonstration of the proportiō between the Cylinder (to wit, the round colomne) and the sphære or globe contained in the same: for he prayed his kinsmen and friends, that after his death they would put a Cylinder vpon his tombe, containing a massie sphære, with an inscription of the proportion, whereof the continent exceedeth the thing contained. So Archimedes being as you haue heard, did asmuch as lay in him, both to saue himselfe and SYRACVSA from taking. But now againe to Marcellus. Marcellus during the siege at SYRACVSA, wan the citie of MEGARES in SICILE, one of the ancientest cities in all the Iland: and he took besides, the camp of Hippocrates, lying by ACILES, where he slue aboue 8000 men, surprising them vpon the sodaine, euen as they were preparing to lodge, and to fortifie their campe. Then he ouercame a great part of the champion country of SICILE, & made the cities to rebel that tooke the CARTHAGINIANS part: and in all the battels he fought, he euer ouercame them that durst bid him battel. It chanced afterwards, that he took a LACEDÆMONIAN captain prisoner, called Danippus: euen as he came out of SYRACVSA by sea. The SYRACVSANS desirous to redeeme him, sent to him to pray he might be ransomed. They made many parlees about his ransome, and drew out this practise to diuerse meetings: vntill Marcellus had taken good markes of a certaine tower, that had no great watch kept vpon it, and into the which he might secretly conuey a certaine number of men, the wall of the citie in that place being no very hard thing to scale. Therefore when he had giuen a good gesse by estimation at the height of that tower, by often approaching to it, hauing parleed many a time hard by it: he prouided skaling ladders, and tooke the oportunity of a feast which the SYRACVSANS solemnized in the honour of Diana, on which day they gaue themselues to al feasting, sporting & playes. So he took not only the tower, but filled all the wals round about with armed men before day, & brake open the maine gate & entry of the city called Hexapile. And as the SYRACVSANS began to stirre, perceiuing the ROMAINES on the wals, Marcellus made his men sound their trumpets on euery side. Whereupon the SYRACVSANS were so affraid and amazed, that they began to fly, thinking al the city besides had bene taken, where indeed the greatest and strongest quarter of the city called ACRADINA, was not yet touched: becausse it is walled in round about, and separated from the rest of the city, which is deuided into two other parts, the one called the new city, & the other fortune. The two parts wherof being won, Marcellus by the breake of the day forced in by the gate or entrie of the Hexapile. And when his captaines told him he was happy, to win so goodly a city so easily: they say that he (looking about him, and considering the greatnesse and statelinesse of the same) wept for very pitie, foreseeing whereto it should come, thinking with himselfe what a sudaine change it should haue, when his army came to spoile & sacke the same. For there was not a captain that durst deny the souldiers when they demanded the spoile, and yet were there many that would needs haue it burnt and rased to the ground. But Marcellus would not agree to that in any case, and besides, it was sore against his mind to grant them the spoile of the goods & slaues: straightly commanding them notwithstanding, not to lay hands on any free man, & not to kil, hurt, nor to make any SYRACVSAN slaue. Wherein, though he shewed great fauor and mercy, yet it grieued him to see so famous a city, brought to that miserable state: and in the midst of all the ioy he had for his victorie, he could not refraine from weeping for pitie to see so rich and welthie a citie, in the turning of a hand, spoiled and brought to nought. For it is said, that the riches and goods taken away at the sacke of SYRACVSA, were nothing inferiour to the spoiles of CARTHAGE, which was also sacked not long after that: for the other part of the city of SYRACVSA called ACRADINA, was soone after also taken by treason, and spoiled against the captains wils, sauing the kings treasure, which was reserued to be caried to the cõmon treasure of ROME. SYRACVSA being taken, nothing grieued Marcellus more, then the losse of Archimedes: who being in his study when the citie was taken, busily seeking out by himselfe the demonstration of some Geometricall proposition which he had drawne in figure, and so earnestly occupied therein, as he neuer saw nor heard any noise of enemies that ran vp and downe the citie, and much lesse knew it was taken: he wondred when he saw a souldier by him, that bade him go with him to Marcellus. Notwithstanding, he spake to the souldier, and bade him tarie vntill he had done his conclusion, and brought it to demonstration: but the souldier being angry with his answer, drew out his sword and killed him. Other say, that the ROMAINE souldier when he came, offered the swords point to him to kill him: and that Archimedes when he saw him, prayed him to hold his hand a litle, that he might not leaue the matter he looked for vnperfect, without demonstration. But the soldier making no reckoning of his speculatiõ, killed him presently. It is reported a third way also, saying, that certain souldiers met him in the streets going to Marcellus, carying certain Mathematicall instruments in a little prety coffer, as dials for the Sun, sphæres & angles, wherewith they measure the greatnesse of the body of the Sun by view: and they supposing he had caried some gold or siluer, or other precious iewels in that litle coffer, slue him for it. But it is most true, that Marcellus was maruellous sory for his death, and euer after hated the villaine that slue him, as a cursed and execrable person: & how he made also maruellous much afterwards of Archimedes kinsmen for his sake. The ROMAINES were esteemed of at that time by all nations, for maruellous

maruellous expert ſouldiers, and taken for very valiant and dangerous men to be delt with: but they neuer ſhewed any example of their clemencie and courteſie, and leſt of all of any ciuill maner to any ſtrangers, vntill Marcellus taught the way, whoſe acts did ſhew the GRECIANS then, that the ROMAINES were more gracious and mercifull then they. For he did ſo courteouſly intreate thoſe that had to do with him, & ſhewed ſuch fauour to priuate perſons, and alſo to whole cities: that if there were any crueltie ſhewed in the cities of ENNA, or at MEGARES, or againſt the SYRACVSANS, it was rather through their own fault and folly that were hurt, then theirs that did them the hurt. And for proofe hereof, I will recite you one example only among many. There is a citie in SICILE called ENGYIVM, it is no great thing, but a very ancient citie of name, by reaſon of the trafficke thither, for that there are certain goddeſſes to be ſeene, whom they worſhip, called the mothers. Some ſay the CRETANS were the firſt builders and founders of the temple there, where you ſhall ſee ſpeares and helmets of copper, and vpon them are grauen the name of Meriones: and vpon others, Vlyſſes name alſo, which are conſecrated to theſe goddeſſes. This citie ſtood altogether at the deuotion of the CARTHAGINIANS: and Nicias being the chiefeſt man of the ſame, was all he might againſt it, and perſwaded them openly in all their councels to take part with the ROMAINES, prouing it by many reaſons, that his enemies counſelling the contrarie, were vnprofitable members of the common wealth. Wherupon Nicias enemies fearing his greatneſſe and authority, they did conſpire among themſelues to apprehend him, and to deliuer him to the CARTHAGINIANS. But Nicias hearing of ſuch a matter, and finding that they lay in waite to take him, vſed this policy to preuent their treaſon. He gaue out openly very ill ſpeeches againſt the goddeſſes, and did many things in derogation of their honour: and ſaid the ſight of them (which was a matter of great credite) was but a deuice, and that there was no credit to be giuen to them. Theſe words tickled his enemies, imagining that the common people would lay the miſchiefe they pretended againſt him, to himſelfe, as the onely cauſer of his owne hurt. So they hauing appointed a day to apprehend him, by chance a common councell was kept that day they had determined of: where Nicias ſpeaking to the people about matters of counſell, in the mideſt of his oration he fell to the ground, to the great wonder of the whole aſſembly, as euery man may coniecture. Howbeit, neuer a man ſtirred, and a pretie while after he began to lift vp his head a litle, and to looke gaſtly about him, with a faint trembling voice, which he ſtill gathered higher and lowder by litle and litle, vntil he ſaw all the people wonderouſly affraid and amazed, that not one of them durſt ſpeake. Then throwing his gowne from him, and renting his coate, he got vpon his feete halfe naked, and ran towards the gate of the Theater, crying out that the goddeſſes mothers did torment him: and not a man durſt once come neare him, nor offer to ſtop him, they were ſo ſuperſtitious & fooliſhly affraid of the goddeſſes, imagining it was ſome diuine puniſhment. But by this means he eaſily got to the gates of the city, and fled from them all, and he was neuer ſeene after that time, to do or ſpeake like a mad man in any thing. His wife that was made priuie to his deuice, and furthered his intent, went firſt and fell downe on her knees before the goddeſſes mothers in the temple, as ſhe had heartily prayed vnto them: and faining afterwards ſhe would go ſeeke her husband, that ran vp & down the fields like a mad man, ſhe went out of the citie with her little children, and no body troubled her. Thus did they eſcape without danger, & went vnto Marcellus to SYRACVSA. The ENGIENIANS afterwards played ſuch inſolent parts, that Marcellus in the end went thither, and cauſed them all to be taken and bound, as though he would haue put thē to execution, But Nicias came to him with teares in his eyes, and embracing his knees, and kiſſing his hands, beſought him to take pity vpō his poore citizens, beginning firſt with thoſe that were his greateſt enemies. This good nature of Nicias ſo pacified Marcellus wrath, that he pardoned them all, and did no hurt to the city, & gaue Nicias certain land, beſides many other rich gifts he beſtowed vpon him. Thus it is reported in the hiſtorie of Piſidonius the Philoſopher. Now Marcellus being ſent for home by the ROMAINES, becauſe they had wars in their owne country, and euen at ROME gates: he departed out of SICILE returning towards ROME, and caried the goodlieſt tables, pictures, and ſtatues, and other ſuch ornaments as were in SYRACVSA, meaning firſt to beautifie his triumph with them, and to leaue them afterwards for an ornament to ROME, which before that time neuer knew what ſuch curious works meant. For, this fineneſſe, and curious tables & imagery, neuer came into ROME before, but was throughly ſet out with armour and weapons of barbarous people, and with bloudy ſpoiles, and was alſo crowned with monuments of victories & triumphs of diuerſe enemies, which were no pleaſant, but rather feareful ſights to looke vpon, farre vnfit for feminine eyes. But euen as Epaminõdas called the plain of BOEOTIA, Mars his ſcaffold, where he kept his games: and Xenophon alſo called the city of EPHESVS, the armorers ſhop: euen ſo me thinkes (as Pindarus ſaid) they might rightly haue termed ROME, the temple of Mars fighting. And this wan the peoples good wils much more to Marcellus, becauſe he did ſo paſſingly ſet forth ROME with ſuch excellent fine toyes of GREECE. But Fabius Maximus on the other ſide, was better beloued of the old men: becauſe he brought no ſuch toyes with him from the city of TARENTVM, when he wan it. Indeed he brought away gold and ready coine, and much other goods that were profitable: but for images and tables, he left them ſtanding in their places, ſpeaking a thing of great note. Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their gods offended with them. And furthermore the noble men were angry with Marcellus, ſaying, that by this act he had purchaſed ROME great malice & hate. Firſt, becauſe he did not only leade men priſoners in his triumph, but the gods alſo: and ſecondly, becauſe he had filled the people full of prittle prattle, and idle curioſitie, ſpending all the whole day in gazing, and wondering at the excellencie of the workemen, and of the works; where before they would fall to their labour, or elſe they went to the wars, not being acquainted with curioſitie, nor idle life, as Euripides ſaid, ſpeaking of Hercules:

In wicked practiſes he ſimple was to ſee,
But he exceld in vertuous deeds, and feates that worthy be.

Notwithſtanding, Marcellus did glory amongſt the GRECIANS themſelues: ſaying that he had taught the ROMAINES to eſteeme the wonderful works of GREECE, which they knew not before. But at his returne out of SICILE, his enemies procured, that his honour of triumph was denied him. So Marcellus knowing that he had yet left ſomewhat to do in SICILE, and that the war was not altogether ended, and fearing beſides leſt a third triumph would make him too much enuied: he was contented with good will to haue the honor of the great triumph in the mountaine of ALBA only: and of the litle triumph, in the city of ROME. This maner of litle triumph is called in Greek Euan, and the ROMAINES call it Ouatie. And this difference there is betweene them: that in the Ouation triumph, the party to whom it is granted, doth not enter into the city vpon a triumphing chariot drawne with foure horſes, nor doth cary any lawrell vpon his head in token of triumph, nor hath any trumpets or hornes blown before him, but doth march on foot with a paire of ſlippers on his feete, hauing flutes and howbowes playing before him, and wearing a garland of firre tree vpon his head: ſo as this maner of entrie is nothing warlike, and is rather a pleaſant then fearefull ſight. Whereby it plainely appeareth, that theſe two kindes of entries they granted to the Captaines, returning from the warres with victorie, were diſtinguiſhed in the old time, rather by the manner, then by the greatneſſe of their doings. For ſuch as had ouercome their enemies by great ſlaughter and bloudy battels, they did make their entrie with pompe of triumph, that was altogether martiall and terrible, followed with their ſouldiers armed, and crowned with lawrell garlands, as their cuſtome was in muſtering their campe in the warres. But they on the contrary ſide, that without any exploit of armes returned home with victory, either by peaceable meanes, or by force of their eloquence: the law granted them the honour of Ouation triumph, which was quiet, and full of all ioy and mirth. For the flute is an inſtrument of pleaſure belonging to peace, and the firre tree is a tree conſecrated to Venus, which goddeſſe, aboue all gods and goddeſſes doth moſt deteſt warres. This ſecond kind of entrie was called Ouation, not as many GRECIANS haue taken it, coming of this word Euan, which is a voice and ſong of ioy, although they did vſe alſo to accompany the Captaines making their entrie in this ſort, crying, and ſinging Euan: but there were certaine GRECIANS that would haue fetched the deriuation of this word, from an old common cuſtome they had: and were of opinion beſides, that part of this honour did appertaine to god Bacchus, whoſe ſurname we call Euius, and ſometimes Triambus, Howbeit this is not the true deriuation of the name, but after this ſort. At the great triumph and entry made, the captaine or generall that triumpheth as a Conqueror, did offer and ſacrifiſe (by the old orders and ancient cuſtomes of ROME) one or diuers oxen: where at the ſecond triumph called the Ouation, he only ſacrifiſed a mutton, which the ROMAINES call in their tongue Ouem, and therof it was called Ouation. And here by the way is to be noted, the difference betwixt the law-maker of the ROMAINE lawes and cuſtomes, and the law-maker of the LACEDÆMONIANS: how each of thé was contrary to the other, in appointing the ſacrifices for victory. For at SPARTA, the captaine or General that had done his feat by policy or friendſhip, ỹ ſacrifice he did offer vp to the gods, was an oxe: and he that by force, and bloudy battel had obtained victory, only offered vp a cock for ſacrifice. For though they were very good ſoldiers, yet they thought better of his ſeruice, that by his wiſdome & wiſe perſwaſions obtained victory, then of his, that wan it by valiantnes, & force of armes. Thus you may ſee which of theſe two law-makers had beſt reaſon by his ordinances. But now to Marcellus again. He being choſen Conſul the fourth time, his enemies and euill willers did ſtirre vp the SYRACVSANS againſt him, and perſwaded them to complaine to the Senate of him, that he had cruelly and vncourteouſly vſed them, contrary to the ancient league and alliances made long before with the ROMAINES. Marcellus being ſacrificing one day in the Capitoll, while the Senate were ſet in counſell, the SYRACVSANS deputies came before them, and kneeling downe beſought them to giue them audience, and that they would do them iuſtice. The other Conſul that was preſent rebuked thẽ being angry that they had ſo maliciouſly ſpied the occaſion of Marcellus abſence. But when Marcellus heard of it, he ſtraight left off all, & came to the Senate, and firſt ſate him downe in his Conſuls chaire, where he gaue audience as Conſull, and diſpatched diuers cauſes: when he had ſo done, he roſe out of his chaire and came downe among them, ſtanding as a priuate perſon to anſwer at the barre, as other offenders and men accuſed, ſuffering the SYRACVSANS to alledge and ſay againſt him what they would. Thẽ were the SYRACVSANS blanke, when they ſaw the maieſtie of Marcellus, and his ſtaied countenance in all things: and as they had found him before a very valiant man in wars, and vnconquerable, they found him then a man no leſſe dreadfull in his Conſuls robe: ſo that they hung down their heads, & durſt not looke him in the face. Notwithſtanding, they being ſuborned by his enemies, began at the length boldly to accuſe him, and yet with ſorrow and lamentation, the effect whereof was this: That they being the ROMAINES friends and confederates, had abidden ſuch iniuries at Marcellus hands, as al other Generals neuer offered their very enemies. Wherto Marcellus ſtraight anſwered againe to the contrary: That for many iniuries the ROMAINS had receiued of them, they ſuffered nothing but that which was vnpoſſible they ſhould not ſuffer, that reſiſted vntil they were taken by force: & yet they might thanke themſelues for any thing they ſuffered, becauſe they would not obey nor conſent to reaſonable capitulations & articles of peace, which he had oftentimes offered them. And againe, they could not alledge for their excuſe, that the tyrants had compelled them to make wars: when they to the contrary becauſe they would enter into wars, were contented to be ſubiect to a tyrant. So, when both parties had ſpoken their minds, the SYRACVSANS (as the manner is) went out of the Senate houſe, and Marcellus alſo, leauing his fellow Conſul in his place in the Senate; & taried without the doore, attending the ſentence of the Senate, neuer altering his countenance nor wõted look, neither for feare of ſentẽce, nor for malice nor anger againſt ỹ SYRACVSANS, quietly looking for his iudgemẽt. Afterwards whẽ the Senators voices were gathered together, & that Marcellus was cleared by moſt voices: then the SYRACVSANS fell down at his feet weeping, & beſought him not to wreake his anger vpon them that were preſent, & moreouer that he would haue compaſſion on the reſidue of the citizens, who did acknowledge his great grace and fauor extended to them, and confeſſed themſelues bound to him for euer. Marcellus moued with pity by their intreaty, he pardoned them, & euer after did to the SYRACVSANS what pleaſure he could poſſibly. For through his intreatie & requeſt, the Senate did confirme and ratifie his grant vnto them, which was: that they might vſe the liberty & benefit of their own laws, & quietly enioy their goods alſo which were left them. To requite the ſpecial grace procured them by Marcellus, the SYRACVSANS gaue him many honors, and among others they made a law, that euer after, as oft as any of Marcellus name or houſe came into SICILE, the SYRACVSANS ſhould keep a ſolemne feaſt, with garlands on their heads, and ſhold alſo ſacrifiſe vnto the gods. After this, Marcellus went againſt Hannibal: & where all the other Conſuls almoſt, and Generals, after the ouerthrow at CANNES, had vſed this only policy with him, not to come to battel: he took a contrary courſe to them all, thinking that tract of time (wherby they thought to eate out Hannibals force) was rather a direct conſuming & deſtroying of all ITALY: & that Fabius Maximus ſtanding too much vpon ſafety, tooke not the way to cure the diſeaſe & weakenes of the cõmon weale of ROME, looking to end this war, cõſuming by litle and litle the ſtrength and power of ROME, cõmitting a fearefull phyſitions fault & error, being afraide to heale the patient ſodainely, imagining that to bring them low, doth leſſen the diſeaſe. So firſt of all he went to beſiege certain great cities of the SAMNITES, which were reuolted frõ obedience of the Romains: and those he wan againe with a great prouision of corne and mony he found in thē, besides 3000. souldiers Hannibal left in garrison there, whom he took prisoners. Hannibal after that, hauing slaine the Viceconsull Cneus Fuluius in Apvlia, with eleuen Tribuni militum (to wit, Colonels, euery one hauing the charge of a 1000. footmen, and ouerthrowne the greatest part of his armie: Marcellus wrote letters to Rome, hoping to comfort the Senate & people, telling he would go thither, and did warrant thē he would driue Hannibal out of Apvlia. Whē the Romains had read his letters, they were nothing the more cōforted, but rather (as Liuy writeth) more afraid & discouraged: because they doubted the danger to come wold be greater then the losse past, taking Marcellus to be a far greater & better General, then euer was Fuluius. Neuertheless, Marcellus performing the contents of his letters written to Rome, draue Hannibal out of Apvlia, and made him retire into Lvcania. And Marcellus finding him in that country, by a city called Nvmistron, lodged vpon hils, & in place of strength and aduantage: he camped hard by him in the valley, and the next morning he was the first that presented his enemy battel. Hannibal on the other side, came down into the valley, and they ioyned battell: which was so cruelly fought, and so long time, as it could not be discerned who had the better. For the battel being begun at nine of the clocke in the morning, twas darke night ere they gaue ouer. The next morning by peepe of day, Marcellus set his men againe in battell ray, in the middest of all the dead bodies that lay slaine in the field, and challenged Hannibal, to proue who should haue the field, but Hannibal refused, and marched his way thence: so as Marcellus thereby had good leisure left him to strip his slain enemies, & also to bury his own souldiers. When he had finished that, he presently followed his enemy by the foot, who laid many ambushes for him, but he could neuer trap him in any: and in euery incounter or skirmish they had together Marcellus had euer the better, which wan him great fame and credit. Now time being come about to chuse new Consuls, the Senate thought good to send rather for the other Consul that was in Sicile, then to remoue Marcellus thence, who had fought with Hannibal. So when the other Consull was come to Rome, the Senate commanded him to name Quintus Fuluius Dictator, because the Dictator was neither chosen by the people, nor by the Senate: but one of the Consuls or Prætors, in open assembly of the people, nameth such a one Dictator as he liketh of. Wherefore it seemeth, that this word Dictator, came vpon that word, naming: for, Dicere in the Romaine tong, signifieth to name. Howbeit other hold opinion, that he was called Dictator, because he commandeth of himselfe what he will, without the counsell of the Senate, & the voices of the people: and this seemeth to be true, because the commandements of the Senate of Rome are called Edicta, which the Greecians call Diatagmata. Now the other Consull and cōpanion of Marcellus being come out of Sicile, he would needs name another Dictator then him whom the Senate offered him: and because he would not be compelled to do that he was vnwilling to do, he stole away one night, and returned again into Sicile. Herupon the people did name and appoint Quintus Fulnius Dictator, and the Senate wrote their leters to Marcellus, to confirme him: which Marcellus did, & authorized the peoples electiō. So he himself was chosen again Proconsul for the next yeare following: in the which he hauing conferred with Fabius Maximus about the wars, they were agreed, that Fabius should proue if he could win the citie of Tarentvm againe: and that Marcellus in the meane time should keepe Hannibal occupied, that he might not come to aid it. This resolution being taken betweene them, Marcellus went to meet Hannibal by the city of Cannvsivm: who as he stil changed and shifted lodging, because he would not come to the battell against his will, found Marcellus euer in his eye before him. Insomuch as Hannibal remouing thus his campe, Marcellus plied him so one day with continuall alarums & skirmishes, that he brought him to a battel that held all day long till night, & compelled them both to leaue off till the next morning: where Marcellus shewed again in field by breake of the day, in battel ray. Wherat Hānibal being in a maruellous rage, he called his souldiers together & made an oration to thē, earnestly mouing thē once again to fight with Marcellus, if euer they had heretofore fought for his sake. You see, said he, that hauing fought so many battels, & gottē such victories as we haue done, we cānot yet take breath as we wold, nor be in quiet, how much soeuer we win, if we driue not away yonder fellow Marcellus. Whē Hannibal had ended his oration to the Carthaginians, he led thē on to the battel: where Marcellus, to no purpose, & out of time, would needs shew Hannibal a stratageme of war, that turned to himselfe the worst. For Marcellus perceiuing the right wing of his army distressed, made one of his legions that was set in

in ray in the rereward of his hoaſt, to march to the front of his battel, to helpe thoſe that needed aid. But this remouing of the legion, troubled them that fought, & gaue the enemies the victory: who ſlue that day two thouſand ſeuen hundred of the ROMAINES. So, when Marcellus was come againe into his campe, he ſtraight called his ſouldiers before him, to whom he ſpake in this maner: That he ſaw a great deale of armour, and bodies of men, but he could ſee no ROMAINS. The ROMAINES hearing him ſay ſo, beſought him to pardon the fault they had committed. Marcellus anſwered, he would neuer pardon them, ſo long as they were ouercome: but whē they ouercame again, he was content to remit al. So the next morning he agreed to bring them ag ain to fight with the enemie, that ſuch as were at ROME ſhould rather heare newes of their victorie, then of their running away. When he had ſaid, he appointed they ſhould giue thoſe bands that firſt turned their backes to Hannibal, barly for wheate. So as though many of them were in great danger of their liues, for the ſore wounds they had receiued in the battell: yet there was not a man of them, but Marcellus words did more grieue thē then the grieuous wounds they had. The next morning betimes was ſet out of the Generals tent, the coat armour died in skarlet, which is the ordinary ſigne of battel: & the bands that had receiued diſhonor the day before, were placed at their owne requeſt in the front of the battel. The other Captaines beſides, that were not ouerthrowne, did leade their bands alſo to the field, and did ſet them in battel ray. Hannibal hearing of that, cried out: O gods, what a man is this, that cannot be quiet, neither with good nor ill fortune: for he is the only odde man, that neuer giueth reſt to his enimies, when he hath ouercome him, nor taketh any for himſelfe when he is ouercome. We ſhall neuer haue done with him, for any thing that I ſee, ſith ſhame, whether he win or loſe, doth ſtil prouoke him to be bolder and valianter. After orations made of both ſides, both armies marched forwards to ioyne battell. The ROMAINS being as ſtrong as the CARTHAGINIANS, Hannibal put his Elephants in the vowarde and front of his battell, and commanded his men to driue thē vpon the ROMAINS: and ſo they did. Which in deed did ſomewhat trouble and diſorder the firſt rankes of the ROMAINS: vntill ſuch time as Flauius Tribune of the ſouldiers, tooke an enſigne in his hands, and marched before the beaſts, and gaue the firſt of them ſuch a thruſt with the point of his enſigne, that he made her turne back. The firſt beaſt being turned back thus, ran vpon the ſecond that followed her, and the ſecond made the third go backe alſo, and ſo from one to another, vntill they all turned. Marcellus perceiuing that, commanded his horſemen to ſet vpon the enemies with all the fury they could, in that place where he ſaw them ſomewhat troubled with theſe beaſts, that turned backe againe vpon them: and that they ſhould driue them further in amongſt them. Which they did, and gaue ſo hot a charge vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, that they made them turne their backes and run away, and they purſued them ſtill, killing them downe right, euen to their camp ſide: where was the greateſt ſlaughter of all, by reaſon their Elephantes that were wounded, fell downe ſtarke dead within the gate of their camp. And they ſay, of the CARTHAGINIANS there were ſlaine at this battel, about eight thouſand, and of the ROMAINS only three thouſand: howbeit all the reſt of them for the moſt part were very ſore hurt. Which fel out very well for Hannibal, that he might march away at his pleaſure, as he did that night, & got him away far off frō Marcellus, as knowing he was not in ſtate to follow him ouer ſodainly, becauſe of the great number of hurt men in his camp: and ſo by ſmall iournies he went into CAMPANIA, where he lay in garriſon al the Sommer, in the citie of SINVESSE, to heale the wounds of his ſore mangled ſoldiers. Hannibal hauing now gotten himſelfe at the length out of Marcellus hands, and hauing his army free to ſerue him as he thought good: he burned and deſtroyed all ITALY where he went, and ſtood no more in feare of any thing. This made Marcellus ill ſpoken of at ROME, and cauſed his enemies to take hold of ſuch a matter againſt him: for they ſtraight raiſed Publius Bibulus Tribune to accuſe him, who was a hot harebraine man, but very eloquent, and could deliuer his mind very wel. So this Bibulus called the people oft to counſel, & told thē there, that they muſt needs call home Marcellus, & apppoint ſome other to take the charge of the army: for as for him, ſaid he, becauſe he hath fought a litle with Hannibal (and as a man might ſay, wreſtled a litle with him) he is now gotten to the bathes to ſolace himſelf. But Marcellus hearing this, left his Lieutenants in the camp, & went himſelf to ROME, to anſwer to ỹ vntrue accuſations laid againſt him: and there he perceiued at his comming, how they intended to proſecute the matter againſt him vpō theſe informatiōs. So a day of hearing was appointed for his matter, & the parties came before the people aſſēbled in coūcel, in the great liſts or ſhew place, called Circus Flaminius, to giue iudgement. There Publius Bibulus the Tribune, ſitting in his chaire, laid open his accuſation with great circumſtance: and Marcellus, when Bibulus had told his tale, anſwered him in a few words, and very diſcreetly, onely touching his purgation. But the noble and chiefe men of the citie, roſe vp and ſpake on Marcellus behalfe, telling the people plainly that they did Marcellus wrong, to reckon worſe of his valiantneſſe, then their enemy did: and to iudge of him as a coward, conſidering Hannibal onely fled from him, of all other captaines, and would by no means fight with him, neuer refuſing to fight with any other whatſoeuer. Theſe perſwaſions tooke ſuch effect, as where Marcellus accuſer looked for his condemnation, Marcellus to the contrary, was not onely cleared of his accuſation, but furthermore, they choſe him Conſull again the fift time. So being entred into his office, he wẽt firſt into THVSCAN: where viſiting ỹ good cities one after another, and quieting thẽ, he pacified a great ſedition in the country, when they were all ready to riſe & rebel. Afterwards at his returne, he thought to conſecrate the temple of honor & vertue, which he had built with the ſpoiles he got in the wars of SICILE. But ỹ Prieſts were againſt it, ſaying, two gods might not be in one church. Thereupon he built another temple, and ioyned it to the firſt, being very angry the Prieſts denied ſo his conſecration: and he did take it for an euill token, beſides diuers others ſignes in the element that afterwards appeared, & troubled him much. For there were many temples ſet on fire with lightning at one time: & the rats & mice did gnaw the gold that was in the chappell of Iupiter Capitoline. And it is reported alſo, that an oxe did ſpeake: and a child came out of the head of an Elephant, and that the child was aliue. Furthermore, the Prieſts & Soothſayers, ſacrificing to the gods, to withdraw the euil from them theſe ſiniſter tokens did threaten: they could neuer find any fauourable ſignes in their ſacrifices. Whereupon they ſought to keep Marcellus ſtil at ROME, who had a maruellous earneſt deſire to be gone with ſpeed to the wars: for neuer man longed for any thing ſo much, as Marcellus did, to fight with Hannibal. In ſomuch he neuer dreamed other thing in the night, nor ſpake of any matter elſe in the day to his friends & cõpanions, nor prayed to the gods for any other thing, but that he might fight with Hannibal in the field: and I thinke he would willingly haue fought a priuate combat with him, in ſome walled city or incloſed liſts for the combat. And had it not bin that he had already won himſelfe a great fame, & ſhewed himſelfe to the world (by ſundry great proofes and experience of his doings) a graue, skilfull, and valiant captaine as any man of his time: I would haue ſaid it had bin a pang of youth, and a more ambitious deſire, then became a man of his age, who was threeſcore yeares old at that time, when they made him Conſull againe the fift time. Neuertheles, after he had ended al his propitiatory ſacrifices, & purifications, ſuch as the ſoothſayers had appointed, he departed from ROME with his fellow Conſul Quintus Chriſpinus to the wars. He found Hannibal lying betweene the cities of BANCIA, and VENOVSA, and ſought all the means he could to procure him to fight, but he could neuer get him to it. Howbeit Hannibal being aduertiſed by ſpials, that the Conſuls ſet an army to beſiege the city of the LOCRIANS ſurnamed EPIZEPHYRIANS (as you wold ſay) the occidẽtals, becauſe the GRECIANS in reſpect of the ITALIANS, are called the orientals:) he laid an ambuſh for them that went, vnder the hill of PETELIVM, which was directly in their way, where he ſlue aboue two thouſand fiue hundred ROMAINES. That ouerthrow did ſet Marcellus on fire, and make him more deſirous of battell: whereupon he remoued his campe from the place he lay in, and marched nearer to his enemie. Between their two camps there was a prety litle hil, ſtrong of ſituation, a wild thing ouergrown with wood: and there was high hillockes, from whence they might diſcerne a great way, both the one and the others camps, and at the foot of the ſame ran prety ſprings: inſomuch as the ROMAINES wondred, that Hannibal coming thither firſt, did not take that place, but had left it to his enemies. Howbeit Hannibal was craftie enough, leauing it of purpoſe: for as it was commodious to lodge his campe, ſo it ſerued his turne better for an ambuſh. So he filled the wood, the hollow places, & the vallies thereabout, with ſtore of ſhot and ſpearemen, aſſuring himſelf that the place would intice the ROMAINES thither: and indeed he geſſed rightly, for ſo it fell out. Straight there flue a rumour abroade in the ROMAINES campe, that there was a paſſing place to lodge in, and euery man tooke vpon him like a skilful ſouldier, to tell what vantage they ſhould haue vpon their enemies by taking that place, and ſpecially if they did lodge there, or otherwiſe built a fort vpon it. Whereupon Marcellus determined to go ſee the place himſelfe, taking a few horſemen with him. Notwithſtanding, before he would take horſe, he called for his ſoothſayer to ſacrifiſe to the gods. The firſt beaſt that was ſacrifiſed, the Soothſayer ſhewed Marcellus the liuer liuer of it without a head. The ſecond beaſt ſacrificed, had a faire great head of a liuer, and all the other parts were alſo ſound, & very new: that by them it appeared all the feare of the firſt ſignes and tokens were taken away. Yet the ſoothſayers on the other ſide ſaid, it did make them worſe afraid then before: for theſe ſo fauourable and luckie tokens of the ſacrifice, following immediatly after the firſt foule and naughty ſignes, made them doubt them much, by reaſon of ſo ſtrange and ſodaine an alteration. But as the Poet Pindarus ſaith:

Nor force of burning fire, nor wall of ſteele nor ſtone,
Nor whatſoeuer other thing, is here this earth vpon:
Can keepe abacke the courſe of fatall deſtiny,
Nor yet reſiſt the due decrees, which come from heauen on high.

So Marcellus tooke his horſe, with Quintus Chriſpinus his fellow Conſull, and his ſon one of the Tribunes of the ſoldiers, hauing only two hundred & twenty horſemen with him, of the which there was not one ROMAINE among thē, but all were THVSCANS, ſauing forty FREGELLANIANS, who from the beginning of theſe warres, had alwaies ſhewed themſelues very faithfull and louing to Marcellus. The hill we ſpake of before, being thicke couered with wood & buſhes, the enemies had ſet a skout to watch on the top of it, to giue warning if they ſaw any coming towards it. The ROMAINES could not ſee him, and he on the other ſide might ſee euen into their campe, and perceiue what was done: as he did aduertiſe thoſe at that time that lay in ambuſh for Marcellus coming: and they ſuffered him to paſſe on, vntill he came directly againſt them. Then they ſhewed vpon the ſodain, and compaſſing in Marcellus, they both ſhot & ſtrake at him, ſome following them that fled, & other fighting with the forty FREGELLANIANS which only ſtucke to it: who came roundly in together (notwithſtanding the THVSCANS were fled) vpon the firſt crie they hard, to defend the two Conſuls, vntill ſuch time as the conſull Chriſpinus hauing two wounds on his body with a dart, did turne his horſe to flie. And with that, one of the enemies gaue Marcellus ſuch a ſore blow with a ſpeare hauing a broad iron head, that he ranne him quite through. The FREGELLANIANS that were left aliue, being but a few in number, ſeeing Marcellus ſlaine, left him lying on the ground, and tooke his ſonne away with them, that was very ſore hurt, and by the ſwiftneſſe of their horſes recouered their camp, & ſaued themſelues. At this ouerthrow, there were not ſlaine aboue forty men, and fiue and twenty taken priſoners, of which fiue of them were the Conſuls ſergeant, & their officers that caried axes before them, and the other were all horſemen. Within few dayes after, the other Conſull Criſpinus died alſo of his hurts, which was ſuch a misfortune, as neuer came before to the ROMAINES, that both their Conſuls were ſlaine at one battel. Now Hannibal made no great reckoning of all that were ſlaine, or taken at this field: but when he hard that Marcellus ſelfe was ſlaine at this ouerthrow, he went himſelf ſtraight to the place to ſee him. So when he had viewed his body a great while, ſtanding hard by it, and conſidering his ſtrength, his ſtature, and countenance, hauing taken full view of all the parts of him, he ſpake no proud words againſt him, nor ſhewed any glad countenance, as ſome other would haue done, that had ſlaine ſo valiant and dangerous an enemie: but wondering how he came to be ſlaine ſo ſtrangely there, he tooke of his ring from one of his fingers that ſealed his letters, and giuing his body buriall according to his eſtate, made it to be honourably burnt, and then put all his bones and aſhes into a ſiluer pot, on which he himſelfe put a crowne of gold, and ſent it vnto Marcellus ſonne. It fortuned ſo, that certaine light horſemen of the NVMIDIANS met with them that caried this ſiluer pot, & would haue taken it from them by force, but they ſtood to it, and would not part with all, and ſo fighting and ſtriuing together for it, the bones and aſhes were ſcattered all about. Hannibal hearing this, ſaid to them that were about him: See, how nothing can be, which the gods will not. So he puniſhed the NVMIDIANS, & cared no more to get Marcellus bones together, but perſwaded himſelf it was the will of their gods he ſhould die ſo ſtrangely, & that his body ſhould haue no burial. Cornelius Nepos, & Valerius Maximus write it thus: but Liuy and Auguſtus Cæſar ſay, that the pot was caried vnto his ſonne, and honorably buried: Marcellus did conſecrate many monuments in diuers places, beſides thoſe at ROME. As at CATANA in SICILE: a place for yong men to exerciſe themſelues in. In the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, in the temples of the gods called Cabires: many images and tables he brought from SYRACVSA. And in the Ile of LINDOS, in the temple of Minerua, where among other, there is a ſtatue of his, and this Epigramme grauen vnder it, as Poſidonius the Philoſopher writeth:

O thou my friend (I say) which passest forth by me,
Of Claudius Marcellus here, the image mayst thou see:
Whose family at Rome, was of the noblest name.
Seuen times he Consull chosen was, in which he ouercame
Great numbers infinite, (in open field and fight)
Of such as sought his countries spoile, and put them all to flight.

Marcellus posteritie.

The Author of this Epigramme reckoneth the two times of his being Viceconsull, for two whole Consulships: but his posteritie continued alwayes in great honour, vnto Marcellus the sonne of Octauia, (Augustus Cæsars sister) and of Caius Marcellus. He died a yong man, being Ædilis of ROME, and maried vnto Iulia, Augustus daughter, with whom he liued no long time. But to honour the memorie of him, Octauia his mother built the Library, and Augustus Cæsar the Theater, which are called to this day, Marcellus Theater and Library.

THE COMPARISON OF Marcellus with Pelopidas.

Pelopidas and Marcellus acts in warres.

THese are the greatest things and best worthy of memory (in my opinion) of all Pelopidas and Marcellus doings: and for their maners and natural conditions otherwise, they were all one, because they were both valiant, painful, & noble minded: sauing that this difference onely was betweene them: that Marcellus in many cities he tooke by assault, did cruelly murder them, and spilt much bloud: where Epaminondas and Pelopidas cõtrarily did neuer put any to the sword they ouercame, neither did they take away the liberty from any city they took: as it is thought the THEBANS would not haue handled the ORCHAMENIANS so cruelly as they did, if one, or both of them had bene present. Now for their acts, it was a noble and wonderfull peece of seruice that Marcellus did, with so small a company of horsemen as he took with him, to ouerthrow so great a company of horsemen and footmen both, of the GAVLES: a thing that neuer Generall but himselfe did, and specially that slue with his own hands in the field the Generall of his enemies: which Pelopidas could neuer attaine vnto; for he seeking to kill Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, was slaine first himselfe, and suffered that, which he desired to haue done to another. And yet for that seruice may be obiected, the battels of LEVCTRES, and of TEGYRA, which were both famous and notable. But to encounter with those, there was no notable ambush or secret practise done by Marcellus, that was any thing like comparable to that Pelopidas did at his returne from exile, when he slue the tyrants that kept THEBES in bondage. For that was as notable a policie and sodaine an enterprise stolen vpon, as none was euer greater, or more famous. It is true Marcellus was yoked with Hannibal, who was a dreadfull & a violent enemie: so were the THEBANS also at that very time with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who notwithstanding were ouercome of Pelopidas, at the battels of TEGYRA, and of LEVCTRES. Whereas Marcellus did neuer so much as once ouercome Hannibal, as Polybius writeth, but but remained vnconquered alwaies, vntil that Scipio ouercame him in battell. Notwithstanding, we do giue best credit to the reports of Cæsar, Liuie, Cornelius, Nepos, and of king Iuba among the GRECIANS: who write that Marcellus otherwhile did ouerthrow certaine of Hannibals companies, howbeit they were neuer no great ouerthrowes to speake of, and it seemeth rather, it was through some mockery or deceit of that AFRICAN then otherwise. Yet sure it was a great matter and worthy much commendation, that the ROMAINS were brought to that courage, as they durst abide to fight with the CARTHAGINIANS, after so many great ouerthrowes, and hauing so many Generals of their armies slaine in battell, and the whole Empire of ROME being in so great danger of vtter destruction. For it was Marcellus only of all other Generals, that put the ROMAINES in heart againe, after so great and long a feare throughly rooted in them: and incouraged the souldiers also to long to fight with their enemie, and not only to hope, but to assure themselues of victory. For, where by reason of their continuall losses and fearefull ouerthrowes they had, they thought themselues happy men to escape Hannibals hands by running away: he taught them to be ashamed to flie like cowards, to confesse they were in distresse, to retire, and leaue the field, before they had ouercome their enemies. And where Pelopidas was neuer ouercome in battell being Generall, and Marcellus did ouercome more then any General in his time: it might seeme therefore that the great number of the victories of the one, shold compare with the good hap of the other that was neuer ouercome. It is true that Marcellus took the city of SYRACVSA, and Pelopidas failed of taking the city of SPARTA: but yet do I thinke that it was more valiantly done of Pelopidas to come so neare SPARTA as he did, & that he was the first that passed the riuer of EVROTAS with an army, which neuer enemy did before him, then it was of Marcellus to win all SICILE. Vnlesse some peraduenture wil say againe, this was Epaminondas, not Pelopidas act, as also in the victorie of LEVCTRES: whereas no man liuing can challenge any part of glory in the doings of Marcellus: for he tooke SYRACVSA, being only General alone, and did ouerthrow the GAVLES without his fellow Consull, & fought with Hannibal, without any mans helpe or incouragement (for all other were against it, and perswaded the contrary) and he was the first that altered the manner of wars the ROMAINES vsed then, and that trained his souldiers that they durst fight with the enemy. For their death, I neither commend the one nor the other, & the strangenesse of either of their deathes doth grieue me maruellously: as I do greatly wonder also, how Hannibal in so many battels as he fought (which are innumerable) could alwayes scape vnhurt. I cannot but greatly commend also the valiantnesse of one Chrysantas, whom Xenophon speaketh of in his books of the institution of Cyrus, saying: that he hauing lift vp his sword in his hand ready to kill one of his enemies, & hearing the trumpet sound the retraite, he softly retired, and would not strike him. Howbeit it seemeth Pelopidas is more to be excused: for beside that he was very hote and desirous of battell, his anger was honourable and iust, and moued him to seeke reuenge. For as the Poet Euripides saith:

Marcellus made the Romaines courageous.

Rashnesse in a captain deserueth blame.

The valiantesse and obedience of Chrysantas a souldier.

The best that may betide, is when a captaine liues,
And doth suruiue the victories, which he with force atchines:
But if he needs must fall, then let him valiantly
Euen thrust amid the thickest throng, and there with honor die.

For so becommeth his death famous, and not dishonorable. But now, besides Pelopidas iust cause of anger, yet was there another respect that most pricked him forward, to do that he did: for he saw his victory ended, in the death of the tyrant: otherwise he hardly should haue found so noble an occasion to haue shewed his valiantnesse, as in that. And Marcellus contrarily, without any instant necessity, and hauing no cause or heate of choler (which putteth all men valiant in fight besides themselues, that they know not what they do) did rashly & vnaduisedly, thrust himselfe into the middest of the danger, where he died not as a General, but as a light horsman and skout (abandoning his three triumphes, his fiue Consulships, and his spoiles and tokens of triumph, which he had gotten of kings with his owne hands) among venturous SPANIARDS and NVMIDIANS, that sold their bloud and liues for pay vnto the CARTHAGINIANS: so that I imagine they were angry with themselues (as a man would say) for so great & happy victory, to haue slaine amongst FREGELLANIAN skouts, and light horsemen, the noblest and worthiest person of the ROMAINES. I would no man should thinke I speake this in reproch of the memory of these two famous men, but as a griefe only of them and their valiantnesse: which they employed so, as they blemished all their other vertues, by vndiscreete hazarding of their persons and liues without cauſe, as if they would and ſhould haue died for themſelues, and not rather for their countrey and friends. And alſo when they were dead. Pelopidas was buried by the allies and confederates of the city of THEBES, for whoſe cauſe he was ſlaine: and Marcellus in like manner, by the enemies ſelues that had ſlaine him. And ſure the one is a happy thing, and to be wiſhed for in ſuch a caſe: but the other is farre aboue it, and more to be wondred at: That the enemy himſelfe ſhould honour his valiantneſſe and worthineſſe that hurt him, more then the office of friendſhip performed by a thankfull friend. For nothing moueth the enemy more to honour his dead enemy, then the admiration of his worthineſſe: and the friend ſheweth friendſhip many times, rather for reſpect of the benefits he hath receiued, then for the loue he beareth to his vertue.

THE LIFE OF Ariſtides.

ARISTIDES the ſon of Lyſimachus, was certainly of the tribe of Antiochides, and of the towne of ALOPECIA. But for his goods and wealth they diuerſly write of him. For ſome ſay, he liued poorely all the dayes of his life, and that he left two daughters, which by reaſon of their pouerty, liued vnmaried many yeares after their fathers death. And many of the oldeſt writers do confirme that for troth. Yet Demetrius Phalerius, in his booke intituled Socrates, writeth the contrary: that he knew certaine lands Ariſtides had in the village of PHALERIA, which did yet beare the name of Ariſtides lands, in the which his body is buried. And furthermore, to ſhew that he was well to liue, and that his houſe was rich & wealthy, he bringeth forth theſe prooſes. Firſt, that he was one yeare Mayor or Prouoſt of ATHENS, whom they called Archon Eponymos, becauſe the yeare tooke the name of him that had it yearely. And they ſay, he came to it by drawing of the beane, according to the ancient vſe of the ATHENIANS, and their wonted manner of making their election of the ſaid office: in which election none were admitted to draw the beane, but ſuch as were higheſt ſet in their ſubſidie bookes, according to the value and rate of their goods, whom they called at ATHENS, Pentacoſiomedimnes, as you would ſay, thoſe that might diſpend fiue hundred buſhels of wheate by the yeare, & vpwards. Secondly, he alledgeth he was baniſhed by the Oſtraciſmon, which baniſheth the Nobility & great rich men onely: whom the common people enuie, becauſe of their greatneſſe; and neuer dealeth with

with poore men. The third and laſt reaſon he makes, is, that he left of his gift, three footed ſtooles in the temple of Bacchus, which thoſe do commonly offer vp, as haue won the victory in comedies, tragedies, or other ſuch like paſtimes, where they themſelues had borne the charge. And thoſe three footed ſtooles remaine there yet, which they ſay were giuen by Ariſtides and haue this inſcription vpon them: The tribe of Antiochides wanne the victorie, Ariſtides defrayed the charges of the games, and Archeſtratus the Poet taught them to play his comedies. The laſt reaſon, though it ſeeme likelieſt of them all, yet is it the weakeſt of the reſt. For Epaminondas (whom euery man knoweth was poore euen from his birth, and alwayes liued in great pouertie) and Plato the Philoſopher, tooke vpon them to defray the charges of games that were of no ſmall expence: the one hauing borne the charges of flute players at THEBES, and the other the dance of the children which danced in a round at ATHENS: towards the furniſhing of which charges Dion the SYRACVSAN gaue Plato mony, and Pelopidas alſo gaue Epaminondas money. Now, this is not ſpoken that vertuous men ſhould alwayes refuſe the gifts of their friends, and that they might not in ſome ſort accept their friends courteſie offered them: but becauſe they ſhould thinke it vncomely and diſhonourable for them, to take any thing to enrich themſelues, or to ſpare and hoord vp. Howbeit where there is any honorable act to be done, or any publike ſhew to be made, not tending to their priuate benefite: in ſuch a caſe they ſhould not refuſe their friends louing offer and goodwill towards them. And where Demetrius ſaith, the three footed ſtoole was offered vp in the temple of Bacchus, Panætius declareth plainely, that Demetrius was deceiued by the ſemblance of the name. For ſince the time of the wars of ỹ MEDES, vnto the beginning of the war of PELOPONNESVS, in all the regiſters and records kept of the defrayers of the charges of common playes, there were found but two men bearing name of Ariſtides that obtained victory: and neither of them both was ſonne vnto Lyſimachus, whom we write of at this preſent. For the one is expreſly named the ſon of Xenophilus, and the other was long after the ſame Ariſtides we now ſpeake of: as appeareth eaſily by the writing and orthographie, which is according to the grammer rules, we haue vſed in GREECE euer ſince Euclides time. Moreouer it is eaſie to be knowne, by the name of the Poet Archiſtratus that is adioyning to it: for there is no man that maketh mention of a Poet of this name, in all the wars of the MEDES: but in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, many do put him in for an Author and maker of rimes and ſongs that were ſung in common dances. Yet for all Panætius obiections, the matter is to be better looked into, and conſidered of. But for the Oſtraciſmon baniſhment, it is true, that ſuch as were great men in eſtimation aboue the cõmon people, either in fame, nobility, or eloquence, they onely were ſubiect vnto this baniſhment. For Damon himſelfe, being Pericles ſchoolemaſter, was baniſhed, only becauſe the common people thought him too wiſe. Moreouer, Idomæneus writeth, that Ariſtides was their prouoſt for a yeare, not by lot of beanes, but by voice of the ATHENIANS that choſe him. And if he were prouoſt ſince the iourney of PLATÆES, as Demetrius writeth, it is likely inough that they did him this honour, for his great vertue and notable ſeruice, which other were wont to obtaine for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not only defend Ariſtides, but alſo Socrates pouertie, as if it were a foule vice and reproch to be poore. For he writeth, that he had not only a houſe of his own, but alſo threeſcore and ten minas at vſurie, which Criton gaue him intereſt for. But now to our ſtory againe. Ariſtides was Cliſthenes very friend, he that reſtored the gouernement at ATHENS after the expulſion of the thirty tyrants, and did reuerence Lycurgus the Law-maker of the LACEDÆMONIANS for his lawes, aboue all the men in his time: and therefore he euer fauoured the ſtate of Ariſtocratia, that is, where the noble men rule, and haue the ſoueraignitie. Howbeit he euer had Themiſtocles (Neocles ſonne) his continual aduerſarie, as taking part with the contrary, and defending the popular ſtate of gouernement. Some ſay, that being ſchollers, and brought vp together, they were euer contrary one to another in all their actions and doings, were it in ſport, or in matter of earneſt: and euer after, men beganne to ſee the naturall inclination of them both, by their contrarie affections. For Themiſtocles was quicke, nimble, aduenturous, and ſubtill, and would venture on any thing vpon light occaſion. Ariſtides contrariwiſe was very quiet, temperate, conſtant and maruellous well ſtaied, who would for no reſpect be drawne away from equity and iuſtice, neither would lie, flatter, nor abuſe any body, though it were but in ſport. Notwithſtanding Ariſtus of CHIO writeth, that their malice beganne firſt of light loue, and that it grew to greatneſſe by proceſſe of time betweene them: (for ſaith he) both the one and the other of them fell in loue with Steſilens, borne in the Ile of Caos. This fond light loue of theirs, fell not eaſily from them, nor the enuy they conceiued one againſt another, but cõtinued againſt each other in matters of ſtate: ſuch were their malice towards one another. In which calling, Themiſtocles ſought the way to winne friends, by whoſe meanes he came to great preferment in ſhort time, and had made himſelfe very ſtrong by them. Therefore, when a friend of his told him one day, he was worthy to gouerne the city of Athens, and were very fit for it, if he were indifferent, and not partiall: The gods forbid (quoth he) I ſhould euer occupie the place of a gouernour, where my friends ſhould not find more fauour then ſtrangers, that do me no pleaſure. But Ariſtides taking another courſe by himſelfe, would not ſtand vpon his friends in gouernement. Firſt, becauſe he would do no man wrong with pleaſuring his friends: nor yet would anger them, by denying their requeſts. Secondly, becauſe he ſaw many rulers and men of authority bold to do iniuſtice and manifeſt wrong, bearing themſelues vpon their friends: but he carried this opinion, that no honeſt man or good citizen, ſhould truſt to any bolſtering of friends, but to his owne iuſt and vpright doings. Notwithſtanding, Ariſtides perceiuing that Themiſtocles did raſhly alter many things, and euer encountered all his wayes, and hindered his doings, he was enforced ſometime to croſſe Themiſtocles againe, and to ſpeake againſt that he preferred, partly to be euen with him, but moſt to hinder his credite and authority, which increaſed ſtill through the peoples fauour and goodwils towards him: thinking it better by contrarying him a little to diſappoint ſometime a thing that might haue fallen out well for the common-wealth, rather then by giuing him the head, to ſuffer him to grow too great. To conclude, it fortuned on a time that Themiſtocles hauing preferred a matter very profitable for the common-wealth, Ariſtides was ſo much againſt it, as Themiſtocles purpoſe took no place. Moreouer Ariſtides was ſo earneſt againſt him, that when the counſell brake vp after Themiſtocles motion was reiected, he ſpake it openly before them all: that the common wealth of Athens would neuer proſper vntill they both were laid in Barathrum, which was a priſon or hole, wherin they put all theeues and condemned men. Another time, Ariſtides moued a matter to the people, which diuerſe were againſt, but yet it went with him. And when the Iudge or Preſident of the counſell did put it to the people, to know their allowance of it: Ariſtides perceiuing by the arguments made againſt it, that the matter he preferred was hurtful to the cõmon-wealth, he gaue it ouer, and would not haue it paſſe. Many times alſo Ariſtides ſpake by other men, when he would haue a thing go forward, for feare leſt Themiſtocles ſpite towards him, would hinder the benefite of the common-wealth. They found him very conſtant and reſolute in matters of ſtate, whatſoeuer happened: which wan him great commendation. For he was neuer the prouder for any honour they gaue him, nor thought himſelfe diſgraced for any ouerthrow he receiued: being alwayes of this mind, that it was the duty of an honeſt citizen, to be euer ready to offer his body and life to do his countrey ſeruice, without reſpect and hope of reward of money, or for honour and glorie. Therefore when certaine verſes were repeated in the Theater, of one of the tragedies of Æſchilus made in commendation of the ancient ſoothſayer Amphiaraus, to this effect:

Themiſtocles ſaying for partiality.

Ariſtides conſtancie.

He will not onely ſeeme, a iuſt man by his face,
But iuſt indeed he will be found, and vertue ſtill embrace
With all his thought and ſoule, from whence there may proceed
Graue counſels, for to beautifie his countries crowne indeed.

All the people ſtraight caſt their eyes vpon Ariſtides, as vpon him, that in truth aboue all other moſt deſerued the praiſe of ſo great a vertue. For he was ſo ſtout and reſolute, not only to reſiſt fauour & friendſhip, but to reiect hate and anger alſo. For in caſe of iuſtice, neither could friendſhip make him go awry for his friends ſake: nor enuy could moue him to do iniuſtice, to his very enemy. For proofe hereof it is written, that he had an enemy of his in ſuite of law, and did proſecute it to iudgement: inſomuch as after the plaint was read, the Iudges were ſo angry with the offender, that without any more hearing of him, they would haue giuẽ ſentence againſt him. But Ariſtides riſing from his place, went and kneeled at the Iudges feete with the offender his enemie, and beſought them to giue him leaue to ſpeake, to iuſtifie and defend his cauſe, according to the courſe of law. Another time he being Iudge betweene two priuate men that pleaded before him, one of them ſaid vnto him: Ariſtides, this fellow mine aduerſary here, hath done you great iniury. My friend (quoth Ariſtides againe) I pray thee tell me only the iniury he hath done thee, for I am Iudge here to do thee right, and not my ſelfe. Moreouer, he being

choſen high treaſurer of all the reuenues of ATHENS, did declare that all the officers before him, & other his late predeceſſours, had greatly robbed and ſpoiled the common treaſure, but ſpecially Themiſtocles: who was a wiſe man, and of great iudgement, but yet ſomewhat light fingered. Therefore when Ariſtides was to giue vp his account, Themiſtocles and many other ſubborned by him, were againſt him, and accuſed him for abuſing his office, and followed him ſo hard, that through their practiſe they condemned him, as Idomeneus writeth. Yet the nobleſt citizens ſeeing what iniury they offered Ariſtides, tooke his cauſe in hand, and found meanes to procure the people not only to releaſe the fine impoſed vpon him, but to reſtore him againe to his office of high treaſurer for the yeare following: in the which he ſeemed to repent his former ſtraightneſſe in gouernment the yeare before, & dealt more fauourably with thoſe he had to do with, and would not examine euery thing ſo ſtraightly as he did before. Wherupon ſuch as were theeues and ſtealers of the treaſure of the cõmon-wealth, did maruellouſly praiſe and like him, and became ſuters for him to continue in the office. But when the day of election came, that the ATHENIANS would chuſe him againe, Ariſtides ſelfe reproued them, and ſaid: When I faithfully diſcharged the duty of mine office committed to me by you, I then receiued ſhame and reproch at your hands: and now that I haue diſſembled, not ſeeming to ſee the thefts and robberies done vpon your treaſure, ye claw me, and ſay I am an honeſt man, and a good citizen. But I would you knew it, and I tell you plainely, I am more aſhamed of the honour you do me now, then I was of the fine you did ſet vpon me, when you condemned me the laſt yeare: and I am ſory to ſpeake it, that you ſhould thinke it more commendation to pleaſure the wicked, then to preſerue the common-wealth. After he had ſpoken theſe words, and had bewrayed the common thefts the officers of the city did commit, he ſtopped the theeues mouthes that ſo highly praiſed and commended him for ſo honeſt a man: but yet of the noble and honeſt citizens he was much commended. Furthermore, on a time when Dathis Lieutenant to Darius king of PERSIA, was come with all his nauy to go aland about MARATHON, in the countrey of ATTICA, vpon pretence (as he ſaid) to be reuenged only of the ATHENIANS, that had burnt the city of SARDIS, but indeed of mind to conquer all GREECE, and to deſtroy the whole country before him: the ATHENIANS choſe ten captaines to go to the warres among whom Miltiades was the chiefeſt man of authority. But Ariſtides drew very neare him in reputation and credite, becauſe he did very good ſeruice in obtaining the victory, ſpecially when he agreed with Miltiades in counſell, to giue battell vpon the barbarous people: and alſo when he willingly gaue Miltiades the whole rule and order of the army. For euery one of the ten captaines did by turnes leade the whole army for one whole day: and when Ariſtides turne came about, he gaue his preferment thereof vnto Miltiades, teaching his other companions, that it was no ſhame, but honour for them to be ruled by the wiſeſt. Thus by his example he appeaſed all ſtrife that might haue growne among them, and perſwaded them all to be contented to follow his direction and counſell, that had beſt experience in the war. And ſo he did much aduance Miltiades honor. For after that Ariſtides had once yeelded his authority vnto him, euery one of the reſt did the like when it came to their turne: and ſo they all ſummitted themſelues vnto the rule and leading. But on the day of the battel, the place where the ATHENIANS were moſt combred, was in the middeſt of the battell, where they had ſet the tribes of the Leontides, and of Antiochides: for thither the barbarous people did bend all their force, & made their greateſt fight in that place. By which occaſion, Themiſtocles & Ariſtides fighting one hard by another, for that the one was of the tribe Leontites, and the other of Antiochides, they valiantly fought it out with the enemies, enuying one another: ſo as the barbarous people at the laſt being ouerthrowne, they made them flie, and draue them to their ſhips. But when they were imbarked and gone, the captaines of the ATHENIANS perceiuing they made not towards the Iles, which was their direct courſe to returne into ASIA, but that they were driuen backe by ſtorme of wind and pyrries of the ſea, towards the coaſt of ATTICA & the city of ATHENS, fearing leſt they might find ATHENS vnfurniſhed for defence, and might ſet vpon it: they thereupon ſent away preſently nine tribes that marched thither with ſuch ſpeed, as they came to ATHENS the very ſame day, and left Ariſtides in the campe at MARATHON, with his tribe and countreymen, to looke to the priſoners and ſpoile they had won of the barbarous people. Who nothing deceiued the opinion they had of his wiſdome. For notwithſtanding there was great ſtore of gold and ſiluer, much apparell, moueables, and other infinite goods and riches in all their tents and pauilions, and in the ſhips alſo they had taken of theirs: he was not so couetous as once to touch them, nor to suffer any other to meddle with thē, vnlesse by stealth some prouided for themselues. As amongst other, there was one Callias, one of Ceres priests, called Dadouchos, as you would say, the torch-bearer, (for in the secret sacrifices of Ceres, his office was to hold the torch) whom when one of the barbarous people saw, and how he wore a band about his head, and long haire, he tooke him for some king, and falling on his knees at his feet, kissed his hand, and shewed him great store of gold he had hidden and buried in a ditch. But Callias, like a most cruell, and cowardly wretch of all other on the earth, took away the gold, and killed the poore soule that had shewed him the place, because he should not tell it to others. Hereof it cometh, that the comicall Poet do call those that came of him in mockerie, Laccoplutes, as made rich by a ditch: because of the gold that Callias found in it. Immediatly after this battell, Aristides was chosen prouost of ATHENS for the yeare: albeit Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that it was a little before his death, after the iourney of PLATÆES: For in their Chronicles, where they set in order their prouosts of ATHENS for the yeare, since Xanthippides time, there appeared no one name of Aristides in that yeare that Mardonius the king of PERSIANS Lieutenant was ouerthrowne by PLATÆES, which was many yeares after: but contrariwise, they find Aristides enrolled among the prouosts immediatly after Phanippus, in the yeare the battell was fought at MARATHON. Now the people did most commend Aristides iustice, before all his other vertues and qualities: because that vertue is most common and in vse in our life, and deliuereth most benefite to men. Hereof it came, that he being a meane man, obtained the worthiest name that one could haue, to be called by the whole city, a iust man. This surname was neuer desired of kings, princes, nor of tyrants, but they alwaies delighted to be surnamed, some Poliorcetes, to say, conquerors of cities: other Cerauni, to say, lightning or terrible: other Nicanores, to say subduers: and some other, Æti and Hieracles, to say, Eagles or Faulcons, or such like birds that prey: desiring rather (as it should appeare by those surnames) the praise and reputation growing by force and power, then the commendation that riseth by vertue and goodnesse. Yet notwithstanding, God whom they desire most to be likened to, doth excell all humane nature in three seuerall things: in immortality, in power, and in vertue, of which three, vertue is the most honourable & precious thing. For as the naturall Philosophers reason, all the foure elements & Vacuum, are immortall and vncorruptible, and so are force and power, earth-quakes, lightning, terrible stormes, running riuers, and inundations of waters: but as for iustice and equity, no man is partaker of them, saue onely God, by meanes of reason and vnderstanding. Therefore, because men commonly haue three sundry affections of the gods: the first, that they thinke them blessed: the second, that they feare them: the third, that they reuerence them: it appeareth then that they thinke them blessed, for the eternity and immortalitie of their godhead: that they feare them, because of their omnipotency and power: and that they loue and worship them, for their iustice and equitie. And yet notwithstanding, of those three, men do couet immortality, which no flesh can attaine vnto: and also power, which dependeth most vpon fortune: and in the meane time they leaue vertue alone, whereof the gods of their goodnesse haue made vs capable. But here they shew themselues fooles. For Iustice maketh the life of a noble man, and of one in great authority, seeme diuine and celestiall: where without iustice, and dealing vniustly, his life is most beastly, and odious to the world. But now againe to Aristides. This surname of a iust man at the beginning, made him beloued of all the people: but afterwards it turned him to great ill will, and specially by Themistocles practise: who gaue it out euery where, that Aristides had ouerthrowne all iustice, because by consent of the parties he was euer chosen Arbitrator to end all controuersies: and that by this meanes he secretly had procured the absolute power of a king, not needing any gard or soldiers about him. The people moreouer being grown very dissolute & licencious, by reason of the victory of MARATHON, and seeking to haue all things passe by them and their authority, began now to mislike, and to be greatly offended, that any priuate man should go before the rest in good fame and reputation. Whereupon, they came out of all shires of ATTICA into the city of ATHENS, and so banished Aristides with the Ostracismon: disguising the enuy they bare to his glory with the name of feare of tyranny. For this maner of banishment called Ostracismon, or Exostracismon, was no ordinary punishment for any fault or offence committed: but to giue it an honest cloke, they said it was onely a pulling downe and tying short of too much greatnesse and authority, exceeding far the matter and countenance of a popular state. wiſe, then a gentle meane to qualifie the peoples enuy againſt ſome priuate perſon: which enuy bred no malice to him whoſe greatneſſe did offend them, but onely tended to the baniſhing of him for ten yeares. But afterwards when by practiſe, this Oſtraciſmon baniſhment was laid vpon meane men, and malefactors, as vpon Hyperbolus that was the laſt man ſo baniſhed, they neuer after vſed it any more at ATHENS. And by the way it ſhall not be amiſſe to tell you here, why and wherefore this Hyperbolus was baniſhed. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefeſt men of ATHENS at that time, and they both were euer at ſquare together, a common thing amongſt great men. They perceiuing now by the peoples aſſembling, that they went about to execute the Oſtraciſmon, were maruellouſly affraid it was meant to baniſh one of them: wherefore they ſpake together, and made both their followers friends with each other, and ioyned them in one tribe together, inſomuch, when the moſt voices of the people were gathered to condemne him that ſhould be baniſhed, they found it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended, to ſee the Oſtraciſmon ſo embaſed and ſcorned, that they neuer after would vſe it againe, and ſo left it off for euer. But briefly to let you vnderſtand what the Oſtraciſmon was, and after what ſort they vſed it: ye are to know, that at a certain day appointed, euery citizen caried a great ſhell in his hand, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would haue baniſhed, and brought it into a certaine place railed about with woodden barres in the market place. Then, when euery man had brought in his ſhell, the magiſtrates and officers of the city did count and tell the number of them: for if there were leſſe then 6000 citizens, that had thus brought theſe ſhels together, the Oſtraciſmon was not full and perfect. That done, they laid apart euery mans name written in theſe ſhels: and whoſe name they found written by moſt citizens, they proclaimed him by ſound of trumpet, a baniſhed man for ten yeares, during which time notwithſtanding, the party did enioy al his goods. Now euery man writing thus his name in a ſhel, whom they would haue baniſhed: it is reported there was a plaine man of the countrey (very ſimple) that could neither write nor reade, who came to Ariſtides (being the firſt man he met with) and gaue him his ſhell, praying him to write Ariſtides name vpon it. He being abaſhed withall, did aske the countrey man, if Ariſtides had euer done him any diſpleaſure. No, ſaid the country man, he neuer did me hurt, nor I know him not: but it grieues me to heare euery man call him a iuſt man. Ariſtides hearing him ſay ſo, gaue him no anſwer, but wrote his own name vpon the ſhell, and deliuered it againe to the country man. But as he went his way out of the city, he lift vp his hands to heauen, and made a prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, beſeeching the gods that the ATHENIANS might neuer haue ſuch troubles in hand, as they ſhould be compelled to call for Ariſtides againe. Notwithſtanding, within three yeares after, when Xerxes king of PERSIA came with his army through the countries of THESSALY and BOEOTIA, & entred into the heart of the country of ATTICA, the ATHENIANS reuoking the law of their Oſtraciſmon, called home againe all thoſe they had baniſhed, and ſpecially, becauſe they were affraid Ariſtides would take part with the barbarous people, and that his example ſhould moue many other to do the like; wherin they were greatly deceiued in the nature of the man: for before that he was called home, he continually trauelled vp and downe, perſwading and incouraging the GRECIANS to maintaine and defend their liberty. After that law was repealed by proclamation, & that Themiſtocles was choſen the only Lieutenant general of ATHENS, he did alwaies faithfully aid and aſſiſt him in al things, as well with his trauell, as alſo with his counſell: and thereby wan his enemies great honour, becauſe it ſtood vpon the ſafety and preſeruation of his countrey. For when Euribiades, Generall of the army of the GRECIANS, had determined to forſake the Ile of SALAMINA, and that the gallies of the barbarous people were come into the middeſt of the ſeas, and had enuironed the Iles all about, and the mouth of the arme of the ſtraight of SALAMINA, before any man knew they were thus incloſed in: Ariſtides departing out of the Ile of Ægina with a maruellous boldneſſe, ventured through the middeſt of all the barbarous ſhips and fleete, and by good hap got in the night into Themiſtocles tent, and calling him out, ſpake with him there in this ſort: Themiſtocles, if we be both wiſe, it is high time we ſhould now leaue off this vaine enuy and ſpite we haue long time borne each other, and that we ſhould enter into another ſort of enuy more honourable and profitable for vs both: I meane, which of vs two ſhould do his beſt endeauour to ſaue GREECE: you, by ruling and commanding all like Lieutenant generall: and I, by counſelling you the beſt, and executing your commandement: conſidering you are the man alone that will roundlieſt come vnto the point that is beſt: which is in my opinion, that we ſhould ſhould hazard battell by ſea within the ſtraight of SALAMINA, and that aſſoone as might be poſſible. But if our friends and confederates do let this to be put in execution, I do aſſure you your enemies do helpe it forward. For it is ſaid, that the ſea both before and behind vs, & round about vs, is couered all ouer with their ſhips, ſo as they that would not before, ſhall now be compelled of force, and in ſpight of their hearts, to fight and beſtirre them like men: becauſe they are compaſſed in all about, and there is no paſſage left open for them to eſcape, nor to flie. Whereunto Themiſtocles anſwered I am ſory, Ariſtides, that herein your honeſty appeareth greater then mine: but ſince it is ſo, that you haue deſerued the honor in beginning, and procuring ſuch an honourable and commendable ſtrife betweene vs, I will henceforth indeauour my ſelfe to exceed you in continuing this your deſire. After which anſwer, he told Ariſtides, how he purpoſed to mocke the barbarous king, and praied him to intreate Eurybiades to yeeld to his deuice, and to perſwade him that there was no other way to ſaue GREECE, but to fight by ſea: for Eurybiades gaue more credit to Ariſtides perſwaſions, then he did to Themiſtocles words: for when all the captaines were called to councell, to determine whether they ſhould giue battell, or not: one Cleocritus CORINTHIAN ſaid to Themiſtocles, that his counſel did not like Ariſtides at all as it ſeemed, becauſe he ſpake neuer a word to it being preſent. Ariſtides anſwered him ſtraight, that he vtterly miſtooke him. For (quoth he) if I did not thinke his counſell good, I would not hold my peace as I do: but now I am mute, not for any goodwill I beare him, but becauſe I find his counſell wiſe and ſound. While the captaines of the GRECIANS were reaſoning in this ſort, Ariſtides ſeeing PSYTTALEA (a litle Iland before SALAMINA within the ſtraight) full of men of warre of their enemies: imbarked immediatly the valianteſt and luſtieſt ſouldiers he had of all his countrey men, into the leaſt foyſtes or pinnaces he had among all his galleys: and went with them, and landed in that Ile, and ouerthrew all the barbarous people he found there, and put them to the ſword euery man, taking the chiefeſt of them only priſoners: among which were three ſons of Sandauce, the kings ſiſter, whom he ſent vnto Themiſtocles. Theſe three Lords were all ſlain by the commandement of Euphrantidas the ſoothſayer, and ſacrifiſed to Bacchus Omeſtes, as to ſay, the cruell Bacchus, and eater of raw fleſh, and all vpon an Oracle they had receiued. That done, Ariſtides diſperſed his ſouldiers about the Ile, to receiue all ſuch as were by fortune of war, out of the ſea, caſt into the Iland: to the end that no enemy of theirs ſhold ſcape their hands, nor any of his friends ſhould periſh. For the greateſt fleete of all their ſhips, & the ſharpeſt encounter of the whole battell, was about this litle Iland: and therefore the tokens of triumph were ſet there. After the battell was won, Themiſtocles to feele Ariſtides opinion, ſaid vnto him: We haue done a good peece of ſeruice, but yet there is another behind of greater importance, & that is this: We muſt bring all ASIA into EVROPE, which we may eaſily do, if we ſaile with all ſpeed to the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, and go breake the bridge the king hath made there. Then Ariſtides cried out, Stay there, neuer ſpeake of that: but I pray you let vs rather ſeeke all the waies we can, how to driue this barbarous king out of GREECE, leſt if we keepe him in ſtill with ſo great an army (and he ſhall ſee no way before him to eſcape out) we driue him then to fight like a deſperate man, and perill our ſelues, we cannot tell to what. When Themiſtocles had heard his opinion, he ſecretly ſent the Eunuke Arnaces his priſoner, vnto king Xerxes, to aduertiſe him frō him, that he had altered the GRECIANS purpoſe, which was fully bent to haue broken vp the bridge he had made at the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, to paſſe ouer his army: and that he was the willinger to let him vnderſtand it, that he might the better prouide for the ſafety of his perſon. King Xerxes being netled with this aduertiſement, tooke ſtraight his iourney, and with all ſpeed went to recouer the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, & left Mardonius his Lieutenant generall in GREECE, with three hundred thouſand of the beſt ſouldiers of his army. This Mardonius was marueilouſly dreaded of all the GRECIANS, for the wonderfull great army he had by land, and he did threaten them alſo by his letters he wrote vnto them: You haue (ſaid he) with your ſhips by ſea, ouercome men acquainted to fight by land, and that neuer handled ower: but now, the plaines of THESSALIE, or the fields of BOEOTIA, are very faire and large for horſemen and footemen to make proofe of their valiantneſſe, if you will come to the battell in the field. He wrote letters to the ATHENIANS, by the king his maſters commandement, of other effect, and offered them from him, to build vp their city againe, to giue them a great penſion, and furthermore to make them Lords of all GREECE, ſo they would giue ouer, and leaue off theſe warres. The LACEDÆMONIANS being forthwith aduertiſed of his letters written to the ATHENIANS, and

and fearing leſt they would haue bene perſwaded by them: ſent their Ambaſſadours withall ſpeed to ATHENS, to pray them to ſend their wiues and children vnto SPARTA, and alſo to offer them victuals, to relieue their poore old people, becauſe of the great ſcarcity that was at ATHENS, for that their city was burnt and razed, and all their country beſides deſtroyed by the barbarous people. The ATHENIANS hauing heard the offers of the Ambaſſadors of LACEDÆMON, made thē a maruellous anſwer through Ariſtides coūſel, & this it was: That they bare with the barbarous people, though they thought all things were to be ſold for gold & ſiluer, becauſe they eſteemed nothing more precious nor better in this world, then to be rich and wealthy: but on the other ſide, they were greatly offended with the LACEDÆMONIANS, that they onely regarded the preſent pouerty, and neceſſity of the ATHENIANS, and did forget their vertue and noble courage, thinking to make them fight more valiantly for the preſeruation of GREECE, by offering them victuals to liue withall. The people approuing this anſwer, Ariſtides then cauſed the Ambaſſadours of SPARTA to come to the aſſembly, and commanded them to tell the LACEDÆMONIANS by word of mouth, that all the gold aboue, or vnder the ground, could not corrupt the ATHENIANS, to make them take any ſumme of money or reward, to leaue the defence of the liberty of GREECE. And to the herauld that came from Mardonius, he ſhewed the Sunne, and ſaid vnto him: So long as yonder Sunne keepeth his courſe about the world, ſo long will the ATHENIANS be mortall enemies vnto the PERSIANS; becauſe they haue ſpoiled and deſtroyed all their country, and haue defiled and burnt the temples of their gods. Beſides, he willed that the prieſts, by commandement of the people, ſhould excommunicate and curſe him that would procure them to ſend vnto the PERSIANS to make peace with them, and to breake their league and alliance with the other GRECIANS. Hereupon, when Mardonius came againe the ſecond time to ouerrun the country of ATTICA, the ATHENIANS got them againe into the Ile of SALAMINA, and then they ſent Ariſtides Ambaſſadour vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. He ſharpely tooke them vp, and reproued their ſloth & negligence, becauſe they had againe forſaken ATHENS, and left it to the ſpoile of the barbarous people: & prayed them yet they would looke to ſaue the reſt of GREECE. The Ephori (which were certaine officers that ruled all things within the city of SPARTA) when they had heard Ariſtides perſwaſions, ſtraight tooke order for aide, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good cheere, keeping that day one of their ſolemne feaſts they called Hyacinthia. Howbeit the next night following, they ſent out fiue thouſand citizens born in SPARTA, into the field, al proper men & valiant ſoldiers, euery one of them carying with him ſeuen Ilotes (which are the country men and ſlaues in the country of LACEDÆMONIA) not making the Ambaſſadors of ATHENS priuy to it at al. Wherfore Ariſtides came againe another time into their counſell, to cōplaine of their negligence. But they fell a laughing, and ſaid he dreamed, or elſe he mocked them: for their army which they had ſent againſt the ſtrangers (for ſo they called the PERSIANS) was already at the city of ORESTION in ARCADIA. Ariſtides hearing their anſwer, replied, that they were to blame to mock them in that ſort, to ſend away their men ſo ſecretly, that they might not know of it: and that it was no time for them now to go about to deceiue their friends, but their enemies rather. Idomeneus in his ſtory reporteth the matter thus in euery point: notwithſtanding, in the decree that was made to ſend Ambaſſadours to SPARTA, Ariſtides is not named for Ambaſſadour, but there are other appointed: as Cimon, Xanthippus, and Mironides. Afterwards Ariſtides was choſen by voices of the people, Lieutenant generall of the army of ATHENS, in this warre againſt the PERSIANS, and went vnto the campe of the GRECIANS by the city of PLATÆES, with eight thouſand footemen well armed and appointed. There he found king Pauſanias the onely Generall of all the whole power and army of the GRECIANS, who brought with him the force of SPARTA: and there came daily into his campe one after another, a maruellous great multitude of other GRECIANS. Now touching the army of the barbarous people, they incamped all along the riuer of ASOPVS: but becauſe their campe ſtretched out a maruellous way in length, they were not intrenched at al, but had only fortified a peece of ground foure ſquare with a wal about, which was ten furlongs on euery ſide, to place all their cariage and chiefeſt things in. And for the GRECIANS againe, the ſoothſayer Tiſamenus, borne in the city of ELIDE, had told Pauſanias, and all the GRECIANS together, that they ſhould haue the victory, ſo they did not aſſault at all, but only defend. And Ariſtides, that had ſent to the Oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, in the name of ỳ ATHENIANS, had anſwer: They ſhould ouercome their enemies, ſo they did ſacrifiſe and make ſpeciall prayers vnto Iupiter and Iuno of mount CITHÆRON, vnto Pan, and vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, and alſo vnto the demy gods, Androcrates, Leucon, Piſander, Damocrates, Hypſion, Actæon, and Polyidus: and ſo that they did hazard battel alſo within their own territories, and in the plaine of Ceres Eleuſinian, and of Proſerpina. This Oracle troubled Ariſtides maruellouſly, becauſe the demy gods whom they had commandement to do ſacrifice vnto, were the founders and anceſtors of the PLATÆIANS: and the caue of the Nymphes Sphragitides, is one of the tops of the mount CITHÆRON, looking towards the Weſt, where the Sunne ſetteth in Sõmer. They ſay there was an Oracle there in old time, whoſe ſpirit poſſeſſed many inhabitants thereabours, & beſtraught them of their wits: whereupon, they called thoſe ſo poſſeſſed, Nympholepti, as who would ſay, taken with the Nymphes. And againe, to tell the ATHENIANS they ſhould haue the victory, ſo they did hazard battell in the plaine of Ceres Eleuſinian, and within their owne teritory: it was euen to ſend them backe againe into the country of ATTICA. Ariſtides being thus perplexed, Arimneſtus captaine of the PLATÆIANS, had ſuch a viſion in the night in his ſleepe. He thought, that Iupiter the ſauiour did appeare vnto him, and asked him what the GRECIANS intended to do? and that he anſwered: My Lord, we muſt to morrow remoue our campe into the territories of ELEVSIN, & there we wil fight with the barbarous people, according to the cõmandement the Oracle of Apollo hath giuen vs. Then that Iupiter replied, that they were greatly deceiued: for all that Apollo had declared by his Oracle was meant within the territories of the PLATÆIANS, and that they ſhould find it true, if they conſidered it well. Arimneſtus hauing plainly ſeene this viſion in his ſleepe, when he did awake in the morning, he ſtraight ſent for the oldeſt citizens, and conſidering with them where this place ſhould be, he found at the length, that at the foote of mount CITHÆRON, by the city of NYSIA, there was an old temple they called the temple of Ceres Eleuſinian, and of her daughter Proſerpina. When he heard them ſay ſo, he went ſtraight and told Ariſtides of it, and found that it was an excellent place to ſet an army in battell ray, that had but few horſemen: for that the foot of mount CITHÆRON did let the horſemen, they could not go to the place where the temple ſtood, and where the plaine and valley did end: beſides alſo, that the chappell of Androcrates was euen in that place, which was all hidden with thicke wood round about it. And becauſe they ſhould lacke nothing to hinder the expreſſe commandement of the Oracle for hope of victorie, the PLATÆIANS (through Arimneſtus counſell and aduice) made a common decree, that the confines of the city of PLATÆES ſhould be taken away towards ATHENS ſide, & that the land therof ſhold be giuen clearely vnto the ATHENIANS, becauſe they ſhould fight with the barbarous people in their owne land, for the defence and preſeruation of GREECE, according to the commandement of the Oracle. This noble gift and preſent of the PLATÆIANS was ſo famous, as many yeares after, king Alexander the great hauing conquered the Empire of ASIA, built vp the wals again of the city of PLATÆES, and when he had done, made a herauld openly proclaime it at the games Olympical, that Alexander had done the PLATÆIANS that honor and dignitie, for a memorial and honour of their magnanimitie; becauſe in the warre againſt the PERSIANS, they had freely and liberally giuen away their land vnto the ATHENIANS, for the ſafety of the GRECIANS: and had ſhewed themſelues of a noble courage alſo, and very willing to defend the ſtate of GREECE. Now when the army of the GRECIANS came to be ſet in order of battell, there fell a ſtrife betweene the ATHENIANS & the THEGEATES, becauſe the ATHENIANS would needs (according to their old cuſtome) haue the left wing of the battel if the LACEDÆMONIANS had the right wing: and the TEGEATES on the contrary part, would haue the preheminence before the ATHENIANS, alledging the famous acts & notable ſeruice of their anceſtors in former wars, whereupon the ATHENIANS did mutine. But Ariſtides ſtept betweene them, and told them, that it was no time now to contend with the TEGEATES about their nobility and valiantneſſe: and as for you, my Lords of SPARTA (ſaid he) and you alſo my maſters of GREECE: we tell you, that the place neither giueth nor taketh vertue away, and we do aſſure you that wherſoeuer you place vs, we will ſo defend and keepe it, as we will not impaire nor blemiſh the honour we haue won in former foughten battels and gotten victories. For we are not come hither to quarrell and fall out with our friends, but to fight with our common enemies: nor to brag of our anceſtors doings, but to ſhew our ſelues valiant in defence of all GREECE. For this battell will make good proofe of all the GRECIANS, how much eſtimation euery city, euery captaine, and particular perſon will deſerue for his part. When Ariſtides had ſpoken, the captaines and all other of the

the counſell concluded in fauour of the ATHENIANS, that they ſhould haue one of the wings of the battell. But by this meanes all GRECE ſtood in maruellous garboile at that time, and the ſtate of the ATHENIANS ſpecially in great danger. For a number of the nobleſt citizens of ATHENS, and that brought great ſubſtance with them to the wars, being now at low ſtate, and in pouerty, their goods being ſpent and gone, and ſeeing themſelues diſcountenanced, not bearing that rule and authoritie in the commonwealth they were wont to do, becauſe other were called to authority, and preferred to the offices of the citie: they gathered together, and met at a houſe in the city of PLATÆES, and there conſpired to ouerthrow the authority of the people at ATHENS: and if they could not obtaine their purpoſe, then that they would rather loſe all, and betray their country vnto the barbarous people. While theſe things were practiſed in the camp many being of the conſpiracy, Ariſtides came to an inckling of it, and was maruellouſly affraid, becauſe of the time: wherefore he began to be carefull of the matter, being of ſuch importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to vnderſtand the whole conſpiracy, litle knowing what a number might be drawn into this treaſon, if it were narrowly looked into, but rather reſpected that which was iuſt, then what was profitable for the time. So he cauſed eight perſons onely of the great number to be apprehended, & of theſe eight, the two firſt whom they would haue indited as principals, and were moſt to be burdened for the conſpiracy, Æſchines of the town of LAMPRA, & Egeſias of the towne of ACHARNA, they found meanes to flie out of the camp, and to ſaue themſelues. And for the other, Ariſtides ſet them at liberty, and gaue them occaſion that were not diſcouered, to be bold, and to repent them of their follies: ſaying, that the battel ſhould be their iudge, where they ſhold purge themſelues of all accuſations laid againſt them, and ſhew the world alſo, that they neuer had any other intention but honeſt & good, towards their country. Mardonius, to proue the courage of the GRECIANS, had ſent all his horſemen (wherein he was farre ſtronger then the GRECIANS) to skirmiſh with them. Who were lodged at the foote of mount CITHÆRON, in ſtrong places and full of ſtones, ſauing the three thouſand MEGARIANS, that camped in the plaine: by reaſon whereof, they were ſore troubled & hurt, by the horſmen of the barbarous people that ſet vpon them on euery ſide, for they might charge them where they would. In ſo much, in the end, perceiuing they alone could no longer reſiſt the force of ſo great a multitude of the barbarous people, they ſent with all ſpeed poſſible to Pauſanias, to pray him to ſend them preſent aide. Pauſanias hearing this newes, and ſeeing in his owne ſight the campe of the MEGARIANS almoſt couered with ſhot and darts which the barbarous people threw at them, and that they were compelled to ſtand cloſe together in a litle corner: he wiſt not what to do. For to go thither in perſon with the LACEDÆMONIANS that were footemen heauy armed, he thought that was no way to helpe them. So he proued to put ſome ambitious deſire & enuy of honor, among the priuate captaines & generals of the army of the other GRECIANS, which were then about him: to ſee if he could moue any mans courage and deſire, to offer himſelfe willingly to aide the MEGARIANS. Howbeit they had all deafe eares, but Ariſtides, who promiſed to go in the name of the ATHENIANS, and brought Olympiodorus into the field (one of the valianteſt captaines that ſerued vnder him) with his company of 300 choſen men, and certain ſhot mingled amongſt them. Theſe ſouldiers were ready in a moment, & marched ſtraight in battel ray, a great pace towards ỹ barbarous people. Maſiſtius, that was General of the horſmen of the PERSIANS, a goodly tall man, perceiuing their coming towards him: turned his horſe, and galloped to them. The ATHENIANS tarried him, and kept their ground, and the encounter was very hote, becauſe both the one and the other ſide did the beſt they could at this firſt onſet to put the reſt of the battell in ieopardy: and they fought ſo long, that Maſiſtius horſe was ſhot through the body with an arrow, that put him to ſuch paine as he neuer left flinging, til he caſt his maſter on the ground, armed as he was at all peeces. So being on the ground, he could not riſe againe, aſwel for the weight of his armor, as for that the ATHENIANS came ſo ſodainly vpon him. And notwithſtanding there were many about him to hew him in peeces, yet they could find no way how to kil him, he was ſo throughly armed & loden with gold, copper, and iron, not only vpon his body and his head, but alſo on his legs and armes: vntil at the length there was one that thruſt ỹ head of his dart through his beuer, & ſo killed him. The PERSIANS perceiuing that, fled immediatly, & forſooke the body of their General. Shortly after it appeared to the GRECIANS that they had ſped well at this skirmiſh, not becauſe they had ſlain many enemies, but for the great lamentation the barbarous people made for the loſſe of Maſiſtius. his death did ſo grieue them, that they polled themſelues, they clipped off their horſe and moyles haires, and filled beſides all the field thereabouts with pitifull cries & ſhreekes, as thoſe that had loſt the valianteſt and chiefeſt man of authority of all their camp, next vnto Mardonius the kings Lieutenant. After this firſt skirmiſh, both the one and the other ſide kept their campe, and would not come into the field many dayes after: for the ſoothſayers did promiſe both ſides the victorie, as much the PERSIANS, as the GRECIANS, ſo they did but only defend: and contrariwiſe, they did threaten them to be ouerthrowne, that did aſſault. But Mardonius finding victuals waxed ſcant, and that they were ſtored but for few dayes, and moreouer how the GRECIANS daily grew ſtronger by continual repaire to their camp, the longer he delayed: in the end he reſolued to tarry no longer, but to paſſe the riuer ASOPVS the next morning by breake of the day, and ſuddenly to ſet vpon the GRECIANS. So he gaue the captaines warning the night before what they ſhould do, becauſe euery man ſhould be ready. But about midnight there came a horſeman without any noiſe at all, ſo neere to the GRECIANS campe, that he ſpake to the watch, and told them he would ſpeake with Ariſtides Generall of the ATHENIANS. Ariſtides was called for ſtraight, and when he came to him, the horſeman ſaid vnto Ariſtides: I am Alexander king of MACEDON, who for the loue and great goodwill I beare you, haue put my ſelf in the greateſt danger that may be, to come at this preſent time to aduertiſe you, that to morrow morning Mardonius will giue you battell: becauſe your enemies ſudden coming vpon you, ſhould not make you affraid, being ſuddenly charged, and ſhould not hinder alſo your valiant fighting. For it is no new hope that is come to Mardonius, that makes him to fight, but onely ſcarcity of victuals that forceth him to do it, conſidering that the Prognoſticators are all againſt it that he ſhould giue you battel, both by reaſon of the ill tokens of their ſacrifices, as alſo by the anſwers of their Oracles, which hath put all the army in a maruellous feare, & ſtand in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to put all at a venture, or els if he wil needs lie ſtill to be ſtarued to death for very famine. After king Alexander had imparted this ſecret to Ariſtides, he prayed him to keepe it to himſelfe, and to remember it in time to come. Ariſtides anſwered him then, that it was no reaſon he ſhould keepe a matter of ſo great importance as that from Pauſanius, who was the Liuetenant generall of their whole army: notwithſtanding, he promiſed him he would tell it no man elſe before the battel, and that if the gods gaue the GRECIANS the victorie, he did aſſure him, they ſhould all acknowledge his great fauour and goodwill ſhewed vnto them. After they had talked thus together, king Alexander left him, and returned backe againe: and Ariſtides alſo went immediatly to Pauſanias tent, and told him the talke king Alexander and he had together. Thereupon the priuate captaines were ſent for ſtraight to councell, and there order was giuen, that euery man ſhould haue his bands ready, for they ſhould fight in the morning. So Pauſanias at that time (as Herodotus writeth) ſaid vnto Ariſtides, that he would remoue the ATHENIANS from the left to the right wing, becauſe they ſhould haue the PERSIANS themſelues right before them, and that they ſhould fight ſo much the luſtier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as alſo becauſe they had ouercome them before in the firſt encounter: and that himſelf would take the left wing of the battel, where he ſhould encounter with the GRECIANS that fought on the PERSIANS ſide. But when all the other priuate captaines of the ATHENIANS vnderſtood it, they were maruellous angry with Pauſanias, and ſaid he did them wrong, and had no reaſon to let all the other GRECIANS keepe their place where they were alwayes appointed, & onely to remoue them, as if they were ſlaues, to be appointed at his pleaſure, now on the one ſide, then on the other, & to ſet them in fight with the valianteſt ſoldiers they had of all their enemies. Then ſaid Ariſtides to them, that they knew not what they ſaid, and how before they miſliked, and did ſtriue with the TEGEATES, onely for hauing the left wing of the battell; and when it was granted, they thought themſelues greatly honoured that they were preferred before them, by order of the captaines: and now where the LACEDÆMONIANS were willing of themſelues to giue them the place of the right wing, and did in manner offer them the preheminence of the whole army: they do not thankfully take the honor offered them, nor yet do reckon of the vantage and benefit giuen them to fight againſt the PERSIANS ſelues, their ancient enemies, and not againſt their naturall countreymen anciently deſcended of them. When Ariſtides had vſed all theſe perſwaſions vnto them, they were very well contented to change place with the LACEDÆMONIANS: and then all the talke among them was to encourage one another, and to tell them that the PERSIANS that came againſt them, had no

them, had no better hearts nor weapons, then thoſe whom they before had ouercome, in the plaine of MARATHON. For ſaid they, they haue the ſame bowes, the ſame rich imbrodered gownes, the ſame golden chaines and carcanets of womaniſh perſons, hanging on their cowardly bodies & faint hearts: where we haue alſo the ſame weapons & bodies we had, and our hearts more liuely and couragious then before, through the ſundry victories we haue ſince gotten of them. Further, we haue this aduantage more: that we do not fight as our other confederates the GRECIANS do, for our city and country only, but alſo to continue the fame and renown of our former noble ſeruice, which we wan at the iourneys of MARATHON and of SALAMINA: to the end, the world ſhould not thinke that the glory of theſe triumphes and victories was due vnto Miltiades onely, or vnto Fortune, but vnto the courage and worthineſſe of the ATHENIANS. Thus were the GRECIANS throughly occupied to change the order of their battell in haſt. The THEBANS on the other ſide that tooke part with Mardonius, receiuing intelligence of the altering of their battell, by traytors that ranne betweene both campes, they ſtraight told Mardonius of it. He thereupon did ſuddenly alſo change the order of his battell, and placed the right wing of the PERSIANS againſt the left wing of his enemies: either becauſe he was affraid of the ATHENIANS, or elſe for greater glory that he had a deſire to fight with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commanded the GRECIANS that tooke his part, that they ſhould fight againſt the ATHENIANS. This alteration was ſo openly done, that euery man might ſee it: whereupon Pauſanias remoued the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, and ſet them in the right wing. Mardonius ſeeing that, remoued the PERSIANS againe from the right wing, and brought them to the left wing (where they were before) againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS: and thus they conſumed all that day in changing their men too and fro. So the captaines of the GRECIANS ſate in counſell at night, and there they agreed, that they muſt needs remoue their campe, and lodge in ſome other place where they might haue water at commandement: becauſe their enemies did continually trouble and ſpoile that water they had about them, with their horſes. Now when night came, the captaines would haue marched away with their men, to go to the lodging they had appointed: but the people went very ill willing, and they had much ado to keepe them together. For they were no ſooner out of the trenches & fortifications of their campe, but the moſt part of them ran to the city of PLATÆES, and were maruellouſly out of order, diſperſing themſelues here and there, and ſet vp their tents where they thought good, before the places were appointed for them: and there were none that taried behind, but the LACEDÆMONIANS onely, and that was againſt their wils: for one of their captaines called Amompharetus, a maruellous hardie man, that feared no danger, and longed ſore for battell, he was in ſuch a rage with theſe trifling delayes that he cryed it out in the camp, that this remouing was a goodly running away, and ſware he would not from thence, but would there tary Mardonius coming with his company. Pauſanias went to him, and told him he muſt do that the other GRECIANS had conſented to in counſell, by moſt voices. But Amompharetus tooke a great ſtone in his hands, and threw it downe at Pauſanias feete, and told him, There is the ſigne I giue to conclude battell, and I paſſe not for all your cowardly concluſions. Amompharetus ſtubburnneſſe did ſo amaze Pauſanias, that he was at his wits end. So he ſent vnto the ATHENIANS that were onwards on their way, to pray them to tary for him, that they might go together, and therwithall made the reſt of his men to march towards the city of PLATÆES, ſuppoſing thereby to haue drawne Amompharetus to haue followed him, or elſe to let him remaine alone behind. But in trifling his, the day brake: and Mardonius vnderſtanding that the GRECIANS did forſake their firſt lodging, he made his army preſently march in battell ray to ſet vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS. So the barbarous people made great ſhoutes and cries, not thinking to go fight, but to ſacke and ſpoile the GRECIANS flying away, as indeed they did little better. For, Pauſanias ſeeing the countenance of his enemies, made his enſignes to ſtay, and commanded euery man to prepare to fight: but he forgate to giue the GRECIANS the ſignall of the battell, either for the anger he took againſt Amompharetus, or for the ſudden onſet of the enemies, which made them that they came not in ſtraight, nor altogether to the battell after it was begun, but ſtragling in ſmall companies, ſome here, and ſome there. In the meane time, Pauſanias was buſie in ſacrificing to the gods, and ſeeing that the firſt ſacrifices were not acceptable vnto them, by the Soothſayers obſeruations they made, he commanded the SPARTANS to throw their targets at their feete, and not to ſtirre out of their places, but onely to do as he bade them, without reſiſting their enemies. When he had giuen this ſtraight order, he went againe & did ſacrifice, when the horſemen of the enemies were at hand, and that their arrowes flew amongſt the thickeſt of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and did hurt diuerſe of them, & ſpecially poore Callicrates among the reſt, that was one of the goodlieſt men in all the GRECIANS hoaſt and army. He hauing his deaths wound with an arrow, before he gaue vp the ghoſt, ſaid, His death did not grieue him, becauſe he came out of his country to die for the defence of GRECE: but it grieued him to die ſo cowardly, hauing giuen the enemy neuer a blow. His death was maruellous lamentable, and the conſtancie of the SPARTANS wonderfull: for they neuer ſtirred out of their places, nor made any countenance to defend themſelues againſt their enemies that came vpon them, but ſuffered thēſelues to be thruſt through with arrowes, and ſlaine in the field, looking for the houre the gods would appoint them, and that their captaines would command them to fight. Some write alſo, that as Pauſanias was at his prayers, and doing ſacrifice vnto the gods a litle behind the battel, certaine of the LYDIANS came vpon him, and ouerthrew and tooke away all his ſacrifice; and that Pauſanias, and thoſe that were about him (hauing no other weapons in their hands) draue them away with force of ſtaues and whips. In memory whereof, they ſay there is a ſolemne proceſſion kept at SPARTA on that day, which they call the LYDIANS proceſſion, where they whip and beate yong boyes about the altar. Then was Pauſanias in great diſtreſſe, to ſee the prieſts offer ſacrifice vpon ſacrifice, and that not one of them pleaſed the gods: at the laſt he turned his eyes to the temple of Iuno, and wept, and holding vp his hands, beſought Iuno Citharon, and all the other gods (patrons and protectours of the country of the PLATÆIANS) that if it were not the will of the gods the GRECIANS ſhould haue the victory yet that the conquerors at the leaſt ſhould buy their deaths dearely and that they ſhould find they fought againſt valiant men and worthy ſouldiers, Pauſanias had no ſooner ended his prayer, but the ſacrifices fell out very fauourable, in ſo much as the Prieſts and Soothſayers came to promiſe him victory. Thereupon, he ſtraight gaue commandement to march toward the enemy, which flew from man to man incontinently that they ſhould march. So as he that had ſeene the ſquadron of the LACEDÆMONIANS, would haue ſaid it had bene like the body of a fierce beaſt raiſing vp the briſtles, preparing to fight. Then the barbarous people ſaw they ſhould haue hot battell, and that they ſhould meete with men that would fight it out to the death: wherefore they couered their bodies with great targets after the PERSIAN faſhion, & beſtowed their arrowes luſtily vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, but they keeping cloſe together, and couering themſelues with their ſhields, marched on ſtill vpon them, vntil they came to ioyne with the enemy ſo luſtily, that they made their targets flie out of their hands, with the terrible thruſts and blowes of the pikes & ſpeares vpon their breaſts, & ouerhwart their faces, that they ſlue many of them, & laid them on the ground. For all that, they died not cowardly, but tooke the LACEDÆMONIANS pikes & ſpeares in their bare hands, and breake them in two by ſtrength of their armes: and then they quickly plucke out their cimiters and axes, and luſtily laid about them, and wrung the LACEDÆMONIANS ſhields out of their hands by force, and fought it out with them a great while hand to hand. Now whileſt the LACEDÆMONIANS were buſily fighting with the barbarous people, the ATHENIANS ſtood ſtill imbattelled farre off, and kept their ground. But when they ſaw the LACEDÆMONIANS tary ſo long, and that they came not, & heard a maruellous noiſe of men as though they were fighting, and beſides that there came a ſpeedy meſſenger vnto them ſent from Pauſanias, to let them vnderſtand they were fighting: then they marched with all ſpeed they could to helpe them. But as they were coming on a great pace ouer the plaine, vnto that part where they heard the noiſe, the GRECIANS that were on Mardonius ſide came againſt them. Ariſtides ſeeing them coming towards them, went a good way before his company, and cried out as loud as he could for life, and coniured the GRECIANS in the name of the gods, the protectors of GRECE, to leaue off theſe warres, and not to trouble the ATHENIANS that were going to helpe them that ventured their liues, to defend the commonwealth and ſafety of all GRECE. But when he ſaw they would needs fight for any requeſt and coniuration he could vſe, and that they came ſtil vpon them, bending themſelues to giue charge: then he ſtayed his going to relieue the LACEDÆMONIANS, and was compelled to make head againſt thoſe that ſet vpon him & his company, they being about fifty thouſand men; of the which, the moſt part notwithſtanding went their waies, and left the army, ſpecially when they vnderſtood the PERSIANS were ouerthrown and fled. The furie of the battell and cruelleſt fight (as they ſay) was where the THEBANS were: becauſe

Battell betwixt the Grecians and Perſians.

cauſe the Nobility & chiefeſt men of the country fought very earneſtly for the PERSIANS, but the people refuſed, being led by a ſmal number of the Nobility that commanded them. So they fought that day in two places, the LACEDÆMONIANS being the firſt that ouerthrew ŷ PERSIANS, and made them flie: & they ſlue Mardonius the kings lieutenant, with a blow of a ſtone one Arimneſtus a SPARTAN gaue him vpon his head, rightly as the Oracle of Amphiaraus had prophecied before vnto him. For Mardonius before the battell had ſent thither a LYDIAN, & a CARIAN vnto the Oracle of Throphonius, of the which the prophet made anſwer vnto ŷ CARIAN, in the CARIAN tongue: and the man of LYDIA lay within the ſanctuary of Amphiaraus, where he thought in his dream that one of the prieſts of the temple willed him to go out of the place he was in and he denying it, the prieſt took a great ſtone and threw it at his head, and ſo thought he was ſlaine with the blow. And thus it is written. And furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS did chaſe the PERSIANS flying into their fortifications they had in a wood: and the ATHENIANS alſo ſhortly after ouerthrew the THEBANS, whereof they ſlue in the field three hundred of the nobleſt and chiefeſt of them. For euen as the THEBANS began to turne taile, newes came vnto the ATHENIANS, that the PERSIANS had intrenched thẽſelues within their fort & ſtrength in the wood, where the LACEDÆMONIANS did beſiege them. The ATHENIANS ſuffered the GRECIANS that fled to ſaue themſelues, and they went to helpe the LACEDÆMONIANS, to take the fort of the barbarous people: who went before but ſlenderly about it, becauſe they had no experience to make an aſſault, nor force vpon a wall. But ſo ſoone as the ATHENIANS came in to them, they ſtraight tooke it by aſſault, and made great ſlaughter of the PERSIANS and barbarous people. For of three hundred thouſand fighting men that Mardonius had in his campe, there were ſaued onely but forty thouſand led vnder Artabazus: and of the GRECIANS ſide there were not ſlaine aboue thirteene hundred and threeſcore in all; amongſt which alſo there were two and fiftie ATHENIANS, all of the tribe of Æantides, the which had done more valiantly that day, then any other tribe, as Clidemus writeth. And this is the cauſe why the Æantides made a ſolemne ſacrifice vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, at the common charge, according to the order giuen them by the Oracle of Apollo, to giue them thankes for this victorie. Of the LACEDÆMONIANS there died foureſcore and eleuen: and of the TEGEATES ſixteene. But I maruell Herodotus ſaith, that none but theſe people onely fought in that iourney againſt the barbarous nation, and no other GRECIANS beſides: for the number of the dead bodies, and their graues alſo do ſhew that it was a generall victory and exploit of all the GRECIANS together. And moreouer, if there had bene but theſe three people onely that had fought againſt them, and that all the reſt had ſtood and looked on, and done nothing: ſure there had bene no ſuch Epigram as this, engrauen vpon the altar or tombe that was ſet vp in the place of the battell:

Mardonius ſlaine by Arimneſtus a Spartan with a blow of a ſtone.

Two hundred and threeſcore thouſand Perſians ſlaine. A thouſand three hundred and threeſcore Grecians ſlaine.

When the victorious Greekes, had driuen out of their land
The Perſians by force of armes, which long did them withſtand,
They built to mighty Ioue, this holy altar here,
And made it common for all Greece, as plainely may appeare,
In guerdon of the good, which he did them reſtore,
In guerdon of their liberty, which lik'd them euermore.

This battell was fought the fourth day of the moneth which the ATHENIANS call Bœdromion, that is, about the moneth of Iuly, or after the BOEOTIANS account, the ſixe and twentieth of the moneth they call Panemus, on which day there is kept a common aſſembly of the eſtates of GREECE, in the citie of PLATÆES, where the PLATÆIANS make a ſolemne ſacrifice vnto Iupiter, protectour of their liberty, to giue him thankes alwayes for this victory. It is no maruell that there was ſuch difference then betwixt the moneths and dayes, conſidering that euen now when Aſtronomie is more perfectly vnderſtood then it was then, ſome do yet beginne and end their moneths at one day, and ſome at another. After this great battell and ouerthrow of the barbarous people, there aroſe a great ſtrife betwixt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS, touching the reward and honour of the victorie. For the ATHENIANS would not giue place vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor ſuffer them to ſet vp any tokens or ſignes of triumph. Whereupon the GRECIANS running to armes in mutinie together, by this occaſion they had almoſt ſpoiled one another: had not Ariſtides through his wiſdome and wiſe perſwaſions, ſtaied and quieted the other captaines his companions, and ſpecially one Leocrates and Myronides, whom he wan with ſuch diſcreet and gentle words, that they were contented to referre it wholly vnto the arbiterment and iudgement of the other people of GRECE. So the GRECIANS met in the same place together, purposely to decide their controuersies. In this councell holden there, Theogiton a captaine of the MEGARIANS, said for his opinion, that to auoide the ciuill warre might grow betweene the GRECIANS vpon this quarrell: he thought it more requisite, to appoint ouer the reward and honor of this victory vnto some other city, then to any of the two that fell out about it. After him rose vp Cleocritus CORINTHIAN, seeming to euery man there that he would haue requested this honour for the citie of CORINTH, being indeed the third city in estimation of all GRECE, vnto SPARTA and ATHENS: howbeit he made an oration in commendation of the PLATÆIANS, which was maruellously liked, and well thought of by euery man: for his opinion went flatly with the PLATÆIANS, that to end this strife, they should giue the honour of this victory vnto the city of PLATÆES, and so would neither of both parties be angry that they should be honoured. Vpon his words Aristides first agreed on the ATHENIANS behalfe, and then Pausanias for the LACEDÆMONIANS, That the PLATÆIANS should haue the reward. Now they both being agreed, before the spoile was diuided betweene them, they set aside fourescore talents that were giuen to the PLATÆIANS, with the which they built a temple vnto Minerua, and gaue her an image, and set out all her temple with pictures that remaine whole vntill this day: and the LACEDÆMONIANS notwithstanding, did set vp their tokens of victorie by themselues, and the ATHENIANS theirs also by themselues. So they sending vnto the Oracle of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES, to know vnto what gods, and how they should do sacrifice: Apollo answered them that, they should build vp an altar vnto Iupiter, protectour of their liberty; howbeit that they should put no sacrifice vpon it, vntill they had first put out all the fire through the whole country, because it had bene polluted and defiled by the barbarous people: and then, that they should fetch pure and cleane fire at the common altar, whereon they do sacrifice vnto Apollo Pythias, in the citie of DELPHES. This answer being deliuered, the great Lords and officers of GRECE went through all the countrey to put out the fire euery where. And there was a man of the same city of PLATÆES at that time called Euchidas, that came and offered himselfe, and promised he would bring them fire from the temple of Apollo Pythias, with all possible speed that might be. So when he came to the city of DELPHES, after he had sprinkled and purified his body with cleane water, he put a crowne of laurell vpon his head, and went in that manner to take fire from the altar of Apollo. When he had done, he hied him againe as fast as he could runne for life, vnto the city of PLATÆES, and came thither before the Sunne was set, hauing come & gone that day a thousand furlongs. But after he had saluted his citizens, and deliuered them the fire he brought, he fell downe dead at their feet, and gaue vp the ghost. The PLATÆIANS lift him vp starke dead, and buried him in the temple of Diana Euclia, to say, of good renowne: and caused afterwards this Epitaph following to be grauen vpon his tombe.

Engraued heere doth lye, Euchidas speedy man,
Who in one day both too and fro, to Delphes lightly ranne:
Euen from this selfe same place, which thou doest here behold,
Such haste, post haste, be swiftly made; thereof thou maist be bold.

Many thinke that this goddesse Euclia is Diana, and so they call her. But other hold opinion she was the daughter of Hercules, and Myrto the Nymph Menætius daughter, and Patroclus sister, that died a virgin, and was honored afterwards as a goddesse of the BOEOTIANS, and of the LOCRIANS. For in all their cities and townes in open places, they finde an altar and image dedicated vnto her: and all that are maried, do sacrifice to her vpon that altar. Afterwards there was a generall councell holden by all the GRECIANS, in the which Aristides made a motion, that all the cities of GRECE should yearely send their deputies at a certaine day appointed, vnto the citie of PLATÆES, there to make their prayers and sacrifices vnto the gods: and that from fiue yeares, to fiue yeares, they should celebrate common games, that should be called the games of liberty: and that they shold also leauie through all the prouinces of GRECE, for maintenance of the warres against the PERSIANS and barbarous people, ten thousand footemen, a thousand horsemen, and a fleete of an hundred saile. Also that the PLATÆIANS thenceforth should be taken for deuout and holy men, and that no man should be so hardy as to hurt or offend them; and that they should onely tend the sacrifices vnto the gods, for the health health and prosperity of GREECE. All which articles were enacted in forme and manner aforesaid, and the PLATÆIANS bound themselues yearely to keep solemne sacrifices and aniuersaries for the soules of the GRECIANS that were slaine in their teritories, fighting for defence of the liberty of the GRECIANS. And this they obserue yet vnto this day in this sort. The sixteenth day of the moneth of Memacterion (which the BOEOTIANS call Alalcomenies, and is about the moneth of Ianuary) they go a procession, and before the procession goeth a trumpetter that soundeth the alarum. Then there follow certaine chariots loden with branches of firre-tree, and with nosegayes and garlands of triumph: then a blacke bull, and certaine yong gentlemen noble men sonnes, that cary great cawdrons with two eares full of wine and milke, such as they vse to powre vpon the graues of dead men for propitiatory oblations; and other yong boyes free borne, that carry oiles, perfumes, and other sweete odours in viall glasses: for no seruant or bondman may lawfully be admitted to haue any office about this mystery, for that they whose memory they honor, died all fighting for defence of the liberty of GREECE. After all this shew, followeth the prouost of the PLATÆIANS for that time being, last of all: who may not al the rest of the yeare besides so much as touch any iron, nor weare any other coloured gowne but white. Howbeit then he weareth on a purple coloured coate, and holdeth a funerall pot in one of his hands, which he taketh in the towne-house, and a naked sword in the other hand, and so goeth through the city in this sort after all the pompe aforesaid, vnto the Church-yard where all their graues be that were slaine at that battell. So when he cometh thither, he draweth water out of a well that is there, and with the same he washeth the foure square pillars and images that stand vpon those tombes, and then annointeth them with oyles and sweete sauours: afterwards, he sacrificeth a bull, and layeth him vpon a heape of wood hard by him, as they do when they burne the bodies of dead men; and making certaine prayers and petitions vnto Iupiter and Mercurie, gods of the earth, he doth solemnly inuite the soules of those valiant men that died fighting for the liberty of GREECE, vnto the feast of the funerall sacrifice. Then he taking a cup full of wine in his hand, and spilling it all vpon their tombes, he speaketh these words aloud: I drinke to the worthy and valiant men, that died sometime in defence of the liberty of GREECE. This solemne ceremony and aniuersarie, the PLATÆIANS do duely obserue vnto this present day. Now when the ATHENIANS were returned to ATHENS, Aristides perceiuing the people were bent to stablish a popular state, where the people might beare the whole rule and authority, iudging them well worthy to be considered of, in respect of their noble seruice and valiant courage they had shewed in this warre: and considering also that they would hardly be brought to like of any other gouernement, being yet in armes, and very stout, by reason of the famous victories they had obtained: he caused a law to be made, that all authority of gouernement should runne in equality among the citizens, and that thencefoorth all burgesses (as well poore as rich) should be chosen by voices of the people, and promoted to offices within the city. And moreouer, when Themistocles told in open assembly, that he had a thing in his head would be greatly to the profit and commodity of the state, but yet it was not to be spoken openly for diuerse respects: the people willed him to tell it vnto Aristides onely, and to take his aduice in it, to know whether it was meete to be done, or not. Then Themistocles told him secretly betweene them, that he thought to set the arcenall on fire, where all the GRECIANS ships lay aladging, that by this meanes the ATHENIANS shold be the greatest mē of power in al GREECE. Aristides hearing that, without any more, came presently to the people againe, and told the whole councell openly, that nothing could be more profitable indeed for the whole commonwealth, and withall more wicked and vniust, then that Themistocles thought good to do. When the people heard Aristides answer, they willed Themistocles to let his deuice alone whatsoeuer it were: so great iusticers were the ATHENIANS, and so much did they trust Aristides wisdome and equity besides. So they made Aristides afterwards Generall of the armie of the ATHENIANS together with Cimon, and sent them to make warre against the barbarous people. Aristides at his coming thither, seeing Pausanias, and the other captaines that were Generals ouer the whole army, dealing hardly & churlishly with the people their confederates, he on the contrary side, spake gently vnto them, and shewed himselfe as courteous and familiar to them as he could possible, making his companion also familiar to all, and iust to euery body, not oppressing some to ease other, in defraying the charges of the warres. Aristides taking this course, it was not noted how by little and little he cut off the rule and authority of the

LACEDÆMONIANS in GRECE, not by force of armes, nor by ships, not by numbers of horses, but onely by his graue and wise gouernment. For if the iustice and vertue of Aristides, and the mildnesse and curtesie of Cimon made the gouernment of the ATHENIANS to be liked of and accepted of al the other people of GRECE: the couetousnesse, pride and fierceneſſe of Pausanias, made it much more to be desired. For Pausanias neuer spake vnto the other captaines of the people, allies, and confederates, but it was euer in choler, and he was too sharpe with them: and for the poore priuate souldiers, he would cause them to be cruelly whipped for euery small offence, or else make them stand a whole day together on their feete, laying a heauy iron anker vpon their shoulders. No man durst goe forrage, neither for straw, nor reedes to make them couches of, nor durst water their horse before the SPARTANS: for he had set skouts for them to whip them home, that went out before them. And one day when Aristides thought to haue spoken to him, and to haue told him something, he frowned vpon him: and said he had no leysure to speake with him now, and so would not heare him: whereupon the captaines of the other GRECIANS, and specially those of CHIO, of SAMOS, & of LESBOS, did afterwards follow Aristides, and perswaded him to take vpon him the charge & authority to command the other people of GRECE, and to take into his protection the allies and confederates of the same, who long sithens wished to reuolt from the gouernement of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and onely to submit themselues vnto the ATHENIANS. Aristides answered them thus: that they had not onely reason to do that they said, but that they were also constrained to do it. Notwithstanding, because the ATHENIANS might haue good ground and assurance of their vndoubted fidelity and good seruice, they should deliuer them manifest testimony and assurance thereof, by some famous act attempted against the LACEDÆMONIANS, whereby their people hereafter durst neuer fall from the league of the ATHENIANS. Vliades SAMIAN, and Antagoras of CHIO hearing him say so, both captaines of galleys confedered together: they wēt one day to set vpon the Admirall galley of Pausanias, hard by BIZANTIVM, the one of the one side of her, and the other on the other side, as she was rowing before all the fleete. Pausanias seeing them, stood vp straight in a maruellous rage against them, & threatned them that before it were long he would make them know they had bene better to haue assaulted their owne naturall country, then to haue set vpon him as they had done. But they answered him, and bad him get him away quickly if he were wise, and let him thanke Fortune hardly, that granted the GRECIANS victory at the battell of PLATÆES vnder his leading: and that it was nothing else but the onely reuerence and respect of the same, that had made the GRECIANS hold their hands till now, from giuing him that iust punishment his pride and arrogancy had deserued. So the end was, they left the LACEDÆMONIANS, and stucke vnto the ATHENIANS: wherein was easily discerned the great courage and wonderfull magnanimity of the LACEDÆMONIANS. For when they saw their captaines were marred and corrupted, through the ouer great authority and liberty they had, they willingly gaue vp their commandement ouer the other GRECIANS, and did no more send their captaines to be Generals of the whole army of GRECE: thinking it better for their citizens, that they shold be obedient, and in euery point obserue the discipline and law of their country, then if they had bene otherwise the onely rulers and Lords ouer the whole country. Now at what time the LACEDÆMONIANS did command all GRECE, as Lords, the cities and people of GRECE did pay a certaine sum of money, towards defraying of the charges of the warres against the barbarous people. But after that their seigniority and rule was taken from them, the GRECIANS were contented a taxe should be leauied, and that euery city should be reasonably sessed, according to their wealth and ability: because euery city might know what they should pay. And for this purpose, they prayed the ATHENIANS they wold appoint Aristides to take order for it, vnto whom they gaue full power and authority to taxe and sesse euery city indifferently, considering the greatnes of the territory, & the reuenues of the same, as euery one was reasonably able to beare it. But if Aristides were poore when he entred into that great charge & office of authority, wherein all GRECE in maner did refer themselues vnto his discretion: he came out of that office more poore, and had made his assessement and taxation not onely iustly and truly, but also so indifferently according vnto euery mans ability, that there was no man could find fault with his doings. And like as the ancient men in old time did celebrate and sing out the blessednesse of those that liued vnder the reigne of Saturne, which they called the golden age: euen so did the people and confederates of the ATHENIANS afterwards honour the assessement made by Aristides calling calling it the fortunat & blessed time of GREECE, and specially, when shortly after it did double, and treble on the sudden. For the taxe Aristides made, came to about foure hundred and threescore talents: and Pericles raised it almost vnto a third part. For Thucydides writeth, that at the beginning of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, the ATHENIANS leauied sixe hundred talents yearely vpon their confederates. And after the death of Pericles, the oratours & counsellors for matters of state, did raise it vp higher by little and litle, vntill it mounted to the summe of thirteene hundred talents. And this was not becausе the warres did rise to so great a charge, by reason of the length of the same, and of the losses the ATHENIANS had receiued: but for that they did accustome the people to make distributions of money by hand vnto euery citizen, to make them set vp games, and make goodly images, and to build vp sumptuous temples. Thus was Aristides therefore iustly honored, praised and esteemed aboue all others, for this iust imposition of taxes, sauing onely of Themistocles: who went vp and downe fleering at the matter, saying it was no meete praise for an honest man, but rather for a coffer well barred with iron, where a man might safely lay vp his gold & siluer. This he spake to be euen with Aristides, which was nothing like the sharpe gird Aristides gaue him openly, when Themistocles talking with him, told him it was an excellent thing for a captaine to be able to know, and to preuent the counsels and doings of the enemies: And so it is, said Aristides againe, not onely a needfull, but an honest thing, and meete for a worthy Generall of an army, to be cleane fingered, without bribery or corruption. So Aristides made all the other people of GREECE to sweare, that they would truly keepe the articles of the alliance, and he himselfe as Generall of the ATHENIANS, did take their oaths in the name of the ATHENIANS: and so pronouncing execrations and curses against them that should breake the league and oath taken, he threw iron wedges red hot into the sea, and prayed the gods to destroy them euen so, that did violate their vowed faith. Notwithstanding, afterwards (in my opinion) when there fell out great alteration in the state, and that the ATHENIANS were forced to rule more straightly then before: Aristides then willed the ATHENIANS to let him beare the danger & burthen of periury and execration, and that they should not let for feare therof to do any thing whatsoeuer they thought meete or necessary. To conclude, Theophrastus writeth, that Aristides was not onely a perfect, an honest, and iust man, in priuate matters betwixt party and party: but in matters of state, and concerning the commonweale, he did many things oftentimes according to the necessity of the time, and troubles of the city, wherein violence and iniustice was to be vsed. As when the question was asked in open councell, to know whether they might take away the gold & siluer, that was left in the Ile of DELOS safely laid vp in the temple of Apollo, to beare out the charges of the warres against the barbarous people, and to bring it frō thence vnto ATHENS, vpō the motion of the SAMIANS, although it was directly against the articles of the alliance, made and sworne among all the GRECIANS; Aristides opinion being asked in the same, he answered: it was not iust, but yet profitable. Now, notwithstanding Aristides had brought his city to rule and command many thousands of people, yet was he still poore for all that, and till his dying day he gloried rather to be praised for his pouerty, then for all the famous victories & battels he had won: and that plainly appeared thus. Callias Ceres torch-bearer, was his neare kinsman, who through enemies came to be accused, and stood in hazard of life: so when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Iudges, his accusers very faintly, and to litle purpose, vttered the offences whereof they accusted him, and running into other by-matters, left the chiefe matter, and spake thus to the Iudges: my Lords, you all know Aristides the son of Lysimachus, and you are not ignorant also that his vertue hath made him more esteemed, then any man else is, or can be, in all GREECE. How thinke ye doth he liue at home, when you see him abroad vp and downe the city, in a threed-bare gowne all to be tattered? Is it not likely, trow ye, that he is ready to starue at home for lacke of meate and reliefe, whom we all see quake for very cold, being so ill arraied and clothed? And yet M. Callias here his cosin germaine the richest citizen in all ATHENS, is so miserable, that notwithstanding Aristides hath done much for him, by reason of his great credit and authority among you, he suffered him and his poore wife & children ready to beg & starue for any helpe he giueth him. Callias perceiuing the Iudges more angry with him for that, then for any matter else he was accused of: he prayed Aristides might be sent for, and willed him to tell truly whether he had not offered him good round sums of money, many a time and oft, and intreated him to take it; which he euer refused, and answered him alwayes, That he could better boast of his pouerty, then himselfe could of his riches;

Taunts betwixt Themistocles and Aristides.

Aristides preferred necessity of time, before law and reason.

Aristides gloried in his pouerty.

(which he ſaid many did vſe ill, and few could vſe them well) and that it was a hard thing to find one man of a noble mind, that could away with pouerty, and that ſuch onely might be aſhamed of pouerty, as were poore againſt their wils. So Ariſtides confirmed all he ſpake to be true: & euery man that was at the hearing of this matter, went wholly away with this opinion, that he had rather be poore as Ariſtides, then rich as Callias. This tale is writtē thus by Æſchines the Socratian philoſopher: & Plato reporteth of him alſo, that notwithſtanding there were many other famous and noble men of ATHENS, yet he gaue Ariſtides praiſe aboue them all. For others, ſaid he, (as Themiſtocles, Cimon, and Pericles) haue beautified the city with ſtately porches, & ſumptuous buildings of gold and ſiluer, and with ſtore of other fine ſuperfluous deuices: but Ariſtides, was onely he, that vertuouſly diſpoſed himſelfe and all his doings, to the furtherance of the ſtate and common weale. His iuſtice and good nature appeared plainly in his doings, and behauiour towards Themiſtocles. For though Themiſtocles was euer againſt Ariſtides in all things, and a continuall enemy of his, and that by his meanes and practiſe he was baniſhed from ATHENS: yet when Themiſtocles was accuſed of treaſon to the ſtate, hauing diuerſe ſharpe enemies againſt him, as Cimon, Alcmæon, with diuerſe other, Ariſtides ſought not reuenge, when he had him at his aduantage. For he neither ſpake nor did any thing againſt him at that time to hurt him: neither did he reioyce to ſee his enemie in miſery, no more then if he had neuer enuied him in his proſperity. And touching Ariſtides death, ſome write that he died in the realme of PONTVS, being ſent thither about matters of the ſtate: and other thinke he died an old man in the citie of ATHENS, greatly honoured and beloued of all the citizens. But Craterus the MACEDONIAN writeth of his death in this ſort: After that Themiſtocles (ſaith he) was fled, the people of ATHENS became very ſtubburne and inſolent: wherupon, many lewd men grew to be cōmon appeachers and accuſers of the noble men and chiefeſt citizens, and to ſtirre vp the malice and ill will of the common people againſt them, who were waxen proud by reaſon of their proſperity, and dominion that was enlarged. Among the reſt, Ariſtides was condemned for extortion and ill behauiour in the common wealth, vpon one Diophantes accuſation, of the village of AMPHITROPE: who burthened him, that he tooke money of the IONIANS, to make the annuall tribute ceſſe which they payed vnto ATHENS: and ſo Craterus ſaith, that becauſe Ariſtides was not able to pay the fine they ſet vpō his head (which was fiue Minas) he was driuen to forſake ATHENS, & to get him into IONIA, where he died. Yet doth not Craterus bring forth any probable matter to proue this true he writeth: as his pleading, his ſentence and condemnation, or any decree paſſed againſt him, although he vſed great diligence elſe in collecting all ſuch matters, and vouching his authors. Furthermore, all other writers that haue ſpecially noted the faults & offences committed by the people of ATHENS in former times againſt their captaines and gouernours: they do declare Themiſtocles exile, Miltiades captiuity that died in priſon, Pericles fine wherein he was condemned, and Paches death that ſlue himſelfe in the pulpit for orations, when he ſaw he was condemned: and tell diuerſe ſuch ſtories, adding too alſo Ariſtides baniſhment: but yet they make no matter of mention of the condemnation which Craterus ſpeaketh of. Moreouer, Ariſtides tombe is to be ſeene at this day vpon the hauen of PHALERVS, which was ſet vp for him at the charge of ỹ common wealth, as it is reported, becauſe he died ſo poore a man, as they found nothing in his houſe to bury him with. Other go further, and ſay that his daughters were maried by decree of the people, at the charge of the commonwealth, & that the city gaue euery one of them three thouſand Drachmas: and his ſonne Lyſimachus, a hundred Minas of ſiluer, and a hundred Iugera; and at Alcibiades requeſt, who was the author of the decree, they gaue him foure Drachmas a day beſides, of ordinary allowance. Furthermore, when this Lyſimachus died, he left aliue one onely daughter called Polycrite, whom the people appointed, as Calliſthenes writeth, as much prouiſion to liue withal, as they gaue to any that wan the Olympian games. And ſithence, Demetrius PHALERIAN, Hyeronimus RHODIAN, Ariſtoxenus the Muſitian, and Ariſtotle the Philoſopher, at the leaſt if the booke intituled of Nobility be any of Ariſtotles works: all theſe agree together, that one Myrto, Ariſtides daughters daughter, was maried to the wife Socrates, who tooke her to his wife (hauing a wife already) becauſe ſhe was a poore widow, and could not be maried for her pouerty, hauing much ado to liue. Yet Panætius doth write againſt him, in his booke of Socrates life. But Demetrius PHALERIAN writeth in his booke he intituled Socrates, that he could remember very well he had ſeene one Lyſimachus, Ariſtides ſonnes ſonne, or his daughters ſonne, that was very poore, and liued of that he could get to interprete dreames, by certaine

It is very true that the selfe same Demetrius PHALERIAN, when he reformed the state of ATHENS, ordained that his mother and sister should haue each of them a Drachma by the day to find them withall, out of the common chamber of the city. And it is no new nor strange thing, that the people of ATHENS were so carefull to helpe and to relieue the women that dwelt in the city: considering that in times past, Aristogiton hauing a litle daughter in the Ile of LEMNOS, in very hard and poore estate, and that could not be bestowed in mariage for her pouerty, they caused her to be brought to ATHENS, and maried her in one of the noblest houses of the city, & made her a ioynter besides in the village of POTAMOS. Which great courtesie and humanity of theirs, hath euer deserued great fame and commendation, and yet continueth euen vntill this day, in that noble city of ATHENS, in the mouth of euery man there.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Cato the Censor.

MARCVS Cato and his ancestors, were (as they say) of the city of THVSCVLVM: but before he went vnto the warres, and dealt in matters of the common wealth, he dwelt and liued in the countrey of the SABYNES, vpon certaine land his father left him. And though to many his ancestors were knowne to haue bene obscure: yet he himselfe did highly commend his father Marcus, by bearing his name, and saying he was a souldier, and had serued valiantly in the field. And he telleth also of another Cato that was his great grandfather, who for his valiant seruice had bene oft rewarded of the Generals, with such honorable gifts, as the ROMAINES did vse to giue vnto them that had done some famous act in any battell: and how that he hauing lost fiue horses of seruice in the warres, the value of the same was restored to him againe in mony of the common treasure, because he had shewed himselfe trusty and valiant for the common wealth. And where they had a common speech at ROME, to call them vpstarts that were no gentlemen borne, but did rise by vertue: it fortuned Cato to be called one of them. And for his part he did confesse it, that he was the first of his house that euer had honour, and office of ſtate: but by reaſon of the noble acts and good ſeruice of his anceſtors, he maintained he was very ancient. He was called at the beginning after his third name, Priſcus: but afterwards by reaſon of his great wiſedome and experience, he was ſurnamed Cato, becauſe the Romaines call a wiſe man, and him that hath ſeene much, Cato. He was ſomewhat giuen to be red-faced, and had a paire of ſtaring eyes in his head, as this man telleth vs, that for ill will wrote theſe verſes of him after his death:

The definition of this word Cato.

Pluto (the god) which rules the Furies infernall,
Will not receiue the damned ghoſt, of Porcius in his hall.
His ſawcy coppered noſe, and fierie ſtaring eyes,
His common ſlanderous tales, which he did in this world deuiſe,
Made Pluto ſtand in dread, that he would brawle in hell,
Although his bones were drie and dead; on earth he was ſo fell.

Furthermore, touching the diſpoſition of his body, he was maruellous ſtrong and luſtie, and all becauſe he did vſe to labour and toile euen from his youth, and liue ſparingly, as one that was euer brought vp in the warres from his youth: ſo that he was of a very good conſtitution, both for ſtrength of body, and for health. As for vtterance, he eſteemed it as a ſecond body, and moſt neceſſary gift, not only to make men honeſt, but alſo as a thing very requiſit for a man that ſhould beare ſway and authority in the common wealth. He practiſed to ſpeake well in litle villages neare home, whither he went many times to pleade mens cauſes in courts iudiciall, that would retaine him of counſell: ſo as in ſhort time he became a perfect pleader, and had tongue at will, and in proceſſe of time became an excellent Orator. After he was thus well known, they that were familiar with him, began to perceiue a graue manner and behauiour in his life, and a certaine noble mind in him, worthy to be employed in matters of ſtate and great importance, and to be called into the common wealth. For he did not onely refuſe to take fees for his pleading, and following the cauſes he maintained: but furthermore made no reckoning of the eſtimation he wan by that manner and practiſe; as though that was not the onely marke he ſhot at. But his deſire reached further, rather to win himſelfe fame by ſeruice in the warres, and by valiant fighting with his enemy, then with ſuch a quiet and pleaſing manner of life. Inſomuch as when he was but a young ſtripling in manner, he had many cuts vpon his breaſt, which he had receiued in diuerſe battels and encounters againſt the enemies. For he himſelfe writeth, that he was but ſeuenteene yeares old, when he went firſt vnto the warres, which was about the time of Hannibals chiefe proſperity, when he ſpoiled and deſtroyed all Italy. So when he came to fight he would ſtrike luſtily, and neuer ſtirre foote nor giue backe; and would looke cruelly vpon his enemie, and threaten him with a fearefull and terrible voice, which he vſed himſelf, and wiſely taught other alſo to vſe the like: for ſuch countenances, ſaid he, many times do feare the enemies more then the ſword ye offer them. When he went any iourney, he euer marched on foote, and caried his armor vpon his backe, & had a man waiting on him that caried his victuals with him, with whom he was neuer angry (as they ſay) for any thing he had prepared for his dinner or ſupper, but did helpe to dreſſe it himſelfe for the moſt part, if he had any leiſure, when he had done the dutie of a priuate ſouldier in fortifying the campe, or ſuch other needfull buſineſſe. All the while he was abroad in ſeruice in the wars, he neuer dranke other then cleane water, vnleſſe it were when he found he was not well, and then he would take a little vineger: but if he ſaw he were weake, he wold then drink a litle wine. Now it fortuned that Manius Curius the Romaine who had triumphed thriſe, had a pretty houſe & land hard by Cato, where he kept in times paſt, which Cato for a while would viſite oft. And he conſidering how litle land he had to his houſe, & what a litle houſe he had withall, and how poorely it was built, wondred with himſelfe what manner of man Curius had bene, that hauing bene the greateſt man of Rome in his time, and hauing ſubdued the mightieſt nations and people of all Italy, and driuen king Pyrrus alſo out of the ſame: yet himſelf with his owne hands did manure that litle patch of ground, and dwell in ſo poore & ſmall a farme. Whither notwithſtanding, after his three triumphs, the Samnites ſent their Ambaſſadors to viſite him, who found him by the fires ſide ſeething of parſeneps, and preſented him a maruellous deale of gold, from their ſtate and communalty. But Curius returned them again with their gold, and told them, that ſuch as were contented with that ſupper, had no need of gold nor ſiluer: and that for his part, he thought it greater honor to command them that had gold, then to haue it himſelfe. Cato remembring theſe things to himſelfe, went home againe, and and began to thinke vpon his houſe, of his liuing, of his family and ſeruants, and alſo of his expences, and to cut off all ſuperfluous charges, and fell himſelfe to labour with his owne hands, more then euer he had done before. Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus tooke the city of TARENTVM againe, Cato ſerued vnder him being very young, where he fell into familiar acquaintance with Nearchus the PYTHAGORIAN Philoſopher, in whom he took maruellous delight to heare him talke of Philoſophy. Which Nearchus held the ſame opinion of pleaſure, that Plato did, by calling him the ſweete poyſon and chiefeſt baite to allure men to ill: and ſaying that the body was the firſt plague vnto the ſoule, and that her onely health, remedie, and purgation ſtood vpon rules of reaſon, good examples and contemplations, that driue ſinfull thoughts and carnall pleaſures of the body, farre off from her. Cato moreouer gaue himſelfe much to ſobriety and temperance, and framed himſelfe to be content with litle. They ſay he fell in his very old age to the ſtudie, of the Greeke tongue, and to reade Greeke bookes, and that he profited ſomewhat by Thucydides, but much more by Demoſthenes, to frame his matter, and alſo to be eloquent: which plainly appeareth, in all his bookes and writings, full of authorities, examples, and ſtories taken out of the Greeke authors: and many of his ſentences and morals, his adages and quicke anſwers, are tranſlated out of the ſame word for word. Now there was a noble man of ROME at that time, one of great authority, & a deepe wiſe man beſides, who could eaſily diſcerne buds of vertue ſprouting out of any towardly youth, who was of a good and honourable diſpoſition to helpe forward, and to aduance ſuch: his name was Valerius Flaccus, a neere neighbour vnto Cato, who was informed by his ſeruants of Catoes ſtrange life, how he would be doing in his ground with his owne hands: and how he would be gone euery day betimes in the morning to little villages thereabours, to pleade mens cauſes that prayed his counſell, and that when he had done he would come home againe: & if it were in Winter, that he would but caſt a litle coat on his ſhoulders, and being Sommer he wold go out bare-necked to the waſt, to work in his ground among his ſeruants and other workmen: and would beſides, ſit & eate with them together at one boord, and drinke as they did. Moreouer, they told him alſo a world of ſuch maners and faſhions he vſed, that ſhewed him to be a maruellous plaine man, without pride, & of a good nature. Thē they told him what notable wiſe ſayings and graue ſentences they heard him ſpeake. Valerius Flaccus hearing this report of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to ſupper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceiuing he was of a very good nature, and well giuen, and that he was a good graffe to be ſet in a better ground, he perſwaded him to come to ROME, and to practiſe there in the aſſembly of the people, in the common cauſes and affaires of the cōmonweale. Cato followed his counſell, who hauing bin no long practiſer among them, did grow ſtraight into great eſtimation, and wan him many friends, by reaſon of the cauſes he tooke in hand to defend: and was the better preferred and taken alſo, by meanes of the ſpecial fauour and countenance Valerius Flaccus gaue him. For firſt of all, by voice of the people he was choſen Tribune of the ſouldiers (to ſay, colonell of a thouſand footmen) & afterwards was made treaſurer: and ſo went forwards, and grew to ſo great credite and authority, as he became Valerius Flaccus companion in the chiefeſt offices of ſtate, being choſen Conſull with him, and then Cenſor. But to begin with all, Cato made choiſe of Quintus Fabius Maximus, aboue all the Senators of ROME, and gaue himſelfe to follow him altogether: and not ſo much for the credit & eſtimation Fabius Maximus was of (who therein excelled all the ROMAINES of that time) as for the modeſty and diſcreet gouernment he ſaw in him, whom he determined to follow, as a worthy mirrour & example. At which time Cato paſſed not for the malice and euill will of Scipio the Great, who did ſtriue at that preſent being but a yong man, with the authority and greatnes of Fabius Maximus, as one that ſeemed to enuy his riſing & greatneſſe. For Cato being ſent treaſurer with Scipio, when he vndertook the iourny into AFRICKE, and perceiuing Scipioes bountiful nature, & diſpoſition to large gifts without meane to the ſouldiers: he told him plainely one day, that he did not ſo much hurt the commonwealth in waſting their treaſure, as he did great harme in changing the ancient manner of their auncеſtours: who vſed their ſouldiers to be contented with litle, but he taught them to ſpend their ſuperfluous mony (al neceſſaries prouided for) in vaine toies & trifles to ſerue their pleaſure. Scipio made him anſwer, he would haue no treaſurer ſhould controll him in this ſort, nor that ſhould looke ſo narrowly to his expences: for his intent was to go to the wars, with full ſailes as it were, and that he would (and did alſo determine) to make the ſtate priuie to all his doings, but not to the mony he ſpent. Cato hearing this anſwer, returned with ſpeed

out of SICILE vnto ROME, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio ſpent infinitely, and that he tended playes, comedies, and wreſtlings, as if he had not bene ſent to make warres, inuaſions, and attempts vpon their enemies. Vpon this complaint the Senate appointed certaine Tribunes of the people, to go and ſee if their informations were true: and finding them ſo, that they ſhould bring him backe againe to ROME. But Scipio ſhewed farre otherwiſe to the commiſſioners that came thither, and made them ſee apparent victory, through the neceſſary preparation and prouiſion he had made for the warres: and he confeſſed alſo, that when he had diſpatched his great buſineſſe, and was at any leaſure, he would be priuately merrie with his friends: and though he was liberall to his ſouldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his dutie and charge in any matter of importance. So Scipio tooke ſhipping, and ſailed towards AFRICKE, whither he was ſent to make warre. Now to returne to Cato. He daily increaſed ſtill in authority and credit by meanes of his eloquence, ſo that diuerſe called him the Demoſthenes of ROME: howbeit the manner of his life was in more eſtimation then his eloquence. For all the youth of ROME did ſeeke to attaine to his eloquence and commendation of words, and one enuied another which of them ſhould come neareſt: but few of them would file their hands with any labour as their forefathers did, & made a light ſupper and dinner without fire or prouiſion, or would be content with a meane gown, and a poore lodging, and finally would thinke it more honourable to defie fancies and pleaſures, then to haue and enioy them. Becauſe the ſtate was waxen now of ſuch power and wealth, as it could no more retaine the ancient diſcipline, and former auſterity & ſtraightneſſe of life it vſed: but by reaſon of the largeneſſe of their dominion and ſeigniority, & the numbers of people and nations that were become their ſubiects, it was euen forced to receiue a medley of ſundry countrey faſhions, examples, and maners. This was a cauſe, why in reaſon men did ſo greatly wonder at Catoes vertue, when they ſaw other ſtraight wearied with paines and labour tenderly brought vp like pulers: and Cato on the other ſide neuer ouercome, either with the one or with the other, no not in his youth, when he moſt coueted honor, nor in his age alſo when he was gray headed and bald, after his Conſulſhip and triumph: but like a conquerour that had gotten the maiſtery, he would neuer giue ouer labor euen vnto his dying day. For he writeth himſelfe, that there neuer came gowne on his backe that coſt him aboue 100 pence, and that his hinds and workemen alwayes drunke no worſe wine, when he was Conſull and Generall of the army, then he did himſelfe: and that his cater neuer beſtowed in meate for his ſupper, aboue thirty Aſſes of ROMAINE money; and yet he ſaid it was, becauſe he might be the ſtronger, and apter to do ſeruice in the wars for his country & the common wealth. He ſaid furthermore, that being heire to one of his friends that died, he had a peece of tapeſtry by him with a deepe border, which they called them the BABYLONIAN border, and he cauſed it ſtraight to be ſold: and that of all his houſes he had abroad in the country, he had not one wall plaſtered, nor rough caſt. Moreouer he would ſay, he neuer bought bondman or ſlaue dearer, then a thouſand fiue hundred pence, as one that ſought not for fine made men and goodly perſonages, but ſtrong fellowes that could away with paines, as carters, horſe-keepers, neat-heards, & ſuch like: and againe he would ſell them when they were old, becauſe he would not keepe them when they could do no ſeruice. To conclude, he was of opinion, that a man bought any thing deare, that was for litle purpoſe: yea, though he gaue but a farthing for it, he thought it too much to beſtow ſo litle, for that which needed not. He wold haue men purchaſe houſes, that had more ſtore of arable land and paſture, thē of fine hortyards or gardens. Some ſay, he did thus for very miſery and couetouſneſſe: other thinke, and tooke it that he liued ſo ſparingly, to moue others by his example to cut off all ſuperfluity and waſte. Neuertheleſſe, to ſell ſlaues in that ſort, or to turne them out of doores when you haue had the ſeruice of all their youth, & that they are grown old, as you vſe brute beaſtes that haue ſerued whileſt they may for age: me thinkes that muſt needes proceed of too ſeuere and greedy a nature, that hath no longer regard or conſideratiō of humanity, then whileſt one is able to do another good. For we ſee, gentleneſſe goeth further then iuſtice. For nature teacheth vs to vſe iuſtice onely to them, but gentleneſſe ſometimes is ſhewed vnto bruite beaſts: and that cometh from the very fountaine and ſpring of all courteſie and humanity, which ſhould neuer dry vp in any man liuing. For to ſay truly, to keep caſt horſes ſpoiled in our ſeruice, and dogs alſo, not only when they are whelpes, but when they be old, be euen tokens of loue and kindnes. As the ATHENIANS made a law, when they builded their tēple called Hecatompedon: that they ſhould ſuffer the moyles and mulets that did ſeruice in their cariages

about the building of the ſame, to graze euery where, without let or trouble of any man. And they ſay there was one of their moiles thus turned at liberty, that came her ſelfe to the place to labour, going before all the other draught beaſts that drew vp carts loden towards the caſtell, and kept them company, as though ſhe ſeemed to encourage the reſt to draw: which the people liked ſo well in the poore beaſt, that they appointed ſhe ſhould be keept whilſt ſhe liued, at the charge of the town. And yet at this preſent are the graues of Cimons mares to be ſeene, that wan him thrice together the prize of the horſe race at the games Olimpian, and they are hard by the graue of Cimon himſelfe. We heare of diuerſe alſo that had buried their dogs they brought vp in their houſe, or that waited on them: as among other, old Xanthippus buried his dog in the top of a cliffe, which is called the dogs pit til this day. For when the people of ATHENS did forſake their city at the coming downe of the king Xerxes, this dog followed his maſter, ſwimming in the ſea by his galleys ſide, from the firme land, vnto the Ile of SALAMINA. And there is no reaſon, to vſe liuing and ſenſible things, as we would vſe an old ſhoo or a rag, to caſt it out vpon the dung-hill when we haue worn it, and can ſerue vs no longer. For if it were for no reſpect elſe, but to vſe vs alwaies to humanity, we muſt euer ſhew our ſelues kind and gentle, euen in ſuch ſmall points of pitie. And as for me, I could neuer find in my heart to ſell my draught Oxe that had ploughed my land a long time, becauſe he could plough no longer for age: and much leſſe my ſlaue, to ſell him for a little money, out of the countrey where he had dwelt a long time, to plucke him from his old trade of life, wherwith he was beſt acquainted, & then ſpecially, when he ſhall be as vnprofitable for the buyer, as alſo for the ſeller. But Cato on the other ſide gloried, that he left his horſe in SPAINE he had ſerued on in the warres during his Conſulſhip, becauſe he would not put the common wealth to the charge of bringing him home by ſea into ITALIE. Now a queſtion might be made of this, and probable reaſon of either ſide, whether this was nobleneſſe or a niggardlineſſe in him: but otherwiſe to ſay truly, he was a man of a wonderfull abſtinence. For when he was Generall of the army, he neuer tooke allowance but after three buſhels of wheate a moneth of the common wealth, for himſelfe and his whole family: and but a buſhel and a halfe of barly a day, to keepe his horſe and other beaſts for his cariage. On a time when he was Prætor, the gouernement of the Ile of SARDINIA fell to his lot: and where the other Prætors before him had put the countrey to exceeding great charge, to furniſh them with tents, bedding, clothes, and ſuch like ſtuffe, and burthened them alſo with a maruellous traine of ſeruants and their friends that waited on them, putting them to great expenſe in feaſting and banqueting of them: Cato in contrary manner brought downe all that exceſſe and ſuperfluitie, vnto a maruellous neare and vncredible ſauing. For when he went to viſite the cities, he came on foote to them, and did not put them to a peny charge for himſelfe: and had onely one officer or bailiffe of the ſtate that waited on him, and caried his gowne and a cuppe with him, to offer vp wine to the gods in his ſacrifices. But though he came thus ſimply to the ſubiects, and eaſed them of their former charges, yet he ſhewed himſelfe ſeuere and bitter to them in matters concerning iuſtice: and ſpared no man, in any commandement of ſeruice for the ſtate, and commmonwealth: for he was therein ſo preciſe, that he would not beare with any litle fault. So by this meanes, he brought the SARDINIANS vnder his gouernement, both to loue and feare the Empire of ROME, more then euer they had before: as appeareth plainely by the manner both of his ſpeaking and writing: becauſe it was pleaſant and yet graue: ſweete and fearefull: merry and ſeuere, ſententious and yet familiar, ſuch as is meete to be ſpoken. And he was to be compared vnto Socrates: who (as Plato ſaith) at the firſt ſight was a plaine ſimple man to them that knew him but outwardly, or elſe a pleaſant taunter or mocker: but when they did looke into him, and found him throughly, they ſaw he was full of graue ſentences, goodly examples, and wiſe perſwaſions, that he could make men water their plants that heard him, & leade them as he would by the eare. Therefore I cannot ſee any reaſon that moues men to ſay, Cato had Lyſias grace and vtterance. Notwithſtanding, let vs referre it to their iudgements that make profeſſion to diſcerne Oratours graces and ſtiles: for my part I ſhall content my ſelfe to write at this preſent, only certaine of his notable ſayings and ſentences, perſwading my ſelf that mens maners are better diſcerned by their words, then by their lookes, and ſo do many thinke. On a time ſeeking to diſſwade the people of ROME, which would needes make a thankefull diſtribution of corne vnto euery citizen, to no purpoſe, he beganne to make an oration with this preface. It is a hard thing (my Lords of ROME) to bring the belly by perſwaſions to reaſon, that hath no eares.

And another time, reprouing the ill gouernment of the city of ROME, he ſaid: it was a hard thing to keepe vp that ſtate, where a litle fiſh was ſould dearer then an Oxe. He ſaid alſo that the ROMAINES were like a flocke of ſheepe: for ſaith he, as euery Weather when he is alone, doth not obey the ſhepheard, but when they are altogether they one follow another for loue of the formoſt: euen ſo are you; for when you are together, you are all contented to be led by the noſes by ſuch, whoſe counſell not a man alone of you would vſe in any priuate cauſe of your owne. And talking another time of the authoritie the women of ROME had ouer their husbands; he ſaid: other men commanded their wiues, and we command men, and our wiues command vs. But this laſt of all he borrowed of Themiſtocles pleaſant ſayings. For his ſonne making him do many things by meanes of his mother, he told his wife one day: The ATHENIANS command all GRECE, I command the ATHENIANS, you command me, and your ſonne ruleth you. I pray you therefore bid him vſe the liberty he hath with ſome better diſcretion, foole and aſſe as he is, ſithence he can do more by that power and authoritie, then all the GRECIANS beſides. He ſaid alſo that the people of ROME did not only delight in diuerſe ſorts of purple, but likewiſe in diuerſe ſorts of exerciſes. For ſaid he, as diuerſe cõmonly die that colour they ſee beſt eſteemed and is moſt pleaſant to the eye: euen ſo the luſty youthes of ROME do frame themſelues to ſuch exerciſe, as they ſee your ſelues moſt like and beſt eſteeme. He continually aduiſed the ROMAINES, that if their power and greatneſſe came by their vertue and temperance, they ſhould take heed they became no changelings, nor waxe worſe: and if they came to that greatneſſe by vice and violence, that then they ſhould change to better, for by that meanes he knew very well they had attained to great honour and dignity. Again he told them, that ſuch as ſued ambitiouſly to beare office in the commonwealth, and were common ſuters for them, did ſeeme to be afraid to loſe their way, and therefore would be ſure to haue vſhers and ſergeants before them, to ſhew them the way, leſt they ſhould loſe themſelues in the city. He did reproue them alſo, that often choſe one man to continue one office ſtill: for it ſeemeth, ſaith he, either that you paſſe not much for your officers, or that you haue not many choice men you think worthy for the office. There was an enemy of his that led a maruellous wicked and an abhominable life, of whom he was wont to ſay, that when his mother prayed vnto the gods that ſhe might leaue her ſonne behind her, ſhe did not thinke to pray, but to curſe: meaning to haue him liue for a plague to the world. And to another alſo that had vnthriftily ſold his lands which his father had left him, lying vpon the ſea ſide, he pointed vnto them with his finger, & made as though he wondred how he came to be ſo great a man, that he was ſtronger then the ſea: for that which the ſea hardly cõſumeth and eateth out by litle and litle a long time, he had conſumed it all at a clappe. Another time, when king Eumenes was come to ROME, the Senate entertained him maruellous honourably, and the nobleſt citizens did ſtriue, enuying one another, who ſhould welcome him beſt. But Cato in contrary maner ſhewed plainely, that he did ſuſpect all this feaſting and entertainement, and would not come at it. When one of his familiar friends told him, I maruell why you flie from king Eumenes company, that is ſo good a Prince, and loues the ROMAINS ſo wel: Yea, ſaid he, let it be ſo, but for all that, a king is no better then a rauening beaſt that liues of the prey: neither was there euer any king ſo happie, that deſerued to be compared to Epaminondas, to Pericles, to Themiſtocles, nor to Manius Curius, or to Hamylcar, ſurnamed Barca. They ſay his enemies did malice him, becauſe he vſed commonly to riſe before day, and did forget his owne buſineſſe to follow matters of ſtate. And he affirmed that he had rather loſe the reward of his well doing, then not to be puniſhed for doing of euill: and that he would beare with all other offending ignorantly, but not with himſelfe. The ROMAINES, hauing choſen on a time three Ambaſſadors to ſend into the Realme of BYTHINIA, one of them hauing the goute in his feet, the other his head full of cuts and great gaſhes, and the third being but a foole: Cato laughing, ſaid, the ROMAINS ſent an Ambaſſade that had neither feet, head nor *heart. Scipio ſued once to Cato at Polybius requeſt, about thoſe that were baniſhed from ACHAIA. The matter was argued afterwards in the Senate, and there fell out diuers opinions about it. Some would haue had them reſtored to their countrey and goods againe: other were wholly againſt it. So Cato riſing vp at the laſt, ſaid vnto them: It ſeemes we haue little elſe to do when we ſtand beating of our braines all day, diſputing about theſe old GRECIANS, whether the ROMAINES or the ACHAIANS ſhall burie them: In the end, the Senate tooke order they ſhould be reſtored vnto their countrey againe. Whereupon Polybius thought to make petition againe vnto the Senate, that the baniſhed baniſhed men whom they had reſtored by their order, might enioy their former eſtates and honours in ACHAIA, they had at the time of their baniſhment: but before he would moue the ſuite vnto the Senate, he would feele Catoes opinion firſt, what he thought of it. Who anſwered him, ſmiling: Me thinkes Polybius thou art like Vlyſſes, that when he had ſcaped out of Cyclops caue the Giant, he would needs go thither againe, to fetch his hat and girdle he had left behind him there. He ſaith alſo, that wiſe men did learne and profit more by fooles, then fooles did by wiſe men. For wiſe men ſaith he, do ſee the faults fooles commit, and can wiſely auoide them: but fooles neuer ſtudie to follow the example of wiſe mens doings. He ſaid alſo that he euer liked young men better that bluſhed, then thoſe that euer looked whitely: and that he would not haue him for a ſouldier, that wags his hand as he goeth, remoues his feete when he fighteth, and rowteth and ſnorteth louder in his ſleepe, then when he cryeth out to his enemie. Another time when he would taunt a maruellous fat man: See, ſaith he, what good can ſuch a body do to the commonwealth, that from his chinne to his codpeece is nothing but belly? And to another man that was giuen to pleaſure, and deſired to be great with him: My friend ſaid Cato, as refuſing his acquaintance: I cannot liue with him that hath better iudgement in the palate of his mouth, then in his heart. This was alſo his ſaying, that the ſoule of a louer, liued in anothers bodie. And that in al his life time he repented him of three things. The firſt was, if that he euer told ſecret to any woman: the ſecond, that euer he went by water, when he might haue gone by land: the third, that he had bene idle a whole day, and had done nothing. Alſo when he ſaw a vicious old man, he would ſay to reproue him: O gray beard, age bringeth many deformities with it, helpe it not beſides with your vice. And to a ſeditious Tribune of the people that was ſuſpected to be a poyſoner, and would needs paſſe ſome wicked law by voice of the people, he would ſay: O yong man, I know not which of theſe two be worſe, to drinke the drugges thou giueſt, or to receiue the lawes thou offereſt. Another time, being reuiled by one that led a lewd and naughtie life: Go thy way, ſaid he, I am no man to ſcold with thee: for thou art ſo vſed to reuile, and to be reuiled, that it is not dainty to thee: but for my ſelfe, I neuer vſe to heare ſcolding, and much leſſe delight to ſcold. Theſe be his wiſe ſayings we find written of him, whereby we may the eaſilier coniecture his manners and nature. Now when he was choſen Conſull with his friend Valerius Flaccus, the gouernment of SPAINE fell to his lot, that is on this ſide of the riuer of BÆTIS. So Cato hauing ſubdued many people by force of armes, & won others alſo by friendly means: ſodainly there came a maruellous great army of ỹ barbarus people, againſt him, & had enuironed him ſo, as he was in maruellous danger, either ſhamefully to be taken priſoner, or to be ſlaine in the field. Wherefore he ſent preſently vnto the CELTIBERIANS, to pray aide of them, who were next neighbors vnto the marches where he was. Theſe CELTIBERIANS did aske him two hundred talents to come and helpe him: but the ROMAINS that were about him, could not abide to hire the barbarous people to defend them. Then Cato told them ſtraight, there was no hurt in it, nor any diſhonor vnto them. For ſaid he, if the field be ours, then we ſhall pay their wages we promiſed, with the ſpoile and money of our enemies: and if we loſe it, then our ſelues and they lye by it, being left neither man to pay, nor yet any to aske it. In the end he wan the battell, after a ſore conflict, and after that time he had maruellous good fortune. For Polybius writeth, that all the wals of the cities that were on this ſide the riuer of BÆTIS, were by his commandement razed in one day, which were many and full of good ſouldiers. Himſelfe writeth, that he tooke moe cities in SPAINE, then he remained there dayes: and it is no vaine boaſt, if it be true that is written, that there were foure hundred cities of them. Now, though the ſouldiers vnder him had gotten well in this iourney, and were rich, yet he cauſed a pound weight of ſiluer to be giuen to euery ſouldier beſides: ſaying he liked it better that many ſhould returne home with ſiluer in their purſes, then a few of them with gold onely. But for himſelfe he affirmed: that of all the ſpoile gotten of the enemies, he neuer had any thing, ſauing that which he took in meate and drinke. And yet ſaid he, I ſpeake it not to reproue them that grow rich by ſuch ſpoiles: but becauſe I would contend in vertue rather with the beſt, then in money with the richeſt, or in couetouſneſſe with the moſt auaritious. For not onely he himſelfe was cleare from bribes and extortion, but his Officers alſo vnder him kept the ſame courſe. In this Spaniſh iourney, he had fiue of his ſeruants with him, whereof one of them called Paccus, brought three young boyes that were taken in the warres, when the ſpoile was ſould to them that would giue moſt. So Cato knew it. But Paccus being affraid to come neare his maſter, hanged himſelfe: and then

Catoes abſtinence from ſpoile and bribery

Cato sold the boyes againe, and put the money made of them into the treasurie chests of saying at ROME. Now while Cato was in SPAINE, Scipio the Great that was his enemie, and sought to hinder the course of his prosperity, and to haue the honour of conquering all the rest of SPAINE, he made all the friends he could to the people, to be chosen in Catoes place. He was no sooner entred into his charge, but he made all the possible speede he could to be gone, that he might make Catoes authority ceasse the sooner. Cato hearing of his hastie coming, tooke onely fiue ensignes of footemen, and fiue hundred horsemen to attend vpon him home: with the which, in his iourny homeward, he ouercame a people in SPAINE called the LACETANIANS, and tooke sixe hundred traitours also that were fled from the ROMAINES campe to their enemies, and did put to death euery mothers child of them. Scipio storming at that, said Cato did him wrong. But Cato to mocke him finely, said: It was the right way to bring ROME to flourish, when noble borne citizens would not suffer meane borne men, and vpstarts as himselfe was, to go before them in honour: and on the other side when meane borne men would contend in vertue, with those that were of noblest race, and farre aboue them in calling. For all that, when Cato came to ROME, the Senate commanded that nothing should be changed nor altered otherwise, then Cato had appointed it, whilest he was in his office. So that the gouernement for which Scipio made such earnest sute in SPAINE, was a greater disgrace vnto him, then it was vnto Cato: because he passed all his time and office in peace, hauing no occasion offered him to do any notable seruice worthy memorie. Furthermore, Cato after he had beene Consull, and had granted to him the honour to triumph, did not as many others do, that seeke not after vertue, but onely for worldly honour and dignitie: who, when they haue bene called to the highest offices of state, as to be Consuls, and haue also granted them the honour to triumph, do then leaue to deale any more in matters of state, and dispose themselues to liue merily and quietly at home, and not to trouble themselues any more. Now Cato farre otherwise behaued himselfe: for he would neuer leaue to exercise vertue, but began afresh, as if he had bene a yong nouice in the world, and as one greedy of honour and reputation, and to take as much paines and more then he did before. For, to pleasure his friends or any other citizen, he would come to the market place, and pleade their causes for them that required his counsell, and go with his friends also into the warres: as he went with Tiberius Sempronius the Consull, and was one of the Lieutenants at the conquest of the country of THRACE, and vnto the prouinces adioyning to the riuer of DANVBY vpon those marches. After that, he was in GRECE also, Colonell of a thousand footemen, vnder Manius Aquilius, against king Antiochus surnamed the Great, who made the ROMAINES so much affraid of him, as euer they were of enemy, but Hannibal. For, when he had conquered all the regions and prouinces of ASIA, which Seleucus Nicanor enioyed before, and had subdued many barbarous and warlike nations: he was so proud hearted, as he would needs haue wars with the ROMAINS, whom he knew to be the only worthy men, and best able to fight with him. So he made some honest shew and pretence of warres, saying it was to set the GRECIANS at liberty, who had no cause thereof, considering they liued after their owne lawes, and were but lately deliuered from the bondage of king Philip, and of the MACEDONIANS, through the goodnes of the ROMAINES. Notwithstanding, he came out of ASIA into GRECE with a maruellous great army, and all GRECE was straight in armes and in wonderfull danger, because of the great promises and large hopes the gouernours of diuerse cities (whom the king had wonne and corrupted with money) did make vnto him. Whereupon Manius dispatched Ambassadours vnto the city, and sent Titus Quintus Flaminius among others, who kept the greatest part of the people from rebelling (that were easily drawn to giue eare to this innouation) as we haue expressed more amply in his life: And Cato being sent Ambassadour also, perswaded the CORINTHIANS, those of PATRAS, and the ÆGIANS, and made them sticke still to the ROMAINES, and continued a long time at ATHENS. Some say they find an oration of his written in the Greeke tongue, which he made before the ATHENIANS, in commendation of their auncestours: wherein he said, he tooke great pleasure to see ATHENS, for the beauty and statelinesse of the citie. But this is false: for he spake vnto the ATHENIANS by an interpreter, though he could haue vttered his oration in the Greeke tongue if he had bene disposed: but he did like the lawes and customes of his own country, and the ROMAINE tongue so well, that he laughed at them that would praise and commend the Greeke tongue. As he did once mocke Posthumius Albinus, who wrote an history in the Greek tongue, praying the readers in in his preface to beare with him, if they found any imperfection in the tongue: Marie said Cato, he had deserued pardon indeede, if he had beene forced to haue written his storie in the Greeke tongue, by order of the states of GREECE, called the councel of the Amphictyons. They say the ATHENIANS wondered to heare his ready tongue. For what he had vttered quickly in few words vnto the interpreter, the interpreter was driuen to deliuer them againe with great circumstances & many words. So that he left them of this opinion, that the GRECIANS words lay all in their lippes, and the ROMAINES words in their heads. Now king Antiochus kept all the straights and narrow passages of the mountaines called THERMOPYLES (being the ordinary way and entrie into GREECE) and had fortified them aswell with an army that camped at the foote of the mountaine, as also with walls and trenches he had made by hand, besides the naturall strength and fortification of the mount it selfe in sundry places: and so he determined to remaine there, trusting to his owne strength and fortifications aforesaid, and to turne the force of the warres some other way. The ROMAINS also they dispaired vtterly they should be able any way to charge him before. But Cato remembring with himselfe the compasse the PERSIANS had fetched about before time likewise to enter into GREECE, he departed one night from the campe with part of the army: to proue if he could find the very compasse about, the barbarous people had made before. But as they climed vp the mountaine, their guide that was one of the prisoners taken in the countrey, lost his way, and made them wander vp and downe in maruellous steepe rockes and crooked wayes, that the poore souldiers were in maruellous ill taking. Cato seeing the danger they were brought into by this lewd guide, commanded all his souldiers not to stir a foote from thence, and to tarrie him there: and in the meane time he went himselfe alone, and Lucius Manlius with him, (a lustie man, and nimble to clime vpon the rockes) and so went forward at aduenture, taking extreme and vncredible paines, and in much danger of his life, grabbling all night in the darke without Moone light, through wild Oliue trees, and high rockes (that let them they could not see before them, neither could tell whither they went) vntill they stumbled at the length vpon a litle path way, which went as they thought directly to the foote of the mountaine, where the campe of the enemies lay. So they set vp certaine markes and tokens, vpon the highest toppes of the rockes they could choose, by view of eye to be discerned furthest off vpon the mountaine called Callidromus. And when they had done that, they returned backe againe to fetch the souldiers, whom they led towards the marks they had set vp: vntill at the length they found their path-way againe, where they put their souldiers in order to march. Now they went not farre in this path they found, but the way failed them straight, and brought them to a bogge: but then they were in worse case then before, and in greater feare, not knowing they were so neare their enemies, as indeed they were. The day beganne to breake a litle, and one of them that marched foremost, thought he heard a noise, and that he saw the GREEKES campe at the foote of the rockes, and certaine souldiers that kept watch there. Whereupon Cato made them stay, and willed only the FIRMANIANS to come vnto him, and none but them, because he had found them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his commandement. They were with him at a trice, to know his pleasure: so Cato said vnto them: My fellowes, I must haue some of our enemies taken prisoners, that I may know of them who they be that keepe that passage, what number they be, what order they keepe, how they are camped and armed, and after what sort they determine to fight with vs. The way to worke this feate standeth vpon swiftnesse and hardinesse to runne vpon them sodainely, as Lyons do, which being naked feare not to runne into the middest of any heard of fearefull beasts. He had no sooner spoken these words, but the FIRMANIAN souldiers beganne to runne downe the mountaines as they were, vpon those that kept the watch: and so setting vpon them, they being out of order, made them flie, and tooke an armed man prisoner. When they had him, they straight brought him vnto Cato, who by oth of the prisoner, was aduertised how that ŷ strength of their enemies army was lodged about the person of the King, within the straight and valley of the said mountaine: and that the souldiers they saw, were sixe hundred ÆTOLIANS, all braue souldiers, whom they had chosen and appointed to keepe the toppe of the rockes ouer King Antiochus campe. When Cato had heard him, making small account of the matter, as well for their small number, as also for the ill order they kept: he made the trumpets sound straight, and his souldiers to march in battell with great cryes, himselfe being the foremost man of all his troupe, with a sword drawne in his hand. But when the ÆTOLIANS saw them coming downe the rockes towards them, they began to flie for life vnto their great campe, which they filled full of feare, trouble, and all disorder. Now Manius at the same present also, gaue an assault vnto the walles and fortification the king had made ouerthwart the vallies and straights of the mountaines: at which assault king Antiochus selfe had a blow on the face with a stone, that strake some of his teeth out of his mouth, so that for very paine and anguish he felt, he turned his horse back, and got him behind the preasse. And then there were none of his army that made any more resistance, or that could abide the fierceness of the Romaines. But notwithstanding that the places were very ill for flying, because it was vnpossible for them to scatter and straggle, being holden in with high rockes on the one side of them, and with bogges and deepe marishes on the other side, which they must needes fall into if their feete slipped, or were thrust forward by any: yet they fell one vpon another in the straights, & ran so in heapes together, that they cast themselues away, for feare of the Romaines swords that lighted vpon them in euery corner. And there Marcus Cato, that neuer made ceremonie or niceness to praise himselfe openly, nor reckened it any shame to do it, did take a present occasion for it, as falleth out vpon all victorie and famous exploits: and so did set it out with all the ostentation and braue words he could giue. For he wrote with his owne hands; and such as saw him chase and lay vpon his flying enemies that day, were driuen to say, that Cato was not bound to the Romaines, but the Romaines bound vnto Cato. And then Manius the Consull selfe, being in a great heate with the furie of the battell, embraced Cato a great while, that was also hote with chafing of the enemie, and spake aloude with great ioy before them all, that neither he, nor the people of Rome could recõpence Cato, for his valiant seruice that day. After this battell, the Consull Manius sent Cato to Rome, to be the messenger himselfe to report the newes of the victorie. So he imbarked incontinently, and had such a faire wind, that he passed ouer the seas to Brindes without any danger, and went from thence vnto Tarentvm in one day, and from Tarentvm in foure dayes more to Rome. And so he came to Rome in fiue dayes after his landing in Italy, and made such speed that himselfe was indeed the first messenger that brought newes of the victory. Whereupon he filled all Rome with ioy and sacrifices, and made the Romaines so proud, that euer after they thought themselues able men to conquer the world both by sea and land. And these be all the martiall deedes and noble acts Cato did. But for his doings in ciuill policy and state, he seemed to be of his opinion: that to accuse and pursue the wicked, he thought it was the best thing an honest man and good gouernour of the commonwealth could employ himselfe vnto: for he accused many, & subscribed many other accusations which they preferred. And to be short, he did alwaies stirre vp some accuser, as he did Petilius against Scipio. But Scipio, by reason of his nobilitie, the greatnesse of his house, and the magnanimitie of his mind, passed not for any accusation they could lay against him: being out of all feare, they should be able to condemne him: and so he let fall the accusation he had against him. Notwithstanding, he ioyned with other that accused Lucius Scipio, his owne brother, and followed the matter so sore against him, that he caused him to be condemned in a great summe of money to the common-wealth: who being vnable to pay the fine, had gone to prison, and hardly scaped it, had not the Tribunes of the people reuoked his condemnation. It is said that Cato coming through the market place one day, and meeting with a yong man by the way that had ouerthrowne his aduersarie in suite, and put one of his late fathers greatest enemies to open shame & foile before the people, he embraced him with a good countenance, and said vnto him: Oh my sonne, sacrifices that good children should offer to their fathers soule, be not lambs nor kiddes, but the teares and condemnations of their enemies. But as he vexed other, so he scaped not free himselfe from danger, in administration of the commonwealth. For if they could catch the least vantage in the world of him, his enemies straight accused him: so as they say he was accused almost fifty times, and at the last time of his accusation, he was about the age of fourescore yeares. And then he spake a thing openly that was noted: That it was a harder thing to giue vp an account of his life before men in any other world, then in this amongst whom he liued. And yet was not this the last suite he followed: for foure yeares after, when he was fourescore and tenne yeares of age, he accused Seruius Galba. And thus he liued as Nestor, in manner three ages of man, alwayes in continuall suite and action. For when he wrestled with the first Scipio the African about matters of state and common wealth, he went on vnto the time of the second, that was adopted by the first Scipioes sonne, the naturall sonne of Paulus Æmylius, who ouercame Perseus, king of Macedon.

Furthermore, Marcus Cato ten yeares after his Conſulſhip, ſued to be Cenſor, which was in ROME the greateſt office of dignitie that any citizen of ROME could attaine vnto: and as a man may ſay, the roome of all glory and honor of their common wealth. For among other authorities, the Cenſor had power to examine mens liues and manners, and to puniſh euery offendor. For the ROMAINS were of that mind, that they would not haue men marry, beget children, liue priuately by themſelues, and make feaſts and bankets at their pleaſure, but that they ſhould ſtand in feare to be reproued and enquired of by the magiſtrate: and that it was not good to giue euery body liberty, to do what they would, following his owne luſt and fancie. And they iudging that mens naturall diſpoſitions do appeare more in ſuch things, then in all other things that are openly done at noone dayes, & in the ſight of the world, vſed to chooſe two Cenſors, that were two Surueyors of maners, to ſee that euery man behaued himſelfe vertuouſly, & gaue not themſelues to pleaſure, nor to breake the lawes and cuſtomes of the common welth. Theſe officers were called in their tong, Cenſores, and alwayes of cuſtome, one of them was a PATRICIAN, and the other a commoner. Theſe two had power and authority to diſgrade a Knight, by taking away his horſe, and to put any off the Senate, whom they ſaw liue diſſolutely and diſorderly. It was their office alſo, to ſeſſe and rate euery citizen according to the eſtimation of their goods; to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of euery man, & to keep books of them, beſides many other prerogatiues they had belonging to their office. Therfore whē Cato came to ſue for this office among other, the chiefeſt Senators were all bent againſt him. Some of them for very enuy, thinking it ſhame and diſhonor to the Nobility, to ſuffer men that were meanely borne, and vpſtarts (the firſt of their houſe and name, that euer came to beare office in the ſtate) to be called & preferred vnto their higheſt offices of ſtate in all their cōmon wealth. Other alſo that were ill liuers, and knowing that they had offended the lawes of their country, they feared his cruelty too much, imagining he would ſpare no man, nor pardon any offence, hauing the law in his owne hands. So when they had conſulted together about it, they did ſet vp ſeuen competitors againſt him, who flattered the people with many faire words and promiſes, as though they had need of magiſtrates to vſe them gently, and to do things for to pleaſe them. But Cato contrariwiſe, ſhewing, no countenance that he would vſe them gently in the office, but openly in the pulpit for orations, threatning thoſe that had liued naughtily and wickedly, he cried out: that they muſt reforme their citie, and perſwaded the people not to chooſe the gentleſt, but the ſharpeſt Phiſitions: and that himſelfe was ſuch a one as they needed, and among the PATRICIANS Valerius Flaccus another, in whoſe company he hoped (they two being choſē Cenſors) to do great good vnto the common wealth, by burning and cutting off (like Hydraes heads) all vanitie and voluptuous pleaſures, that were crept in amongſt them: and that he ſaw well inough, how all the other ſuters ſought the office by diſhoneſt meanes, fearing ſuch officers as they knew would deale iuſtly and vprightly. Then did the people of ROME ſhew themſelues nobly minded, and worthy of noble gouernours. For they refuſed not the ſowerneſſe or ſeueritie of Cato, but reiected theſe meale-mouthed men, that ſeemed ready to pleaſe the people in all things: and thereupon choſe Marcus Cato Cenſor, and Valerius Flaccus to be his fellow, and they did obey him, as if he had bene preſent officer, and no ſuter for the office, being in themſelues to giue it to whom they thought good. The firſt thing he did after he was ſtalled in his Cenſorſhip, was that he named Lucius Valerius Flaccus his friend and fellow Cenſor with him, prince of the Senate: and among many other alſo whom he thruſt out of the Senate, he put Lucius Quintius Flaminius off the Senate, that had bene Conſull ſeuen yeares before, and was brother alſo vnto Titus Quintius Flaminius that ouercame Philip king of MACEDON in battell, which was greater glorie to him, then that he had bene Conſull. But the cauſe why he put him off the Senate, was this: This Lucius Quintius caried euer with him a young boy to the warres, whom he gaue as good countenance and credite vnto, as to any of his beſt familiar friends he had about him. It fortuned on a time whileſt Lucius Quintius was Conſull and gouernor of a prouince, that he made a feaſt, and this boy being ſet at his table, hard by him, as his maner was, he began to flatter him, knowing how to handle him when he was pretily merrie: and ſoothing him, told him he loued him ſo dearely, that vpon his departing from ROME, when ỹ ſword-players were ready to fight for life and death with vnrebated ſwords, to ſhew the people paſtime, he came his way, & left the ſight of that he neuer ſaw, that was very deſirous to haue ſeen a man killed. Thē this Lucius Quintius, to make him ſee the like, ſaid: care not for ỹ fight thou haſt loſt, boy, for I wil let thee ſee as much

The cauſe why Cato put Quintius off the Senate.

Lucius Quintius Flaminius wickednesse and crueltie.

And when he had spoken these words, he commanded a prisoner condemned to die, to be fetched and brought into his hall before him, and the hang-man with his axe: which was forthwith done according to his commandement. Then asked he the boy, if he would straight see the man killed: Yea sir said the boy: and with that he bade the hang-man strike off his head. Most writers report this matter thus: And Cicero to confirme it also, wrote in his booke de Senectute, that the same was written in an oration Cato made before the people of ROME. Now Lucius Quintius being thus shamefully put off the Senate by Cato, his brother Titus being offended withall, could not tell what to do, but besought the people that they would command Cato to declare the cause, why he brought such shame vnto his house. Whereupon Cato openly before the people, made recitall of all this feast. And when Lucius denied it, affirming it was not so: Cato would haue him sworne before them all, that it was not true they had burdened him withall. But Lucius prayed them to pardon him, who said he would not sweare: whereupon the people iudged straight that he deserued well that shame. So not long after, certaine games being shewed in the Theater, Lucius came thither, and passing beyond the ordinary place that was appointed for those that had bene Consuls, he went to sit aloofe off amongst the multitude. The people tooke pitie on him, and made such ado about him, as they forced him to rise, and to go sit among the other Senators that had bene Consuls: saluing the best they could, the shame and dishonour happened vnto so noble a house. Cato put out of the Senate also, one Manlius, who was in great towardlinesse to haue bene made Consull the next yeare following, onely because he kissed his wife too louingly in the day time, and before his daughter: and reproouing him for it, he told him, his wife neuer kissed him, but when it thundered. So when he was disposed to be merrie, he would say it was happy with him when Iupiter thundered. He tooke away Lucius Scipioes horse from him, that had triumphed for the victories he had wonne of the great King Antiochus: which wanne him much ill will, because it appeared to the world he did it of purpose, for the malice he did beare Scipio the AFRICAN, that was dead. But the thing that most grieued the people, of all other extremities he vsed, was his putting downe of all feasts and vaine expences. For a man to take it cleane away, and to be openly seene in it, it was vnpossible, because it was so common a thing, and euery man was giuen so to it. Therefore Cato to fetch it about indirectly, did praise euery citizens goods, and rated their apparell, their coaches, their litters, their wiues chaines and iewels, & al other moueables and houshold stuffe, that had cost aboue a thousand fiue hundred Drachmes apeece, at ten times as much as they were worth: to the end that such as had bestowed their mony in those curious trifles, should pay so much more subsidie to the maintenance of the common wealth, as their goods were ouer valued at. Moreouer he ordained for euery thousand Asses that those trifling things were praised at, the owners thereof should pay three thousand Asses to the common treasurie: to the end that they who were grieued with this taxe, and saw other pay lesse subsidie (that were as much worth as themselues, by liuing without, such toyes) might call home themselues againe: and lay aside such foolish brauery and fineneſse. Notwithstanding Cato, was enuied euery way. First, of them that were contented to pay the taxe imposed, rather then they would leaue their vanitie: and next, of them also, that would rather reforme themselues, then pay the taxe. And some thinke that this law was deuised rather to take away their goods, then to let them to make any shew of them: & they haue a fond opinion besides, that their riches are better seene in superfluous things, then in necessary. Whereat they say Aristotle the Philosopher did wonder more, then at any other thing: how men could thinke them more rich and happy, that had many curious and superfluous things, then those that had necessary and profitable things. And Scopas the THESSALIAN, when one of his familiar friends asked him, I know not what trifling thing, and to make him grant it the sooner, told him it was a thing he might well spare, and did him no good: Mary said he, all the goods I haue, are in such toyes as do me no good. So this couetous desire we haue to be rich, cometh of no necessary desire in nature, but is bread in vs by a false opinion from the common sort. Now Cato caring least of all for the exclamations they made against him, grew to be more straight and seuere. For he cut off the pipes and quils priuate men had made to conuey water into their houses and gardens, robbing the city of the water that came from their common conduit heads, and did plucke downe also mens porches that were made before their doores into the streete, and brought downe the prises of common workes in the city, and moreouer raised the common farmes and customes of the city, as high as he could all

Wherefore Titus Flaminius, and certaine other being bent againſt him in open Senate, cauſed all Catoes couenants and bargaines made with the maſter worke-man, for repairing and mending of the common buildings & holy places, to be made voide, as things greatly preiudiciall to the commonwealth. And they did alſo ſtirre vp the boldeſt & raſheſt of the Tribunes of the people againſt him, becauſe they ſhould accuſe him vnto the people, and make requeſt he might be condemned in the ſumme of two talents. They did maruellouſly hinder alſo the building of the pallace he built at the charge of the common wealth, looking into the market place vnder the Senate houſe: which pallace was finiſhed notwithſtanding, and called after his name, Baſilica Porcia: as who would ſay, the pallace Porcius the Cenſor built. Howbeit it ſeemed the people of Rome did greatly like and commend his gouernement in the Cenſorſhip: for they ſet vp a ſtatue of him in the temple of the goddeſſe of Health, whereunder they wrote not his victories nor triumph, but only ingraued this inſcription word for word, to this effect by tranſlation: For the honour of Marcus Cato the Cenſor: becauſe he reformed the diſcipline of the common wealth of Rome (that was farre out of order, and giuen to licencious life) by his wiſe precepts, good maners, and holy inſtitutions. Indeed, before this image was ſet vp for him, he was wont to mocke at them that delighted, and were deſirous of ſuch things: ſaying, they did not conſider how they bragged in founders, painters, and image-makers, but nothing of their vertues: and that for himſelfe, the people did alwayes cary liuely images of him in their hearts, meaning the memorie of his life and doings. When ſome wondered why diuerſe meane men and vnknowne perſons had images ſet vp of them, and there were none of him, he gaue them this anſwer: I had rather men ſhould aske why Cato had no image ſet vp for him, then why he had any. In the end, he would haue no honeſt man abide to be praiſed, vnleſſe his praiſe turned to the benefit of the common wealth: and yet was he one of them that would moſt praiſe himſelfe. So that if any had done a fault, or ſlept awrie, and that men had gone about to reproue them, he would ſay they were not to be blamed, for they were no Catoes that did offend. And ſuch as counterfeited to follow any of his doings, and came ſhort of his manner, he called them left handed Catoes. He would ſay that in moſt dangerous times the Senate vſed to caſt their eyes vpō him, as paſſengers on the ſea do looke vpon the maſter of the ſhip in a ſtorme: and that many times when he was abſent, the Senate would put ouer matters of importance, vntill he might come among them. And this is confirmed to be true, as well by other as by himſelfe. His authority was great in matters of ſtate, for his wiſedome, his eloquence, and great experience. Beſides this commendation, they praiſed him for a good father to his children, a good husband to his wife, and a good ſauer for his profit: for he was neuer careleſſe of them, as things to be lightly paſſed on. And therefore me thinkes I muſt needs tell you by the way ſome part of his well doing, to follow our declaration of him. Firſt of all he maried a gentlewoman more noble then rich, knowing that either of both would make her proud and ſtout enough: but yet he thought the nobler borne, would be the more aſhamed of diſthoneſty, then the meaner borne: and therefore they would be more obedient to their husbands, in all honeſt manner and reaſonable things. Furthermore, he ſaid: that he that beate his wife or his child, did commit as great a ſacriledge, as if he polluted or ſpoiled the holieſt things of the world: and he thought it a greater praiſe for a man to be a good husband then a good Senatour. And therefore he thought nothing more commendable in the life of old Socrates, then his patience, in vſing his wife well, that was ſuch a ſhrew, and his children that were ſo hare-brained. After Catoes wife had brought him a ſonne, he could not haue ſo earneſt buſineſſe in hand, if it had not touched the common wealth, but he would let all alone, to go home to his houſe, about the time his wife did vnſwaddle the young boy to waſh and ſhift him: for ſhe gaue it ſucke with her owne breaſts, and many times would let the ſlaues children ſucke of her alſo, becauſe they might haue a naturall loue towards her ſonne, hauing ſucked one milke, and bene brought vp together. When his ſonne was come to age of diſcretion, and that he was able to learne any thing, Cato himſelfe did teach him, notwithſtanding he had a ſlaue in his houſe called Chilo (a very honeſt man, and a good Grammarian) who did alſo teach many other: but as he ſaid himſelfe, he did not like a ſlaue ſhould rebuke his ſonne, nor pull him by the eares, when peraduenture he was not apt to take very ſodainely that was taught him: neither would he haue his ſonne bound to a ſlaue for ſo great a matter as that, as to haue his learning of him. Wherefore he himſelfe taught him his grammer, the law, and to exercise his body, not onely to throw a dart, to play at the sword, to vawt, to ride a horse, and to handle all sorts of weapons, but also to fight with fists, to abide cold and heate, and to swim ouer a swift running riuer. He said moreouer, that he wrote goodly histories in great letters with his owne hand, because his son might learne in his fathers house the vertues of good men in times past, that he taking example by their doings, should frame his life to excell thē. He said also, that he tooke as great heed of speaking any foule or vncomely words before his son, as he would haue done if he had bene before the Vestall Nunnes. He neuer was in the hot house with his sonne: for it was a common vse with the ROMAINES at that time, that the sonnes in law did not bathe themselues with their fathers in law, but were ashamed to see one another naked. But afterwards they hauing learned of the GREEKES to wash themselues naked with men, it taught them also to be naked in the bathe euen with their wiues. There lacked no towardlinesse, nor good disposition in Catoes sonne, to frame himselfe vertuous: for he was of so good a nature, that he shewed himselfe willing to follow whatsoeuer his father had taught him. Howbeit he was such a weake puling, that he could not away with much hardnesse, and therefore his father was contented not to binde him to that straight and painefull life, which himselfe had kept. Yet he became valiant in the warres. For he fought maruellous stoutly in the battell, in which Perseus King of MACEDON was ouerthrowne by Paulus Æmylius: where his sword being striken out of his hand, with a great blow that lighted on it, and by reason his hand was somewhat sweaty besides, he fell into a great fury, and prayed some of his friends to help him to recouer it. So they all together ranne vpon the enemies in that place where his sword fell out of his hand, and came in so fiercely on them, that they made a lane through them; and clearing the place, found it in the end, but with much ado, being vnder such an heape of dead bodies and other weapons as well ROMAINES as MACEDONIANS, one lying on another. Paulus Æmylius the Generall hearing of this act of his, did highly commend the yong man. And at this day there is a letter extant from Cato to his son, in the which he praiseth this worthy fact and toile of his, for the recouering of his sword againe. Afterwards, this Cato the yonger maried Tertia, one of Paulus Æmylius daughters, and sister vnto Scipio the second, and so was matched in this noble house, not only for his owne vertues sake, but for respect of his fathers dignitie and authority: whereby the great care, paines, and study that Cato the father took in bringing vp his sonne, in vertue & learning, was honourably rewarded in the happy bestowing of his sonne. He euer had a great number of young litle slaues which he bought, when any would sell their prisoners in the warres. He did chuse them thus young, because they were apt yet to learne any thing he would traine them vnto, and that a man might breake them like young colts, or little whelpes. But none of them all, how many soeuer he had, did euer go to any mans house, but when himselfe or his wife did send them. If any man aske them what Cato did: they answered, they could not tell. And when they were within, either they must needs be occupied about somewhat, or els they must sleepe: for he loued them well that were sleepy, holding opinion that slaues that loued sleep were more tractable and willing to do any thing a man would set them to, then those that were waking. And because he thought that nothing did more prouoke slaues to mischiefe and naughtinesse, then lust and desire of women: he was contented his slaues might company with his bondwomen in his house, for a peece of mony he appointed them to pay, but with straight commandement besides, that none of them should deale with any other woman abroad. At the first when he gaue himselfe to follow the warres, and was not greatly rich, he neuer was angry for any fault his seruants did about his person: saying that it was a foule thing for a gentleman or nobleman, to fall out with his seruants for his belly. Afterwards as he rose to better state, & grew to be wealthier, if he had made a dinner or supper for any of his friends and familiars, they were no sooner gone, but he wold scourge thē with whips & leather thongs, that had not waited as they should haue done at the boord, or had forgottē any thing he would haue had done. He would euer craftily make one of them fall out with another: for he could not abide they should be friends, being euer iealous of that. If any of them had done a fault that deserued death, he would declare his offence before them all: and then if they condemned him to die, he would put him to death before them all: Howbeit in his later time he grew greedy, & gaue vp his tillage, saying that it was more pleasant then profitable. Therefore because he would lay out his mony surely, and bring a certaine reuenue to his purse, he bestowed it vpon ponds, and naturall hote bathes, places fit for fullers craft; vpon medowes and pastures, vpon copises and young wood: and of all these he

he made a great and a more quiet reuenue yearely, which he would say, Iupiter himselfe could not diminish. Furthermore he was a great vsurer, both by land and by sea: and the vsury he tooke by sea, was most extreme of all other, for he vsed it in this sort. He would haue them to whom he lent his mony vnto, that trafficked by sea, to haue many partners, to the number of fifty: and that they should haue so many ships. Then he would venture among them for a part onely, whereof Quintius his slaue whom he had manumissed, was made his factor, and vsed to saile and traffick with the merchants, to whom he had lent his mony out to vsury. And thus he did not venture all the mony he lent, but a litle peece onely for his part, and got maruellous riches by his vsurie. Moreouer he lent money to any of his slaues, that would therewith buy other yong slaues, whom they taught and brought vp to do seruice, at Catoes charge and cost: and then they sold them againe at the yeares end, and some of them Cato kept for his owne seruice, and gaue his slaues as much for them as any other offered. Therefore to allure his son in like maner to make profit of his mony, he told him it was no wise mans part to diminish his substance, but rather the part of a widow. Yet this was a token of a most greedy couetous mind, that he durst affirme him to be diuine, and worthy immortall praise, that increased his wealth and patrimony more then his father left him. Furthermore, when Cato was growne very old, Carneades the ACADEMICK, and Diogenes the STOICKE, were sent from ATHENS as Ambassadors to ROME, to sue for a release of a fine of fiue hundred talents which they had imposed on the ATHENIANS vpon a condemnation passed against them for a contempt of appearance, by the sentence of the SICYONIANS, at the suite of ỹ OROPIANS. Immediatly when these two philosophers were arriued in the city of ROME, the yong gentlemen that were giuen to their books, did visit and welcome them, and gaue great reuerence to them after they had heard them speake, and specially to Carneades: whose grace in speaking, and force of perswading was no lesse then the fame ranne of him, & specially when he was to speake in so great an audience, and before such a state, as would not suppresse his praise. ROME straight was ful, as if a wind had blowne this rumor into euery mans eare: that there was a GRECIAN arriued, a famous learned man, who with his eloquence wold leade a man as he list. There was no other talke a while through the whole citie, he had so inflamed the yong gentlemens minds with loue and desire to be learned: that all other pleasures and delights were set aside, and they disposed themselues to no other exercise, but to the study of Philosophie, as if some secret and diuine inspiration from aboue had procured them to it. Whereof the Lords and Senators of ROME were glad; and reioyced much to see their youth so well giuen to knowledge, and to the studie of the Greeke tongue, and to delight in the companie of these two great and excellent learned men. But Marcus Cato, euen from the beginning that yong men began to study the Greeke tongue, & that it grew in estimation in ROME, did dislike of it: fearing lest the youth of ROME that were desirous of learning and eloquence, would vtterly giue ouer the honor and glory of armes. Furthermore, when he saw the estimation and fame of these two personages did increase more and more, and in such sort that Caius Aquilius, one of the chiefest of the Senate made suite to be their interpreter: he determined then to conuey them out of the city by some honest meane and colour. So he openly found fault one day in the Senate, that the Ambassadours were long there, and had not dispatch: considering also they were cunning men, and could easily perswade what they would. And if there were no other respect, this onely might perswade them to determine some answer for them, and so to send them home againe to their schooles, to teach their children of GREECE, and to let alone the children of ROME, that they might learne to obey the lawes and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he spake this to the Senate, not of any priuate ill will or malice he bare to Carneades, as some men thought: but because he generally hated Philosophie, and of ambition despised the muses and knowledge of the Greeke tongue. Which was the more suspected, because he had said, the ancient Socrates was but a busie man, and a stirrer vp of sedition, and sought by all meanes possible to vsurp tyranny and rule in his country: by peruerting and changing the manners and customes of the same, and alluring the subiects thereof to a disliking of their lawes and ancient customes. And he laughed at Socrates schoole, that taught the art of Eloquence: saying his schollers waxed old, and were still so long in learning, that they meant to vse their eloquence and pleade causes in another world before Minos, when they were dead. Therefore to plucke his sonne from the study of the Greeke tongue, he said to him with a strained voice, and in a bigger sound then he was wont to do: (as if he had spoken to him by way of prophecie or inspiration) that ſo long as the ROMAINES diſpoſed themſelues to ſtudy the Greeke tongue, ſo long would they marre and bring all to nought. And yet time hath proued his vaine words falſe and vntrue. For the city of ROME did neuer flouriſh ſo much, nor the ROMAINE Empire was euer ſo great, as at that time, when learning and the Greeke tongue moſt flouriſhed. Howbeit Cato did not onely hate the Philoſophers of GREECE, but did miſlike them alſo that profeſſed phiſicke in ROME. For he had either heard or read the anſwer Hippocrates made, when the King of PERSIA ſent for him, and offered him a great ſumme of gold and ſiluer, if he would come and ſerue him: who ſware he would neuer ſerue the barbarous people that were naturall enemies to the GRECIANS. So Cato affirmed it was an oath that all other Phiſitions ſware euer after: wherefore he commanded his ſonne to flie from them all alike, and ſaid he had written a little booke of phiſicke, with the which he did heale thoſe of his houſe when they were ſicke, and did keepe them in health, when they were whole. He neuer forbade them to eate, but did alwayes bring them vp with hearbs, and certaine light meates, as mallard, ringdoues and hares: for ſuch meates, ſaid he, are good for the ſick, and light of digeſtion, ſauing that they make them dreame & ſnort that eate them. He boaſted alſo how with this maner of phiſicke, he did alwayes keepe himſelfe in health, & his family from ſickneſſe. Yet for all that, I take it, he did not all that he bragged of: for he buried both his wife and his ſonne alſo. But he himſelfe was of a ſtrong nature, and a luſty body, full of ſtrength, & health, and liued long without ſickneſſe: ſo that when he was a very old man and paſt mariage, he loued women well, and maried a yong maiden for that cauſe onely. After his firſt wife was dead, he maried his ſonne vnto Paulus Æmylius daughter, the ſiſter of Scipio, the ſecond AFRICAN. Cato himſelfe being a widower, tooke paines with a prety yong maide that waited in his houſe, and came by ſtealth to his chamber: howbeit his haunt could not long continue ſecret in his houſe, and ſpecially where there was a young gentlewoman maried, but needs muſt be ſpied. So, one day when the young maid went ſomewhat boldly by the chamber of yong Cato, to go to his father, the yong man ſaid neuer a word at it: yet his father perceiued that he was ſomewhat aſhamed, and gaue the maide no good countenance. Wherefore finding that his ſonne and daughter in law were angry with the matter, ſaying nothing to them of it, nor ſhewing them any ill countenance: he went one morning to the market place (as his maner was with a traine that followed him, amongſt whom was one Salonius that had bene his clearke, and waited vpon him as the reſt did. Cato calling him out aloud by his name, asked him if he had not yet beſtowed his daughter. Salonius anſwered him, he had not yet beſtowed her, nor would not before he made him priuy to it. Then Cato told him againe: I haue found out a husband for her, and a ſonne in law for thee, and it will be no ill match for her vnleſſe ſhe miſlike the age of the man; for indeed he is very old, but otherwiſe there is no fault in him. Salonius told him againe, that for that matter he referred all to him, and his daughter alſo, praying him euen to make what match he thought good for her: for ſhe was his humble ſeruant, and relyed wholly vpon him, ſtanding in need of his fauour and furtherance. Then Cato began to diſcouer, and told him plainely he would willingly marrie her himſelfe. Salonius therewith was abaſhed, becauſe he thought Cato was too old to marrie then, and himſelfe was no fit man to match in any honourable houſe, ſpecially with a Conſull, and one that had triumphed: howbeit in the end, when he ſaw Cato meant good earneſt, he was very glad of the match, and ſo with this talke they went on together to the market place, and agreed then vpon the mariage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the ſonne taking ſome of his kinne and friends with him, went vnto his father, to aske him if he had offended him in any thing, that for ſpite he ſhould bring him a ſteppe-mother into his houſe. Then his father cried out, and ſaid: O my ſonne, I pray thee ſay not ſo, I like well all thou doeſt, and I find no cauſe to complaine of thee: but I do it, becauſe I deſire to haue many children, and to leaue many ſuch like citizens as thou art, in the common wealth. Some ſay that Piſiſtratus the tyrant of ATHENS, made ſuch a like anſwer vnto the children of his firſt wife, which were men growne when he maried his ſecond wife Timonaſſa, of the towne of ARGOS, of whom he had (as it is reported) Iophon, and Theſſalus. But to returne againe to Cato, he had a ſonne by his ſecond wife, whom he named after her name, Cato SALONIAN: and his eldeſt ſonne died in his office being Prætor, of whom he often ſpeaketh in diuers of his bookes commending him for a very honeſt man. And they ſay, he tooke the death of him very patiently, and like a graue wiſe man, not leauing therfore to do any ſeruice or buſines for the ſtate, otherwiſe then he did before.

And

And therein he did not as Lucius Lucullus, and Metellus surnamed Pius, did afterwards: who gaue vp medling any more with matters of gouernement and state, after they were waxen old. For he thought it a charge and dutie, whereunto euery honest man whilest he liued was bound in al piety. Nor as Scipio AFRICAN had done before him, who perceiuing that the glory & fame of his doings did but purchase him the ill will of his citizens, he changed the rest of his life into quietnesse, and forsooke the city and all dealings in commonwealth, and went and dwelt in the countrey. But as there was one that told Dionysius the tyrant of SYRACVSA, as it is written, that he could not dye more honorably, then to be buried in the tyranny: euen so did Cato thinke, that he could not waxe more honestly old, then in seruing of the cõmonwealth vnto his dying day. So at vacant times, when Cato was desirous a litle to recreate and refresh himselfe, he passed his time away in making of bookes, and looking vpon his husbandry in the countrey. This is the cause why he wrote so many kinds of bookes and stories. But his tillage and husbandry in the countrey, he did tend and follow in his youth, for his profite. For he said he had but two sorts of reuenue, tillage and sparing: but in age whatsoeuer he did in the countrey, it was all for pleasure, and to learne something euer of nature. For he hath written a book of the country life, and of tillage, in the which he sheweth how to make tartes and cakes, and how to keepe fruits: he would needs shew such singularitie and skill in all things. When he was in his house in the country, he fared a litle better then he did in other places, and would oftentimes bid his neighbours, and such as had land lying about him, to come and suppe with him, and he would be merry with them: so that his company was not onely pleasant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but also to the younger sort. For he had seene much, and had experience in many things, and vsed much pleasant talke profitable for the hearers. He thought the boord one of the chiefest means to breed loue amongst men, and at his owne table would alwayes praise good men and vertuous citizens, but would suffer no talke of euill men, neither in their praise nor dispraise. Now it is thought the last notable act and seruice he did in the common wealth, was the ouerthrow of CARTHAGE: for indeed he that wan it & razed it vtterly, was Scipio the second, but it was chiefly through Catoes counsell and aduise, that the last warre was taken in hand against the CARTHAGINIANS, and chanced vpon this occasion. Cato was sent into AFRICKE to vnderstand the cause and controuersie that was betweene the CARTHAGINIANS and Massinissa, King of NVMIDIA, which were at great warres together. And he was sent thither because King Massinissa had euer bene a friend vnto the ROMAINES, and for that the CARTHAGINIANS were become their confederates since the last warres, in the which they were ouerthrowne by Scipio the first, who tooke for a fine of them a great part of their Empire, and imposed vpon them besides, a great yearely tribute. Now when he was come into that country, he found not the city of CARTHAGE in misery, beggery, and out of heart, as the ROMAINS supposed: but full of lusty youths, very rich and wealthy, and great store of armour and munition in it for the wars, so that by reason of the wealth thereof, CARTHAGE caried a high saile, and stooped not for a litle. Wherefore he thought that it was more then time for the ROMAINS to leaue to vnderstand the controuersies betwixt the CARTHAGINIANS and Massinissa, and rather to prouide betimes to destroy CARTHAGE, that hath euer bene an ancient enemie to the ROMAINES, and euer sought to be reuenged of that they had suffered at their hands before, and that they were now growne to that greatnes and courage in so short time, as in manner it was incredible: so as it was likely they would fall into as great enmity with the ROMAINES, as euer they did before. Therfore so soone as he returned to ROME, he plainely told the Senate, that the losses and harmes the CARTHAGINIANS had receiued by the last wars they had with them, had not so much diminished their power and strength, as the same had shewed their owne folly and lacke of wisdome: for it was to be feared much, lest their late troubles had made them more skilfull, then weakned them for the wars. And that they made warres now with the NVMIDIANS, to exercise them only, meaning afterwards to war with themselues: and that the peace they had made with them, was but an intermission and stay of warres, only expecting time and oportunitie to breake with them againe. They say moreouer, that besides the perswasions he vsed, he brought with him of purpose AFRICKE figs in his long sleeues, which he shooke out amongst them in the Senate: & when the Senators maruelled to see so goodly faire greene figges, he said: The country that beareth them, is not aboue three dayes sailing from ROME. But yet this is more strange which they report of him besides: that he neuer declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that, but this was euer the one end of his tale: Me thinketh ſtill CARTHAGE would be vtterly deſtroyed. Publius Scipio Naſica, vſed euer in like maner the contrarie ſpeech: that he thought it meete CARTHAGE ſhould ſtand. This Publius Scipio ſaw, in my opinion, that the ROMAINES through their pride and inſolencie were full of abſurdities, and caried themſelues very high, by reaſon of their happy ſucceſſe and victories, and were ſo loftie minded, that the Senate could hardly rule them: and that by reaſon of their great authority, they imagined they might bring their citie to what height they would. Therfore he ſpake it that the feare of CARTHAGE might alwaies continue as a bridle, to raine in the inſolencie of the people of ROME, who knew well enough, that the CARTHAGINIANS were of no ſufficient power to make wars with the ROMAINES, nor yet to ouercome them: and euen ſo were they not wholly to be deſpiſed, and not to be feared at all. Cato ſtill replied to the contrary, that therin conſiſted the greateſt danger of all: that a city which was euer of great force and power, and had bene puniſhed for former warres and miſerie, would alwayes haue an eye of reuenge to their enemies, and be much like a horſe that had broken his haltar, that being vnbridled, would run vpon his rider. And therefore he thought it no good nor ſound aduice, ſo to ſuffer the CARTHAGINIANS to recouer their ſtrength, but rather they ought altogether to take away all outward danger, and the feare they ſtood in to loſe their conqueſt: and ſpecially, when they left meanes within the citie ſelfe to fall ſtill again to their former rebellion. And this is the cauſe why they ſuppoſe Cato was the occaſion of the third and laſt war the ROMAINES had againſt the CARTHAGINIANS. But now when the warre was begun, Cato died, and before his death he prophecied, as a man would ſay, who it ſhould be that ſhould end thoſe wars. And it was Scipio the ſecond, who being a young man at that time, had charge onely as a Colonel ouer a thouſand footmen: but in all battels, and whereſoeuer there was wars, he ſhewed himſelfe euer valiant and wiſe. Inſomuch as newes being brought thereof continually vnto ROME, and Cato hearing them, ſpake (as they ſay) theſe two verſes of Homer:

This onely man right wiſe reputed is to be,
All other ſeeme but ſhadowes, ſet by ſuch wiſe men as he.

Which prophecie Scipio ſoone after confirmed true by his doings. Moreouer, the iſſue Cato left behind him, was a ſonne he had by his ſecond wife: who was called (as we ſaid before) Cato SALONIAN, by reaſon of his mother, and a litle boy of his eldeſt ſon that died before him. This Cato SALONIAN died being Prætor, but he left a ſonne behind him that came to be Conſull, and was grandfather vnto Cato the Philoſopher, one of the moſt vertuous men of his time.

THE COMPARISON OF Aristides with Marcus Cato.

NOW that we haue set downe in writing, these notable and worthie things of memorie: if we will conferre the life of the one, with the life of the other, perhaps the difference betweene the one and the other will not easily be discerned, seeing there be so many similitudes and resemblances one of another. But if we come to compare them in euery particularitie, as we would do Poets workes, or pictures drawne in tables: first, in this we shall find them much alike, that hauing had nothing else to preferre and commend them, but their onely vertue and wisedome, they haue bene both gouernours in their common wealth, and haue thereby atchieued to great honour and estimation. But me thinkes when Aristides came to deale in matters of state, the common wealth and Seigniorie of ATHENS being then of no great power, it was easie for him to aduance himselfe, because the other Gouernours and Captaines of his time, and that were competitors with him, were not very rich, nor of great authoritie. For the taxe of the richest persons then at ATHENS in reuenue, was but at fiue hundred bushels of corne and vpwards, and therefore were such called Pentacosiomedimni. The second taxe was but at three hundred bushels, and they were called knights. The third and last was at two hundred bushels, and they called them Zeugitæ. Where Marcus Cato coming out of a litle village from a rude countrey life, went at the first dash (as it were) to plunge himselfe into a bottomlesse sea of gouernment in the common wealth of ROME: which was not ruled then by such gouernours and Captaines, as Curius Fabricius, and Ostilius were in old time. For the people of ROME did no more bestow their offices vpon such meane labouring men, as came but lately from the plough and the mattocke: but they would looke now vpon the nobilitie of their houses, and vpon their riches that gaue them most money, or sued earnestly to them for the office. And by reason of their great power and authority, they would be waited vpon and sued vnto, by those that sought to beare the honourable offices of the state and common-wealth. And it was no like match nor comparison, to haue Themistocles an aduersary and competitor, being neither of noble house, nor greatly rich (for they say, that all the goods his father left him, were not worth aboue foure or fiue hundred talents, when he began to deale in state) in respect as to contend for the chiefest place of honour and authority against Scipio AFRICAN, Seruilius Galba, or Quintius Flaminius, hauing no other maintenance, nor helpe to trust vnto, but a tongue speaking boldly with reason and all vprightnesse. Moreouer, Aristides at the battels of MARATHON, and of PLATÆES, was but one of the ten captaines of the ATHENIANS: where Cato was chosen one of two Consuls among many other noble and great competitors, and one of the two Censors, before seuen other that made suite for it, which were all men of great reputation in the city, and yet was Cato preferred before them all. Furthermore, Aristides was neuer

the chiefeſt in any victory. For at the battell of MARATHON, Miltiades was the Generall: and at the battell of SALAMINA, Themiſtocles: and at the iourney of PLATÆES, king Pauſanias as Herodotus ſaith, who writeth that he had a maruellous victory there. And there were that ſtriued with Ariſtides for the ſecond place, as Sophanes, Amynias, Callimachus, and Cynegirus, euery one of the which did notable valiant ſeruice at thoſe battels. Now Cato was Generall himſelfe, and chiefe of all his army in worthineſſe and counſell, during the warre he made in SPAINE while he was Conſull. Afterwards alſo in the iourney where king Antiochus was ouerthrowne in the countrey of THERMOPYLES, Cato being but a Colonell of a thouſand footmen, and ſeruing vnder another that was Conſull, wanne the honour of the victory, when he did ſuddenly ſet vpon Antiochus behind, whereas he looked only to defend himſelfe before. And that victory without all doubt was one of the chiefeſt acts that euer Cato did, who draue ASIA out of GREECE, and opened the way vnto Lucius Scipio to paſſe afterwards into ASIA. So then for the warres, neither the one nor the other of them was euer ouercome in battell: but in peace and ciuill gouernement, Ariſtides was ſupplanted by Themiſtocles, who by practiſe got him to be baniſhed ATHENS for a time. Whereas Cato had in manner all the greateſt and nobleſt men of ROME that were in his time, ſworne enemies vnto him, and hauing alwayes contended with them euen to his laſt houre, he euer kept himſelfe on ſound ground, like a ſtout champion, and neuer tooke fall nor foile. For he hauing accuſed many before the people, and many alſo accuſing him, himſelf was neuer once condemned, but alwaies his tongue was the buckler and defence of his life and innocencie. Which was to him ſo neceſſary a weapon, and with it he could helpe himſelfe in ſo great matters, that (in my opinion) it was the only cauſe why he neuer receiued diſhonor, nor was vniuſtly condemned: rather then for any thing elſe he was beholding to fortune, or to any other that did protect him. And truly, eloquence is a ſingular gift, as Antipater witneſſeth, in that he wrote of Ariſtotle the Philoſopher after his death: ſaying that amongſt many other ſingular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he could perſwade what he liſted. Now there is a rule confeſſed of all the world, that no man can attaine any greater vertue or knowledge, then to know how to gouerne a multitude of men, or a citie: a part whereof is Oeconomia, commonly called houſe-rule, conſidering that a city is no other, then an aſſembly of many houſholds and houſes together; and then is the city commonly ſtrong and of power, when as the townes men and citizens are wiſe and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that baniſhed gold and ſiluer from LACEDÆMON, and coyned them mony of iron, that would be marred with fire and vinegar when it was hote, did not forbid his citizens to be good husbands: but like a good lawmaker, exceeding all other that euer went before him, he did not only cut off all ſuperfluous expences that commonly waite vpon riches, but did alſo prouide that his people ſhould lacke nothing neceſſary to liue withall, fearing more to ſee a begger and needy perſon dwelling in his city, and enioy the priuiledges of the ſame, then a proud man by reaſon of his riches. So me thinks, Cato was as good a father to his houſhold, as he was a good gouernour to the commonwealth: for he did honeſtly increaſe his goods, and did teach other alſo to do the ſame, by ſauing, and knowledge of good husbandry, whereof in his booke he wrote ſundry good rules and precepts. Ariſtides contrariwiſe, made iuſtice odious and ſlanderous by his pouerty, and as a thing that made men poore, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans ſelfe that vſed iuſtice. And yet Heſiodus the Poet, that commendeth iuſtice ſo much, doth wiſh vs withall to be good husbands, reprouing ſloth and idleneſſe, as the roote and originall of all iniuſtice. And therefore me thinkes Homer ſpake wiſely when he ſaid:

In times paſt, neither did I labour, carke nor care
For buſineſſe, for family, for food, nor yet for fare:
But rather did delight, with ſhips the ſeaes to ſaile.
To draw a bow, to fling a dart in wars, and to preuaile,

As giuing vs to vnderſtand, that iuſtice and husbandry are two relatiues, and neceſſarily linked one to the other: & that a man who hath no care of his owne things nor houſe, doth liue vniuſtly, and taketh from other men. For iuſtice is not like oyle, which Phiſitions ſay is very wholſome for mans body, if it be applied outwardly: and in contrary maner very ill, if a man drinke it: neither ought a iuſt man to profit ſtrangers, & in the end not to care for himſelf nor his. Therefore me thinkes this gouerning vertue of Ariſtides had a fault in this reſpect, if it be true that moſt Authors write of him: that he had no care nor forecaſt with him to leaue ſo much, as to marry his his daughters withall, nor wherewith to bury himselfe. Where those of the house of Cato, continued Prætors and Consuls of Rome, euen vnto the fourth descent. For his sons sonnes, and yet lower, his sonnes sons sons came to the greatest offices of dignitie in Rome. And Aristides, who was in his time the chiefest man of Greece, left his posterity in so great pouerty, that some were compelled to become soothsayers (that interpret dreames, and tell mens fortune) to get their liuing, and other to aske almes: and left no meane to any of them, to do any great thing worthy him. But to cõtrary this, it might be said pouerty of it self, is neither ill nor dishonest: but where it groweth by idlenesse, careless life, vanity and folly, it is to be reproued. For when it lighteth vpon any man that is honest, & liueth well, that taketh paines, is very diligent, iust, valiant, wise, and gouerneth a common wealth well: then it is a great signe of a noble mind: for it is vnpossible that man should do any great things, that had such a base mind as to thinke alwaies vpon trifles: and that he should releeue the poore greatly, that lacketh himselfe reliefe in many things. And sure, riches are not so necessary for an honest man that will deale truely in the common-wealth, and gouernement, as is sufficiency: which being a contentation in it selfe, and desirous of no superfluous thing, it neuer withdraweth a man from following his businesse in the common wealth, that enioyeth the same. For God is he alone, who simply and absolutely hath no need of any thing at all: wherefore the chiefest vertue that can be in man, that cometh neerest vnto God, ought to be esteemed that, which maketh man to haue need of least things. For like as a lustie body, and well complexioned, hath no need of superfluous fare and curious apparell: euen so a cleane life, and sound house, is kept with a litle charge: and so should the goods also be proportioned, according to vse and necessitie. For he that gathereth much, and spendeth litle, hath neuer enough. But admit he hath no desire to spend much, then he is a foole to trauell to get more then he needeth: and if he do desire it, and dare not for niggardlinesse spend part of that he laboureth for, then he is miserable. Now would I aske Cato with a good will, if riches be made but to vse them, why doe you boast then you haue gotten much together, when a litle doth suffice you? And if it be a commendable thing (as in truth it is) to be contented with the bread you find, to drinke of the same tappe workmen & labourers do, not to care for purple died gownes, nor for houses with plastered walls: it followeth then that neither Aristides, nor Epaminõdas, nor Manius Curius, nor Caius Fabritius, haue forgotten any part of their duties, when they cared not for getting of that which they would not vse nor occupy. For it was to no purpose for a man that esteemed rootes and parsenips to be one of the best dishes in the world, and that did seeth them himselfe in his chimney, whilest his wife did bake his bread, to talke so much of an Asse, and to take paines to write, by what art and industrie a man might quickly inrich himself. For it is true, that sufficiencie and to be contented with a litle, is a good and commendable thing: but it is becaus it taketh from vs all desire of vnnecessary things, and maketh vs not to passe for them. And therefore we find that Aristides said, when rich Callias case was pleaded, that such as were poore against their wills, might well be ashamed of their pouerty: but such as were willingly poore, had good cause and might iustly reioyce at it. For it were a mad part to thinke that Aristides pouerty proceeded of a base mind and slouthfulnes, since he might quickly haue made himselfe rich without any dishonestie at all, by taking onely the spoile of some one of the barbarous people whom he had ouercome, or any one of their tents. But enough for this matter. Furthermore, touching the victories and battels Cato had won, they did in maner litle helpe to increase the Empire of Rome: for it was already so great, as it could almost be no greater. But Aristides victories are the greatest conquest and noblest acts that the Grecians euer did in any wars: as the iourny of Marathon, the battel of Salamina, & the battel of Platæes. And yet there is no reason to compare king Antiochus with king Xerxes, nor the wals of the townes of Spaine which Cato ouerthrew and razed, vnto so many thousands of barbarous people, which were then ouerthrown and put to the sword by the Grecians, aswell by land as by sea. In all which seruices, Aristides was the chiefest before all other, as touching his valiantnesse in fighting: notwithstanding he gaue other ỹ glory of it, that desired it more then himselfe, as he did easily leaue the gold & siluer vnto those that had more need of it then himself. Wherein he shewed himself of a nobler mind then all they did. Furthermore, for my part, I wil not reproue Catoes maner, to commend & extoll himself so highly aboue all other, since he himself saith in an oratiõ he made that to praise himself is as much folly, as also to dispraise himself: but this I thinke, his vertue is more perfect that desireth other should not praise him, then he that cõmonly doth vse to praise him-ſelfe. For not to be ambitious, is a great ſhew of humanitie, and neceſſary for him that will liue amongſt men of gouernment: and euen ſo, ambition is hatefull, and procureth great enuie vnto him that is infected withall. Of the which Ariſtides was cleare, and Cato farre gone in it. For Ariſtides did helpe Themiſtocles his chiefeſt enemie, in all his nobleſt acts, and did ſerue him (as a man would ſay) like a priuate ſouldier that guarded his perſon, when Themiſtocles was Generall, being the onely inſtrument and meane of his glory: which was indeed the onely cauſe that the city of ATHENS was ſaued, and reſtored again to her former good ſtate. Cato contrariwiſe, croſſing Scipio in all his enterpriſes, thought to hinder his voyage and iourney vnto CARTHAGE, in the which he ouercame Hannibal, who vntill that time was euer inuincible: and ſo in the end, continuing him ſtill in iealouſie with the ſtate, and euer accuſing of him, he neuer left him till he had driuen him out of the citie, and cauſed his brother Lucius Scipio to be ſhamefully condemned for theft, and ill behauiour in his charge. Furthermore, for temperancy & modeſty which Cato did euer commend ſo highly, Ariſtides truly kept them moſt ſincerely. But Catoes ſecond wife, who maried a maid (that was neither fit for his dignitie and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a letcherous man, and not without manifeſt cauſe. For he cannot be excuſed with honeſtie, that being a man paſt mariage, brought his ſonne that was maried, and his faire daughter in law, a ſtep-mother into his houſe, and but a Clerks daughter, whoſe father did write for mony, for any man that would hire him. Take it Cato maried her to ſatisfie his luſt, or elſe for ſpite to be reuenged of his ſon, becauſe his ſon could not abide his young filth he had before: either of theſe turneth ſtil to his ſhame, as well the effect as alſo the cauſe. Againe, the excuſe he made to his ſonne why he maried, was a lye. For if he had grounded his deſire indeed, to haue gotten other children, as he ſaid, that might be as honeſt men as his eldeſt ſonne: then ſurely he had done well after the death of his firſt wife, if he had ſought him another wife ſoone after, that had bene of an honeſt houſe; and not to haue lyen with a young harlatry filth, till his ſonne had ſpied him: and then when he ſaw it was knowne, to go and mary her, and to make alliance with them, not becauſe it was honourable for him to do it, but eaſieſt to be obtained.

THE LIFE OF Philopœmen.

IN the citie of MANTINEA, there was a citizen in old time called Caſſander, one that was as nobly borne & of as great authoritie in gouernment there, as any man of his time whatſoeuer. Notwithſtanding, Fortune frowned on him in the end, inſomuch as he was driuen out of his country, & went to lie in the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, only for the loue he bare vnto Crauſis, Philopœmens father, a rare man, and nobly giuen in all things, and one that loued him alſo very well. Now ſo long as Crauſis liued, Caſſander was ſo well vſed at his hands, that he could lack nothing: and when he was departed this world, Caſſander, to requite the loue Crauſis bare him in his life time, tooke his ſonne into his charge, being an orphane, and taught him, as Homer ſaid Achilles was brought vp by the old Phœnix. So this child Philopœmen grew to haue noble conditions, & increaſed alwayes from good to better. Afterwards, when he came to grow to mans ſtate, Ecdemus and Demophanes, both MEGALIPOLITANS, tooke him into their gouernment. They were two Philoſophers that had bene hearers of Arceſilaus, in the ſchoole of Academia, and afterwards employed all the Philoſophie they had learned, vpon their gouerning of the common welth, and dealing in matters of ſtate, as much or more, then any other men of their time. For they deliuered their city from the tyrannie of Ariſtodemus, who kept it in ſubiection, by corrupting thoſe that killed him. And they did helpe Aratus alſo to driue the tyrant Nicocles, out of SICYONE. At ẏ requeſt of the CYRENIANS, that were troubled with ciuil diſſention & factions among them, they went vnto CYRENA, where they did reforme the ſtate of the common wealth, and ſtabliſhed good lawes for them. But for thẽſelues, they reckoned the education and bringing vp of Philopœmen, the chiefeſt act that euer they did: iudging that they had procured an vniuerſall good vnto all GREECE, to bring vp a man of ſo noble a nature, in the rules & precepts of Philoſophy. And to ſay truly, GREECE did loue him paſſingly wel, as the laſt valiant man ſhe brought forth in her age, after ſo many great and famous ancient captaines: and did alwayes increaſe his power and authority, as his glory did alſo riſe. Whereupon there was a ROMAINE, who to praiſe him the more, called him the laſt of the GRECIANS: meaning that after him, GREECE neuer brought forth any worthy perſon, deſeruing the name of a GRECIAN. And now concerning his perſon, he had no ill face, as many ſuppoſe he had: for his whole image is yet to be ſeene in the city of DELPHES, excellẽtly wel done, as if he were aliue.

Philopœmen taken for a seruing man.

And for that they report of his hostesse in the citie of MEGARA, who tooke him for a seruing man: that was by reason of his courtesie, not standing vpon his reputation, and because he went plainly besides. For she vnderstanding that the General of the ACHAIANS came to Inne there al night, she bestirred her, and was very busie preparing for his supper, her husband peraduenture being from home at that time: and in the meane season came Philopœmen into the Inne, with a poore cloke on his back. The simple womā seeing him no better apparelled, took him for one of his men that came before to prouide his lodging, and so praied him to lend her his hand in the kitchin. He straight cast off his cloke, and began to fall to hew wood. So as Philopœmen was busie about it, in cometh her husband, and finding him riuing of wood: Ha ha ha, said he, my Lord Philopœmen, why what meaneth this? Truly nothing else, said he in his DORICAN tongue, but that I am punished, because I am neither faire boy, nor goodly man. It is true that Titus Quintius Flaminius said one day vnto him, seeming to mocke him for his personage: O Philopœmen, thou hast faire hands and good legs, but thou hast no belly; for he was fine in the waste, and small bodied. Notwithstanding, I take it this iesting tended rather to the proportion of his army, then of his body, because he had both good horsemen and footemen, but he was often without money to pay them. These ieasts, schollers haue taken vp in schooles, of Philopœmen. But now to descend to his nature and conditions: it seemeth that the ambition & desire he had to win honour in his doings, was not without some heate and wilfulnesse. For, because he would altogether follow Epaminondas steps, he shewed his hardinesse to enterprise any thing, his wisedome to execute all great matters, and his integrity also, in that no mony could corrupt him: but in ciuill matters and controuersies, he could hardly otherwhiles keep himself within ŷ bounds of modestie, patience, and curtesie, but would often burst out into choler, and wilfulnesse. Wherefore it seemeth, that he was a better captaine for warres, then a wise gouernor for peace. And indeed, euen from his youth he euer loued soldiers & armes, and delighted maruellously in all martiall exercises: as in handling of his weapon well, riding of horses gallantly, and in vawting nimbly. And because he seemed to haue a naturall gift in wrestling, certain of his friends, & such as were careful of him, did wish him to giue himself most vnto that exercise. Then he asked them, if their life that made such profession, wold be no hinderance to their martial exercises. Answer was made him again. That the disposition of the person, & maner of life that wrestlers vsed, and such as followed like exercises, was altogether contrary to the life and discipline of a souldier, and specially touching life and limme. For wrestlers studied altogether to keepe themselues in good plight, by much sleeping, eating, and drinking; by labouring, and taking their ease at certaine houres, by not missing a iot of their exercises: and besides, were in hazard to lose the force and strength of their bodie, if they did surfeit neuer so litle, or passed their ordinarie course and rule of diet: where souldiers contrariwise are vsed to all change and diuersitie of life; and specially be taught from their youth, to away with all hardnesse and scarcitie, and to watch in the night without sleepe. Philopœmen hearing this did not onely forsake those exercises, and scorned them, but afterwards being generall of an armie, he sought by all infamous meanes he could to put downe all wrestling and such kind of exercise, which made mens bodies vnmeete to take paines, and to become souldiers to fight in defence of their countrey, that otherwise would haue bene very able and handsome for the same. When he first left his book and schoolemasters, and began to weare armour in inuasions the MANTINEANS vsed to make vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, to get some spoile on a sodaine, or to destroy a part of their countrey: Philopœmen then would euer be the foremost to go out, and the hindermost to come in. When he had leisure, he vsed much hunting in time of peace, all to acquaint his bodie with toile and trauell, or else he would be digging of his grounds. For he had a faire mannor, not passing twentie furlongs out of the citie, whither he would walke cōmonly after dinner or supper: and then when night came that it was bed time, he would lie vpon some ill fauored mattresse, as the meanest labourer he had, & in the morning by breake of the day, he went out either with his vine-men to labour in his vineyard, or els with his plough-men to follow the plough, and sometimes returned againe to the city, and followed matters of the common wealth, with his friends and other officers of the same. Whatsoeuer he could spare & get in the wars, he spent it in buying of goodly horses, in making of faire armors, or paying his poore country mens ransome, that were taken prisoners in the warres: but for his goods and reuenue, he sought only to increase them by the profit of tillage, which he esteemed the iustest and best way of getting of goods. For he did not trifle therin, but imployed his whole

care and ſtudie vpon it, as one that thought it fit for euery noble man & gentleman ſo to trauel, gouerne, and increaſe his owne, that he ſhould haue no occaſion to couet or vſurp another mans. He took no pleaſure to heare all kind of matters, nor to reade all ſorts of books of Philoſophy: but thoſe onely that would teach him moſt to become vertuous. Neither did he much care to reade Homers workes, ſauing thoſe places only that ſtirred vp mens hearts moſt vnto valiantnes. But of all other ſtories, he ſpecially delighted to reade Euangelus bookes, which treated of the diſcipline of warres, how to ſet battels, and declared the acts and geſts of Alexander the Great: ſaying, that men ſhould euer bring words vnto deeds, vnleſſe they would take them for vaine ſtories, and things ſpoken, but not to profit by. For in his books of the feates of warre, and how battels ſhould be ordered, he was not only contented to ſee them drawn and ſet out in charts and maps, but would alſo put them in execution, in the places themſelues as they were ſet out. And therfore when the army marched in order of battel in the field, he would conſider & ſtudy with himſelfe, the ſodaine euents and reproches of the enemies, that might light vpon them, when they coming downe to the valley, or going out of a plaine, were to paſſe a riuer or a ditch, or through ſome ſtraight: alſo when he ſhould ſpread out his armie, or elſe gather it narrow: and this he did not only forecaſt by himſelfe, but would alſo argue the ſame with the captaines that were about him. For Philopœmen doubtleſſe was one of the odde men of the world, that moſt eſteemed the diſcipline of warre, and ſometime peraduenture more then he needed) as the moſt large field & moſt fruitful ground, that valiantnes could be exerciſed in: ſo that he deſpiſed and contemned al that were no ſoldiers, as men good for nothing. When he was come now to thirty yeares of age, Cleomenes King of LACEDÆMON, came one night vpon the ſodaine, and gaue an aſſault to the citie of LEGALIPOLIS, ſo luſtily that he draue backe the watch and got into the market place, and wanne it. Philopœmen hearing of it, ran immediatly to the reſcue. Neuertheleſſe, though he fought very valiantly, and did like a noble ſouldier, yet he could not repulſe the enemies, nor driue them out of the city: but by this meanes he got the citizens leiſure, and ſome time to get them out of the town to ſaue themſelues, ſtaying thoſe that followed them: & made Cleomenes ſtill waite vpon him, ſo that in the end he had much ado to ſaue himſelfe, being the laſt man and very ſore hurt, and his horſe alſo ſlaine vnder him. Shortly after, Cleomenes being aduertiſed that the MEGALIPOLITANS were gotte into the city of MESSINA, he ſent vnto the to let them vnderſtand, that he was ready to deliuer them their city, lands, & goods, againe. But Philopœmen ſeeing his countrymen very glad of theſe newes, and that euery man prepared to returne againe in haſt, he ſtaid them with theſe perſwaſions, ſhewing them that Cleomenes deuice was not to deliuer them their city, but rather to take them together with their city: foreſeeing well inough, that he could not continue long there, to keep naked walles and empty houſes, and that himſelfe in the end ſhould be compelled to go his way. This perſwaſion ſtaid the MEGALIPOLITANS, but withall it gaue Cleomenes occaſion to burne and plucke downe a great part of the city, and caried away a great ſumme of money and a great ſpoile. Afterwards when king Antigonus was come to aide the ACHAIANS againſt Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the top of the mountaines of SELLASIA, and kept all the paſſages, and wayes vnto them out of all thoſe quarters: King Antigonus ſet his army in battell hard by him, determining to ſet vpon him, and to driue him thence if he could poſſibly. Philopœmen was at that time amongſt the horſmen with his citizens, who had the ILLYRIANS on the ſide of them, being a great number of footmen and excellent good ſouldiers, which did ſhut in the taile of all the army. So they were commanded to ſtand ſtil, & to keep their place, vntil ſuch time as they did ſhew them a red coate of armes on the top of a pike, from the other wing of the battell, where the King himſelfe ſtood in perſon. Notwithſtanding this ſtraight commandement, the captaines of the ILLYRIANS would abide no longer, but went to ſee if they could force the LACEDÆMONIANS that kept on the top of the mountaines. The ACHAIANS contrariwiſe, kept their place and order, as they were commanded. Eudidas, Cleomenes brother, perceiuing how their enemies footmen were ſeuered from their horſmen, ſodainly ſent the lighteſt armed ſouldiers and luſtieſt fellowes he had in his bands, to giue a charge vpon the ILLYRIANS behind, to proue if they could make them turne their faces on them, becauſe they had no horſemen for their guard. This was done, and theſe light armed men did maruellouſly trouble and diſorder the ILLYRIANS. Philopœmen perceiuing that, and conſidering how theſe light armed men would be eaſily broken and driuen back, ſince occaſion ſelfe enforced them to it: he went to tell the Kings Captaines of it, that led his men of armes.

Philopœmens fact in the battell againſt king Cleomenes.

But when he ſaw he could not make them vnderſtand it, and that they made no reckoning of his reaſons, but tooke him of no skill, becauſe he had not yet attained any credit or eſtimation to be iudged a man that could inuent or execute any ſtartagème of warre, he went thither himſelfe, and tooke his citizens with him: and at his firſt coming, he ſo troubled theſe light armed men, that he made them flie, and ſlue a number of them. Moreouer, to encourage the better king Antigonus men, and to make them giue a luſtie charge vpon the enemies, whileſt they were thus troubled and out of order, he left his horſe and marched on foot vp hill and down hill, in rough and ſtonie wayes, full of ſprings and quauemires, being heauily armed at all peeces as a man at armes, and fighting in this ſort very painfully and vneaſily, he had both his thighes paſt through with a dart, hauing a leather thong on the middeſt of it. And though the blow did not take much hold of the fleſh, yet was it a ſtrong blow; for it pierced both thighes through and through, that the yron was ſeene on the other ſide. Then was he ſo cumbred with this blow as if he had bene ſhackled with irons on his feet, and knew not what to do: for the leather faſtened in the middeſt of the dart, did grieue him maruellouſly, when they thought to haue pulled the dart out of the place where it entred in, ſo as neuer a man about him durſt ſet his hands to it. Philopœmen on the other ſide, ſeeing the fight terrible on either ſide, and would ſoone be ended: it ſpited him to the guts, he would ſo faine haue bene among them. So at the length he made ſuch ſtrugling, putting backe one thigh, and ſetting forward another, that he knapped the ſtaffe of the dart aſunder, and made them pull out the two truncheons, the one on this ſide, and the other on the other ſide. Then when he ſaw he was at liberty again, he took his ſword in his hand, and ran through the midſt of them that fought, vnto the foremoſt rankes, to meete with the enemie: ſo that he gaue his men a new courage, and did ſet them on fire with enuy, to follow his valiantneſſe. After the battel was wonne, Antigonus asked the MACEDONIAN captaines, to proue them: who moued the horſemen to deuide themſelues, and giue the charge, before the ſigne that was commanded. They anſwered him, that they were forced to do it againſt their wils, becauſe a young MEGALIPOLITAN gentleman gaue a charge with his company, before the ſigne was giuen. Then Antigonus laughing, told them: the young gentleman played the part of a wiſe and valiant captaine. This exploit, together with Antigonus teſtimony, gaue great reputation vnto Philopœmen, as we may eaſily imagine. So King Antigonus maruellouſly intreated him he would ſerue with him, and offered him a band of men at armes, and great entertainment, if he would go with him. But Philopœmen refuſed his offer, and chiefly becauſe he knew his owne nature, that he could hardly abide to be commanded by any. Notwithſtanding, becauſe he could not be idle, he tooke ſea, and went into CRETA, where he knew there was warres, only to continue himſelfe in exerciſe therof. So when he had ſerued a long time with the CRETANS, which were valiant ſoldiers, and very expert in all policies and feates of war, and moreouer were men of a moderate & ſpare diet: he returned home again to ACHAIA, with ſo great credit and reputation of euery one that he was preſently choſen General of all the horſemen. So when he entred into his charge, he found many horſmen very ill horſed, vpon litle iades, ſuch as might be gotten cheapeſt, and that they vſed not to go themſelues in perſon to the warrs, but did ſend other in their ſtead: and to be ſhort, that they neither had hearts, nor experience of the wars, and all becauſe the Generals and captaines of the people of the ACHAIANS that ſerued before him, did take no heed to thoſe matters, as fearing to offẽd any, becauſe they had the greateſt authority in their hands, to puniſh or reward whom they thought good. Philopœmen fearing none of all theſe things, would leaue no part of his charge and dutie vndone, but went himſelfe in perſon to all the cities, to perſwade and encourage the young gentlemen, to be well horſed, and well armed, that they might win honour in the field, be able to defend themſelues, & ouerthrow their enemies. And where perſwaſion could do no good, there he would ſet fines vpon their heads that ſo refuſed, and did vſe to muſter them oft, and did acquaint them with tilting, turneying, and barriers, and one to fight with another, and at ſuch times and places ſpecially, as he knew there would be multitudes of people to giue them the looking on: that in ſhort ſpace he made them very forward, proper, and ready horſemen, whoſe chiefeſt property is, to keepe their order and rankes in the battell. So as when neceſſitie ſerued for the whole company of horſemen to turne together, halfe turne, or whole turne, or els euery man by himſelf: they were ſo throughly trained in it, that all the whole troupe ſet in battell ray, did ſeeme as it were to be but one body, they remoued ſo together, and withal ſo eaſily, and at all times, and ſo oft, as they ſhould turne, on the one ſide, or on the other.

Philopœmen choſen General of the horſemen of the Achaians.

Now

Now in a great battel the ACHAIANS had with the ÆTOLIANS, & the ELIANS, by the riuer of Lariſſus, Demophantus Generall of the horſemen of the ÆTOLIANS, came from his company to fight with Philopœmẽ, who alſo made towards him, & gaue him firſt ſuch a blow with his ſpeare, that he ſtrake him ſtarke dead. When Demophantus fell to the ground, his ſouldiers fled by & by vpon it. This wan Philopœmen great honour, who gaue no place to the yongeſt men in fighting moſt valiantly with his own hands: nor to the oldeſt men in wiſdome, for the wiſe leading of his armie. Indeed the firſt man that made the people of ACHAIA grow in power and greatnes, was Aratus: for before his time ACHAIA was of ſmal reckoning, becauſe ỹ cities of the ſame ſtood deuided betweene themſelues, & Aratus was the firſt man that made them ioyne together, and ſtabliſhed among them an honeſt ciuil gouernment. Wherby it happened, that as we ſee in brooks and riuers where any litle thing ſtoppeth & falleth to the bottome, which the courſe of the water bringeth down the ſtreame, there the reſt that followeth doth vſe to ſtay, and go no further: euen ſo in the cities of GREECE that were in hard ſtate, & ſore weakened, by faction one againſt another, the ACHAIANS were the firſt that ſtaid themſelues, and grew in amity one with the other, & afterwards drew on the reſt of the cities into league with them, as good neighbours and confederates. Some by helping & deliuering them from the oppreſſion of tyrants, and winning other alſo by their peaceable gouernement and good concord: they had a meaning in this wiſe to bring all the country of PELOPONNESVS into one body & league. Neuertheleſſe, while Aratus liued, they depended moſt vpon the ſtrength and power of the MACEDONIANS: firſt with ſticking vnto king Ptolomy, and then vnto Antigonus, and laſt to Philip, who ruled in maner all the ſtate of GREECE. But when Philopœmen came to gouerne, and to be the chiefeſt man, the ACHAIANS being ſtrong inough to reſiſt the ſtrongeſt, would march then no more vnder any other bodies enſigne, nor would ſuffer any more ſtrange gouernours or captaines ouer them. For Aratus (as it ſeemed) was ſomewhat too ſoft and cold for the wars, and therfore the moſt things he did, were by gentle intreaties, by intelligences, & by the kings friendſhips with whom he was great, as we haue at large declared in his life. But Philopœmen being a man of execution, hardy & valiant of perſon, & of very good fortune, in the firſt battel that euer he made, did maruellouſly increaſe the courage and hearts of the ACHAIANS: becauſe vnder his charge they euer foiled their enemies, & alwayes had the vpper hand of them. The firſt thing Philopœmen began withal at his coming, he changed the maner of ſetting of their tables, & their faſhion of arming thẽſelues: for before they caried litle light targets, which becauſe they were thin & narrow, did not couer half their bodies, & vſed ſpeares far ſhorter then pikes, by reaſõ wherof they were very light, & good to skirmiſh and fight afar off: but when they came to ioyne battell, their enemies then had great vantage of them. As for the order of their battels, they knew not what it meant, nor to caſt thẽſelues into a ſnaile or ring, but only vſed the ſquare battell, nor yet gaue it any ſuch front where the pikes of many rankes might puſh together, and where the ſouldiers might ſtand ſo cloſe, that their targets ſhould touch one another, as they do in the ſquadron of the battell of the MACEDONIANS: by reaſon whereof, they were ſoone broken and ouerthrowne. Philopœmen reformed all this, perſwading them to vſe the pike and ſhield, in ſtead of the litle target, ſpeare, or bore-ſtaffe, and to put good morrians or burganets on their heads, corſelets on their bodies, and good taſſes and greaues to couer their thighes & legges, that they might fight it out manfully, not giuing a foote of ground, as light armed men runne to and fro in a skirmiſh. And thus hauing perſwaded and taught the yong men to arme themſelues throughly, firſt he made them the bolder and more couragious to fight, as if they had bene men that could not haue bene ouercome: then he turned all their vaine ſuperfluous charge, into neceſſary and honeſt expences. But he could not poſſibly bring them altogether from their vaine and rich apparell they had of long time taken vp, the one to exceed another: nor from their ſumptuous furniture of houſes, as in beds, hangings, curious ſeruice at the table, and delicate kind of diſhes. But to begin to withdraw this deſire in them, which they had to be fine and delicate, in all ſuperfluous & vnneceſſarie things, and to like of things neceſſarie and profitable: he wiſhed them to looke more nearely to their ordinarie charge about themſelues, taking order as well for their apparell, as alſo for their diet, and to ſpare in them, to come honourably armed to the field, for defence of their countrey. Thereupon, if you had looked into the gold-ſmithes ſhoppes, ye ſhould haue ſeene nothing elſe in their hands, but breaking and battering of pots of gold and ſiluer, to be caſt and molten downe againe, and then gilding of armours and targets, and ſiluering of bits, hir ſone Cleopatrus, Generall of the horſemen of the Aetolians.

The praiſe of Philopœmen.

Aratus raiſed Achaia to greatnes.

Philopœmen and Aratus compared.

Aratus a ſoft man in wars.

Philopœmen turned all curioſitie and daintie fare into braue and rich armours.

In the ſhew-places for the running of horſes, there was managing and breaking of yong horſes, and young men exerciſing armes. Womens hands alſo were full of morians and head peeces, whereto they tied goodly braue plumes of feathers of ſundry colours, and were alſo full of imbrodered arming coates and caſſocks, with curious and very rich workes. The ſight of which bravery did heaue vp their hearts, and made them gallant and liuely: ſo as enuy bred ſtraight in them who ſhould do beſt ſeruice, and no way ſpare for the warres. Indeed, ſumptuouſneſſe and bravery in other ſights, doth ſecretly carry mens minds away, & allure them to ſeeke after vanities, which makes them tender bodied, and womaniſh perſons: becauſe this ſweet tickling and inticing of the outward ſence, that is delighted therewith, doth ſtraight melt and ſoften the ſtrength and courage of the mind. But againe, the ſumptuous coſt beſtowed vpon warlike furniture, doth incourage and make great a noble heart. Euen as Homer ſaith it did Achilles, when his mother brought him new armour and weapons ſhe had cauſed Vulcan to make for him, and layed them at his feete: who ſeeing them, could not tarrie, but was ſtraight ſet on fire with deſire to occupy them. So when Philopœmen had brought the youth of ACHAIA to this good paſſe, to come thus bravely armed and furniſhed into the field, he began then to exerciſe them continually in armes: wherein they did not only ſhew themſelues obedient to him but did moreouer ſtriue one to excell another, and to do better then their fellowes. For they liked maruellous well the ordering of the battel he had taught thē, becauſe that ſtanding ſo cloſe together as they did, they thought ſurely they could hardly be ouerthrown. Thus by continuance of time, being much vſed to weare their armour, they found them a great deale eaſier and lighter then before, beſide the pleaſure they tooke to ſee their armour ſo braue, and ſo rich: inſomuch as they longed for ſome occaſion to trie them ſtraight vpon their enemies. Now the ACHAIANS at that time were at warres with Machanidas, the tyrant of LACEDÆMON, who ſought by all deuice he could with a great army, to become chiefe Lord of al the PELOPONNESIANS. When newes was brought that Machanidas was come into the countrey of the MANTINEANS, Philopœmen ſtraight marched towards him with his army: ſo they met both not farre from the citie of MANTINEA, where by and by they put themſelues in order of battell. They both had entertained in pay a great number of ſtrangers to ſerue them, beſides the whole force of their country: and when they came to ioyne battell, Machanidas with his ſtrangers gaue ſuch a luſty charge vpon certaine ſlingers and archers, being the forelorne hope whom Philopœmen had put before the battell of the ACHAIANS to begin the skirmiſh, that he ouerthrew them, and made them flie withall. But where he ſhould haue gone on directly againſt the ACHAIANS that were ranged in battell ray, to haue proued if he could haue broken them, he was very buſie and earneſt ſtil, to follow the chaſe of them that firſt fled, & ſo came hard by the ACHAIANS that ſtood ſtil in their battell, and kept their rankes. This great ouerthrow fortuning at the beginning, many men thought the ACHAIANS were but caſt away. But Philopœmen made as though it had bene nothing, and that he ſet light by it; and ſpying the great fault his enemies made, following the forlorne hope on the ſpurre, whom they had ouerthrowne, and ſtaying ſo farre from the battell of their footmen, whom they had left naked, and the field open vpon them: he did not make towards them to ſtay them, nor did ſtriue to ſtop them that they ſhould not follow thoſe that fled, but ſuffered them to take their courſe. And when he ſaw that they were gone a good way from their footemen, he made his men march vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, whoſe ſides were naked, hauing no horſemen to gard them: and ſo did ſet vpon them on the one ſide, and ranne ſo haſtily on them to win one of their flankes, that he made them flie, and ſlue withall a great number of them. For it is ſaid, there were foure thouſand LACEDÆMONIANS ſlaine in the field, becauſe they had no man to leade them. And moreouer, they ſay they did not looke to fight, but ſuppoſed rather they had wonne the field, when they ſaw Machanidas chaſing ſtil thoſe vpon the ſpurre, whom he had ouerthrowne. After this Philopœmen retired to meete Machanidas, who came backe from the chaſe with his ſtrangers. But by chance there was a great broad ditch betweene them, ſo as both of them rode vpon the bankes ſide of the ſame, a great while together, one againſt another of them: the one ſide ſeeking ſome conuenient place to get ouer and flie, and the other ſide ſeeking meanes to keepe them from ſtarting away. So to ſee the one before the other in this ſort, it appeared as they had bene wilde beaſts brought to an extremitie, to defend themſelues by force, from ſo fierce a hunter as Philopœmen was. But whileſt they were ſtriuing thus, the tyrants horſe that was luſtie and couragious, and felt the force of his maſters ſpurres pricking pricking in his sides, that the bloud followed after, did venture to leape the ditch, coming to the bankes side, stood vpon his hindmost legs, & aduanced forward with his foremost feete, to reach to the other side. Then Simmias and Polyænus, who were about Philopœmen when he fought, ran thither straight to keepe him in with their borestaues that he should not leape the ditch. But Philopœmen who was there before them, perceiuing that the tyrants horse, by lifting vp his head so high, did couer all his masters body: forsooke by and by his horse, & tooke his speare in both his hands, and thrust at the tyrant with so good a will, that he slue him in the ditch. In memory wherof, the ACHAIANS that did highly esteeme this valiant act of his, and his wisedome also in leading of the battell, did set vp his image in brasse in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, in the forme he slue the tyrant. They say, that at the assembly of the common games called Nemea, (which they solemnize in honour of Hercules, not farre from the citie of ARGOS) and not long after he had won this battell of MANTINEA, being made Generall the second time of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, & being at good leasure also by reason of ỹ feast; he first shewed al the GRECIANS that were come thither to see the games & pastimes, his army ranged in order of battell, and made them see how easily they remoued their places euery way, as necessity and occasion of fight required, without troubling or confounding their rankes, and that with a maruellous force and readinesse. When he had done this, he went into the Theater to heare the Musitians play and sing to their instruments, who should win the best game, being accompanied with lustie young gentlemen apparelled in purple cloakes, & in skarlet coates & cassocks they wore vpon their armor, being all in the flower of their youth, and well giuen & disposed: who did greatly honor & reuerence their Captaine, & besides that shewed themselues inwardly of noble hearts, being incouraged by many notable battels they had fought, in which they had euer attained ỹ victory, & gotten the vpper hand of their enemies. And by chance, as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the Musitian, singing certaine poems of Timotheus, called the Perses, fell into these verses:

Philopœmen slue Machanidas.

O Greekes, it is euen he, which your prosperitie
Hath giuen to you: and therewithall a noble libertie.

When he had sweetly sung out aloud these noble verses, passingly well made, the whole assembly of the GRECIANS in the Theater, that were gathered thither to see the games, cast all their eyes straight vpon Philopœmen, and clapped their hands one to another for ioy, because of the great hope they had in him, that through him they should soone recouer their ancient reputation: and so imagined they possessed already the noble and worthy minds of their ancestours. And as young horses that do alwayes looke to be ridden by their ordinary riders, if any stranger get vp on their backes, do straight waxe strange to be handled, and make great ado: euen so when the ACHAIANS came to any dangerous battell, their hearts were euen done, if they had any other Generall or leader then Philopœmen, on whom still they depended and looked. And when they saw him, euer the whole army reioyced, and desired straight to be at it, they had such confidence in his valiantnesse and good fortune: and truely not without cause. For of all men, their enemies did feare him most, and durst not stand before him: because they were afraid to heare his name onely, as it seemed by their doings. For Philip King of MACEDON (imagining that if he should find meanes to dispatch Philopœmen out of the way, howsoeuer it were, the ACHAIANS would straight take part againe with him) sent men secretly into the city of ARGOS, to kil him by treason: howbeit the practise was discouered, and the king euer after was mortally hated of all the GRECIANS generally, and taken for a wicked and cowardly Prince. It fortuned one day when the BOEOTIANS layed siege to the city of MEGARA, and thought certainely to haue won it at the first assault, there rose a rumor suddenly amongst them, that Philopœmen came to aide the city, and was not farre from it with his army. But it was a false report. Notwithstanding, the BOEOTIANS were so scared, that for feare they left their scaling ladders behind them, which they had set against the walles, to haue scaled the towne, and fled straight to saue themselues. Another time, when Nabis the tyrant of LACEDÆMON, that succeeded Machanidas, had taken the city of MESSINA vpon a sudden: Philopœmen being then a priuate man, and hauing no charge of souldiers, went vnto Lysippus Generall of the ACHAIANS that yeare, to perswade him that he would send present aide vnto thẽ of MESSINA. Lysippus told him, it was too late now to go thither, and that it was but a lost towne, not to be holpen: considering the enemies were in it already. Philopœmen perceiuing he could not procure him to go, went thither himselfe with the force of MESSINA onely, not staying for the assembly of the MEGALIPOLITANS, that were in counsel about it, to giue them commission by voyces of the people to take him with him: but they all willingly followed him, as if he had bene their continuall Generall, and the man that by nature was worthiest of all other to command them. Now when he came nere vnto MESSINA, Nabis hearing of his coming, durst not tarrie him, though he had his army within the city, but stole out at another gate, and marched away in all the hast he could, thinking himselfe a happy man if he could so scape his hands, and retire with safety, as indeed he did. And thus was MESSINA by his meanes deliuered frō captiuity. All that we haue written hitherto concerning Philopœmen, falleth out doubtlesse to his great honour and glory: but afterwards he was greatly dispraised for a iourney he made into CRETA, at the request of the GORTYNIANS, who sent to pray him to be their captaine, being sore troubled with warres at that time. Because Philopœmen went then to serue the GORTYNIANS, when the tyrant Nabis had greatest wars with the MEGALIPOLITANS in their own coūtry, they laid it to his charge, either that he did it to flie the wars, or else that he sought honour out of season with forraine nations, when his poore citizens the MEGALIPOLITANS were in such distresse, that their countrey being lost and destroyed, they were driuen to keepe them within their city, and to sow all their void grounds and streets in the same with corne, to sustaine them withall, when their enemies were encamped almost hard at their owne gates. And the rather, because himselfe making wars with the CRETANS, and seruing strangers beyond the sea in the meane time, gaue his enemies occasion to slander him that he fled, that he would not tarry to fight for defence of his own country. Againe, there were that said, because the ACHAIANS did chuse other for their Generall, that he being a priuat man and without charge, was the rather contented to be Generall of the GORTYNIANS, who had marueilously intreated him to take the charge: for he was a man that could not abide to liue idlely, and that desired specially aboue all things to serue continually in the wars, and to put in practise his skill & discipline in the leading of an army. The words he spake one day of king Ptolomie do witnesse as much: for when there were some that praised king Ptolomie highly, saying that he trayned his army well, and that he still continued his person in exercise of armes: It is not commendable for a king (said he) of his yeares, to delight in training his men to exercise armes, but to do some act himselfe in person. Well, in the end, the MEGALIPOLITANS tooke his absence in such euill part, that they thought it a peece of treason, and would needs haue banished him, & put him from the freedome of the city: had not the ACHAIANS sent their Generall Aristænetus vnto them who would not suffer the sentence of banishment to passe against him, although otherwise there was euer contention betweene them about matters of the commonwealth. Afterwards Philopœmen perceiuing his countrymen made no more account of him, to spite them withall, he made diuers small villages and cities rebell against them, and taught them to say, and to giue it out, that they were not their subiects, neither paid them tribute frō the beginning: and he made them stand to it openly, and maintaine their sedition against the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, before the counsell of the ACHAIANS. These things hapned shortly after. But whilest he made wars in CRETA for the GORTYNIANS, he shewed not himself a PELOPONNESIAN, not like a man borne in ARCADIA, to make plaine & open wars: but he had learned the maner of the CRETANS, to vse their own policies, fine deuices, and ambushes against themselues. And made them know also, that all their crafts were but childish sports as it were, in respect of those that were deuised, & put in execution, by a wise experienced captain, and skilful to fight a battell. So Philopœmen, hauing won great fame by his acts done in CRETA, returned again to PELOPONNESVS, where he found, that Philip king of MACEDON had bin ouercome in battel, by T. Q. Flaminius: and that the ACHAIANS ioyning with the ROMAINS, did make war against the tyrant Nabis, against whom he was made General immediatly vpon his return, and gaue him battel by sea. In the which it seemed he fel into like misfortune, as Epaminondas did: the euent of this battell falling out much worse with him then was looked for, in respect of his former courage and valiantnes. But as for Epaminondas, some say he returned willingly out of ASIA, & the Iles, without any exploit don, because he wold not haue his coūtrimē fleshed with spoile by sea, as fearing lest of valiant soldiers by land, they wold by litle & litle (as Plato said) become dissolute mariners by sea. But Philopœmen cōtrariwise, presuming on the skil he had to set the battell in good order by lād, wold needs take vpō him to do the same by sea. But he was taught to his cost, to know what exercise & experiēce meant, & how strong it maketh thē that are practised in things. For he lost not only the battel by sea, being vnskilful of that seruice: but he cōmitted besides a fouler error.

For

For he cauſed an old ſhip to be rigged, which had bin very good of ſeruice before, but not occupied in 40. yeares together; & embarked his countrymen into the ſame, which were all likely to periſh, becauſe the ſhip had diuerſe leakes, by fault of good calking. This ouerthrow made his enemies deſpiſe him vtterly, perſwading thẽſelues he was fled for altogether, & had giuẽ thẽ ſea-roome: whereupon they laid ſiege to the citie of GYTHIVM. Philopœmen being aduertiſed thereof, imbarked his men ſuddenly, and ſet vpon his enemies ere they wiſt it, or had any thought of his coming: and found them ſtragling vp and downe, without watch or guard, by reaſon of the victory they had lately won. So he landed his men cloſely by night, and went and ſet fire vpon his enemies campe, and burnt it euery whit: and in this feare and hurly burly, ſlue a great number of them. Shortly after this ſtealing vpon them, the tyrant Nabis alſo ſtole vpon him againe vnwares, as he was to go through a maruellous ill and dangerous way: which made the ACHAIANS amazed at the firſt, thinking it vnpoſſible for them that they could euer ſcape that danger, conſidering their enemies kept all the wayes thereabouts. But Philopœmen bethinking himſelfe, and conſidering the nature and ſituation of the place: after he had viewed it well, he ſhewed them plainely then, that the chiefeſt point of a good ſouldier and man of warre, was to know how to put an army in battell, according to the time and ſituation of the place. For he did but alter the forme of his battel a litle, and forced it according to the ſituation of the place, wherin he was compaſſed: and by doing this without trouble or buſineſſe, he tooke away all feare of danger, and gaue a charge vpon his enemies in ſuch fierce wiſe, that in a ſhort time he put them all to flight. And when he perceiued that they did not flie all in troupes together towards the city, but ſcattering wiſe, abroad in the fields in euery place, he cauſed the trumpet to ſound the retraite. Then he commanded the chaſe to be followed no further, for that all the country thereabout was full of thicke woods and groues, very ill for horſemen: and alſo becauſe there were many brookes, vallies and quauemires, which they ſhould paſſe ouer, he encamped himſelf preſently, being yet broad day. And ſo, fearing leſt his enemies would in the night time draw vnto the city, one after another, and by couples: he ſent a great number of ACHAIANS, and laid them in ambuſh amongſt the brookes and hils neare about it, which made great ſlaughter of Nabis ſouldiers, becauſe they came not altogether in troopes, but ſcatteringly one after another as they fled, one here another there, and ſo fell into their enemies hands, as birds into the fowlers net. Theſe acts made Philopœmen ſingularly beloued of the GRECIANS, and they did him great honor in all their Theaters & cõmon aſſemblies. Whereat T. Q. Flaminius, of nature very ambitious & couetous of honor, did much repine, & was enuious at the matter, thinking that a Conſul of ROME ſhold haue place & honor among the ACHAIANS before a mean gentleman of ARCADIA. And he imagined he had deſerued better of all GRECE, then Philopœmẽ had: conſidering how by the only proclamatiõ of an herald, he had reſtored GRECE again to her ancient liberty, which before his coming was ſubiect to king Philip, & vnto the MACEDONIANS. Afterwards, T. Quintius made peace with the tyrãt Nabis, who was ſhortly after very traiterouſly ſlain by the ÆTOLIANS. Wherupon the city of SPARTA grew to a tumult, & Philopœmen ſtraight taking the occaſiõ, went thither with his army, & handled the matter ſo wiſely, that partly for loue, & partly by force, he wan the city, & ioyned it vnto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. So was he maruellouſly cõmended & eſteemed of the ACHAIANS for this notable victory, to haue won their tribe and cõmunalty ſo famous a city, & ſo great eſtimation. For the city of SPARTA was no ſmal increaſe of their power, being ioyned as a mẽber of ACHAIA. Moreouer he wan by this meanes the loue & goodwil of al the honeſt men of LACEDÆMON, for the hope they had to find him a protector and defendor of their liberty. Wherefore, when the tyrant Nabis houſe and goods were ſold, as forfeited to the ſtate: they reſolued in their counſell to make him a preſent of the money thereof, which amounted to the ſum of ſixeſcore talents, and ſent ambaſſadours purpoſely vnto him, to offer it him. Then Philopœmen ſhewed himſelfe plainely to be no counterfeit honeſt man, but a good man indeed. For firſt of all, there was not one of all the LACEDÆMONIANS that durſt preſume to offer him this mony, but euery man was afraid to tell him of it: and euery body that was appointed to do it, made ſome excuſe or other for themſelues. Notwithſtanding, in the end they made one Timolaus to take the matter vpon him, who was his familiar friend, and alſo his hoſt. And yet the ſame Timolaus when he came vnto MEGALIPOLIS, and was lodged & entertained in Philopœmẽs houſe, did ſo much reuerence him for his wiſe talke and conuerſation, for his moderate diet, & iuſt dealing with all men: that he ſaw there was no likely poſſibility to corrupt him with money, ſo as he durſt not once open his mouth to ſpeake to him of the preſent he had brought him, but found ſome other occaſion to excuſe the cauſe of his coming vnto him. And being ſent vnto him again the ſecond time, he did euen as much as at the firſt time. And making a third proofe, he ventured at the laſt to open the matter vnto him, and told him the good-will the city of SPARTA did beare him. Philopœmen became a glad man to heare it: and when he had heard all he had to ſay to him, he went himſelf vnto the city of SPARTA. There he declared vnto the counſell, that it was not honeſt men and their good friends, they ſhould ſeeke to winne and corrupt with money, conſidering they might command their vertue vpon any occaſion, without coſt vnto them: but that they ſhould ſeeke to bribe naughty men with money, and ſuch as by ſeditious orations in counceil did mutine, and put a whole city in vprore: to the end that hauing their mouths ſtopped with gifts, they ſhould trouble them the leſſe in the cõmonwealth. For ſaid he, it is more neceſſary to ſtop your enemies mouths, & to ſow vp their lips from liberty of ſpeaking, then it is to keepe your friends from it. So noble a man was Philopœmen againſt all couetouſneſſe of mony. Shortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS beginning to ſtir again, Diophanes (who was then general of the ACHAIANS) being aduertiſed of it, began to prepare to puniſh thẽ. The LACEDÆMONIANS on the other ſide preparing for the wars, did ſet all the country of PELOPONNESVS in armes. Hereupon Philopœmen ſought to pacifie Diophanes anger, declaring vnto him, that king Antiochus, and the ROMAINES, being at wars, together at that preſent time, and they both hauing puiſſant armies one againſt another in the middeſt of GREECE, it was meet for a good generall and wiſe gouernor, to haue an eye to their doings, to be carefull of the ſame, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thing within his country at that inſtant, but therather to diſſemble it, & not to ſeeme to heare any fault whatſoeuer they did. Diophanes would not be perſwaded, but entred the territories of LACEDÆMON with a great army, & T. Quintius Flaminius with him: and they together marched directly towards the city of SPARTA. Philopœmen was ſo mad with their doings, that he took vpon him an enterpriſe not very lawfull, nor altogether iuſt: neuertheleſſe his attempt proceeded of a noble mind & great courage. For he got into the city of SPARTA, and being but a priuate perſon, kept out the generall of the ACHAIANS, and the Conſul of the ROMAINS for entring the city: and when he had pacified all troubles and ſeditions in the ſame, he deliuered it vp again as it was before, into the hands of the communalty of the ACHAIANS. Neuertheles himſelfe being afterwards general of the ACHAIANS, did compel the LACEDÆMONIANS to receiue thoſe home again whom they had baniſhed for certain faults, & did put 80 naturall borne citizens of SPARTA vnto death, as Polybius writeth: or 350, as Ariſtocrates another hiſtoriographer reciteth. Then he pulled downe the walles of the city, and razed them to the ground, and took away the moſt part of their territories, and gaue them to the MEGALIPOLITANS. All thoſe whom the tyrants had made free denizens of SPARTA, he compelled them to depart the country of LACEDÆMON, and forced them to dwel in ACHAIA, three thouſand onely excepted, who would not obey his commandement: all thoſe he ſold for ſlaues, and with the money he made of them (to ſpite them the more) he built a goodly faire walke within the city of MEGALIPOLIS. Yet furthermore, to do the LACEDÆMONIANS all the miſchiefe he could, and as it were, to treade them vnder the feete in their moſt grieuous miſerie, he did a moſt cruell and vniuſt act toward them. For he compelled them to leaue the diſcipline and manner of education of their children, which Lycurgus had of old time inſtituted: and made them to follow the maner the ACHAIANS vſed, in lieu of their old grounded countrey cuſtome, becauſe he ſaw they would neuer be humble minded, ſo long as they kept Lycurgus order and inſtitution. Thus were they driuen to put their heads in the coller, by the miſerable miſhap that befell them: and in all deſpite, to ſuffer Philopœmen in this manner to cut aſunder (as it were) the ſinewes of their cõmonwealth. But afterwards they made ſute to the ROMAINS, that they might be ſuffered to enioy their ancient diſcipline againe, which being granted them, they ſtraight left the maner of the ACHAIANS, and did ſet vp againe as much as was poſſible (after ſo great miſerie and corruption of their maners) their old ancient cuſtomes & orders of their country. Now about the time the wars began in GREECE betweene the ROMAINES and king Antiochus, Philopœmen was then a priuate man, and without any authority. He ſeeing that king Antiochus lay ſtill in the city of CHALCIS, and did nothing but feaſt and loue, and had maried a young maid farre vnmeete for his yeares: & perceiuing that his SYRIAN ſouldiers wandred vp & down the towns in great diſorder, playing many lewde parts without guide of Captaines, he was very ſory he was

was not at that time Generall of the Achaians, and told the Romaines, that he enuied their victorie, hauing warres with enemies that were so easily to be ouercome. For said he) if Fortune fauoured me that I were Generall of the Achaians at this present, I would haue killed them euery man in the cellars and tippling houses. Now when the Romaines had ouercome Antiochus, they began to haue surer footing in Greece, and to compasse in the Achaians on all sides, and specially, by reason the Heads and gouernours of the cities about them did yeeld to the Romaines, to win their fauour. And now their greatnesse grew in hast, by the fauour of the gods, so as they were become the monarch of the whole world, who brought them now to the end that Fortune had determined. Philopœmen in the meane time did like a good pylot, resisting against the billowes and roughnesse of the waues. And though for the time he was forced to giue place, and to let things passe, yet for all that he was against the Romains, and did withstand them in the most part of their proceedings, by seeking euer to defend the liberty of those, who by their eloquence and well doing carried great authority among the Achaians. And when Aristænetus Magalipolitan, (a man of great authoritie among the Achaians, and one that euer bare great deuotion to the Romaines) said in open Senate among the Achaians, that they should denie the Romaines nothing, nor shew themselues vnthankfull to them: Philopœmen hearing what he said, held his peace a while and suffered him to speake (though it boiled in his heart, he was so angry with him) and in the end, breaking all patience, and as one ouercome with choler, he said: Aristænetus, why haue you such haste to see the vnfortunate end of Greece? Another time when Manius Consull of Rome (after he had conquered king Antiochus) did make request to the councell of the Achaians, that such as were banished from Lacedæmon, might return home into their country againe, and that Titus Quintius Flaminius also did earnestly intreat them: Philopœmen was against it, not for any hatred he bare vnto the banished men, but because he would haue done it by his owne meane, and the onely grace of the Achaians, to the end they should not be beholding for so good a turne, neither vnto Titus, nor yet to the Romaines. Afterwards he himselfe, being Generall of the Achaians, did restore them wholy to their owne againe. Thus was Philopœmen sometime a litle too bold and quarrellous, by reason of his great stomack: & specially when any man sought for to haue things by authority. Lastly, being threescore & ten yeares of age, he was ý eight time chosen General of the Achaians, and hoped well, not only to passe the yeare of his charge in peace and quietnesse, but also all the rest of his life without any stir of new wars, he saw the affaires of Greece take so good successe. For like as the force and strength of sickenesse declineth, as the natural strength of the sickly body impaireth: so through all the cities & people of Greece, the desire of quarrel & of wars surceased, as their power diminished. Neuerthelts, in the end of his yeares gouernment, the gods diuine (who iustly punish all insolent words and deeds) threw him to the ground, as they suffer a rider vnfortunately to take a fall of his horse, being come almost to the end of his cariere. For they write, that he being in a place on a time amongst good company, where one was maruellously praised for a good captaine, said vnto them: Why masters, can ye commend him that was contented to be taken prisoner aliue of his enemies? Shortly after came newes that Dinocrates Messinian (a priuate enemie of Philopœmens for certaine controuersies past betweene them, and a man generally hated besides of all honourable and vertuous men, for his licentious wicked life) had withdrawne the city of Messina from the deuotion of the Achaians: and moreouer, that he came with an army to take a towne called Colonide. Philopœmen was at that time in the city of Argos, sicke of an Ague, & yet hearing these newes, took his iorney towards Megalipolis, making all the haste he could possible, for that he came aboue 4. hundred furlongs that day. Straight he departed thence towards Messina, and taried not, but tooke with him a company of men at armes of the lustiest and wealthiest Megalipolitans: who were all young noble men of the city, and willingly offered themselues to go with him for the good will they bare him, & for the desire they had to follow his valiantnes. Thus went they on their way towards the city of Messina, & marched so long, that they came neare to the hill of Euander, where they met with Dinocrates and his company, and gaue so fierce an onset on thẽ that they made them all turne taile: howbeit in the meane while, there came a releefe of 500 men to Dinocrates, which he had left to keepe the countrey of Messina. The flying men that were scattered here and there, seeing this supply, gathered themselues againe together, and shewed vpon the hils. Philopœmen fearing to be enuironed, & being desirous to bring his men safe home againe, who moſt of loue had followed him: began to march away through narrow buſhy places, himſelf being in the rereward, and turned oftentimes vpon his enemies, and skirmiſhed with them, onely to driue them away from following of the reſt of his company, and not a man that durſt once ſet vpon him: for they did but cry out aloofe, and wheele as it were about him. Howbeit Philopœmen ſundry times venturing farre from his company, to giue theſe young noble men leaſure to ſaue themſelues one after another: tooke no heede to himſelfe that he was alone enuironed on euerie ſide with a great number of enemies. Notwithſtanding, of all his enemies there was not a man that durſt come to handſtrokes with him, but ſtill ſlinging and ſhooting at him a farre off, they draue him in the end amongſt ſtony places betweene hewne rocks, where he had much ado to guide his horſe, although he had ſpurred him that he was al of a gore bloud. And as for his age, that did not let him but he might haue ſaued himſelfe; for he was ſtrong and luſtie by the continuall exerciſe he tooke: but by curſed happe his body being weake with ſickneſſe, and wearie with the long iourney he had made that day, he found himſelfe very heauie & ill diſpoſed, that his horſe ſtumbling with him, threw him to the ground. His fall was very great, and bruſed all his head, that he lay for dead in the place a great while, and neuer ſtirred nor ſpake: ſo that his enemies thinking he had bene dead, came to turne his bodie to ſtrip him. But when they ſaw him lift vp his head and open his eyes, then many of them fell all at once vpon him and tooke him, and bound both his hands behind him, and did all the villany and miſchiefe they could vnto him, and ſuch, as one would little haue thought Dinocrates would haue vſed in that ſort, or that he could haue had ſuch an ill thought towards him. So they that tarried behind in the city of MESSINA, were maruellous glad when they heard theſe newes, and ran all to the gates of the citie to ſee him brought in. When they ſaw him thus ſhamefully bound and pinioned, againſt the dignitie of ſo many honours as he had receiued, and of ſo many triumphs & victories as he had paſſed: the moſt part of them wept for pity, to conſider the miſhap and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is ſo litle certainetie, as in manner it is nothing. Then beganne there ſome courteous ſpeech to run in the mouthes of the people by litle & litle that they ſhould remember the great good he had done them in times paſt, and the liberty he had reſtored them vnto, when he expulſed the tyrant Nabis out of MESSINA. But there were other againe (howbeit very few) that to pleaſe Dinocrates, ſaid they ſhould hang him on a gibbet, & put him to death as a dangerous enemy, and that would neuer forgiue man that had once offended him: and the rather, becauſe he would be more terrible to Dinocrates then euer he was before, if he eſcaped his hands, receiuing ſuch open ſhame by him. Neuertheleſſe, in the end they carried him into a certaine dungeon vnder the ground, called the Treaſurie, (which had neither light nor aire at all into it, nor doore, nor halfe doore, but a great ſtone rolled on the mouth of the dungeon) and ſo they did let him downe the ſame, and ſtopped the hole againe with the ſtone, and watched it with armed men for to keepe him. Now when theſe young noble ACHAIAN horſemen had fled vpon the ſpurre a great way from the enemy, they remembred themſelues, and looked round about for Philopœmen: and finding him not in ſight, they ſuppoſed ſtraight, he had bene ſlaine. Thereupon they ſtaid a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiuing he anſwered not, they began to ſay among themſelues, they were beaſts and cowards to fly in that ſort: and how they were diſhonoured for euer ſo to haue forſaken their Captaine, to ſaue themſelues, who had not ſpared his owne life to deliuer them from danger. Hereupon riding on their way, and enquiring ſtill for him, they were in the end aduertiſed how he was taken. And then they went and carried thoſe newes through all the townes and cities of ACHAIA, which were very ſorry for him, and tooke it as a ſigne of great ill fortune toward them. Wherupon they agreed to ſend ambaſſadors forthwith to the MESSINIANS, to demand him: and in the meane time euery man ſhould prepare to arme themſelues to go thither, and get him either by force or loue. When the ACHAIANS had thus ſent, Dinocrates feared nothing ſo much, as that delay of time might ſaue Philopœmens life: wherefore to preuent it, as ſoone as night came, and that the people were at reſt, he ſtraight cauſed the ſtone to be rolled from the mouth of the dungeon, and willed the hangman to be let downe to Philopœmen with a cup of poiſon to offer him, who was commanded alſo not to go from him, vntill he had drunke it. When the hangman was come downe, he found Philopœmen laid on the ground vpon a litle cloake, hauing no liſt to ſleepe, he was ſo grieuouſly troubled in his mind. Who when he ſaw light, and the man ſtanding by him, holding a cup in his hand with this poiſon, he ſate vpright vpon his couch, howbeit with great paine, he was ſo weak:

and taking the cup in his hand, asked the hangman if he heard any newes of the horsemen that came with him, specially of Lycortas. The hangman made him answer, that the most of them were saued. Then he cast his hands a litle ouer his head, and looking merrily on him, he said: It is wel, seeing we are not all vnfortunate. Therewith speaking no mo words, nor making other ado, he drunke vp all the poison, and laid him down as before. So nature stroue not much withal, his body being brought so low, and thereupon the poison wrought his effect, and rid him straight out of his paine. The news of his death ran presently through all Achaia, which generally frō high to low was lamented. Wherupon al the Achaians youth & counsellers of their cities & towns, assembled themselues in the city of Megalipolis, where they all agreed without delay to reuenge his death. They made Lycortas their General, vnder whose conduct they inuaded the Messinians, with force and violence, putting all to the fire and sword: so as the Messinians were so feared with this mercilesse furie, that they yeelded themselues and wholly consented to receiue the Achaians into their citie. But Dinocrates would not giue them leisure to execute him by iustice, for he killed himselfe: and so did all the rest make themselues away, who gaue aduise that Philopœmen should be put to death. But those that would haue had Philopœmen hanged on a gibbet, Lycortas caused them to be taken, which afterwards were put to death with al kind of torments. That done, they burnt Philopœmēs body, & did put his ashes into a pot. Then they straight departed from Messina, not in disorder, one vpon anothers necke as euery man listed: but in such an order & ray, that in the middest of the funerals, they did make a triumph of victory. For the soldiers were all crowned with garlands of lautel in token of victory, notwithstanding, the teares ran downe their cheekes in token of sorow, and they led their enemies prisoners, shackled and chained. The funerall-pot in the which were Philopœmens ashes, was so couered with garlands of flowers, nosegayes, & laces, that it could scant be seene or discerned, and was caried by one Polybius a young man, the son of Lycortas, that was General at that time to the Achaians: about whom there marched all the noblest & chiefest of the Achaians, and after them also followed all the souldiers armed, and their horses very well furnished. The rest, they were not so sorowful in their countenance, as they are commonly which haue great cause of sorow: nor yet so ioyful, as those that came conquerors frō so great a victory. Those of the cities, towns, & villages in their way as they past, came and presented themselues vnto them, to touch the funerall-pot of his ashes, euen as they were wont to take him by the hand, and to make much of him when he was returned from the warres: and did accompany his conuoy vnto the city of Megalipolis: at the gates whereof, were old men, women and children, which thrusting thēselues amongst the souldiers, did renew the teares, sorrowes, & lamentations of all the miserable and vnfortunate citie: who took it that they had lost with their citizens, the first & chiefest place of honour among the Achaians. So he was buried very honorably as appertained vnto him: and the other prisoners of Messina, were all stoned to death, about his sepulcher. Al the other cities of Achaia, besides many other honours they did vnto him, did set vp statues, as like to him as could be counterfeited. Afterwards in the vnfortunate time of Grece, when the citie of Corinth was burnt & destroyed by the Romains, there was a malicious Romaine that did what he could to haue the same pulled downe againe, by burdening and accusing Philopœmen (as if he had bene yet aliue) that he was alwayes enemie to the Romaines, and enuied much their prosperitie and victories. But after Polybius had answered him, neither the Consull Mummius, nor his counsellors, nor lieutenants, would suffer them to deface & take away the honors done in memory of so famous and worthy a man, although he had many waies done much hurt vnto Titus Quintius Flaminius, and vnto Manius. So, these good men then made a difference betweene duty and profite: and did thinke honestie and profit two distinct things, and so separated one from the other, according to reason & iustice. Moreouer they were perswaded, that like as men receiue courtesie and goodnesse of any, so are they bound to requite them againe with kindnesse and dutie. And as men vse to acknowledge the same: euen so ought men to honour and reuerence vertue.

Titus Quintius Flaminius.

IT is easie to see Titus Quintius Flaminius forme and stature, by Philepœmen statue of brasse, to whom we compare him: the which is now set vp at ROME, neare to great Apollo that was brought from CARTHAGE, and is placed right against the coming into the shew-place, vnder which there is an inscription in Greeke letters. But for his nature and conditions, they say of him thus: he would quickly be angry, and yet very ready to pleasure men againe. For if he did punish any man that had angred him, he would do it gently, but his anger did not long continue with him. He did good also to many, and euer loued them whom he had once pleasured, as if they had done him some pleasure: and was readie to do for them still whom he found thankfull, because he would euer make them beholding to him, and thought that as honourable a thing as he could purchase to himselfe, because he greatly sought honour aboue all things, when any notable seruice was to be done, he would do it himselfe, and no man should take it out of his hand. He would euer be rather with thē that needed his helpe, then with those that could help him, or do him good. For, the first he esteemed as a meane to exercise his vertue with: the other, he took them as his fellowes and followers of honor with him. He came to mans state, when the city of ROME had greatest warres and trouble: At that time all the youth of ROME, which were of age to carie weapon were sent to the war to learne to traile the pike, and how to become good captaines. Thus was he entred into martiall affaires, and the first charge he tooke, was in the warre against Hannibal of CARTHAGE, where he was made Colonell of a thousand footemen, vnder Marcellus the Consull: who being slaine by an ambush Hannibal had laid for him betweene the cities of BANCIA and VENVSA, then they did chuse Titus Quintius Flaminius gouernour of the prouince and city of TARENTVM, which was now taken againe the second time. In this gouernment of his, he wanne the reputation as much of a good and iust man, as he did of an expert and skilfull captain. By reason whereof, when the ROMAINES were requested to send men to inhabite the cities of NARNIA and COSSA, he was appointed the chiefe leader of them, which chiefly gaue him heart and courage to aspire at the first to the Consulship, passing ouer all other meane offices, as to be Ædile, Tribune, or Prætor, by which (as by degrees) other yong men were wont to attaine the Consulship. Therefore when the

the time came that the Conſuls ſhould be elected, he did preſent himſelfe among other, accompanied with a great number of thoſe he had brought with him, to inhabite the two new townes, who did make earneſt ſute for him. But the two Tribunes Fuluius & Manlius, ſpake againſt him, and ſaid: it was out of all reaſon, that ſo yong a man ſhould in ſuch manner preaſe to haue the office of the higheſt dignitie, againſt the vſe and cuſtome of ROME, before he had paſſed through the inferiour offices of the common wealth. Neuertheleſſe, the Senate preferred it wholy to the voices of the people: who preſently pronounced him Conſull openly, with Sextius Ælius, although he was not yet thirtie yeares old. Afterwards, Ælius and he deuiding the offices of the ſtate by lot, it fel vpon T. Quintius to make war with Philip king of MACEDON. In the which me thinkes fortune greatly fauoured the ROMAINS affaires, that made ſuch a man General of theſe wars: for, to haue appointed a Generall that by force and violence would haue ſought all things at the MACEDONIANS hands, that were a people to be won rather by gentlenes & perſwaſions, then by force and compulſion: it was all againſt themſelues. Philip to maintaine the brunt of a battell againſt the ROMAINES, had power enough of his own in his Realme of MACEDON: but to make war any long time, to furniſh himſelfe with mony and victuals, to haue a place & cities to retire vnto: and laſtly, to haue all other neceſſaries for his men and army, it ſtood him vpon to get the force of GREECE. And had not the force of GREECE bene politickly cut frō him, the wars againſt him had not bene ended with one battell. Moreouer, GREECE (which neuer before bare the ROMAINES any great good will) would not haue dealt then ſo inwardly in friendſhip with them, had not their General bene (as he was) a gentle perſon, lowly and tractable, that wan them more by his wiſedome, then by his force, and could both eloquently vtter his mind to them, and courteouſly alſo heare them ſpeake, that had to do with him, and chiefly miniſtred iuſtice, and equitie to euery man alike. For it is not to be thought that GREECE wold otherwiſe ſo ſoone haue withdrawne themſelues from the rule of thoſe, with whom they were acquainted, and gouerned: and haue put themſelues vnder the rule of ſtrangers, but that they ſaw great iuſtice and lenitie in them. Howbeit that may more plainely appeare by declaring of his acts. Titus was informed, that the Generals before him ſent to the warre in MACEDON (as Sulpitius, and Publius Iulius) vſed to come thither about the latter end of the yeare, and made but cold wars, and certaine light skirmiſhes, as ſometime in one place, and ſometime in another againſt Philip, & all to take ſome ſtraight, or to cut off victuals: which he thought was not his way to follow their example. For they tarrying at home, conſumed the moſt of their Conſulſhip at ROME, in matters of gouernment, and ſo enioyed the honour of their office. Afterwards in the end of their yeare, they would ſet out to the wars, of intent to get another yeare ouer their heads in their office, that ſpēding one yeare in their Cōſulſhip at home, they might employ the other in the wars abroad. But Titus not minding to trifle out ẏ half of his Conſulſhip at ROME, & the other abroad in the wars: did willingly leaue al his honors & dignities, he might haue enioyed by his office at ROME and beſought the Senate that they wold appoint his brother Lucius Quintius lieutenant of their army by ſea. Furthermore, he took with him ſelf about three thouſand old ſoldiers of thoſe that had firſt ouerthrowne Aſdrubal in SPAINE, and Hanibal afterwards in AFRIKE, vnder the conduct of Scipio, which yet were able to ſerue, and were very willing to go with him in his iourney, to be the ſtrength of his army. With this company he paſſed the ſeas without danger, & landed in EPIRVS, where he found Publius Iulius encamped with his army before King Philip, who of long time had lien in camp about the mouth of ẏ riuer of Apſus, to keep their ſtraight & paſſage which is the entry into EPIRVS. So that Publius Iulius had lien ſtill there, and done nothing, by reaſon of the natural force & hardnes of the place. Then Titus took the army of him, & ſent him to ROME. Afterwards, himſelf went in perſon to view & cōſider the nature of the coū ry, which was in this ſort. It is a long vally walled on either ſide with great high mountains, as thoſe which ſhut in the vally of Tempe in THESSALY: howbeit it had no ſuch goodly woods, nor greene foreſts, nor faire medows, nor other like places of pleaſure, as the other ſide had: but it was a great deep mariſh or quauemire, through the middeſt wherof the riuer called Apſus did run being in greatneſſe & ſwiftneſſe of ſtreame, very like to the riuer of PENEVS. The riuer did occupy al the ground at the feete of the mountaines, ſauing a litle way that was cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand, & a narrow ſtraight path by the waters ſide, very vnhandſome for an army to paſſe that way, though they found not a man to keep the paſſage. There were ſome in the army that counſelled Titus to fetch a great compaſſe about by the country of DASSARETIDE, and by the
